Most persons will agree that the toad is ugly and venomous, but few indeed are the persons who can boast of having actually discovered that "precious jewel in his head." Shakspeare, we may assume as a philosopher, but calamity may be classed in two great divisions—1st, The afflictions, which the gradation can avert; 2d, The misfortunes, which men take all possible pains to bring upon themselves. Adherents of the first class may but call forth our sympathy, and result in our aid; those of the second, if they have any virtue, find in it the jewel. But to get at the jewel we must kill the toad. Misfortune of the second class but too often increases the vices or the vices by which they are inherited. Such is the adversity which is all toad and no jewel. If you choose to look for the jewel you see the toads, the increase of the venom absorbs every bit of the jewel.

NEVER did I know a man who was an habitual gambler, otherwise than notably inaccurate in his calculations of probabilities in the ordinary affairs of life. Is it that such a man has become so obstinate a dreamer about money, that he sees double every chance in his favor?

Jasper Losely had counted upon two things as matters of course.

1st. Darrell's speedy reconciliation with his only child.

2d. That Darrell's only child must of necessity be Darrell's heiress.

In both these assertions the gambler was deceived.

Darrell did not even answer the letters that Matilda addressed to him from France, to the shores of which Jasper had borne her, and where he had been suffered to make her his bride under his assumed name of Hammond, but his true Christian name of Jasper.

In the disreputable marriage Matilda had made, all the worst parts of her character seemed suddenly revealed to her father, and when he saw what he had hitherto sought not to see, the true child of a mother whom he had loved mistakenly, if palliated by long or familiar acquaintance with the object, however it might have gulled him, his heart taught him to detect; but here, without even a struggle of duty, without the ordinary excuses of maiden pride, to be won with so scanty a wooing, by a man who she knew was betrothed to another—the dissimulation, the perfidy, the combined effrontery and meanness of the whole transaction, left no force in Darrell's eye for the gentleness and excuses of inexperience and youth. Darrell would not have been Darrell if he could have taken back to his home or his heart a daughter so old in deceit, so worthless in the things that are dishonor.

Darrell's silence, however, little saddened the heartless bride, and little damped the sanguine bridegroom. Both thought that pardon and plenty were but the affair of time—two little more or little less. But their funds rapidly diminished; it became necessary to recruit them. One can't live in hotels entirely on one's credit. Leaving his bride for a while in a pleasant provincial town, not many hours distant from Paris, Jasper returned to London, intent upon seeing Darrell himself; and should the father-in-law still remain obdurate, to make him comprehend that he could have no trouble in raising a present supply upon such a son-in-law's future expectations. Darrell at once consented to see Jasper, not at his own house, but at his solicitor's. Jasper was not surprised, therefore, at a proud gentleman deemed this condescension extorted on the part of Darrell a concession worthy of those revolvers upon which depended the worldly station and prospects of the wedded pair.

Mr. Gotobed, senior, in the lawyer's cloud's office, Darrell was alone, standing near the hearth, and with his arm resting upon the mantelpiece, that tender truth toward his breast which Jasper had elaborately prepared; but the moment the first time he met his son-in-law, and perhaps yet more resentfully mortified while recognizing those personal advantages of a lower prodigate which had rendered a daughter of his house so facile a conquest; Jasper's color fled, chosen to the last to himself at least, the eminent must necessarily be old and broken) shocked and disappointed at the sight of a man in the vigor of a man still young, under forty, with a countenance, a port, a presence, that in any assemblage would have at once singled out Jasper from his own brilliant self, and looking altogether as unfavorably as that self could look in the noise of pot-mets, as unlikely to breathe out a blessing or to give up the ghost, as the word bestow a benefit or resign a place or pension. Nor were Darrell's words more comforting than his aspect.

"Sir, I have consented to see you, partly that you may learn from my own lips once for all that I admit no man's right to enter my family, that I am not my consent, and that consent you will never receive, and partly that, then knowing exactly how or by what, you may know the man it becomes him most to avoid. The lady who is now your wife is entitled to all the considerations due to the reversion of a small fortune at my death; nothing more from me is she likely to inherit. As I have no more than this one to say, I once gave the name of daughter should be dependent wholly on yourself for bread as you have for it inform you on what conditions I am willing, during my life, to pay the interest of the sum to which will go your wife at my death. Sir, it return to your hands the letters that lady has addressed to myself which, if by you or by her, I once were written at your dictation. No letter from her to myself, or to any one else, has ever old her foot will never pass. Thus, Sir, concludes all possible intercourse between you and myself; what rests is between you and me, as gentleman."

Darrell had opened a side-door in speaking the last words—pointed toward the respectable form of Mr. Gotobed standing tall beside his tall desk—and Jasper could have seen the old sword, the father-in-law gone.

With Jasper's departure Mr. Gotobed made Jasper fully aware that not only all Mr. Darrell's fondest or personal property was entirely at his own disposal, but that all the late years landed estates he had purchased (and which Jasper had supposed to be unconditionally in the strict entail) were in the same condition—conditution enviable to the proprietor, odious to the disappointed, as Jasper could not but perceive, but that even the fee-simple of the poor Fawley Manor House was entirely at Darrell's will, unencumbered only by the portion of £10,000 which the late Mrs. Darrell had brought to her husband, and which was to go, on the death of herself and Darrell, on the children of the marriage.

In the absence of marriage-settlements between Jasper and Matilda, that sum at Darrell's death was liable to be claimed by the eldest child—right of his wife, so as to leave no certainty that a succession would not be claimed by the wife and family; and the contingent reversion might, in the mean time, be so dealt with as to be of no value whatever to any one else.

"Sir," said the lawyer, "I will be quite frank with you. By my will, now executed, I have full power to settle this sum of £10,000 on your wife, and my children she may bear you, to its latest issue of any degree of consanguinity to those of, even with Mr. Hammond's consent. If your part in this matter be honorable and reasonable one, you are entitled to compensation. I am prepared to make that compensation liberal. Perhaps you will see your own interests best with me though your own solicitor. But I should tell you, at my time of life, I consider it no disadvantage to you, in proposition as no position is confined to us two. It might, for instance, be agreeable to you to purchase with your true name (I have you a thousand pardons) a seat Hammond. In a secret ear I tell you I move you can keep it to yourself, the better I think it will be for you. We have no wish to be known."

Jasper by this time had somewhat recovered the first shock of displeasure and disappointment; and with that quickness which we cruelly darted through a mind that contrived to be dull often any thing honest was addressed to its apprehension, he instantly divined that Mr. Gotobed was not in the secret of Darrell's will. He had no idea of resuming—no, indeed, at that time anxious altogether to ignore and eschew it; but he had a right to it, and a man's rights are not to be resigned for nothing. Accordingly, he said with some asperity, "I shall resume my family name whenever I choose it. If Mr. Darrell does not like his daughter to be called Mrs. Jasper Losely—or all the malignant attributions which an injured father's exasperation may attribute, which we may believe that innate trial might provoke—he must, at least, ask me as a favor to retain the name I have honorably given to my wife in my family. Mr. Losely married a Hammond, I forget when —generations ago—and I see it in the Heralds' Mr. Gotobed, Sir Julian, was not a crack lawyer, but he was a harvest of as good sense as any in the county; and by Mr. Jasper—(Jasper's voice trembled)—"my father," he added, hurriedly striking his clenched hand on the table, "was a gentleman every inch of his body; and I'll pitch any man out of the window that says he was not so in the country!"

"Sir," said Mr. Gotobed, shrinking toward the bell-pull, "I think, on the whole, I had better see your solicitor."

Jasper cooled down at that suggestion; and, with a slight apology for natural excitement, begged to know what Mr. Gotobed wished to propose. The latter, on the first part of the story, after two or three interviews, in which the two negotiators learned to understand each other, as a settlement was finally completed, by which the sum of £10,000 was inalienably settled on Mrs. Jasper Losely and the children of Mr. Jasper; in case he survived her, the interest was to be his for life—in case she died childless, she could assign the capital to himself at absolute decease. Meanwhile, Darrell agreed to pay £200 a year, quarterly, for so long, too, as he forbore directly, or indirectly, to molest, or even to address the person at whose pleasure it was held. Should he break the conditions to the per were sufficiently favorable: he came into an income unexpectedly beyond his right to believe that he should ever enjoy; and sufficient —well managed—for even a fair share of the happiness or the misfortunes of life, to the man couple blessed in each other's love, and remote from the temptations of the fashionable gambling of this opulent England, where, out of fear to be thought too poor, nobody is ever too rich.

Matilda returned to Darrell. But some months afterward he received an extremely well-expressed note in French, the writer and date of represented herself as a French lady, who had very lately seen Madame Hammond—was now in London for a few days, and had, under the thing to communicate, of such importance as to justify the liberty she took in requesting to be honor her with a visit. After some little hesitation, Darrell called on this lady. Though Matilda had forbidden to see him, he could not contemplate her profitable fate without painful anxiety. Perhaps Jasper had ill-used her; perhaps she had need of shelter elsewhere. Though that shelter could not again be under a father's roof, though Darrell would have taken no step to separate her from the husband she had chosen, he was not the man to be the felt comparative relief and ease had she herself sought to divide her fate from one whose harsh dominion over her she could not judge strictly divided. With an idea that some communication might be made to him, or that he might reply that Matilda, if compelled to quit her husband, should never want the home and subsistence which he could give, Darrell went to the house (a handsome house in a quiet fashionable square) to which he was directed.

A tall chasseur, in full costume, opened the door —a page usurped him into the drawing-room. He saw a lady young—and with all the air and of a Parisienne in her manner—who, after some preparatory phrases of courtesy, informed him (as a testimonial of the intimacy between herself and Madame Hammond) a letter she had received from her friend, in a very hurried, unfamiliar strain, full of professions of gratitude—of a genuine attachment—of a sincere friendliness—but far from complaining of Jasper, or hinting at the idea of deserting a spouse, with whom, but in that kindly remembrance of a beloved parent, her lot would be blessed indeed. Whatever of pity was deficient in the tone of the French lady supplied by such apparent fine feeling, and by so many touching little traits of Darrell's own daughter that Darrell's heart was cased in spite of his reason. He went away, however, with the lady's promise of sending to call no more. But another note came. The French lady had received a letter from a mutual friend—Darrell's—she feared, "most unexpectedly, ill." This took him again to the house, and he found the lady seated in a room darkened by the news she had heard—and yet so desirous not to exaggerate nor alarm him needlessly, that Darrell perceived his daughter must be dying, and became nervously anxious himself for the visit was over. Two or three more such visits in all necessarily followed the first one. Then Darrell abruptly closed the intercourse, and could only be induced to call again.

Not that he for an instant suspected that this amiable lady, who spoke so becomingly, and whose manners were so high-bred, was other than the well-born Baroness she called herself, and looked to be, but partly because, in the last interview the charming Parisienne had appeared a little to forget Mr. Hammond's existence, and to look toward her suit, cupectful desire to centre his attention more upon herself; and the moment she did so, he took a decisive leave of her which she had not before conceived; and partly because his feelings having recovered the first effect which the vision of a penitent pining, dying daughter could not fail to produce, his experience of Matilda's duplicity and falsehood made him discredit the pensiveness, the pining, and the dying. The Baroness might not willfully be deceiving him—Matilda might be willfully deceiving the Baroness. To the more shrewd, more, dispatched to him by the feeling and elegant Gotobed, he replied but by a cry evasive—a stately hint that such matters could never be satisfactorily discussed except in family intercourse, and that if her friend and she were really in any way occasioned by a lullet in the pale cheeks of his daughter was indicted on himself, it might convince her that more than half indebted, and that his wish was for her health and happiness as well as his secure, because henceforth he could neither watch over the one nor minister to the other. In this note, after a day or two, the Baroness replied by a letter so beautifully worded, I doubt whether Madame de Staël herself could have written in purer French, or Madame de Staël with a truer feeling of phrase. Though a little prone of diction, the substance was but small; "Anxiety for a friend so beloved—so unhappy—more grieved even than before, and which Mr. Hammond had been enabled to see how fondly a daughter must idolize a father in the man whom a union revered—Clare two lines devoted to compliment personal—compelled by that anxiety to quit even another day in London—demanded the metropolis of that noble country," etc.—three four lines more devoted to compliment personal)—and then proceeding through some charming sentences about parrot altars and domestic hearths, the writer ended by ordering herself—"I would intrude no more on time unlimely solicited by the sacred affections—confided with the assurance of sentiments the most distinguees." Entire thought Darrell that this communication might be the last he should ever behold, would exercise an influence over that portion of his destiny which he desired to see in him most severe from evil; toward which, then, he looked for the balm to every wound—the support in every injury.

Darrell heard no more of Matilda, till, not long afterward, he received the announcement to him. She had died from exhaustion shortly after giving birth to a female child. The news came upon him with a shock which, from no other cause—(he explanation of which, forming no part of the present history, I leave to the ingenious reader to divine)—his mind was in a state of great affliction and disorder—when he had already buried in the grave his daughter. Lady —ambition reigned and the world renounced—and the unfortunate Matilda was not dead until ten more than it might have done some months before. If, at that moment of utter bereavement, Matilda's child could best become his care—given up to him to rear—would he have rejected it? I would he have forgotten that it was a lady's grandchild? I dare not say. But his pride was not yet to such a trial. One day he received a packet, inclosing a letter, inclosing the formal certificates of the infant's death, which had been prepared for him by Jasper, who had arrived in London for that melancholy purpose, with which he combined a pecuniary proposition. As Matilda had died childless, and her only child, the sum of £10,000 absolutely reverted to Jasper in the event of Darrell's decease. As the interest meanwhile was continued to Jasper, and without counter-suggestion, Jasper proposed in a great deal to himself and no disadvantage to Darrell if the principal were made over to him at once. This was the proposition originally to commence. He had abjured all thoughts of resuming over vocation during his wife's lifetime, out of that consideration for the family and ancient birth which motives of delicacy impelled him to observe. Intercourse with Mr. Darrell was dissolved, it might be rather a relief than otherwise to feel gentlemanly and quiet in an honor due to displeasing to him was finally settled, not only in a foreign land, but in a social sense, with the dead. The insurance would soon be ignored by all who could remind Mr. Darrell that his daughter had once a child and, on the occasion that Jasper should occur again now presented itself. A trolling firm at Paris, might, but necessarily must be in its mercantile transactions, would accept him as a partner could not. Mr. Darrell would advance the said of £10,000." Not without dignity did Jasper add, "that since his connection had been so unhappily dissolved by the death of one of the very payment, each quarter, of the interest on the sum in question should be paid to the given the unwelcome remembrance of that connection, he had the less scruple in making a proposition which would relieve Mr. Darrell's mind perhaps no dislodged his alliance to get rid of him altogether." To this proposition, and to every other proposal, pleased to cut off from his life each his child henceforth link to do Jasper's, Mr. Darrell returned a decided negative across from every shilling of the marriage portion which was supposed on it as a debt, and associated with memories of unmingled bitterness. Accordingly, Mr. Gotobed, taking care first to ascertain that the letter announcing the poor child's death were genuine, accepted Jasper's cool refusal on the part of Mr. Darrell's estate. There still, however, remained the £200 a year which Jasper had received during Matilda's life, on the tacit condition of remaining Mr. Hammond, and not personally addressing Mr. Darrell. Jasper inquired if that annuity was to continue? Mr. Gotobed referred the inquiry to Darrell, observing that the object for which it was granted was now at an end. Darrell responded in the affirmative. Jasper, on the death of Mrs. Hammond and her child, accordingly ceased to receive it. He could have neither power nor pretext to molest Mr.

Darrell, and that it could signify but little what name might in future be borne by one whose connection with the Darrell family was wholly dissolved. Darrell impatiently replied, "That nothing having been said as to the withdrawal of the said allowance in case Jasper became a widower, he remained equally entitled, in point of honor, to receive that allowance, or an adequate equivalent."

This answer being intimated to Jasper, that gentleman observed "that it was no more than he had expected from Mr. Darrell's punctilio of honor," and apparently quite satisfied, carried himself and his £10,000, back to Paris. A long after, however, he wrote to Mr. Gotobed that "Mr. Darrell, having alluded to an equivalent for the £200 a year allowed to him, had kindly implying that it was no disagreeable to Mr. Jasper that the said sum should be secured in his banker's books, as it had to see there the quarterly interest of the £10,000, so Jasper might be excused in owning that he should prefer an equivalent. The commercial firm to which he was about to launch himself required a somewhat larger capital on his part than he had hoped, etc., etc. Without presuming to dictate any definite sum, he would observe that £1500, or even £1000, would be of more avail to his views and objects in life than the annuity of £200 a year, which, being held only at will, was not susceptible of a temporary loan."

Darrell, engrossed in thoughts wholly remote the recollection of Jasper, chafed at being thus recalled to the subject, and angrily answered, "I wrote back to the solicitor who transmitted to him this message, 'that on my having settled on his wife what was to be considered by Mr. Hammond's notions of its value. That the £200 a year should henceforth be placed on the same footing as the £500 a year that had been allowed on a capital of £10,000; that accordingly I might be left to suppose that a capital of £4000, for which he inclosed a check, begging Mr. Gotobed not to say to me a word, Mr. Hammond understand that there ended all possible accounts or communication between them, for never again to trouble him with any matters whatsoever in reference to affairs that were Mr. Darrell's, Mr. Jasper, and consequently the £4000, left Darrell and Gotobed in peace till the following year. He then addressed Jasper, as he had strongly plausible, business-like letter. "The firm he had entered, in the silk trade, was in the most flourishing condition, an opportunity occurred to purchase a magnificent millinery plantation in Provence, etc., etc. To guide many enquiries, etc., which would yield an immense increase of profit. That if, to insure him to the value of his interest in the concern, Mr. Darrell could accommodate him for a year with a loan of £20,000 or £30,000, reasonably calculated on attaining so high a position in the commercial world, as, though it could not render the wisdom of his advice more disinterested, Mr. Darrell would realize it less humiliating."

Mr. Gotobed, in obedience to the peremptory instructions he had received from his client, did not write the letter to Darrell, but on the occasion at that time to visit Paris on other business, he made personal enquiries of Mr. Hammond, to institute there some private inquiries about his son-in-law, and to report to him any thing about Mr. Jasper Hammond. A few fashionable English roués remembered to have seen Jasper there during Mabille balls, and shortly after her decease, a very fine-looking man about town, more seen among the demi-mondaine and lounging in the Champs Elysées, or dining at the Café de Paris, but of him that meeting had somewhere. Mr. Gotobed, then, was closely employing a commissioner to gain some information, when Mr. Hammond's visit to the private residence from which Jasper addressed his letter, ascertained that in that private residence Jasper did not reside. He paid the rent and received occasional letters, for which he called or sent; and from the person who was also a faithful and discreet functionary, declared his friend and Monsieur Hammond's friend, a large house in which he transacted business, though, where was the house, or what was the business, the garrulous Frenchman could not inform him. Police, "Monsieur Hammond was too reserved to communicate, he told too few particulars to inquire." At length Mr. Gotobed's business, which was, in fact, a commission from a distressed father to exclude an unprincipled man from a more boy, from some unhappy associations, having brought him into the neighborhood of those persons who belonged neither to the beau monde nor to the haut commerce, he gleaned from them the information he desired. Mr. Hammond lived in the very heart of a certain circle in Paris, which but few Englishmen ever penetrate. In that circle Mr. Hammond had, on receiving his late wife's dowery, become the partner in a private gambling hell; in which he had been ingulfed all the moneys he had received—a hell that ought to have prospered with him, if he could have concealed his villainous gains. His senior partner in that firm retired into the country with a fine fortune, no doubt the very owner of those millinery plantations which were so rich in the East, and per scattered Napoleons faster than any croupier could rake them away. And Jasper's natural talent for converting solid gold into thin air had been assisted by a lady, who, in the course of her amiable life, had assisted many richer men than Jasper to lodgings in St. Pelagie, or cells in the Maison des Fous. With that lady he had become acquainted during the lifetime of his wife, and it was supposed that Matilda's discovery of this fatuous had contributed perhaps to the illness which closed in her decease; the name of that lady was Gabrielle Demarets, the wife of a man who had been, in the days of Boulogne, nightly at opera-house or theatre; she had imprisonments in the Chamber d'Amis for from inaccessible to Mr. Gotobed, if he coveted the honor of her acquaintance. But Jasper was less before an admiring world. He was supposed now to be connected with another gambling-house of lower grade than the hell, in which he had contrived to break his own bank, and plunder his own till. It was supposed also that he owned a good friend in the notorious Belle Demarets; but if he visited her at her house, he was not seen by Darrell's spies. Of his temper was so uncertain, his courage so dauntless, his strength so prodigious, that gentlemen were in the habit of calling him the widow, or harlot down a stair-case, shunned the spot in which he was likely to be found, chose to encounter him. Mademoiselle Demarets had thus been condemned to the painful choice between an unsocial and that of acting, or that of any body else with the rigid privation of her sex. Not, however, that she was without the latter alternative. It was believed, however, that if ever Gabrielle Demarets should see the weakness of a kind sentiment, it was for this turbulent lady-killer; and that, with a liberality not less sure of its object than of its generosity, when she could no longer help him to squander, she would add a pinch, both to his fame and wrongly, of course, in such a reverse of the normal laws of her being, Mademoiselle Demarets sat down beside the man whom every woman but she would not have imposed upon his, and had paid with a fortune for the privilege of his at best me and beggared my friends; but to beat my friends and to beggar me—that is not the kind of love which I am willing to pay for."

Scandalized to the last nerve of his respectable system by the information which he received, Mr. Gotobed returned to London. More letters from Jasper—becoming urgent, and at last even menacing—Mr. Darrell received. To all of them, wrote back shortly "that he could not even communicate with Monsieur Jasper Hammond, and that he must peremptorily decline all further intercourse, epistolary or personal, with Mr. Hammond."

Darrell, on returning from one of the occasional months of absence, which, however, he rarely friended, melancholy," by which he broke the monotony of his Faulty life, found a letter from Jasper, and therein a letter from Matilda to herself, complaining of Mr. Gotobed's improper use, respecting her husband's character, and intimating that he could in return communicate to Mr. Darrell an intelligence that would give him more joy than it could to himself. Darrell replied that he could not, by Mr. Gotobed's own request, receive any communications from him. The revelations of Jasper's mode of life which were no delicate, or too much the reverse, to come to pass. Great Mr. Darrell's horror and memory of Jasper had hitherto been, it may with truth be observed, how much more would that memory now! No answer was, of course, vouchsafed to Jasper, who, after another assumed feeble appeal to the generosity of his enigmatical boast of the pleasurable information he was in the habit of receiving, became for a sullen silence.

One day, somewhat more than five years after Matilda's death, Darrell, coming in from his morning walks, found a stranger waiting for him. The stranger was Mr. Gotobed's clerk, who came from penal exile; and while Darrell, on hearing this unconcerned, stood mute with haughty wonder that within a visitor could have the boldness of his father's house, the convict began what seemed his prepared and premeditated speech incomprehensible—the infant Matilda had borne to Jasper, and the certificates of whose death had been so ceremoniously produced and so prudently attested, lived still! Sent out to nurse as soon as born, the child was put to a cheaper another babe, and this last was the child who had died before the eyes of Mr. Hammond. The elder Lously went on to statement out a hope that his son was not at the time aware of the fraud practised upon him, and was deceived by the nurse—that it had not been a premeditated importure of his own to obtain his wife's fortune.

When Darrell came to this part of his story, Mr. Darrell gave proof of his power of self-command. "Stop!" he said; "William Lously assisted you at this very moment in a fraud which I take was true. What proofs did he volunteer?"

"Proofs? Death, man, to you think that at such moment I had the cool self-possession to question and cross-examine? I could but bid the impostor leave the house which his feet polluted.

Alban heaved a sigh, and murmured, too low for Darrell to overhear, "Poor Matilda!" then aloud, "But, my dear friend, bear with me one moment more. Lously, by the acts of this diabolical Jasper, the exchange really had been effected, and a child to your ancient line lived still, would it not be worth your while—"

"Comfort!" cried Darrell, "comfort in the new child of the vile wife of the vile husband—my father to restore to its rank in the land, to be restored in the grandchild of a felon's—in the child of the wife of her husband's foe! You, gentleman and soldier, call that thought a comfort! Begone, sir, and tell your master so, if he lie! Not—leave such a thought to the lips of a William Lously! He indeed, clasping his hands, faltered forth some such word; he seemed to count on my forlorn privation of kith and kindred—so heir to my wealth—no representative of my race—would I deprive myself of—ay —your very words—of a solace—a comfort! He asked me, at least, to inquire."

"And you answered?"

"Answered so as to quell and crush in the bud all hopes in the success of so flagrant a falsehood—answered, 'Why inquire? Know that, even if your tale were true, I have no heir, no representative, no descendant in the child of Jasper—the grandchild of William Lously. I can at least leave my wealth to the son of Charles Haughton. True, Charles Haughton was a spendthrift—a gamester: but he was neither a professional cheat nor a convicted felon."

"You said that—oh, Darrell!"

The Colonel checked himself. But for Charles Haughton, the spendthrift and gamester, would William Lously have been the convicted felon? Not Matilda's child, but Jasper's, married one—

"And how did William Lously reply?"

"He made no reply—he skulked away without a word."

Darrell then proceeded to relate the interview which Jasper had had with him at Darrell during Lously's visit there—on Jasper's part, an attempt to blackmail Mr. Darrell, which he told—on Darrell's part, the same scornful refusal to hear it out.

"And," added Darrell, "at this moment, though it is impossible to assign any reason, had the inconceivable meanness to apply to me for a loan, I could not better show the disdain in which I held himself and his story than in recognizing his plea as a moderate asset. I threw him out at his feet, and so left him."

"But," continued Darrell, his brow growing darker and darker, "but wild and monstrous as the story was, still the idea that it smuggest be true was a supposition which derived its sole support from the character of Jasper Lously—from the interest he had in the supposed death of a child that alone stood between himself and the money he longed to grasp—an interest which ceased with the death of the child was gone, or was changed into the counter-interest of proving it alive. But, be that as it would be possible a fraud on me—still, I say, an idea that the story might be true, would force itself on my fears, and if it, though not even never to acknowledge to the child of Jasper Lously as a representative, or even as a relation of my house, would of course be immovable—yet it would become my duty to see that her infancy was sheltered, her childhood cared for, her youth guarded. Is not my duty now?"

"Right—noble—right duty," said Alban, blunt.

"Intricate sometimes are the obligations imposed on us as gentlemen; noblesse oblige's a motto which sometimes puzzles us to construe; but our duties as men are plain—the idea very properly banished from me—said—"

"And I hastened to exercise the spectre. I left England—I went to the French coon in Paris—I found Jasper—I could not, of course, make formal or avowed inquiries of a nature to which Jasper could reply with contradictions (a conspiracy there were) which threatened me. But I saw the physician who had attended both the daughter and the child—I saw them—I had seen them both when living—seen them both when dead. The doubt on my mind was dispelled—not a pretext left for my own self-torment. The only person needful in evidence was Jasper himself, and he was not there. The infant had been sent. She lived in a village some miles from Paris, and there I saw her—saw she was cut. I left word I should call the next day—I did so—I had absconded. In the night, doubtless, have traced her, but to what end, if she were merely Jasper's minion and tool? Let me spare my flight pass the pain and her terror? Indirectly I inquired into her antecedents and character. The inquiry opened a field of conjecture, from which I hastened to turn my eyes. This woman had a sister who had been in the service of Madame Demarets, and Gabrielle Demarets had been in the neighborhood during my own daughter's lifetime, and my father my wife's death. Her husband, who had had two infants under her charge; the nurse had accompanied one of them to Paris, and on Alban, if these facts be in fresh and full child by another Lously to be forced upon my purse or my pity—is it his child, not by the illfated Matilda, but by the sister of the nurse of Matilda, even in the first year of wedlock, was accused? Accused—no—absolutely could not shrink appalled from the horrible name!—to acknowledge, adopt, proclaim as the last of the Darrells, the offspring of such a union? Lously Lously and a Gabrielle Demarets!—or, when I am in my grave, some relative advanced upon the new settled by marriage articles on Matilda's issue, and which, if a child survived, could not have been made over to Jasper? Is not this claim with witnesses suborned—a claim that might be formally established—a claim that would leave the representative of Darrell of my lands and wealth, but, more precious far, of my lineage and name? Is not this possible?"

Darrell paused, almost stifling, and became so pale that Alban started from his seat in alarm.

"It is nothing," resumed Darrell, faintly; "and, ill or well, I must finish this subject now, or that we may never resume it.

"I remained abroad, as you know, for some years. During that time two or three letters from Jasper Hammond were forwarded to me; the latest in date more insolent than all preceding ones. Mr. Gotobed answered for me. If they were rights, and insinuated threats of public exposure, reflecting on myself and my pride—He was my son-in-law after all, and if he came to disgrace the world should know the tie." Enough. This is all I know until the man who now, it seems, thrusts himself forward as Jasper Lously's friend or agent, spoke to me the other night at Mrs. Haughton's. That man you have seen, and you say that he—"

"Represents Jasper's poverty as extreme; his temper unscrupulous and desperate; that he is capable of any amount of scandal or violence. It seems that rumors of a child by the Duke (he, I believe) still preserved the name of Hammond, and that in England he has reversed that of Lously; seems, by Poole's date of the time on which he, Poole, quitted Jasper's acquaintance, to have done so after his bullied attempt on you at Pawley—whether in so doing he intimated the commencement of hostilities, or whether, as is more likely, the sharper finds it convenient to have one name to go by in one country and another, 'tis useless to inquire; enough that the identity between the Hammond who married your Matilda and the Jasper Lously whose face we have transported, that unscrupulous rogue has no longer any face to conceal. It is true that the revelation of this identity would now be of slight moment to a man of the world—as thick-skinned as myself. But, pardon me, but to you it would be disgreeable—there is no denying that—and therefore, in the hope that Mr. Poole advises a compromise, by which Jasper could be secured from want and yourself from annoyance, I am of the same opinion as Mr. Poole is."

"I see it?"

"Certainly. My dear Darrell, if in your secret heart there was something so galling in the thought that the man who had married your daughter, though without your consent, was not even to the commonplace extent of decency the world supposed, but the son of that poor dear—I mean, that raised who was transported, Jasper, but, indeed, a cheat and a swindler—that galled you so that you have concealed the true facts from myself and Mr. Gotobed till this day—if it has cost you even now so sharp a pang to divulge the true name of Mr. Hammond, whose acquaintance society now, when even gossip has forgotten in connection with yourself to bear inconvenience to you, I am willing to have this man watching for you in the streets, some wretched girl in his hand, and crying out, 'A penny for your son-in-law's wife's poor grandchild!' Pardon me—I must be blunt. You can give him to the police—transport him to the treadmill. Does that mend the matter? Or, worse still, suppose the man commits some crime that fills the newspapers with his life and adventures, including, of course, his runaway marriage with the fiance to Darrell's heiress —no one would blame you, no one respect you less; but do not tell me that you would not be glad to save your daughter's name from being coupled with such a miscreant's, at the price of half your fortune?"

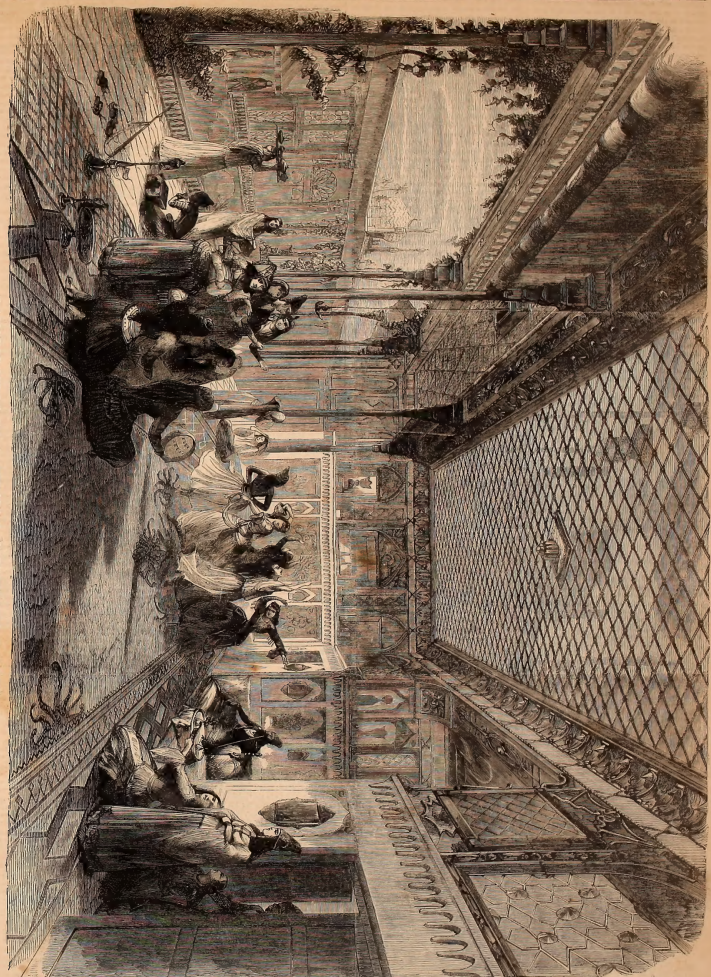
"Alban," said Darrell, gloomily, "you can say nothing on this score that has not been considered by myself. But I am willing to place the matter that honor itself forbids me to bargain with him for the price of his silence. So long as he threatens, I can not buy off a threat —so long as he persists in a story by which he would establish a claim on the property of a child whom I have every motive, as well as every reason, to believe dead—whether he be what whatever I bestowed on himself would seem like hush-money to suppress that claim."

"Of course," Alban understood entirely agree with you. But if the man retract all threats, confess his imposture to be a mere pretended offspring, and consent to retire for life to a distant colony, upon an annuity that may suffice for his wants, leave no room for regret, to render more glaring his vices, or more effective the power of which he has made a bad usage between Mr. Poole and myself, I think that your peace might be permanently secured without the slightest sacrifice of honor. Will you leave the matter in my hands, on this assurance — that I will not give him anything except on the conditions I have stated?"

"On these conditions, and most gratefully," said Darrell, his whole face lighting. But one favor more: never again speak to me (unless absolutely necessary) in reference to this dark portion of my inner life."

Alban pressed his friend's hand, and both parties sliced for the moment. He said the Colonel, with an attempt at cheerfulness, "Darrell, more than ever now I feel glad that the new house at Fawley, so long suspended, must be finished. Marry again you must! You can not live alone! And remembrances when you can supplant them by fresh hopes."

"I feel that," said Darrell, passionately. "And oh! if one blessed word could be breathed away! But it shall—it shall!"



"Ah!" thought Alban, "the remembrance of his former conjugal life—a remembrance which might well make the heart of the boldest Benedict shrink from the hazard of a similar experiment."

In proportion to the delicacy, the exactness, the depth of a man's nature, will be his appreciation of the value of friendship. One man friend can conceive, and something in the secrets of his life which no male friend can ever conjecture.

PERSIAN DANCING-GIRLS.

In a former number of this journal we gave a pretty full description of private life in Persia, with illustrations taken from a sketch made by a member of a late British embassy. We give now a picture of one of the most striking scenes of Persian life—the performance of the bayaderes, or dancing-girls, in the hall of a Persian noble.

The scene will at once arrest attention. The hall is lofty and spacious, in order that, in that sultry country, fresh air may circulate freely. Creepers clustering round the windows fill the air with delicious fragrance; the ear is delighted with the low sound of never-ceasing fountains. The floor is marble mosaic, here and there worked into designs; the walls are lined with paintings, mosaics, or pier-maché from Birmingham and Paris, splendid mirrors from Venice, and exquisite sculptures in the beautiful transparent green marble of Tauris. Every angle and every corner is softened and half hid by a sculptured group. The walls contain alcoves, niches, closets, and even private chambers, to which the lazy lord of this luxurious abode may retire to rest without overfatiguing himself by the way.

DANCING-GIRLS IN A PERSIAN NOBLEMAN'S SALOON.

Now, fair reader, if you have realized this sumptuous hall, with its resplendent magnificence, you must go a little further, and fancy its master, a pale, bearded Persian, half seated, half lying, on his carpet and his cushions in the coolest alcove, smoking his chibouk, and sipping his coffee or liqueur.

His lordship is dull this evening, he must be entertained. Let the dancing-girls come in!

Three dancing-girls, like the nautch-girls of India, and the same class in old Greece and Rome, are wanderers over the face of the earth. Most of them inherit their calling. In India they almost form a caste, and intermarry among themselves. In Persia people are not much in the habit of inquiring about girls' parents, and where the dancing-girls come from is more, probably, than they themselves could tell. They are "not in society" the Persian ladies, who are a very poor variety of the human female so far as morals and intellect are concerned, will not associate with them. On the other hand, the Persian gentlemen are fonder of them than of their families; no banquet is complete without dancing-girls, and no luxury is more highly prized by the voluptuous Persian aristocracy than such a private spectacle as the one we now illustrate.

The girls are generally pretty, and always well made. The least clumsiness unfits a girl for the office of bayadere. Her form must be perfect, and her command of her muscles thorough. In India the savage rajahs have been known to order an unhappy girl who stumbled during an exciting dance to be dragged out to the middle and thrown to the tigers. By way of compensation, when a girl dances unusually well, and fulfils uncommonly saluting, the polygamic lord may marry her, and she may become the mother of his heir and successor. Every thing is balanced in this world.

The dance is nothing like what is seen at our theatres on ballet nights. It is a melodramatic pantomime, invariably descriptive of love scenes. Every scene is called into play, and the best and good dancer is as expressive as that of one of our track scenes. Those people who have been accustomed to witness these exhibitions describe them as very exciting—far more so than the performances at our theatres. But even they see but little. The sitachin of Ferok Khan, the late Persian ambassador to France, describes very forcibly the sense from those which have been recounted by European travelers. They must, however, be aware that Persian women wear suffer any male but himself to be present at a private exhibition in his own house. It will, in fact, be found that in no case is the burden of the house, servant-girls, and eunuchs are the only spectators of the performers.

The girls are well paid. It is usual to give them a certain sphere for their evening's dancing—about $20—which is a great deal of money in Persia. They earn it well, the fatigue is prodigious; some of their dances, during which the motion of the whole body is incessant, last half an hour.

Some years ago, an enterprising danseuse of the Paris opera was seized with a desire to see the world, and therefore arrived in Calcutta under the Paris aliens. The first was the mere marvelous as, unlike that great theatre known as Drury Lane, she was young and pretty. Arrived at Calcutta, this enterprising young woman found herself at the end of her money. She was informed she would have been less embarrassing had she been willing to dance at the house of some of the native princes; to her by one or more attaches of the European legations; but she would have nothing to say to her compatriots. It was generally supposed that diplomatic circlet that she would soon be brought to before the Lord as a vagrant to answer for her debts. Her French acquaintances anxiously awaited this denouement to her little comedy.

Suddenly a rumor spread through the aristocratic society that a minister of the Shah, a well-known connoisseur, was to give a dancing and a supper of supernatural address and loveliness. He had her, of course, said rumor, in close seclusion in his palace, and he took good care among his friends to venture upon the selection of even addressing him on the subject. He was much too jealous of what he told his good fortune every where; vaunting the grace and the beauty of his new bayadère from morning till night. Piqued at last by the boasts from a brother minister, he broke through conventional rules, and invited a select party to a dancing-by-seat to witness the performance of his new dancer. One or two of the diplomatic body were admitted to the mission; which, by-the-by, is a great manner more than an ordinary dinner-party.

The entertainment was of course, splendid and recherché. The best wines of the Rhine and Burgundy, the most exhilarating drinks, the most tempting tobacco, pressed upon the guests by young slaves who seemed all either Hebes or lookers Ganymede, regaled the guests in the course of the banquet. At last, when the greater senses were appeased, the hour arrived for the dance, and the dancing-girl appeared. The foreigners almost shouted—it was the little Parisian opera girl equipped and trained as a Persian bayadère.

What the particular character of the performance of that evening was none of the fortunate guests have ever disclosed. The Persians, when quartered on the subject, simply turned their eyes to heaven and declared that none of their own dancing-girls could charm them again. And it is understood, in select circles at Calcutta, that, for a round sum down, a relative of the Shah became possessor of the successful dancer, who consented to be sold in order to become his Royal Highness's wife.

We trust that no aspiring young lady will, on the strength of this, go to Persia, and try her fortune as a bayadère.

Miscellany.

—From a recently-published Memoir of the Author of the Curiosities.

I suppose that his full name is

Edward George Earle Lytton Bulwer Lytton. He is the third and youngest son of the late General William Earle Bulwer, of Heydon Hall and Wood-dalling, in the County of Norfolk, by Elizabeth, Anastasia, her Lytton, sole heiress and last descendant of the Lytton of Knebworth, in the County of Hertford. His mother was last lineal representative of the family of Norreys Baronets-Lytton, of Menacuffe, in the island of Anglesea, and of Quarrendon, in Buckinghshire, and claimed direct descent, through the alliance of her ancestors with the first Plantagenet king, Henry II.; from Anse, sister of Orc, the Norwegian sea-king, and from Vill.; from the Earl of Warwick, the King-maker, as well as from the Scottish monarchs Robert Bruce and Stephen Bathon, and Wallace, the Scottish Hero of Ayler, and from the princes of Ancient Wales, Caradoc Vreichvras and Owain Myvyr, and in recognition of the splendor of this pitchy pedigree that when, in 1838, at the period of the coronation of Queen Victoria, the then Prime Minister (the late Viscount Melbourne) acquainted Bulwer Lytton with the royal intention to include him in a new creation of baronets, he nobly Prender gratefully intimated that, if regarded as given to ers of as ancient a family, the title could only be bestowed a distinction; yet that, as given exclusively to the man of letters, in conjunction with the simultaneous nomination to the same dignity of Sir Robert Peel, as a man of science, it would hereafter be a welcome honor—namely, as a tribute to literature. It was a noble proffer, as such it was accepted—as a tribute to literature.

Who was Lady Bulwer?

In 1826 Bulwer Lytton, still in the early dawn of manhood, was united in marriage to Rosina, daughter of Francis Wheeler, Esq., of Lizard Castle, in Ireland. The fruits of this marriage were a son and a daughter; the latter prematurely deceased, in 1843, among the fatal victims of consumption. The son is also dead. He was drowned under his pseudonym of Owen Meredith, the author, in his early manhood, of the "Clytemnestra" "Clytemnestra," and, later, of a volume of poems.

A Meeting.

Shortly after his Bulwer Lytton published his first really remarkable poem, a satire of modern London, under the title of "The New Timon." In this occurs the following passage:

"One after one the lustre of time advances:
Here Stanley waits, and there the Lyndhurst glances!
The brilliant chief, irregularly great,
Frank Hastings, rich in all the attributes of Debate!

Yet who not listens, with delighted smile,
To the pure Saxon of that silver style?
In the close division, who not cheers at once,
Prompt to the rule—kneeling from the mean?"

The Sunday Times allowed in to Geoffry, Earl of Derby, now Prime Minister of England, and Sir Robert, to Lord Stanley, one of the most famed and fortunate leaders of the Tory party. The "Chief" of "The New Timon" little thought at the time that he and the man he then eulogized would, twelve years afterward, stand together in the Ministry of their country.

—Every thing may be bored—which fact is demonstrated by a recent litigation which was forshaw a Bed showing how three hundred and twenty-three pounds sterling, with forty-three pounds more for bed and pounds sterling, with forty-three the moderate annual allowance of fifty thousand pounds, are spent.

Some Royal Grievances.

We can imagine a young, amiable, sensitive, and newly-created monarch—a monarch simple in taste, who had studied, in early life, from the consecutive attitude of yacht-sailing—coming unexpectedly to a throne, in consequence of some unlooked-for circumstance, and being let loose, comparatively and unprepared, in the midst of this elaborate system of royalty. We can imagine with what his bewilderment at the crowd in the first department—that of the Lord Steward—consisting of the Lord Steward, the treasurer, the comptroller of the household, master of the household, secretary of the master, assistant secretary, three clerks of the household, secretary of the garden accounts, paymaster of the household, office-keeper, two messengers, and a yeoman usher.

In the Royal Kitchen

there is a clerk of the kitchen, four clerks of the kitchen, one master cook, deputy, the necessary woman of the kitchen, a chief cook, four master cooks, sundry appentices, two yeomen of the kitchen, two assistants to the yeomen, a purveyor, a caterer, three kitchen maids, one store-keeper, two confectioners, two assistant confectioners, a pastrycook, two female assistants of the pastry-cook, a baker, an assistant baker, a yeoman of the confectionery, one yeoman of the ewer, two female assistants of the yeoman of the ewer, the gentleman of the wine cellar, the yeoman of the wine cellar, the undertaking liquors, a groom of the intoxicating liquors, a principal bottle-washer, a second bottle-washer, a third table-decker, an assistant table-decker, a waxlighter, the yeoman of the plate, the plate-porter, a groom of the plate-pantry, and six assistants in the plate-pantry. Two principal cook-porters, eleven assistant cook-porters, the yeoman-purveyor, the yeoman-porter, first yeoman-porter, second yeoman-porter, the yeoman-purveyor, three groom-porters, a state sergeant-porter, five state groom-porters, four state under-porters, and ten night-porters. One first laundry-maid, a second laundry-maid, an assistant laundry-maid, a yeoman of the sewers, a yeoman of the sewers of the yeoman of the steward's room, an usher of the green cloth, three assistants of the usher of the servants' hall. To complete the wondering list, the clerk of the ordinary Grand Almoner (honorary), Lord High Almoner (honorary), yeoman sewer of the almonry, one knight marshal and eight assistants, ranger of Windsor home park, ranger of Windsor great park, and keeper of the walks of Windsor great park.

Almighty recovered from these overwhelming parasites of the Lord Steward's department, we can imagine the bewildered monarch wandering into the second department—that of the Lord Chamberlain, who supervises the Royal Household Out-door Exercise.

There he is hailed by the Lord Chamberlain, the Vice-Chamberlain, the controller of accounts, the gentleman-usher daily waiter, the clerk of ware of the Lord Chamberlain, a chief clerk, an inspector of accounts, three assistant-clerks, an office-porter, the housekeeper of Windsor castle, the housekeeper of Hampton Court, the housekeeper of Kensington palace, secretary to the keeper of the privy purse, the master of the horse, the equerries in waiting, the ministers of the robes, eight ladies of the bed-chamber, eight maids of honor, eight bed-chamber women, and an extra bed-chamber woman; then to endure the obeisance of a groom of the robes, a clerk to the groom of the robes, a messenger to the groom of the robes, and a farrier to the groom of the robes. He is next saluted by eight lords in waiting, eight grooms in waiting to help the lords in waiting, an extra groom in waiting, four gentlemen ushers quarterly waiters, four gentlemen ushers, several daily waiters, an assistant gentleman usher, four grooms of the privy-chamber, eight gentlemen ushers, quarterly waiters, an extra gentleman usher as a messenger of the green cloth, thirty-two (honorary) gentleman of the privy-chamber. A number of the equerries, assistant master of the ceremonies, a marshal of the ceremonies, five pages of the back stairs, two state pages, a page of the chambers, six pages of the presence, and three pages' men to wait upon the pages. Then come sergeants-at-arms: he must have a night sergeant-at-arms, a Lord Chancellor's sergeant-at-arms, House of Commons' sergeants-at-arms, the kings of arms, a deputy four queen's messengers, one Lord Chamberlain's messenger. Then he is saluted by a number of inspectors of palaces, three carpet-men, nine house-keepers, three linen-room women, three necessary women, three yeomen, two strangers' attendants. At Windsor Castle, when it encounters a dean of the Chapel-Royal, a subdean, a chaplain, a clerk of the queen's closet, three deputy-clerks, a clerk of chapels in ordinary, a closet-keeper, forty-eight chaplains in ordinary, ten priests in ordinary, four chaplains, three preachers, three readers, sixteen lay gentlemen of the chapels-royal, four organists, two composers, a violist, a harper, a corporal of the yeomen of the vestry, a master of the boys, and ten boys to be mastered.

Royalty goes to Church,

If Royalty is Ill,

it must not be without evoking the services of two physicians in ordinary, four physicians extraordinary, one physician to the household, first and second physicians-accoucheur, surgeons-accoucheur, one surgeon-dentist, one surgeon to the household, three surgeons-extraordinary, four apothecaries to the person, two apothecaries to the household, two surgeons-extraordinary, a chemist, a druggist, one dentist to the household, two aurists-extraordinary, an oculist, and a surgeon-chiropodist. Finally,

Royalty loves Music.

Who is the unhappy monarch if he does not? for he must keep a master of the state band of music, a conductor, twenty-five performers, a sergeant-trumpeter, a state trumpeter, a trumpet-major. He must pay, also, a poet-laureate, an examiner of plays, a master of the tennis-court, three keepers, and waterman, a keeper of the swans, a keeper of the jewel-house in the Tower, an exhibitor of jewels, a principal librarian, a librarian in ordinary, a painter in ordinary, a surveyor of pictures, captain and gold-stick, lieutenant and silver stick, standard-bearer and silver stick, clerk of the cheque, adjutant and silver stick, gentleman harbinger and silver stick, groom-porter, a secretary to the captain, and forty gentlemen-at-arms; captain of yeomen of the guard, lieutenant, ensign, adjutant, clerk of the cheque, four exempts, assistant adjutant, eight sergeant-majors, two messengers, one hundred yeomen; and Governor and Constable of Windsor Castle.

Of course

Royalty rides—

Having finished the Lord Chamberlain's department, bewildered and distracted monarch, on going into his stables, finds the Master of the Horse, one principal coachman and twelve others, four helpers, four grooms of the stole, four equerry and clerk marshal, four equerries in ordinary, an extra equerry, the keeper of the saddlery, extra equerry and secretary to the Master of the Horse, first clerk of the stables, second clerk of the stables, assistant clerk of the stables, inspector of stables, a surgeon, surgeon, a yeoman rider, a lady rider, a sergeant-farrier, a second farrier, a third farrier. Master of the Buckhounds and Hereditary Grand Falconer and on to due without.

Royalty Sees Sport.

We can imagine our bewildered monarch, exhausted with the labor of the survey, retiring to a private apartment, where a plan could be found, sealed, looking over the list of his host of attendants, and commencing with the list of servants of attendants. He finds there, the names of the butlers of the first families in the land, who carry out the most delicate system of waiting on the servants, and who, as there are no castles to be sacked, and no wine to be drunk, as he had, are content to receive a commonplace remuneration in the form of a salary, varying from forty to four thousand pounds per annum, and every quarter-day out of the Civil List portion of the taxes. He looks over that same list, and finds that, although he is in his bed and centre, he receives for his wife one shipped less than six-sixth every year, the rest being absorbed before reaching him by the surrounding circles.

Royalty takes a Drink.

Indignantly he rings a bell, and is answered by a page in waiting, page, every, gentle, man, usher, and, K.C.B. The bewildered monarch, considering the number of glasses of water. Four and twenty bells ring in succession, each one summoning another, until at last the man is reached whose duty it is to wait on the water, after having undertem of caste in full working order, aided by all the under-waiters previously collected. The water —with some considerable delay—is passed on from hand to hand, until it reaches the expectant and nearly-famished monarch. He sees the whole operation at a glance—the perfect, unbroken chain of civility—and, with a very hearty laugh, he rings only one bell, and, every body brushing every body else's coat, every body pouring out every body else's wine, every body handing every body else a shoe-horn, every body attending every body else abroad, every body waiting upon every body else at dinner, every body laughing at every body else's jokes, and sometimes (for quarrels will arise in the very best-regulated palaces), every body kicking every body else down stairs.

Finally, we can imagine our bewildered monarch as much alarmed at the amount of detail that exists in the royal household, for, and at the number and variety of individuals of whose existence and importance he has to avoid offending and misdirecting, that in the dusk of evening he seizes a stout fishing-rod, a basket of provisions, a flask of sack, to take a long and quiet cruise in the Baltic or the Mediterranean.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A SECOND HIT.—During the very warm weather in June last, a party of tourists and others from Dieppe made an excursion on Sienne Lake, from whence to Granville, by the steamer H. M. Among the party there was delightfully cool and pleasant on the lake, so that the time rounded very quickly. Dinner, while the weather continued so hot, she would like to be captain herself very well. She replied, in a most gallant manner, that he would not object to her becoming captain's mate in the business department of the ship, and effectually prevents any body from seeing any thing.

CHILD.

Father day as I was tenting
Home for to stop the night,
What, of all things 'midst the heap,
Should I have to see, but sleep?
But the little desperate elf,
The tiny thing that I myself
By the wings I perched him up
Like a hero, and in sport
At my wine I sank him,
Drank him! Drank him! Drank him!
Faith, I thought the deed was done!
There he lived, and there he died,
And his mute corpse on the table slept,
I feel him tickling my heart-strings!

THE ART OF CONVERSATION.—Not only to say the right thing at the right place, but to leave a different still; to leave unsaid the wrong thing at the tempting moment.

DEFINITION.—Life: A farce to the rich; a comedy to the wise; a tragedy to the poor.

ADVICE TO LADIES.

If you your lips would save from slips,
Five things observe with care:
Of whom you speak, to whom you speak,
And when, and how, and where.

A scientific friend of ours has discovered the cause of the potato blight a few years ago. He ascribes it to the Asiatic cholera—potatoes.

MR. FARNUTTON'S VISIT TO THE "UNITED FREE."—Had the pleasure of a most genuine treat at the "Free Church" school a committee, as he met her at the entrance to the playground. "Well, my little man," said she, addressing. "I have heard so much about the talented child, that I am glad to have the opportunity of seeing you myself, and secure them as well as an officer. You asked me if I would accompany you to the school." Here a little manly man, with an eyeglass on his shoulder and a smile on his face, interrupted her by saying that if I would not be too much trouble. I told him that we could both smile as well outside as inside the school-room. Mr. Hill told the same fact, and, following the lead of a hard wooden stool, upon which she reposed herself. "Now, my little man, what is the first thing you learn?" "Please, ma'am, the alphabet is objected to!" I don't wonder a mite at the handsome reply of the little fellow. What do you learn next?" she, as the noise of a cannon satisfied her ear. "I learn to read, ma'am." "Read, indeed!" "Yes, ma'am, a rebellion as her tone as the spoke, and she was informed that she was a little fellow, and that he would wipe the late field with his child. "Dear me!" said she, "how very odd! I am sure I am very much obliged to you for the information, that is to take his seat with him wherever he goes." "Yes, ma'am," said the little fellow, "and I will be very much obliged to you to take your self-sufficiency, and to confine it to the bottom of your self-conceit."

A gentlemen who had the marvelous gift of shaping a great many things out of orange-peel, was displaying his talent to a party of ladies, among whom happened to be Mr. Thomas Hill, and succeeded in reconstructing a pig to the astonishment of everybody. Mr. Hill took the same fact, and, following the lead of a hard wooden stool, upon which he reposed herself. "Now, my little man, what is the first thing you learn?" "Please, ma'am, the alphabet is objected to!" I don't wonder a mite at the handsome reply of the little fellow. What do you learn next?" she, as the noise of a cannon satisfied her ear. "I learn to read, ma'am." "Read, indeed!" "Yes, ma'am, a rebellion as her tone as the spoke, and she was informed that she was a little fellow, and that he would wipe the late field with his child. "Dear me!" said she, "how very odd! I am sure I am very much obliged to you for the information, that is to take his seat with him wherever he goes." "Yes, ma'am," said the little fellow, "and I will be very much obliged to you to take your self-sufficiency, and to confine it to the bottom of your self-conceit."

A gentlemen who had the marvelous gift of shaping a great many things out of orange-peel, was displaying his talent to a party of ladies, among whom happened to be Mr. Thomas Hill, and succeeded in reconstructing a pig to the astonishment of everybody. Mr. Hill took the same fact, and, following the lead and steering the table with the pest of at least a dozen pigs, gave it up in despair, exclaiming, "Well, I'll be hanged if you make one!" "Any Hill," exclaimed Rook, "you have only to remove the tail of the pig, you have a pig's head instead."

"OF THE SOUR QUITE SWEET!"—Tell me, ye winged winds, that round my pathway roar, do ye not know some spot where mortals weep? Some place where the night-bird may shun? Some island far away, where nature, lavishing in beauty, has not breathed around my face, and answered—"Any place."

What is earth, sexton?—A place to dig graves.
What is earth, grain?—A mine to work for wages.
What is earth, greyhound?—A place to grow old.
What is earth, miser?—A treasure to be gold.
What is earth, school-boy?—A place for my play.
What is earth, tradesman?—A place to get rich.
What is earth, statesman?—A place where I were.
What is earth, Christian?—A place to be tried in.
What is earth, lover?—A place for bliss.
What is earth, husband?—A place to raise cattle.
What is earth, wife?—A place for true sorrow.
What is earth, tradesman?—I'll tell you.
What is earth, lawyer?—Where there's business.
What is earth, sailor?—My home is the sea.
What is earth, farmer?—A place to win fame.
What is earth, author?—I'll write there my name.
What is earth, soldier?—A place where to give.
What is earth, Christian?—The gateway to heaven.

A PAIR OF BOOTS.—The most recent triumphs of modern mechanical art, of mind over matter, are thrown necessarily into the shade by the following, really into the shade. Let us take one instance: "In the year 1851, the Great Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations was held in England to her honor in India wrote lately to her friends, "Although there is no end to the wonders you have seen, you will be surprised to hear that I myself, after having seen the sewing-machine in London,

I gave my love a chain of gold
And fetters for her feet,
And bade her sing me faster hold
With links of love complete.

I gave my love a chain of gold
For truth her lovely chain
To bind my wandering heart—
My fetters are selfish.

When the cholera was raging in the south of Europe a native of Portugal heard that in a certain village it attacked only men. Hoping to escape the disease, he disguised himself in female attire, left his native town and country, and went to live in the favored village. Soon after his arrival he was, however, attacked with the worst symptoms of the disorder, and in his agony exclaimed, "Alas! alas! who could have betrayed my sex?"

The vows that bride you Tom or Jack
Are made to be broken, you know,
But the vows you swear your uncle
Is such a fool as to pay
Are very much less liberal indeed.
To pardon or to bear it.

A humorous writer in the Yonkers Examiner, Mr. T. Green, publishes the subjoined rules for the composition of poetry, with your name, in a single night:

"1st. Select your subject. This may be your mother-in-law, or your hackmaster. You would do well to leave that unsatisfying sadness to Longfellow and Charles Kingsley.

"2d. Determine whether your lines shall be blank verse or rhymed. The fact that Jen. Milton got only $50 for several thousand lines of very respectable blank verse, called "Paradise Lost," may assist your choice in this regard.

"3d. Select your subject. This may be serious or comic. Serious poetry will suit you best if you are desirous of the girls' comic poetry will cause you to be considered a funny fellow. Therefore decide between these extremes.

"4th. By all means have your verses end with a fine moral sentiment. It is not necessary that your reform have a very good person because he repeats and assents to your moralities."

As an instance of the application of these verses, the writer offers a version of the old song, Lucy Neal, which, written during a steamboat sail from Fort Washington to New York city:

"For Charley" says the writer, "like Pinto, his heart beat pro-fu-sely when he spied the lady on the other side, and, stumbling one day he took up on his back's cot, and he fell in love with her. Now Lucy was a maiden who, to the great philosopher did devote her heart with delight, and so one of the farmers shot Charley as mildly as pos-sible."

Here lies a faithful sheet;
A stanch, uncompromising "silver gray"—
Who put the face of fifth with sparkling speed,
Yet never ran—away.

With rain he never erred,
Yet maintained tame ones with much zest;
Cheerful in his work each editorial kind,
As cheerfully took rest.

Bright were his eyes, yet soft,
And fit his mind in his red rule and flowing;
And though he never sketched a single draught,
He showed a rash rule for drawing.

Lithe were his limbs and clean,
Filled alike for bigger for days of Dray;
And like Napoleon the Great, I ween,
He had a martial bay.

Oft have I watched him green
His forms with skill and method, wear, and fair,
With such contentment shining from his face,
And such a stable air.

With here and there a spot
Of rum diversifying his broad back;
And, hairy-like, a hair round his neck,
Which bound him to the rack.

More constant of length
The hay-day of his life was damped by death;
So, summoning all his remarkable strength,
He drew—his first breath.

A drunken father undertook to chastise an undutiful son, newly at large on bail, in the Tombs police court, the 4th of July, says the Leadership Journal, but fell suddenly down—prostrated by a new attack.

In the year 1848, the Legislature of Illinois gave to the then town of Rock Island, in that State, a city charter which provided the regulation of a grocery store, or restaurant, upon condition that an election called for the purpose should be held and a majority of votes cast in favor of the grant. The election was held, and although not any thing promised well for the result until two or three days before it was to take place, the opposition to the measure began to show itself and, finally, a "public meeting of the citizens" was holden at which the question of license was well attended, and where it was unanimously

Resolved, That it is the sense of this meeting, shiplever, sassi-pan, and other deadly, infectious, and dangerous epidemics, prevail to the most alarming extent in cities, the attempt to bring these calamities upon our healthy town deserves and will receive the rebuke of all who love us, and always will, oppose a city charter.

Resolved, That the proposed grant is inimical to the interests of the Mayor's stand were adopted by a large majority, since that time a "public meeting at the court-house" has frequently been required, and it always proves a wet blanket upon all innovations.

My neighbor T——— had a social party at his house a few evenings since, and his "dear" child, a bright little four-year-old, was favored with permission to be seen in the parlor. But, as is usually the case with children of that class, of course, obstinately put up for so great an occasion—arriving at the conclusion that she would not be treated to a liberal supply of "goodies" unless she began her gratification. As to entered the parlor and made its bow to the ladies and gentlemen, it took a look, and said he, proudly, "if any of you smells a smell, that's me!" The effect was decided, and before the child had time to sink her entrance delivered an illustrative essay on human vanity, was the hero of the evening. Every one would call to mind some boy of larger growth, whose self-satisfaction, though not perhaps so openly demonstrated, was yet equally evident, and not better founded.

Not pardon, but principles, is all we ask for; pay but God's parity, and we all other agencies as we use rational men—carrying out the principle of love to him as in the right direction, and then leaving it for another.

A man ought to carry himself in the world as an orange-tree would if it could walk, bearing its fruit and its flowers—swinging perfume from every little corner it holds up to the air.

In a Sunday-school in the central part of New York, an eminent citizen was examining the children in one of the course of his remarks said that he hoped that none present had ever disobeyed their parents. One little boy's hand's name in vain. Here he was interrupted by a little boy, of seven years, triumphantly exclaiming, "I've broken six all over!"

"Mother, Tom, that's a pretty coat you have on; Jarvis's name, is it not?"

"No, it is not Jarvis's coat, sir," said Tom, with a look that it made for myself, and got it new from the store."

Judge Sewall, of Massachusetts, who died in 1720, went one day into a butcher's shop and bought a number of different second-hand brushes for cleaning his shoes. The master of the shop presented him with a bill, and said:

"What is your price?" said the Judge.

"Why, sir, they will answer your turn," replied the other, "if you have them sold without."

Tom Hood's pathetic lines, "Sit down, sad, boring, we leaving the wing, when limited to the grave," will no longer bar forgotten your brushes."

"By no means," said the Judge. "If you please to let a price I am ready to purchase, but ever since I have had a seat on the bench I have accustomed myself to giving to the value of a single copper, lest at some future period of my life I should contract any guilt or error in determining my judgment."

Query: How many judges of this stamp are on the bench at the present time?

An Irishman, a Scotchman and an Yankee.—"Dey may call wigs women as much as dey like, but dey can't set me agin dem. I had always in my life found men to be fool to ask, but in a quarrel, feet in de dance, but in de ice cream school, men at last, and de last in de sick room. What would we poor debils do without dem? Let me be born as young, or ugly, and we helpless as we can be, and a woman's arm can open to receive us. She can, like a queen in our hearts, sit down, and we will kneel to her. I always talked like limbs, and embers up our feets as a woman is being found to be a woman. Let me, she was gone, who dis our dinner-baskets will toughness and spirits as we start to school, and links us when we leave our trouble."

The fourth finger was originally chosen for wearing the wedding ring, for the reason that it is not only used the least of all of the nails, but is more capable of receiving a ring free from bruises—having this one quality peculiar to itself, that it is the nearest to external violence or with some other finger. Consequently the short ring is singly stretched out to their full length and straightened.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRIDAY, P. M., July 30, 1858.

The foreign trade of the country is not so much improper as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending July 24, 1858	$1,901,345	$1,427,708
Corresponding week, 1857	8,850,505	893,051
Decrease	$4,179,157	$533,657

At this time last year the effect of the new tariff was still being felt, and the year 1857 was a year of inflation which was so abruptly terminated by the revulsion. Money is now plentier than it was a year ago, and is hardly to lend in large amounts even at that rate. Exchange on England, which rallied to 110 in the beginning of the week, fell off toward the close; the latest sales of bankers' paper averaged 109¾.

At those rates specie is not exported, and will continue to flow outward in moderate amounts.

Stocks are strong, without movement of any kind and without activity. Public Mall has improved to 99 @ 91, in consequence of the Harlem's first dividend. The railroad stocks are generally tranquil and dull. Pending any controversies between the rival companies discourages the public from touching such investments.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, July 26, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets are generally unchangingly supplied with the leading kinds of breadstuffs. A break in the Flour and Meal market is reported, at sales prices from that source. The receipts by railway and by Southern boats are limited; those by canal are quite in the balmed higher prices, though business has been much restricted. Canal Meal brands are 10 cents lower, but slightly dealt in at previous figures. Groceries have attracted more attention, and Coffee, Sugar, Molasses, Rice and Cuba Sugars especially have been in brisk request, at full rates. Fruits are abundant, and Peaches, Apricots and Plums are offered, amounts of which are shipped, and 3500 boxes, which, it is believed, formed the bulk of day's business among the retail trade. Provisions have been in fair demand at strengthening rates.

Ashes are steady, without movement of any kind and ——. The Full trade in Dry Goods has been commenced, the auction sales where the principal business is done both and Southwest. Stocks are fair and well assorted. Holdings unchanged. The Dry Goods Reporter says that during the week amounted to $1,079,209, against $1,778,497, the corresponding week in 1857, and $1,779,449 of the imports since January 1 reached $27,193,643, against $47,000,000 in the same week last year. The auction sales of other commodities were moderate, and unprovisioned to the Wholesale Produce Markets, with the exception of the following, which are in full request:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 10	@ $4 40
Superfine to fancy Western do.	4 10	@ 4 30
Extra to fancy Genesee do.	4 40	@ 4 70
Superfine to extra Canadian, per barrel	4 10	@ 4 30
Extra to fancy Canadian, per barrel	4 30	@ 5 20
Superfine to extra Southern, per barrel	4 10	@ 4 30
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 90	@ 3 90
Corn Meal, per bbl.	3 90	@ 3 90
White Wheat, per bushel	1 05	@ 1 45
Red Wheat, per bushel	85	@ 95
Corn, per bushel	52	@ 55
Rye, per bushel	70	@ 75
Barley, per bushel	——	@ ——
Oats, per bushel	42	@ 45
Cotton Cuttings, per yard	7	@ 7½
Jersey and Penn. Cuts, per bushel	14 00	@ ——
Potatoes Mixed, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Cotton, sailclipps, per pound	12	@ 16
Hay, per 100 pounds	77 1/2	@ 90
Prime Pork, per barrel	14 00	@ ——
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	16 00	@ 16 50
Prime Mess Beef, per tierces	13 00	@ 22 00
Cut Meats, per pound	6 @ 6½
Cut Meats, per pound	6	@ 6½
Lard, per pound	11½	@ 12
State Butter, per pound	15	@ 20
Western Butter, per pound	12	@ 18
Cheese, per pound	8	@ 10
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 00	@ 3 75
Tallow, per pound	8	@ 8½
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6	@ 7
New Orleans do. do.	6	@ 7
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	——	@ ——
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	45	@ 50
Hyson Teas, per pound	37	@ 60
Imperial Teas, per pound	37	@ 60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	30	@ 24
Foreign do. do.	30	@ 24
Hay, per 100 pounds	40	@ 70
Straw, per 100 pounds	——	@ ——
Shavings, per pound	3	@ 4
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	35	@ 37
Rosin, per 100 pounds	——	@ ——
Common Hemp, per 100 pounds	1 87½	@ 1 90
Manilla Hemp, per pound	10	@ 10½
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	4½	@ 15
Seed Leaf do. do.	7	@ 15
American Fleece Wool, per pound	37	@ 48
Do. pulled do.	25	@ 38

Freights have been quiet. For Liverpool — Cotton, 5-32d.; Flour, 1s. 3d.; Wheat, 7½d.; Flour, 1s. 1½d., per barrel; Grain, 7d. @ 7½d. per bushel: Heavy Goods, 35s. @ 40s. per ton. For other ports unchanged rates. The number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 1,000.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were not remarkable for activity, though prices were well maintained. Beeves were in fair supply, and fetched $6 @ $6 50 per cwt. and prices were languid. Veal Calves were in moderate supply, and sold at 5 @ 7½ per cwt. Lambs....Swine continued scarce and quiet. ....The receipts of Cattle at the various cattle markets for the last two weeks compare as follows:

	Week ending July 14.	Week ending July 21.
Beeves	3,117	3,212
Cows and Calves	211	211
Veal Calves	311	311
Sheep and Lambs	8,612	8,612
Swine	3,453	3,453

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received:

Illinois	1,104	Pennsylvania	153
Ohio	1,000	Kentucky	12
Indiana	184	Iowa	37
New York	141

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Poor to prime Ox-en Beeves, per pound	5 @ 8	9
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@ 65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5	@ 7
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 00	@ 6 00
" " per pound	3½	@ 7
Live Swine, per pound	4½	@ 5½
Dressed do. do.	6½	@ 7½
Rousing Pigs, each	1 50	@ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets, with good supplies of the leading commodities, have exhibited considerable activity.

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Gooseberries, per bushel	$2 50	@ $3 00
Raspberries, per pound	10	@ 12
Plums, per bushel	4 00	@ ——
Currants, per quart	6	@ 8
Raspberries, per 16½ baskets	2 50	@ 3 00
Blackberries, per 16½ quarts	2 50	@ 3 00
Huckleberries, per bushel	3 50	@ 4 25
Apples, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Peaches, per box	1 00	@ 2 00
Bering Sheep, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Potatoes, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 50
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Tomatoes, per 16 baskets	4 00	@ 5 00
Turnips, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Beets, new, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
New Carrots, per 100 bunches	2 00	@ 3 00
Cabbages, per 100 heads	4 00	@ 6 00
Sea-kales, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Endives, per 100 heads	2 00	@ 3 00
Green Peas, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 25
Green Corn, per 100 ears	1 00	@ 1 50
Watermelons, per 100	25 00	@ 75 00
Musk Melons, per dozen	1 00	@ 2 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	1 25	@ 2 00
Cucumbers, per 100	1 00	@ 1 50
Eggs, N. Y. and L. I., per dozen	16	@ 17
Eggs, Western, per dozen	16	@ 17
Chickens, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Fowls, per pound	11	@ 14
Fowls, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Ducks, per pair	1 00	@ 1 25
Turkeys, per pound	13	@ 15
Turkeys, per pound	15	@ ——
Geese, per pound	12	@ 14
Woodcock, per dozen	3 00	@ 5 00
Snipe, Barnstable, per dozen	1 00	@ 2 00
Snipe, Au-sies, per dozen	75	@ 1 00
Plovers, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY. The next QUARTER will commence September 1. Gymnasium, horseback riding, swimming in the Mystic River, baths, &c., &c. Entire separation of pupils. Circulars may be known from the Catalogue, and Young Ladies will be received. A few vacancies are filled.

Mystic, Conn. P. T. SMITH, Principal.

West Medford, Mass., July 1, 1858.

A QUARIUM.—This day is published, in 1 volume 12mo, beautifully illustrated, $1 50.

Sent free by mail on receipt of the price.

LIFE BENEATH THE WATERS:

Or, The Aquarium of America.

By ARTHUR M. EDWARDS.

H. DAILLARD, Publisher, 102 Broadway, NEW YORK.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The clearness and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are considered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. Now but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The changes are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three or Six Months.

TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
TULIPS.
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Salve,
Kiss-me-quick, the Soap.
EUGENE DULEY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
699 Broadway.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS for the postage.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, desiring to form libraries or enrich their literary treasures, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to contain a complete list of the best and most attractive Standard Works in the English language, PRESENTING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—all bound in substantial manner, and many of them in the cost of similar productions in England.

The Libraries of Colleges, Academies, and Common Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the selection of literary productions, is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, when practicable, you send for a classified list, or any part thereof, as the usual agent, applications with remittance should be addressed to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.

The sweetest and really the most perfect BEAUTIFIER OF THE AGE.

This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been esteemed as a mild and harmless, yet most perfect beautifier of the complexion. Queen Elizabeth, Rodeca, &c., it will speedily and completely

REMOVE all sunburn, freckles, tan, pimples, flushes and blotchiness even to the youngest infant.

SHAVING.—Any person shaving will find this article very gentle and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and smooth, and preventing any irritation. Sold by FAMILY LICENSE.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.

KEENE DUFFY, Family Chemist,
69 Broadway, N. Y.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—
Now with extraordinary potency upon the ruins of the body, cleansing them from all deleterious particles, and as a consequence RESTORING HEALTH, when combined, it is accomplished
Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton St., New York. Price $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

FOR SUMMER TOURISTS.

LOTUS EATING. A Summer Book. By C. W. CURTIS, Author of "Nine Notes of a Howadji," "The Howadji in Syria," &c. Beautifully illustrated from Designs by Kensett, Hine, Mosler, 75 cents.

CONTENTS.

The Hudson and the Hilton.	Saratoga
Cornwall.	Lake George.
Trenton.	Nahant.
Newport.	Rockaway.

This delightful volume is a record of the summer rambles of a cultivated observer, specially on some of the most attractive spots in American scenery, and giving a series of fine descriptions of the beauties of nature, blended with graceful reflections. Its style and sentiment are generally blended in its pages, the author's own experiences, opinions, &c., are given in a free, off-hand manner, but such sparkling is relieved by an undercurrent of thoughtful feeling, and its fresh and glowing descriptions give a new charm to familiar objects.

NEW YORK AND ERIE RAILROAD GUIDE-BOOK; containing a Description of the Scenery, Rivers, Towns, Villages, and Objects of Interest upon the Road. Embellished with 116 Engravings on Wood, by Lossing and Barritt. With Maps, Profiles, and Tables of Distances, &c. Price, 12mo, Paper, 50 cents; Muslin, 63 cents.

HARPER'S ATLAS AND STATISTICS OF THE New People in Europe. By J. W. DE PEYSTER. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

EDWARDES'S RANDOM SKETCHES. Reminiscences of a Man about Town. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

WILL CARLETON'S A.M. Close, Muslin, $1 00.

WILL CARLETON'S FARM BALLADS. Just issued. Illustrated by Thomas Nast. Author of "The Old Homes by the Hudson," "Rural Hymns," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WM. C. PRIME'S TENT LIFE. Tent Life in the Holy Land. By WILLIAM C. PRIME, Author of "Boat Life in Egypt and Nubia," "Coral and Coral Islands," &c. Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

JARVIS'S PARISIAN SIGHTS. Three Series. Parisian Sights and French Principles Seen through Americans Spectacles. Illustrations. With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JARVIS'S PARISIAN SIGHTS. Second Series. Parisian Sights and French Principles Seen through Americans Spectacles. By CHARLES JACKSON JARVIS. Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JARVIS'S ITALIAN SIGHTS. Italian Sights and Travel Principles Seen through American Spectacles. By JAMES JACKSON JARVIS. Numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage paid, to any persons in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

A GUIDE-BOOK TO EUROPE.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST.

CONTENTS.

A WINTER IN THE SOUTH. (Sixth Paper. Illustrated by Thomas Nast.)
THE ROMANCE OF WYOMING.
HISTORICAL TOMB-STONES.
VAGABONDIZING IN BELGIUM.
HISTORIC HOUSES OF NEW YORK.
HOW THE MONEY GOES.
LOVE'S ATHLETE WRIGHT. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.
THE BANKERS OF FORTUNE, AND THEIR LESSONS.
THE RED BRACELET.
MY SISTER MARGARET.
BATTLE PICTURES.
CRITICISMS ON ITALY.
NOTES.
THE QUIET HOME.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY. Illustrations.—A Vice-Queen.—A Rencontre in Low Life.—Mrs. Mackenzie's Supper.
CHAPTER XXXIII. Colonel Quin's Soliloquy by Heater.
CHAPTER XXXIV. Mrs. Mackenzie's Morning Drink the Country with Tea-Table Talk.
CHAPTER XXXV. Mrs. Mackenzie Speaks.
CHAPTER XXXVI. Mrs. Mackenzie Speaks to upon Medicine.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
GUESSES AT THE TRUTH.
Illustrations.—Mother and Daughter.—Precious Stones.—Mother and Daughter.—Mother and Daughter.—Insolence.—Insolence Modified.—Bold Daughter.—Modest Daughter.—Trusting, obliged to be wise of the Amorist.—Verdant Youth.—Polite Shopkeeper.—Amorist.—Verdant Youth.—Polite Shopkeeper.—Amorist.—Verdant Youth.—Polite Shopkeeper.—Amorist.
FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.
Illustrations.—Home Dress.—Lace Bonjour.—Under-sleeve.—Chemise.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE feel that the success already issued as the best assurance that no labor or expense will be spared in order to render it the literary periodical of the day received. They believe that the Magazine now embraces the most distinguished list of writers ever engaged in periodical literature, and pledged to the value of the Amorist. on Public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished even during the period of the greatest revulsion, which has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises; and the sale has increased from every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than as a luxury. They therefore announce no "New Features" for the future. They will continue to give the Magazine, as they have endeavored to give it, in Life and Morals; leaving as heretofore, the discussion of Politics entirely to the Political Newspapers of the day. They will endeavor to present in each number fresh and true pictures upon popular matters, and will not hesitate to express their honest views. But the Magazine will be to write rather than to separate the views and opinions of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by rewards" Specimen Numbers, or Premium Copies, or other similar devices of illustrations. They intend that every number shall prove its own best recommendation. They will endeavor to make each number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE more attractive and better than the preceding one, and they confidently believe that the public will observe and confirm their endeavor.

Publishers are confident that it will deserve and receive the support of all who desire a high-toned Periodical which have been accorded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

Postage, Twenty-four Cents per annum, payable at the subscriber.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents per annum.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

Extraordinary habit of the "rigidly trained sporting dog," which arrived from England by the last Steamer for young Benwax, and for which that young gentleman paid a hundred and twenty-five dollars!

AWKWARD PREDICAMENT.

Young Scarrow. "Oh, I'm sorry to trouble you, Uncle—but could you lend me a Razor? my Man hasn't packed up my Dressing Case!"

Dealer. "There! I don't know where to find a fault with him!"
Customer. "But he's got such a beastly tail!"
Dealer. "Beastly tail! There never was a bal Hat-tailed Horse. Why, we go miles to find 'em!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT.

Thousands of this new Coffee Pot have already been sold, and the demand from all parts of the United States is rapidly on the increase. Wherever introduced, it has given the most complete satisfaction.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT

Makes better coffee than it is possible to obtain in any other way, because, by an ingenious but simple arrangement, the housekeeper may boil her coffee for any length of time without loss of aroma, thus securing all the elements of the coffee in their natural and proportional combinations.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT

Is manufactured under the patent for the United States by

ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 & 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia.

Also, Manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT AIR-TIGHT SELF-SEALING TEA CADDIES.

For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.'S

IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH

SEWING MACHINES

ARE THE BEST.

469 BROADWAY,

NEW YORK.

A VALUABLE CURIOSITY sent by mail for 25 cts. Agents wanted.
SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Soda Ash. } { Soap Powder.
Newcastle Sal Soda. } { Prepared Potash.

BI CARBONATE SODA.
Also,
PERFECTLY PURE
CREAM TARTAR,
Prepared under our own supervision.
Sold in papers of 1 oz. to 10 lbs., in boxes of 10 to 100 lbs., or in original packages of our own importation, of the best brands.

"Excelsior Dietetic" } { "Extra Refined Fam-
"Double Refined } { ily," and Peak." } { "Petersburg Soda."

SALAERATUS,
Made at our "Chemical Works," Jersey City, the only one of the kind in the Union!
Our Saleratus, of their various grades,
Warranted the pure chem. better, for the price, than can be obtained elsewhere.
Also,
Our Highly Improved and Celebrated
EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER,
PROVED RELIABLE—Gives the Last Satisfaction!

Our Articles are First Class, and are put up expressly for the Wholesale Jobbing Trade.

Buy of us—we are the first hands!

We have the various qualities of Copper Sup. Carb. Soda and Cream Tartar, which we sell, when required, as the packers and miners say they do,
"Less than first cost!"
CHURCH & CO.,
THOMAS MATTHEWS & CO.,
Manufacturers and Importers,
136 & 138 Cedar, near West Street, New York.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $15 per week.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK
WORTH FROM 25 CENTS TO $100 00.

Our new descriptive catalogue of 60 octavo pages, embraces a larger collection and better variety of Standard, Historical, Biographical, and Miscellaneous Books, than any other catalogue ever published in the country; also, contains greater inducements than ever before offered, mailed free to any address. Send for a Catalogue.
D. W. EVANS, } EVANS & CO., Publishers,
J. H. VERNON } 671 Broadway, N. Y. City.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY
AND
FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.
W. H. BANNISTER, A.M., ... Principal.
A First Class Seminary, perfectly arranged, beautifully located, and with an able corps of Teachers.
Board and Tuition in Common English per Term of fourteen weeks, $15 00 if paid in advance.
Fall Term opens August 25d. Winter Term opens, December 14th.
Address the Principal, Fort Plain, N.Y.

FOUNTAIN'S INDIAN STORE,
(53 BROADWAY,
India Silks and Pineapple Dress Goods, India Lacquer and American Indian Articles. India, China, and Japanese Curiosities wholesale and retail, and Imported to order.

BOUDOIR
SEWING MACHINE,
(DARRIN PATENT).
The Best and most Reliable Under Thread Machine yet offered to the Public.
It is now the most simple and perfect Family Machine in the Market, and cannot get out of order.
Testimonials and Circulars sent, if desired, from
444 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
G. C. Munson, Agent.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
343 Broadway, New York,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINE for all manufacturing purposes.—To ascertain the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, it is only necessary to inquire of any manufacturer or merchant who uses one. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, which will be supplied gratis. It gives full information on the subject.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

PATENT ARTIFICIAL ANGLESEY LEG AND HANDS.
These great improvements in Artificial Limbs are applied only by WILLIAM SELPHO, 518 Broadway, New York. Send for a Circular.

A TWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $25 SEWING MACHINES received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 495 Broadway, New York,
Send for descriptive Circulars.
H. C. BURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agents for the United States.

INVENTORS—PATENTS—PATENTEES.
PERSONS desiring to secure patents in the United States or Europe can receive full instructions, free of charge, by addressing MUNN & Co., Editors of the Scientific American, New York City.

"VROOM & FOWLER'S"
WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
Commended to suit the most fastidious.
JOHN B. VROOM, ONLY MAKER, 74 Liberty St., N. Y.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.—No other sewing machine for family use ever equaled this, either as respects the beauty of the machine or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.
THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER is published weekly in the City of New York, under the editorial charge of Rev. A. A. Livermore, assisted by the most eminent writers of the Unitarian denomination. It is designed to be fresh, fearless, and reverent, a family religious newspaper of liberal thought and the most advanced Christian views. Delivered by carrier, $2 50, or mailed, $1 50 per annum. Address Christian Inquirer, 111 Broadway, New York.
The contributors and readers of the Unitarian denomination in this city are legion.
A model paper.—Boston Commonwealth.
One of the best religious newspapers published in America.—Boston Transcript.
One of the ablest Unitarian journals in the country.—N. Y. Daily News.
One of the ablest religious newspapers published in America.—Cleveland Herald.
The ably conducted organ of our Unitarian fellow Christians.—Detroit Journal.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

Five Cents a Number; $2 50 a Year.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	18 00
Twenty Copies for One Year	25 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty Copies.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 84.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE LATE REV. JABEZ BUNTING, D.D., WITH A FINE PORTRAIT.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. CORRESPONDENCE ON THE PURCHASE OF MOUNT VERNON.
IV. THE LODGER.
V. A BEE SUFFOCATED IN A CHEST, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VI. THE MARRIAGE OF THE CHRISTIANS AT DIJEDA, WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
VII. CHESHUNT COLLEGE, LONDON, ENGLAND, WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
VIII. LITERARY.
IX. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
X. FOREIGN NEWS.
XI. OUR TRIP TO THE FISHING BANKS, WITH EIGHT BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATIONS.
XII. LITTLE GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.
XIII. BUDWICK'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XIV. HOW MR. RAREY TAMES HORSES (our London Correspondence), WITH THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XV. THE DEVIL'S LAST WALK. By CHARLES DICKENS.
XVI. THEIR WINE AND OTHERWISE.
XVII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVIII. COMICALITIES.

THE LATE REV. JABEZ BUNTING, D.D.

THE portrait we give herewith is that of the late Rev. Jabez Bunting, D.D., who has for years been the most prominent chief of the Methodists Church in England. We condense the following sketch of his life from an English periodical:

In August, 1769, a stranger man passed through the quiet village of Montrayh, in Derbyshire. It was noised abroad that one who was on his way to embark for America as a missionary, would preach in the Methodist Chapel. His name was Richard Boardman, the first missionary sent out by John Wesley. At that day, and in that place, a missionary was a strange phenomenon, and many came to hear. His text was 1 Chron., iv., 9, 10—the prayer of Jabez. To the seeking heart of at least one young woman the Lord sent, by his hand, a saving message. Ten years afterward she was rejoicing over the birth of a first, and, as it proved, an only, son. She remembered the words that had been made a baffle to her soul, and, vowing her child to the Lord, "called his name Jabez." Full oft did that pious mother put up for her little one the prayer of Jabez, "Oh that thou wouldst bless me indeed, and enlarge my coast, and that thine hand might be with me, and that thou wouldst keep me from evil, that it may not grieve me!" While he was yet an infant, she carried him to Oldham Street Chapel, Manchester, and there presented him to John Wesley. Well-stricken in years, the evangelist took in his arms the child, and pronounced upon it a blessing.

Nearly twenty years from that day two young men, of about the same age, are seen walking out from Manchester. The two friends reach a cottage, or a farm-house, where a few humble people meet to hear the Gospel. The one, Jabez Bunting, begins the service; his companion, James Wood, watches earnestly.

Nearly forty years from that day you might see this same countenance fixed on the same friend, and glowing with like sentiments. They are now in that Oldham Street Chapel, so connected with their early religious course. The black locks of James Wood have become white as any snow. And time has also touched his friend. The compact, expressive head is very bald; the pale countenance has become full and strongly colored; and, instead of extreme slenderness, we have advanced corpulency. But the whole air speaks generosity and happiness. Those smiles do not play upon that countenance—that confidence does not sit in the eye—those various tones of easy and sometimes playful sagacity, of hope, and humor, and pathos, do not come from the breast of a man who has a bitter or a broken heart. Methodism has reached the age of a hundred years, and her chief men are met to concert measures for duly noting her centenary. To him all look for the clearest exposition and the wisest counsel. He is in the act of opening up that plan which is to evoke such wonderful response throughout home and missionary Methodism. As his friend watches him with joy and pride, doubtless he thinks of the day when he saw him trembling before his cottage audience.

Among the Methodists a young man like Jabez Bunting was not likely to preach long without a call to the full ministry. This he received in 1799, being then twenty years of age. It was not accepted without a sacrifice. His father, a pious and sensible man, had placed him at one of the best schools in Manchester. One of his school-fellows was the son of Dr. Percival, then very eminent in that town as a physician and man of literature. By this young friend he was often taken to the house of his father, who was so struck with him that he received him into his family, without a fee, as his medical pupil and amanuensis. Before the call to the ministry came Mrs. Bunting was a widow, and so interested had Dr. Percival become in his pupil, that he had made arrangements by which he should take his diploma at a Continental university free of expense, and promised to introduce him to a Manchester practice, worth at first £700 a year. The mother had long devoted her son to God, and the son had grace to choose the better part. The kindly feeling of his generous friend, Dr. Percival, was manifested even in death, as he appointed him his executor, and left to him and to his own son all his papers.

The young preacher at once bespoke the sympathy of his hearers by a transparent naturalness. Men always came to appear natural when they strain to make themselves more than they are. Against this error Dr. Bunting was doubly guarded by a vigorous judgment and a deep unction. The former led him to choose the course in which he excelled without straining, and the latter shed upon his public and private demeanor a mellow and engaging simplicity. "And such modesty!" was frequently the closing touch of a picture of his early virtues, drawn by a most intelligent lady, now gone home. Another venerable woman, speaking of his earlier ministry, said to us,

"In the pulpit, he had the authority of an apostle; out of it, the meekness of Moses." To this day nothing is more striking in his public efforts than the complete absence of mannerism or attempt; and in his private life nothing more striking than the beautiful modesty with which this naturalness is allied.

One who was present when Dr. Bunting was received into full connexion by the Conference, has often told us how marked was his modesty among his youthful brethren. Yet all who knew the heart that beat under that modest countenance knew that none was braver, not all who knew the voice, which, in reply to the question, "Are you resolved to devote yourself wholly to God and to His work?" said, "I habitually do," in tones so serious and modest that all were mollified, knew that none could expound with more self-possession, argue with more force, or appeal with stronger thunder.

Mr. Wood lost again and again declared to us, with a smile, that he doubted whether Dr. Bunting ever preached a better sermon than his second. Perhaps in this matter friendship interfered with his clear and well-cultured judgment; but that, in point of early maturity, his friend was a prodigy, is testified by all the attempts we have seen to depict him, and by all the traditions of his youth with which we have met. He had only been four years in the ministry when he came to London. We know a most intelligent person who went to City-road Chapel with small expectations from the young preacher, just come from the North. "Brethren, pray for us," was his text. "But such preaching!" exclaimed our informant; "I never heard such a sermon before." As he advanced in life, that which first astonished as maturity delighted as completeness, and many were wont to say that, in his great discourses, it was almost impossible to show the place in which a sentence could be withdrawn, altered, or supplied.

The impression of his ministry was not that of grandeur, or brilliancy, or beauty, but chiefly of power. This impression of power was much intensified by the persuasion that the power was legitimate. The hearer knew that he had not been beguiled into submission by display, had not been surprised by a mere rush of masterful passion; but the preacher had fairly approached his reason, challenged his assistance, and by open stroke sent swift upon open stroke, broke through all his parries, then rushed upon him and bore him clean away. "What do you think of him?" asked an admirer, who had taken one to hear his little seed to Methodist chapels. "I think of him? there can be but one opinion—it is, Surrender at discretion."

But his power, if oratorically great, was religiously wonderful. One most intelligent friend assures us, that while Dr. Bunting labored in Leeds, more persons were converted through his preaching than had been through that of any predecessor, at least of his popular order of talent. And a worthy man in that town, whose judgment would not be formed on just the same generally, but in his own way, given to a Methodistonian. He has a solo-sufficiency air. Bless you! all the soul-saving preachers we have nowadays are only children to him. Oh, what a power was with his word—to hear him on a Sunday evening!"

THE LATE REV. JABEZ BUNTING, D.D.

So one speaks of Dr. Bunting's power in preaching without connecting with it his power in prayer. A sketch, published some years ago, under the auspices of Mr. (Hon. Edward) Everett (just now very famous), and generally ascribed to his pen, says, that this "among the whole characteristics of a sacredness which ought to lead an opponent to touch his weapons with reverence, and, more tenderly, in some cases he should be found fighting against God."

Such are the characteristics by which Dr. Bunting, in the very outset, gained preeminence in the body to which he belonged. Of course, opposition has never waned. With singular rapidity his talents won him an influence equal to that of the first men in the Body. He was your friend and the secretary of the Conference, and when only of twenty-one years' standing in the ministry, was placed in the chair.

This rapid rise was perfectly natural. He never troubled the Conference with unnecessary speeches. He never tried to be eloquent. He rose only when a real measure was to be discussed, or a real difficulty solved. He always touched the leading points of the case, and these were done with a skill so natural that all perceived them distinctly, and most thought they saw just as he saw. If he had to support or to oppose measures, he always took both side had thrown upon it all the light they could.

"We have heard pleaders at the bar, and statesmen in the Senate," says the sketch ascribed to Mr. Everett, "but we never saw any one who, like Dr. Fly, we never heard a near approach to him."

Added with his power of speech was his knowledge of the Methodist economy equally remarkable. In addition to his natural bent, Providence seems to have specially led him to this line of discipline. From childhood he had been taken by his mother to the Love Feasts held in a room for almost fifteen years of age, Alexander Mather ordered strict attention to the rule that no one should be admitted without a ticket. Children of seven, as also among the Methodists. Ladies was preparing to go as usual, but was told that she must stay at home, and then, with much solemnity, said, "I do not know what you think of it, dear, but to me it seems an awful thing that the children are to be carried there, you should now be excluded by your own fault." The Lord and your mother will be. A maternal solicitude to awaken a soul that waf to be the instrument of awakening many.

Unequalled in power of detail and in knowledge of the Methodist system, his influence was soon enormous. He was universally regarded as ascendency. Every attempt to undermine it has only left it more consolidated. Four times his brethren have placed him at their head. They will, perhaps, in any body where all are equal, where all have the power to choose, where he is not a man who had no advantage in birth, fortune, or patronage, to gain suddenly such a powerful influence, and to go on increasing its influence perpetually. A long series of successful trusts, held little to another, and generally with increasing power. Methodism was at school he was much teased by his companions for being a Methodist. His mother applied to the master, and a rule of the school was made that no one should make any fun on that score," said he, "for he will soon see that the fun is on his side," and thus all the other boys will be under him." His prediction was soon fulfilled, and his schoolfellows were made by it to see that he was not a subject to plague him. The same powers which told his teacher that he had been born to be a leader in a school, told all who knew him that he would soon be at the head of the Conference.

Many not belonging to the same body with Dr. Bunting have of late had an opportunity to judge for themselves as to the secret of his power. On the 10th of August, 1846, nearly a thousand thoughtful men met in the same place as the Freemasons' Hall. Of different lands, tongues, and denominations, they were one in the alliance of evangelical faith. Dr. Bunting was of course present, and we believe that most who remained throughout the proceedings of that Conference will feel that it was impossible for his to be in any deliberative assembly without eventually taking the lead. "What a wonderful old man that is!" said an intelligent gentleman, in our hearing, to Dr. Cox, of New York. "Why, sir," replied the Doctor, with his wonted vivacity; "of all the great men whom I had known and admired before seeing them, none has grown upon me, by personal view, as much as Dr. Bunting."

Such are Dr. Bunting had begun to lead in the Conference a signal occasion arose for eliciting both his popular and governing talents. Dr. Coke died at sea, beginning to be Methodist and Missionary but particulars family of Missions, for which his personal influence was so peculiarly adapted. Who they must either be abandoned or organized. Among the foremost to advise the latter course was Dr. Bunting. He had already offered himself as a missionary; and we have heard him say, "Some of the happiest moments of my life were to those that immediately followed my conversion, were when I first prayed to myself to the Lord as a missionary to India." His request was not heard nor overruled; and now that a day of need for the missionary cause, his powerful mind, and his high platform his eloquence found a sphere in which it outshone all its former lustre.

Another feature of Dr. Bunting's legislation has been the giving to Methodism all the ordinances of Church complete in itself, so removing it from the position of a supplement to the Establishment. The opening of colleges for the training of ministers, the use of imposition of hands in ordination, and the placing of the various Connectional funds on permanent basis, all already in force, made Methodism a position wholly independent. Dr. Bunting spoke of Wilham Thompson as his father in the Methodist polity. He was the first President of Conference after John Wesley's death, and his influence is believed to have mainly decided that English Methodism, instead of following the Episcopal model, already established in America, took the Presbyterian form, which it retains. Dr. Bunting's intense interest in the Free Church question gave for a time room to judge of his real leanings in things ecclesiastic. But while firmly leading Methodism to a position wholly distinct from the Establishment, he has been careful to maintain friendship for the Establishment. "Friends of all, enemies to none," was the original idea of Methodism —to which, under all circumstances, Dr. Bunting has nobly adhered.

When Richard Watson died, in 1833, Dr. Bunting, who had been for some years in the North, was called to the post of Secretary of the Wesleyan Missions. In that position he has since remained. It is no process of mere routine to conduct operations of this weighty trust. On comparing the report of the Society for the year before he took the work that of the present year, we find as follows:

	1832.	1858.
Stations	356	1,032
Missionaries	214	913
Church Members	43,387	106,019
Scholars	37,470	74,114
Communicants	16,000	41,000

Dr. Bunting leaves behind him, to his family and his people, only the heritage of his good name and his sacred works. Though all Europe has acknowledged leader among the Methodists, and besides his public labors, has written books for three years their editor, for seventeen years one of their missionary secretaries, and the President of the Theological Institution, he has left their establishment in 1833, he received for these varied labors only £300 (about $1,500) a year. When he resolut preacher, £150 ($750) per annum, with household and taxes.

We have only to add that as he lived so he died, in the bosom of the Methodist Church, and, having been raised by the power of God from the bed of sickness, and resisted many tempting offers to come out of her. His bones at last found a resting-place with her fathers in the old Methodist Chapel—a special license to that purpose having been granted by the Government upon his own earnest and oft-repeated request.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 7, 1858.

THE CRUSADE AGAINST CHRISTIANS IN THE EAST.

IN another part of this paper the reader will find an illustrated account of the fearful massacre of Christians at Djidda, in Arabia, of which we spoke briefly last week.

In this instance the victims appear to have been for the most part English and French; but, lately, Christians have been even more severe sufferers than Europeans by the persecution of the Mussulmans. Nobody has forgotten the terrible rumors that reached us from Damascus only a few months ago on the family of our countryman, the missionary Dickson. Later still, in the same region, the family of another American missionary, Mr. Dod, being driven, with his family, from his house early in the morning, and compelled to travel without resting-places under the noonday sun, without even so much as a glass of water for his fainting wife and children, he sunk exhausted by the roadside, has any one been punished. The indifference and neglect which the Government has shown in regard to the murders of four American missionaries and their families, a year gone, at Pattaghan, in Persia, and the escape of the assassins wherever they go," is really the most exciting sarcasm on the country that was ever published. Another terrible massacre of Christians, indeed! Why, the United States Government does not stir hand or foot when American Indian volunteers murder the most advantageous missionaries bestowed. Protect their citizens! When political capital is to be made by bracing intelligence on behalf of the Christian Missionaries, you shall admire the energy and promptitude with which the Government will rescue not the throats of unoffending American preachers, or drive American matters and children out to perish on the sands of Syria, and not a pulse seems to beat the faster at Washington. If this is the way the United States are "honorably remembered," no sooner may Christians look elsewhere to honor the better.

Soon ask where the fault lies? Where can it lie but at the door of the Executive Government? It may be, indeed it must be, that the United States representatives in Turkey and Syria are unfit for their posts; most of the United States consuls throughout the East are speckled rascals, who would disgrace any country; and our minister at Constantinople must be a very poor creature. But these subordinates own no responsibility to the public, on the public call them to account. It is the President and his advisers who are responsible for the people in the United States; and every their heads must the blame fall when public duties are neglected.

Will old Buck, with President Pierce barred down a town because some one said he had broken a bottle on the nose of a United States minister? Will, without pausing into the general merits of the measure, it has no doubt proved conducive to the safety of United States citizens in the Pacific to the world. A similar stroke of policy is sadly needly in the Levant. The Mussulmans are evidently greatly bold by the tolerance with which Christian nations treat their outrages. They need a lesson. In Turkey, above all the trading countries, no servant thinks you are in earnest till you apply a cane to a fleshy part of his body; the authorities and the law work there now. All Christendom would applaud the United States if one of their ships administered a measure of exemplary punishment to the pirates who are practically shielding the authors of the outrages upon our countrymen. If General Jackson had been President, the Consul-General who has been general twenty-four hours to decide whether its magistrates would do their duty or no. Mr. Buchanan's policy is certainly a striking contrast in this respect.

THE WAR OF THE RAILROADS.

THE war to which allusion was made in these columns as likely to break continues to rage with unabated vigor. It may well commend public attention. All railroads have been, under Divine Providence, the chief instrument of our astonishing progress since 1840; controversies involving their most vital interests are of public moment.

It will be remembered that the pending contest between the New York Central and the Erie railroads arose from a resolution of the latter to reduce the fare below a payin; point, thus obliging its rival to do the same or to lose its passenger business. The motive for the act was alleged faithlessness on the part of the Central; the object simply to ruin it, with the ultimate design of being repaid by that road for the carriage of passengers between Albany and Buffalo. In other words, the Erie, which has been supposed to have worth mentioning, demands that the Central shall divide with it the receipts from its passenger business; and in default of such a division, the groundless claim to pay property generally is in so delicate a position that further losses will destroy its value as a security, and so coerce the Erie into a fairer course of policy. They have agreed to send the Erie to Coventry, not to sell tickets for, or that have no honor tickets granted by it or a word, to do every thing in their power to divert travel from it until it shall cease its destructive warfare upon its rival.

It would seem that the combination is too powerful to be resisted, and that, whatever public may prompt, the offending Company will now be brought to terms. An insolvent concern may always disgrace itself by defaulting; but there are a point which even bankrupts can not pass; there are things which can not be bought with money. It seems impossible that one line, in the great chain of road to the West can successfully defy all the other links.

This, however, is a fact of public consequence. The point in the controversy which deserves general attention is the broad question whether railroads are to continue to be paying properties.

Experience has rendered it abundantly manifest that it is only with the best business men that they can be made to pay. In the most advantageous circumstances of position, that any railway in the United States can pay interest on its cost, it is equally certain that a large proportion of the roads which are built are not managed with the economy, or blessed with the local advantages, to enable them to pay interest. The question which now presents itself is this: Shall the existing roads, in a keen competition for business, and fats in wasting general rate? Shall they be engineered with an eye to stock speculation, or, in the interest, or with a view to their ultimate value as dividend-paying property?

These are the questions which owners of railway stock throughout the country must answer for themselves. And their interest is that of the public at large. For, though it may seem that the public is a gainer by close competition and consequently cheap fares on railways, these are, in fact, mere modern illustrations of the old story of killing the goose with the golden eggs. If our railways rain themselves by bad management or too low charges we shall have no more roads built. And the national progress, of which railways have been the cause and the secret, will be at an end at once.

A STEP IN THE RIGHT DIRECTION.

CERTAIN sensible men in this city propose to give the public free baths at the public expense. Nothing could be better. Health requires them; nature facilities their construction; common sense dictates their benefit at a glance. Public baths, it may safely be said, would effect a diminution of several per cent. in our bills of mortality.

Why should the proposed reform be limited to New York? Why should not swimming schools and baths be established in every city throughout the country? Doctors vid certify that ten per cent. of the diseases which afflict humanity could be cured by a much larger dose might be averted by thorough and regular ablutions. Why not make such an easy and pleasant provision against and obligatory on the rising generation?

Physical education, the importance of which was first brought home to the American mind, is, in some points of view, more important than mental training; and no branch of it is better worth pressing than the art of swimming. Apart from the mere consideration of the security which it affords in a country where every one is exposed to greater or less opportunities of drowning, swimming is, in reality, one of the most healthy exercises in which boys can engage. No sport makes so direct appeal to develop the muscles or brace the nerves. None imparts more vigor to the frame.

If our school teachers were wise, they would make swimming as essential a branch of education as arithmetic or history. In the season they would oblige every boy to learn to swim and to take exercise in the water. This is the practice in Germany, and it is one of the French customs which justify the assertion that "they order things better in France."

THE PURCHASE OF MOUNT VERNON.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

NEW YORK, Wednesday, July 17, 1858.

SIR,—The thanks of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union are due to you for the eleventh article, entitled "A Visit to Mount Vernon," published in your periodical of July 3. It has given me real and high gratification, but I trust that you will have the goodness to correct an error which a moment's reflection impels me to point out. You say that "a number of Virginian ladies have associated themselves together, and obtained from Mr. Washington the restricted offer to allow them to purchase the property for public uses, for a given sum, within a limited time." The Mount Vernon Association is not one "of Virginian ladies," or of ladies from any one State—it is an Association of the ladies of the United States, in the most full and liberal meaning of the word. The project of purchasing and consecrating the home and tomb of Washington, through the exertions of his grateful daughters, was originated by a lady of South Carolina, and the first subscription, of Ten Thousand Dollars, solely for several years under the title of a "South Carolina Matron," a sum de pleno collected in her first appeal by an editor who was not acquainted with the writer. The dread of personal publicity caused her to adopt this signature. But when the Association became a legalized body, the entreaties of her friends and of Mr. Everett in particular, induced her, though very reluctantly, to abandon her incognito.

In March, 1858, Virginia, at her solicitation, granted a charter authorizing a part of Mount Vernon and one hundred acres of land, [illegible] and owned by the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union, and limiting its capital stock to five hundred thousand dollars.

The Constitution of the Association, formally adopted by the Legislature of Virginia, in accordance with a provision of the charter, requires that the Association shall have a Regent, and that Miss Ann Pamela Cunningham shall be the first Regent, and that she shall appoint a Vice-Regent to represent each State. Twelve Vice-Regents have received their appointments, and the Regent hopes before long to select a representative from every State. Since the organization of Mount Vernon Association is not one of "Virginia ladies," but of the whole Union, and Virginia is only represented in the same manner as her sister States.

The contract with Mr. Washington was obtained by "Virginia ladies," by the Regent or any other State, but by the Regent of the Association, whose personal influence with him enabled her first to go to all to the Association after he had positively declined to do so. It is but just to the honored and venerable head of our Association that these facts should be made public.

I declare that the Regent of the Secretary of the Association, which gives a correct statement of its present prospects and intentions, and the names of its Vice-Regents.

With the solicitation that you will correct the inadvertent error which must exist as wide a circulation through your periodical,

I am yours, respectfully,

ANNA CORA BRIGHAM,

Vice-Regent of the Mt. Vernon Association for Virginia.

The following is an extract from the last Report of the Mount Vernon Ladies' Association of the Union:

"The sum stipulated for in the contract of purchase is two hundred thousand dollars, eighteen thousand of which were paid on the execution of the deeds, and the first instalment of fifty-seven thousand dollars is due on the 1st of January, 1859. The balance is due in three annual instalments; and in the failure to pay the fifty-screen thousand dollars due January, 1859, the sum of eighteen thousand dollars, already paid, is forfeited. The sums now on hand, contributed by members of local associations, by various public-spirited ladies and individuals, and accruing from the delivery of Mr. Everett's address, are sufficient to meet the instalment due in January, 1859. The sums required to meet the other instalments, and the payment of interest, if interest should become due by failure to obtain possession on the 22d of February next, by the entire consummation of the purchase, are yet to be provided.

"In addition to the large sum required to fulfil the contract of purchase, a considerable amount will be necessary to put the premises in decent repair, to lay out the garden and grounds, as nearly as possible, to the condition in which they were left by the late proprietor, and to meet the expense of managing the estate and executing the requisite improvements.

"The following are the officers who at present compose the Grand General Committee:

Regent.—Miss Ann Pamela Cunningham, South Carolina.

Vice-Regents.—Mrs. Anna Cora Ritchie, Richmond, Virginia; Mrs. Alice H. Hutchison, Wilmington, North Carolina; Mrs. Philoclea Edgeworth Lyle, Augusta, Georgia; Mrs. Octavia Walton Le Vert, Mobile, Alabama; Mrs. Catherine A. McWillie, Jackson, Mississippi; Mrs. Margaretta S. Mason, Nashville, Tennessee; Mrs. Mary Jennings Pegg, Nashville, Tennessee; Mrs. Elizabeth H. Walker, St. Louis, Missouri; Mrs. Sarah Morris Hamilton, New York City, New York; Mrs. Louisa Ingersoll Greenough, Boston, Massachusetts; Mrs. Alida Lindsay Hopkins, Detroit, Michigan; Mrs. Princess Murat, Tallahassee, Florida; Mrs. Susan L. Pellet, Secretary, Hoboken, New Jersey; Hon. John L. Riggs, Esq., Treasurer, Washington, D. C.

"The sum of one dollar constitutes the contributor a member of the Association; and the name, sum, and residence of every subscriber must be transmitted, either by the person, or who are authorized to make or receive collections in, at the Mount Vernon Council.

The following is extracted from the Appeal to the ladies of the States of New York for the purchase of Mount Vernon:

"The Vice-Regent for the State of New York is Miss MARY ISABELLA HAMILTON, of Westchester County.

"ANY citizen of the United States, 'dead beat as the Regent, any of the Vice-Regents, the Secretary, the Treasurer, or any local board may receive subscriptions for that purpose, receive or rec 'pulate the receipt of the sum of one dollar, and issue a sca, 'ate of membership, and the payment of the further sum of one dollar, on or before the 22d of February in 1859, will constitute the member to attend and vote at the annual meeting of the Association of that year.

"The following plan has been adopted for the State of New York, as a simple and practical method, and is now offered for the purpose of sending money out, through its length and breadth, to unite in securing the national object, as being desirable to be done by every American heart. What proportion of the whole sum is expected from each one not now or previously on the list is cautiously believed that, if necessary, the whole amount would be forthcoming.

"The office of the Association in the city of New York is in the 'Cooper Institute,' Astor Place, ... The largest will be assisted by a Standing Committee of ladies, by a large number of Managers, and by a Central Executive Committee of gentlemen from different parts of the State.

"The lady Managers will be appointed in each county, city, and large village by the Vice-Regent, and the Chairman of the Standing Committee, to collect subscriptions, and forward all sums received to the Central Committee having them.

"The funds collected (deducting necessary expenses) are to be deposited in the New York Life Insurance and Trust Company, until required for the payment of the purchase money of the property, to be paid over only on the draft of the Vice-Regent, countersigned by at least three of the members of the Executive Committee. The name and residence of each subscriber, from one dollar and upwards, will be recorded in a book or books, and are to be preserved among the archives of the Association at Mount Vernon.

"Regular meetings of the Committees, for reconciliation and business, will be held on the first Tuesday in each month, at 11 o'clock A.M., at the office in the city of New York. The office in New York will be open every day, from 9 A.M. to 2 P.M., when subscriptions will be received in person or by letter, and receipts and certificates given. Post-office address, New York City, Station D, Box 92, viz., Appy 92, Station D.

"Ladies' Standing Committee.—Mrs. Millard Fillmore, Buffalo; Mrs. Pierre Van Cortlandt, Croton; Mrs. William H. Seward, Auburn; Mrs. Governor Morgan, Albany; Mrs. Francis, Mrs. Washington Hunt, Lockport; Mrs. Samuel Stevens, Burlington; Mrs. Governor Seymour, Utica; Mrs. Johnston Livingston, Livingston; Mrs. G. S. Silliman, Geneva; Mrs. Governor Clark, Canandaigua; Mrs. Andrew J. Downing, Fishkill; Mrs. George Bancroft, New York; Mrs. John Stevens, Hoboken; Mrs. Gen. Scott, Prospect Place, New York; Mrs. Marshall O. Roberts, New York; Mrs. Samuel Ward, New York; Mrs. Peter Cooper, Mrs. Hon. Theodore Sedgwick, Lenox; Mrs. Hon. Hamilton Fish, Mrs. Gen. Morgan, New York; Mrs. Walden Pell, New York; Mrs. G. M. Kirkland, New York; Mrs. Gen. Dix, Albany; Mrs. Hermon D. Goodell, Buffalo; Miss Susan Fenimore Cooper, Cooperstown; Mrs. Gen. Wool, Troy; Mrs. Gen. Worth, Brooklyn; Mrs. Edward Schriver, Troy; Mrs. Robert J. Lansing, Watertown.

"Advisory Committee.—Hon. John A. King, Governor of New York; Mr. Samuel B. Ruggles, New York; Mr. Washington Irving, Tarrytown; Dr. Francis, New York; Hon. Washington Hunt, Lockport; Mr. Henry R. Selden, Clarkson; Mr. Theodore De Forest, New York; Mr. Robert C. Pruyn, Albany; Mr. Peter G. Stuyvesant, Poughkeepsie; Mr. R. D. Mangan, New York; Mr. William Kelly, Binnewater; Mr. Edward Cooper, Mr. Robert B. Minturn, New York; Mr. Charles Augustus Davis, New York; Mr. Peter Harmony, New York; Mr. William Samuel Johnson, Hillsdale; Mr. James S. Wadsworth, Geneseo; Mr. Erastus D. Culver, Mr. Edward Livingston, Rome; Mr. Hiram J. Redfield, Lenox; Mr. E. W. Leavenworth, Syracuse; Mr. David Rumsey, Bath; Mr. Daniel B. St. John, Newburgh; Mr. James G. Hyman, Mr. Edward Matthews, Rondout, Cold Spring; Mr. Geo. W. Cuyler, Palmyra; Mr. Wm. C. Bryant, Liverpool and Syracuse; Mr. Thomas J. Hoxie, Plattsburg; Mr. William A. Wheeler, Malone; Mr. Henry H. Ross, Lockport; Mr. Wm. H. Aspinwall, Owasco; Mr. Martin Lee, Granville; Mr. Samuel G. Ward, Lowville; Mr. Isaac Bell, Jun., New York."

IS AIMÉ BONPLAND DEAD?

A NOTE from Governor Joseph A. Wright, our Minister at Berlin, inclosed the following letter to him from the veteran Humboldt, to which we with pleasure give the publicity he desires:

"BERLIN, July 31, 1858.

"MESSIEURS LE MINISTRE.—I received your letter, and forward the inclosed paper to the United States, in order to have inserted the translation of the article in any American journal of large circulation. Mr. Bonpland has a great many friends in America, and I would be wanting in what I owe to them not to attend to what has reference to his memory.

"Receive, Monsieur le Ministre, the renewed assurances of my high consideration. I have been deeply affected by the kindness with which your Excellency let me assist at the noble entertainment of the 4th of July.

"Your respectful servant,

"ALEX. DE HUMBOLDT."

The following is the paper inclosed:

"I hold it to be a duty to the many friends of my dear friend and companion in the labors of his youth to publish the following. The last-received notices of him, embodied in letters by my self, are dated Corrientes, 15th of August (Aimé Bégle Service at Los Lanzes, in February last, and journey of Bonpland to Cuaya, 18th of March, when he fled my old friend Bonpland. He did not find him. Bonpland, however, had left us, as he was afraid of Ballesteros's letters are dated 19th and 20th April, 1858. I make his following account:

"'In San Borja I stopped with an old friend of Bonpland, the Vicar Gay, in whose company I visited the estate of the neighborhood, and where I found a very good botanist. The last letter received from M. Bonpland by this Gay was between the 15th and 20th March, the circumstances of his recent sickness. Letters of inquiry received from Bonpland's friends in Buenos Ayres, which we now know at San Borja whether he was dead or alive.

"'He left the town of Santa Ana, and crossed there since 1833), and removed to his villa of Santa Anna, where he devoted himself to agriculture and to diligences among trees. The villa, valued at 10,000 piastres, was given him by the Government of Corrientes. He had, besides, a pension of 3,000 francs from the French Government. The villa, consisting of a house, well constructed of bamboos, and straw-thatched. They have been left to every one, although there are no partitions between the thinks of the bamboo walls. I was received in the most friendly and hospitable manner. Notwithstanding the great heat, I found the air in the house cool, which the deep furrows on his face sufficiently betokened, his eye was extinguished, but his memory was however, very evident. Conversation very quickly interested him, and he showed the greatest information of the thinks.

"'The extremely simple manner of his life is quite voluntary with him, and not the result of necessity, but rather of long habit and of indifference to the comforts of living were quite easy. He has for many years practised medicine gratuitously among the natives, and was regarded throughout the country; but love settled, and a wide-spread reputation, as a physician and botanist. His zeal for science is unabated; his collections and manuscripts are in order, and he has already established a native museum.

"'I found a cordial welcoming. The following morning I found him much vague. He had passed a very pained night. I urged him earnestly to let me arrive him in some way; he declined to all that proposed, and that he needed no help. When I took leave of him he displayed some emotion. He accompanied me to the manner of the last manager he should ever receive, of love and honor, from the hands of a friend. He bore his suffering, but still overpower. Those who arose him have not found him in the morning. Happy fortune for the truest meeting.'

"The first part was the last letter I myself received from Bonpland! It is dated 7th of June, 1857—'I will, says he, 'shortly, with my children, return to Corrientes, to Paris, and lodge them in the Museum. My visit to Buenos Ayres will be the last. I shall return to my Santa Anna where I am expending a peaceful, happy life. I wish to die here. I prepare my tomb in the shade of a grove one of the many trees I have planted there. How happy would I be, dear Humboldt, to see you again, and to renew our reminiscences of the Cordilleras and Mexico. But it shall complete my 84th year, and I am three years younger than you. A great deal of labor is still required at the age of 187. What a prospect for two travelers who have passed their youth!'

"This genial letter contrasts remarkably with the sorrowful sketch of Ballesteros. The latter, after his visit, arrived in Montevideo, according to M. Van Tschudi, on the 28th of May. It was reported that he died in that Borja, and the date of his death was not given. Now Dr. Ludwig Rosenthal has died in Brazil on the 20th of May a report of his death was contradicted in Paris during the month of April, and there is reason still that the younger of us two is not the first called away. At such distances, however, the uncertainty of life is painfully felt, and I have therefore sought for news of Edm and Vogel, from Central Africa: of Adolph Schlagintweit, from Kashgar.

"ALEX. DE HUMBOLDT.

"BERLIN, July 31, 1858."

THE LOUNGER.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER,—I know that the Weekly is printing Bulwer's 'What will he do with it?' which I read every week. But I am in the country, and so should have no right to speak of him. I do not know that anybody has any right to speak of him, and everything not very flattering about him—and notice it to you.

Your friend,

"TIMOTHY BISTOP."

In a paper like this it is only fair that all sides should have a hearing, where there is nothing objectionable in the matter. So the communication of the Lounger thinks that the "young ladies" will not quarrel with the Weekly for printing Bulwer's novel, chance of scolding at that unappreciative, unromantic, and cold-hearted Mr. Timothy Bishop.

"SIR EDWARD BULWER LYTTON JOSEPH LYTTON SURFACE.

"MY DEAR YOUNG LADIES,—I want to say a word to you about Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Bart., and George Lorle Lytton Bulwer Lytton, of No. 1, Park Lane, London, and Knebworth, Stevenage, Herts, and Majesty's Secretary for the Colonies. He is one of the most popular novelists and well-known men of the day. As an author he possesses undoubted genius—may say not that he possesses it—because he may not think that they are very good books, in parts, and profound—and you may not think him the most economical literary charlatan of the century—Bulwer, the novelist, who writes like a dandy at heart and a sophist in mind—all these things are matters of opinion; the world may read and judge.

"If any rash man say that Bulwer is Byron and writer, I know he must look out for the lunching-schools. If there be any one human being in whom he has confidence (I believe I can, my dears), as the dearest, darlingest, love of a man's heart, it is the right honorable as aforesaid. And I exercise the liberty of a friend to tell my fellow-citizens—including the indignant boarding-school—in saying that I consider Her Majesty's Colonial Secretary in literature a fungus, feeding upon, and indicative of, the moral sophistry that is engendered by every extremely cultivated society—the most complete, and therefore most dangerous representations of that spirit in English society against which the whole contemporary literature of England—his own novels excepted—are the indignant and manly protest. Carlyle, Dickens, Thackeray, Hood, Tennyson, the Brownings, Charlotte Brontë, Landor, and Leigh Hunt, in his prose, Miss Mulock, May, stand for mankind and human nature. Mr. Samuel Warren, the architect Alison, the Mr. Hallam, Mr. Macaulay, Mr. Grote, and the Right Honorable Sir Edward George, et cetera, et cetera, stand for the world. They have place and high places. His literature is what Carlyle calls Bentley, and Thackeray and Leigh Hunt call Colburn, the leading literature. (That is my opinion, dear young ladies.)

"For all this Sir Edward George is a man of very great talent, unbending industry, remarkable accomplishment, and incredible ambition. That he can tell an interesting story—that he is, in fact, one of the best story-tellers—by which I mean a man who understands plot, and combinations, and consecutive interest—the columns of the World constantly testify to the enjoyment of which I will be to read it?' He divides popularity in England with Dickens himself; and as for Americ. Yes, why, after following every other author for book of solutions, and see for yourself (as if you didn't your own gilt-edged album crowded with plums from literature).

"Now let us close the album upon those delightful sentiments of admiration. Let us proceed to deeper Surface to shut his mouth for a little while, look at his works.

"Some thirty years ago, more or less, this new young man was beginning his now celebrated career. He was not a man of wealthy, but fully aristocratic, and talented. After writing a morbid Byronic sentimentality called 'Falkland,' which created loud noise in the world, he wrote his aspirations into a novel, and called it 'Pelham.' From the publication of that book he has been a writer and publishing man. Of course you know all that he has done. He has written many very fine novels, like travers; lively, suffering Alice; high-browed, distinguished, magnificent, and melancholy Audley Egerton and Mary Darrell. He is familiar with them, for they always 'come on' in every book and never appear to be old stock company cast to an entirely original drama.

"Well, just as all this was beginning, Mr. Bulwer married, and has been now for a long period two years old. He went to Parliament—and looks from the House of Commons upon Europe. His wife incompatible; and, it is a statement which has never been denied, and is intrinsically probable, that upon the separation Mr. Bulwer published his failure, he stuck her. Hereupon they separated, and upon the separation she received from him the allowed to be paid to her for her support. The amount was about two thousand dollars. He soon after succeeded to fifty thousand dollars a year exclusive of his large literary income. Lady Bulwer appeared in the literary world, wrote a series of very poor novels, abusing her husband—and lived in retirement near Taunton. The right honorable Baronet, having come into the front of the new century, recently went down to Taunton to address the electors, with a view of being returned to Parliament, and there at the hustings, as he was concluding his speech, as public dinners are concluded, his wife rose from the complement to witness, and Madame, even Lady Bulwer herself, who, before the face of the whole world, charged him with the chronicler of innumerable unhappy loves with being a smooth-tongued villain!

"The celebrated novelist and Colonial Secretary withdrew; but a few days afterward Lady Bulwer was seized and thrown into a mad-house! Deep, delightful man!

"The citizens of Taunton held a public meeting, to protest against the individual outrage and the threatened danger to the liberty of the subject—and now comes the extraordinary sequel, from the London Times of July 14:

"'We are requested to state, upon the best authority, that all matters in reference to the recent affair at Taunton certain statements have appeared in some of the public papers, are in process of being amicably settled by family arrangements to the satisfaction of all the parties concerned.'

"Now if the arrangement be satisfactory to all parties it must be so to the chief party,—the lady: and to her we have the pleasure to be satisfied? which does not release her from the lunatic asylum. But if she is to be released she is not a lunatic. Why, then, was she thrown into such a place?

"Dear young ladies, the moral is this. However brilliant and talented and fascinating a man may be, no matter how much he may write of the intellectually eminent without being morally excellent, yet all creative art springs as much from the heart as from the mind; and when a man is selfish and coarse, like Bulwer, you will find selfishness and coarseness in his poetry, however exquisite; and when a man strikes his wife and imprisons her in a mad-house, you may be sure that the flattering blandishments which many thoughtful readers had found in his books was not altogether a feeling.

"I know you can never forgive me; but, one day, when you have your young ladies and gentlemen, your daughters, and your sons, you will believe that I am and have always been your friend,

"TIMOTHY BISTOP."

"O YOUNG, TOO!"

ON a winter afternoon some few years ago the Lounger, who had been walking upon the frozen pavements of Broadway, and had been dazzled with the graceful hills that make the valley of the River of Pines so lovely, returned to the hotel in Hartford, door with a young man knocked at the door, and, upon entering, modestly introduced himself. He had published some sketches in a magazine, and his profession was the law. But he was very anxious to relinquish his profession and devote himself to literature, and came to consult with the Lounger upon the wisdom of such a plan. He was very earnest and confident, and, after a few words, it was clear that the young man's resolution was very nearly taken.

To such a man asking such a question there is but one answer, and that is a frank statement of the difficulties, and discouragements, and of the literary profession, and an exhortation to wait patiently and discover what are the chances of success in their own case. The young man sang, and they had a pleasant talk together. The young man presented to the Lounger some specimens of poetry, and at last a little novel of New England life called "Uncle Harold," which was published in a volume, was reviewed in England, and had a quiet little reputation, as it deserved, on an admirable specimen of New England character and development.

It is summer now, and the hills of the Connecticut are green and soft in the tender light. But for the young man, in whose heart such high hopes were kindled, the year has been sad with storm, and the stars and sought to write his name among them, who sought the future and wondered if it would not crown him with laurel and immortal praise.

"He put not all the pomp that life
To the cruel eye of mortal man;
In, that his grave is green."

The reader of the newspapers has recently seen that Caleb W. Fluller died in Hartford, Connecticut. The frail paragraph has fame is given. But the soldier does not forget the comrade who never wrote a line; and they will sympathize, helped cheer the weary way and that light, which was to them a beacon, went out forever then and the bulletin omits him; so the authors of the same age, in the same country, knowing or not knowing each other, succeeded and died in their excess, do not forget the names of those who started with them and who wrote by their sides, continued, and hoped, and longed, and struggled beside them. In the memories of each these who die young, when most the possibility glows with a proper formance, dwell gently and long. "They might have been" that sweetest thing to their children.

"Friends that we knew,
Gentle and just,
Sleep in the same dust!
We sing round the tree."

A NEW FASHION.

YES, at last, something really new, and happy the young woman who tries it first in Newport or Saratoga. Just cut your hair short in front on the forehead, shaving it close, and then curling it long as you come to the ear; then twist it and tie it and brush it so as to look like the morning-glory that will be a huge, irregular fire on both sides of your head, filling up the front of the bonnet, and positively the loveliest style of head-dress of one of the daily papers writes that, when a noted actress first wore her hair in this style, the front of the house was filled by other devotees of the same style. Those who follow the fashion are called mop-tops—which is really comic. It is supposed to be imitative of the state of things on the other—the inner—side of the ocean, and is very pretty. Now let all start fair—as the minister said to his congregation of wreckers when a ship was thrown up on the land—and let the first day that the young ladies agree upon a certain morning to grace the beautiful breakfast-tables of Saratoga, Newburgh, Niagara, Newport, the Virginia Springs, Cape May, Long Branch, the White Mountains, and Lake George, with the new coiffure.

SMALL SUBSTITUTIONS.

A SENSITIVE friend of the Lounger that whenever he dined in company and noticed that there were fourteen at the table, he immediately pleaded illness, and retired.

"How do you set if there were fourteen?" replied the Lounger.

"I stay, and eat my dinner."

"How if there were fifteen?" said the Lounger.

"I continue to eat and drink."

"But why do you select thirteen as an unlucky number?"

"Because Judas was the thirteenth at table."

"This is serious on your part."

"Most serious. I dined at my aunt's table once with thirteen, and one of them died before the year was out. I will not risk it again."

"Indeed," replied the Lounger. "I dined once at my uncle's table with eighteen, and three died before the end of the year."

"Indeed! indeed!"

"Yes, and were they most Ory O'More?"

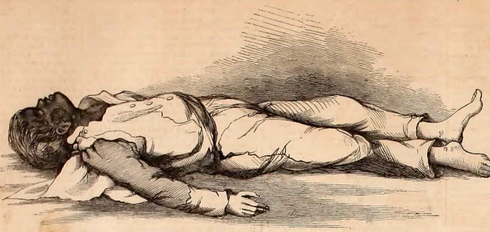
"No, what does he say?"

"There's Jack Rann's numbers, says Rory O'More."

"But this is no jesting matter."

"Then there's no joke in the world."

And so we parted.



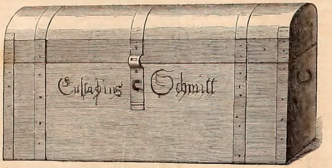
But there are some people who are really seriously troubled if they tip over the salt—if they break a mirror—if they pass under a ladder—and a hundred other of the old superstitions which are continually doing somewhere. It is a kind of superstition which is especially ridiculous, and hateful, because, although every body hasn't seen enough not to share it, every body has sense enough to laugh at it.

In Bordeaux a society has been formed to attack this weakness. A company of thirteen is to dine together on Fridays—turn the chairs round—tip over salt-cellars—cross the knives and forks, and smash looking-glasses. The amusing and melancholy part is, that if either of them should die during the year, the survivors, instead of fully intelligent people who would lay it to the salt, or the looking-glass, or the number of the company, would actually consult the entrails of birds to know what was to happen to the state.

A BOY SUFFOCATED IN A CHEST.

The accompanying pictures illustrate a very sad occurrence which took place a few days since in Brooklyn, Long Island.

It appears that in a house on Division Avenue, near Myrtle, there lived a German family, consisting of a man and his wife, and a little boy nine years of age, the child of the wife by a former husband. On Friday, 23d ult., the woman left the house to call on some of her neighbors, and directed the boy to wash the dishes in her absence. Having done so, the child began to play with some boys in the neighborhood, and from one of them received a cent to purchase candy to be divided among them. No sooner had the boy received the cent, it is said, than he ran up stairs, and being hotly pursued by his companion, sought a hiding-place in a chest which lay in the garret. The better to conceal himself, he pulled the lid of the chest down, the latch caught, and the poor little fellow was suffocated.



THE BODY OF GEORGE PRICKNER, AS IT APPEARED WHEN REMOVED FROM THE CHEST.

It will be seen, by the drawing of the chest, that it is very strong and well made, with iron bands passing round it, and a solid catch. It is, in fact, almost air tight.

The boy must have struggled violently to liberate himself, but without success. In his agony he seems to have torn the flesh off one of his cheeks.

On the return of his mother search was made for the missing child, but without result. It was not till Sunday night that attention was directed to the chest by a peculiar smell which was noticed in the garret. The mother opened the chest expecting to find a dead rat inside it; instead of which her horror-struck gaze met the rapidly decaying corpse of her son, with blackened face and eyes protruding from their sockets.

A Coroner's inquest was held and a verdict rendered—Death by suffocation. The boy's name was George Prickner. It is understood that he owned property to some extent in Brooklyn. This, of course, will now go to his bereaved mother.

THE CHEST.

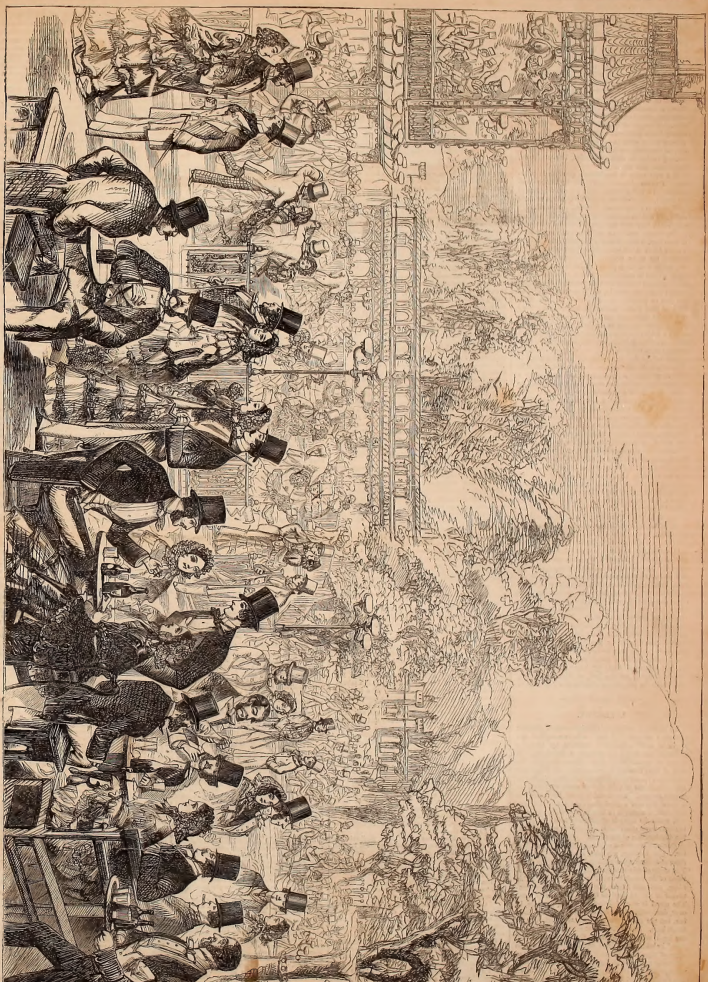
THE MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS AT DJIDDA.

Djidda, or Jidda, is a sea-port on the Arabian coast of the Red Sea, sixty-four miles west from Mecca, of which it is the port. It has about ten thousand inhabitants, is walled, and regularly laid out; surrounded by the desert, and exists only by its commerce. It has several mosques, a governor's residence, and a small castle. A tomb thirty feet long, and reported to be the burial-place of our mother Eve, is in the immediate vicinity of the town, and forms a prominent holy place for the visits of the Mohammedan faithful. Rain-water is preserved in cisterns for drinking purposes, there being no springs in the desert. The town was formerly under the control of the sheriff of Mecca, but now belongs to the Pashalic of Egypt, whose troops garrison it. The harbor is difficult of access, and large ships are obliged to discharge cargo in the offing, two miles from shore. Grain, Mocha coffee, "balm of Mecca," and dates are shipped here for India and the Mediterranean. The imports are: slaves from the Mozambique Channel, shawls and cottons from India, and various provisions and native goods from the opposite coast of Nubia, which is one hundred and twenty miles distant. At certain seasons of the year the town is flooded with pilgrims, to the number of often over ten thousand, on their way to Mecca to worship at the shrine of their prophet.

Being so near the central point of Islamism, Djidda is the scene of much fanaticism. The pilgrims are intolerant of the presence of "Christian dogs;" and the British and French, by whom the commerce of the place is chiefly conducted, have consuls resident there for the protection of the trade. These consuls have, however, no armed force at their disposal, and have been forced to rely upon the assistance of the garrison to settle all disagreements between natives and Europeans. These Europeans are chiefly merchants, residing there for business purposes, and their wives.

On the 15th of June last the Mohammedan populace butchered the English and French consuls and nineteen other Christians, and plundered the consulates. Our illustration presents the scene. The survivors of the Christian residents were with difficulty saved from the infuriated mob by the Kaimakam, or governor of the place, who, at risk of his life, gave them refuge in his house. The boats' crews were obliged to fire on the advancing Mohammedans, who attempted to intercept the retreat of the Christians. Among the victims is the wife of the French consul. His daughter, a young lady of eighteen years, was saved, but not before she had received a sabre-cut across the cheek. It is stated that she killed the murderer of her father.

The British and French forces have taken possession of the town since; and the Turkish Government has promised to punish the Arabs and give satisfaction to the Governments of the murdered and injured persons.



Mohammedanism seems to have grown in fanaticism in all its strongholds since the breaking out of the Indian rebellion. What outside influences may have been brought to bear upon the mutinous Mohammedans in India it is impossible to say. It is stated, however, that among the pilgrims then congregated at Djidda, on their way to Mecca, was a Mussulman sheik, who boasted that he had been an actor in the massacre at Delhi. It needed no more than this to inflame the fanaticism of the barbarous Hadramites, whose hatred of Christians is well known. It is supposed that the present massacre had been for some time planned. The fact that at no less than four points in the Sultan's dominions have Christians been ill-used and massacred since the breaking out of the Indian rebellion would seem to show that that movement has not been without its influence upon the ignorant and fanatical masses of Islamism in other parts of Asia.

The Sublime Porte is evidently powerless for the prevention of such outrages. Its punishments have not hitherto been of a severity adequate to the offenses. This time it is likely that the British and French forces will themselves supervise the administration of justice to the barbarous offenders, and thus teach them that "Christian dogs" are not to be trifled with.

The Arab population believes, in its ignorance, that since the Eastern war the influence of the Sultan has become greater than before, and it is asserted that his representative at the Conference of Paris will know how to make the will of the Sultan prevail over that of France and England. The populace sing ballads in Arabic and Turkish which breathe hatred of the Christians. This occurrence at Djidda has caused a great sensation at Alexandria.

MASSACRE OF CHRISTIANS AT DJIDDA.

CREMORNE GARDENS, LONDON.

CREMORNE GARDENS, LONDON, ENGLAND.

A EUROPEAN institution which has never been naturalized in this country is the public gardens and dancing establishments. It would seem as though, in the United States, there was no compromise or middle way between the stiffest propriety and the lowest immorality. There is the Church and there is Peter Dawson; take your choice; but between the two there is nothing.

They order these things differently in Europe. In each large city there are several public gardens where dancing, flirtation, and amusements of various kinds take place several times a week. Some of the gardens are open every evening; others on certain nights only. Paris boasts several such gardens, beginning with the famous Chaumiere, where the students work off the effects of law and medicine by vigorous cancans with grisettes, and copious chopines of beer. Then there is Mabille, an establishment of a somewhat higher class; the Chateau d'Eau, and several others, which are frequented by men about town and the wealthier class of lorettes. The entertainment at all these places is the same—a good orchestra, a good floor, cosy summer-houses for flirtation, and copious refreshments of various quality. Half past seven is the hour at which people begin to assemble at the students' gardens; nine is the recognized hour of meeting at the more aristocratic gardens on the north of the Boulevards. From these hours till midnight the dance is kept up with praiseworthy diligence. Policemen are present to watch over "the public morals;" occasionally they have been seen to cooperate from the gardens a riotous youth, or a lady who was too zealous in her efforts to imitate the pirouettes of the opera. But "public morals" in Paris can stand a good deal; one must be very troublesome or very shocking indeed to provoke the interposition of these guardians of Parisian propriety.

Similar establishments flourish in Vienna, Berlin, and London. The most famous of the London gardens is Cremorne, of which we give, on the previous page, a spirited illustration. It differs in no respect from the Paris gardens, save that the dancing is heavier, and the mirth less noisy. John Bull is sad over his pleasures; his jollity has sometimes a mournful aspect. Cremorne, viewed by a stranger, seems to carry its own punishment on its face. Though lovely girls are more plentiful than at any Paris gardens, and here and there you do see groups which seem to be resolutely enjoying themselves, the most common expression of countenance, among males as well as females, is one of care, weariness, and ennui.

We now come to the delicate question in reference to these places. They belong to the demi-monde. In other words, they are not frequented by ladies. Men do not take their wives or their daughters to Cremorne or Mabille. Men of every class and station in life go freely, and without concealment; you may meet members of Parliament at Cremorne, and peers of France at the Chateau d'Eau; nay, it has even been whispered that the well known faces of the most eminent American clergy, abroad for their health, have been detected at one or both of these places. But they are an unknown land to respectable ladies. For the lovely and seducing creatures whom you see in the picture—who dance so blithely, smile so charmingly, and eat ices so prettily, are one and all of them members of that pariah caste, the demi-monde. They are Becky Sharps or Lady Hamiltons in the chrysalis stage—waiting to be elevated into respectability; which too many of them, alas! never reach. They are here on 'Change. These gardens are their matrimonial market, where—it must be acknowledged without banns, license, or magistrate—unions are negotiated which often last, and still oftener embitter a lifetime. Many and many a young fellow dates the misery of his life from an evening at Mabille or Cremorne.

Quite lately, within a few weeks, that highly respectable but slightly unoccupied sect of Londoners of whom Lord Shaftesbury is the type and the chief—having failed to rouse the women of our Southern States into a rebellion against slavery, and failed as decidedly to regulate the affairs of Tuscany and the Pope—have taken in hand the nearer and cheaper task of setting Cremorne Gardens straight. In order not to brusk the matter, it was decided, as the first step, to devote the gardens for one night in the week to "the nobility and gentry." A grand ball was accordingly given there a few evenings since. The lady patronesses were all women of title and station; among the guests were half the belles and half the dandies of Belgravia. If ever there was a ball which could lay claim to the title of distinguished, this was the one. Unfortunately, the heavens, which do not discriminate so nicely as mere mortals between the haut monde and the demi-monde, poured down upon the poor duchesses and countesses, and lords and ladies, such floods of rain, that, as a reporter said, Puddle was the master of the situation.

However, now that the ice is broken, we shall doubtless hear of more direct endeavors to reform Cremorne by the actual admixture of the two mondes on the same evening. The Shaftesbury class stick at nothing, and we must expect to hear of duchesses sacrificing their feelings in order to redeem the cancan by participating in its performance. As for us, who only know of demi-mondes and dancing gardens, and even of duchesses too, for the matter of that, by hearsay, and from a remote distance we can look on with composure, and watch the progress of this curious experiment.

LITERARY.

At length the wishes of the thousands of summer travelers are gratified, and we have a capital and readable novel—Doctor Thorne, by Anthony Trollope, published by Harper & Brothers. It comes at an excellent time. Every thing in the way of light reading is exhausted. Railway and steamboat passengers, loungers at watering-places, and inhabitants of quiet farm-houses, will seize on it with avidity. Fresh and piquant, just suited to a warm day and a mind that does not wish to exert itself, it abounds in humor, sharp and delicate wit, while the story is of sprightly interest. It is the best novel since Debit and Credit, and supplies the desideratum of the season.

Doctor Thorne is a quiet, excellent country doctor. His brother, a young scamp, by drugs or force overcame a beautiful girl and dishonored her. The child of this outrage, Mary Thorne, is the heroine of the novel, brought up by the Doctor as his niece, and one Frank Gresham, a wealthy commoner of an old English family, is the real hero. The novel is one of first-class society, seldom, if ever, descending from the circles of rank and fashion, but the author finds abundant opportunity for satire here. One of the most amusing portions of the book might be styled "The wars of the doctors," in which the follies and assumptions of one class of physicians are well shown up. Here is an interesting passage at arms. Dr. Thorne had been discharged, and Dr. Fillgrave sent for, but before Dr. Fillgrave arrived the patient concluded to stick to his old adviser, and Dr. Fillgrave is not allowed to see him, but very politely informed that he does not need his advice this morning. Fillgrave departs in a towering passion, and Lady Scatcherd follows him into the hall and presses on him a five-pound fee, which he virtuously resists.

"Now do'ee take it, do'ee," pressed Lady Scatcherd.

"Utterly out of the question," said Dr. Fillgrave, with great deliberation, as he backed his way into the hall. As he did so, of course he turned round, and found himself almost in the arms of Dr. Thorne.

As Burley must have glared at Bothwell when they rushed together in that dread encounter on the mountain side; as Achilles may have glared at Hector when at last they met, each resolved to test in fatal conflict the prowess of the other, so did Dr. Fillgrave glare at his foe from Greshamsbury, when, on turning round on his exalted heel, he found his nose on a level with the top button of Dr. Thorne's waistcoat.

And here, if it be not too tedious, let us pause a while to recapitulate and add up the undoubted grievance of the Barchester practitioner. He had made no effort to ingratiate himself into the sheepfold of that other shepherd-dog; it was not by his seeking that he was now at Boxall Hill; much as he hated Dr. Thorne, full sure as he felt of that man's utter ignorance, of his incapacity to administer properly even a black dose, of his murdering propensities, and his low, mean, unprofessional style of practice, nevertheless, he has done nothing to undermine him with these Scatcherds. Dr. Thorne might have sent every mother's son at Boxall Hill to his long account, and Dr. Fillgrave would not have interfered—would not have interfered unless specially and duly called on to do so.

But he had been specially and duly called on. Before such a step was taken, some words must have undoubtedly passed on the subject between Thorne and the Scatcherds. Thorne must have known what was to be done. Having been so called, Dr. Fillgrave had come—had come all the way in a post-chaise—had been refused admittance to the sick man's room on the plea that the sick man was no longer sick, and just as he was about to return fee-less—for the want of the fee was not the less a grievance from the fact of its having been tendered and refused—fee-less, dishonored, and in dudgeon, he encountered this other doctor—this very rival whom he had been sent to supplant—he encountered him in the very act of going to the sick man's room.

What mad, fanatic Burley, what god-succored, insolent Achilles ever had such cause to swell with wrath as at that moment had Dr. Fillgrave? Had I the pen of Molière, I could fitly tell of such medical anger, but with no other pen can it be fitly told. He did swell, and when the huge bulk of his wrath was added to his natural proportions, he loomed gigantic before the eyes of the surrounding followers of Sir Roger.

Dr. Thorne stepped back three steps and took his hat from his head, having, in the passage from the hall door to the dining-room, hitherto omitted to do so. It must be borne in mind that he had no conception whatever that Sir Roger had declined to see the physician for whom he had sent—none whatever that that physician was now about to return fee-less to Barchester.

Dr. Thorne and Dr. Fillgrave were doubtless well-known enemies. All the world of Barchester, and all that portion of the world of London which is concerned with the lancet and the scalping-knife, were well aware of this: they were continually writing against each other; continually speaking against each other; but yet they had never hitherto come to that positive personal collision which is held to justify a cut direct. They very rarely saw each other; and when they did meet, it was in some usual way in the streets of Barchester or elsewhere, and on such occasions their habit had been to bow with very cold propriety.

On the present occasion, Dr. Thorne, of course, felt that Dr. Fillgrave had the whip-hand of him; and, with a sort of manly feeling on such a point, he conceived it to be most compatible with his own dignity to show, under such circumstances, more than his usual courtesy—something, perhaps, amounting almost to cordiality. He had been supplanted, quoad doctor, in the house of this rich, eccentric railway baronet, and he would show that he bore no malice on that account. So he smiled blandly as he took off his hat, and in a civil speech he expressed a hope that Dr. Fillgrave had not found his patient to be in any very unfavorable state.

Here was an aggravation to the already lacerated feelings of the injured man. He had been brought thither to be scoffed and scorned at, that he might be a laughing-stock to his enemies, and food for mirth to the vile-minded. He swelled with noble anger till he would have burst, had it not been for the opportune padding of his frock-coat.

"Sir," said he, "Sir;" and he could hardly get his lips open to give vent to the tumult of his heart. Perhaps he was not wrong, for it may be that his lips were more eloquent than would have been his words.

"What's the matter?" said Dr. Thorne, opening his eyes wide, and addressing Lady Scatcherd over the head and across the hairs of the irritated man below him. "What on earth is the matter? Is any thing wrong with Sir Roger?"

"Oh laws, Doctor," said her ladyship, "oh laws, I'm sure it ain't my fault. Here's Dr. Fillgrave in a taking, and I'm quite ready to pay him—quite. If a man gets paid, what more can he want?" And she again held out the five-pound note over Dr. Fillgrave's head.

What more, indeed, Lady Scatcherd, can any of us want, if only we could keep our tempers and feelings a little in abeyance? Dr. Fillgrave, however, could not so keep his, and therefore he did want something more, though at the present moment he could have hardly said what.

Lady Scatcherd's courage was somewhat resuscitated by the presence of her ancient trusty ally; and, moreover, she began to conceive that the little man before her was unreasonable beyond all conscience in his anger, seeing that that for which he was ready to work had been offered to him without any work at all.

"Madam," said he, again turning round at Lady Scatcherd, "I was never before treated in such a way in any house in Barsetshire—never—never."

"Good Heavens, Dr. Fillgrave," said he of Greshamsbury, "what is the matter?"

"I'll let you know what is the matter, Sir," said he, turning round again as quickly as before; "I'll let you know what is the matter. I'll publish this, Sir, to the medical world;" and as he shrieked out the words of the threat, he stood on tiptoes and brandished his eye-glasses up almost into his enemy's face.

"Don't be angry with Dr. Thorne," said Lady Scatcherd; "any ways, you needn't be angry with him. If you must be angry with any body—"

"I shall be angry with him, madam," ejaculated Dr. Fillgrave, making another sudden demi-pirouette. "I am angry with him—or, rather, I despise him;" and, completing the circle, Dr. Fillgrave again brought himself round in full front of his foe.

Dr. Thorne raised his eyebrows and looked inquiringly at Lady Scatcherd; but there was a quiet sarcastic motion round his mouth which by no means had the effect of throwing oil on the troubled waters.

"I'll publish the whole of this transaction to the medical world, Dr. Thorne—the whole of it; and if that has not the effect of rescuing the people of Greshamsbury out of your hands, then—then—then I don't know what will. Is my carriage, that is, post-chaise, there?" and Dr. Fillgrave, speaking very loudly, turned majestically to one of the servants.

"What have I done to you, Dr. Fillgrave?" said Dr. Thorne, now absolutely laughing, "that you should determine to take the bread out of my mouth? I am not interfering with your patient. I have come here simply with reference to money matters appertaining to Sir Roger."

"Money matters! Very well—very well; money matters! That is your idea of medical practice! Very well—very well. Is my post-chaise at the door? I'll publish it all to the medical world—every word—every word of it—every word of it."

"Publish what, you unreasonable man?"

"Man! Sir, whom do you call a man? I'll let you know whether I'm a man—post-chaise there!"

"Don't 'ee call him names now, Doctor; don't 'ee, pray don't 'ee," said Lady Scatcherd.

By this time they had all got somewhat nearer the hall-door; but the Scatcherd retainers were too fond of the row to absent themselves willingly at Dr. Fillgrave's bidding, and it did not appear that any one went in search of the post-chaise.

"Man! Sir, I'll let you know what it is to speak to me in that style. I think, Sir, you hardly know who I am."

"All that I know of you at present is that you are my friend Sir Roger's physician, and I can not conceive what has occurred to make you so angry." And, as he spoke, Dr. Thorne looked carefully at him to see whether that pump discipline had in truth been applied. There were no signs whatever that cold water had been thrown upon Dr. Fillgrave.

"My post-chaise—is my post-chaise there? The medical world shall know all—you may be sure, Sir, the medical world shall know it all;" and thus, ordering his post-chaise, and threatening Dr. Thorne with the medical world, Dr. Fillgrave made his way to the door.

But the moment he put on his hat he returned. "No, madam," said he, "no, it is quite out of the question: such an affair is not to be arranged by such means. I'll publish it all to the medical world—post-chaise there!" and then, using all his force, he flung as far as he could into the hall a light bit of paper. It fell at Dr. Thorne's feet, who, raising it, found that it was a five-pound note.

"I put it into his hat just while he was in his tantrum," said Lady Scatcherd. "And I thought that perhaps he would not find it till he got to Barchester. Well, I wish he'd been paid, certainly, although Sir Roger wouldn't see him; and in this manner Dr. Thorne got some glimpse of understanding into the cause of the great offense.

"I wonder whether Sir Roger will see me!" said he, laughing.

Here are very fair directions to a modest man for an after-dinner speech. Frank Gresham is to have a grand dinner on his arriving at age.

Some one, of course, would propose his health, and then there would be a clatter of voices, ladies and gentlemen, men and girls; and when that was done he would find himself standing on his legs, with the room about him going round and round and round.

Having had a previous hint of this, he had sought advice from his cousin, the Honorable George, whom he regarded as a dab at speaking; at least, so he had heard the Honorable George say of himself.

"What the deuce is a fellow to say, George, when he stands up after the clatter is done?"

"Oh, it's the easiest thing in life," said the cousin.

"Only remember this, you mustn't get astray; that is what they call presence of mind, you know. I'll tell you what I do, and I'm often called up, you know; at our agriculturals I always propose the farmers' daughters. Well, what I do is this: I keep my eye steadfastly fixed on one of the bottles, and never move it."

"On one of the bottles!" said Frank; "wouldn't it be better if I made a mark of some old covey's head? I don't like looking at the table."

"The old covey'd move, and then you'd be done; besides, there isn't the least use in the world in looking up. I've heard people say, who go to those sort of dinners every day of their lives, that whenever any thing witty is said, the fellow who says it is sure to be looking at the mahogany."

"Oh, you know I sha'n't say any thing witty; I'll be quite the other way."

"But there's no reason you shouldn't learn the manner. That's the way I succeeded. Fix your eye on one of the bottles, put your thumbs in your waistcoat pockets, stick out your elbows, bend your knees a little, and then go ahead."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

EXCITEMENT ABOUT FRAZER'S RIVER.

They write from California to say that Frazer River continues to occupy every mind. The press of the entire State has been almost monopolized by accounts and letters from there; and every line on the subject has been seized and read with the utmost avidity. The exodus from California of emigrants for that region has continued unabated. Steamers and sailing vessels—some of the former of the largest class—have been brought into requisition to accommodate the travel. Owing to the carelessness, or design, of the masters of vessels in not entering the full number of their passengers on the custom-house books, it is impossible to get at the exact number of those who have left San Francisco, since the breaking out of the excitement, for the new gold region; but it is variously estimated at from 15,000 to 18,000 persons, all adult males. As yet there seems to be no falling off in the number who are leaving. The interior towns are being deserted, and operations in part of our mining country will for a time cease. Property in various parts of California has necessarily depreciated. In many places the depreciation is unreasonably great; and perhaps, says the Bulletin, a better time for investing money profitably in California never existed than at present. Mining claims, paying splendidly, and real estate, have been sold by individuals afflicted with the "Frazer River fever" at less than half their real value.

A STRANGE ROMANCE.

A Watertown (New York) paper has the following:

"A paragraph is going the rounds of the papers relating how a man named Frazer was recently arrested near Baltimore and committed to the jail near Moorestown, New Jersey, from whence he had escaped, when under confinement for counterfeiting. The story is touched up with a little romance concerning a sister of his, who is said to have struggled hard for a livelihood in her younger days, but who is now a great lady at the Court of France—all of which is true.

"This Frazer was once a resident of our county. He came here with Lucien Murat—son of the illustrious Murat and the beautiful Pauline Bonaparte—nephew of the old and cousin of the present Emperor. Lucien, assisted by this Frazer and a French chap, whose name we can not recall, undertook to build a 'city' on Indian River, between Evans Mills and Theresa. This was some twenty-three years ago. This trio were a precious set. Horse-racing and cock-fighting were more industriously attended to than legitimate business; still a grist-mill, a few shops, and a store were put up, but in the end, went down under the sheriff's hammer. Thus began and ended the great city of 'Joachim.' The old mill is still standing as a monument of Lucien Murat's failures in this county. The wright who built the mill still holds an expressive memento of Lucien in the form of a 'promise to pay,' given for eighteen hundred dollars' worth of labor performed.

"After our adventurers left this county Frazer went to New York and got rich—Murat went to Bordentown, New Jersey, married Frazer's sister, and remained poor. His wife actually supported him by teaching school. Meantime her brother continued to wax fat and fast. He became noted as a gentleman of wealth, leisure, and pleasure, without giving a thought, it is said, to his relatives, who were then under the frowns of fortune. The throw of the dice-box of destinies which gave France into the hands of Louis Napoleon, also gave peace and glory to Lucien Murat and his very worthy and hard-working wife. He is now one of the high dignitaries of the Empire, and she is one of the first ladies of the court. Thus, while the sister occupies the Elysée Bourbon at Paris, the brother is awaiting his sentence to serve in a New Jersey State prison. So the 'play' goes on."

FURY OF A JEALOUS WOMAN.

At the City Hotel, Hartford, last week, a maid-of-all-work—a good-looking woman of twenty-four—named Mary Sheridan, cut the throat of her false lover, James Martin, with a razor. She had seen or heard something to open her eyes to the fact that her gallant was an impostor, who had a wife and children elsewhere. So she determined to revenge herself, and watching from a window, enticed Martin, who was passing the hotel, to come in and up into a porter's room. Here, on pretense of loosening his cravat for him, which she said was too tight, the desperate girl gained an opportunity to cut a big gash into his throat with a razor; it missed the artery, and Martin escaped from her with a liberal loss of blood. His wound was dressed by Dr. Ellsworth, who says it is a wonder that she did not sever the carotid artery; as it was, Martin barely escaped with his life. He was too weak from loss of blood to appear before the Police Court, and Mary was sent to jail, for want of $500 bonds, to await her trial.

STRIKE, BUT HEAR ME!

The Detroit Board of Education, who must be a little waggishly inclined, have adopted as a device for the seal of that body a handsome young school-mistress with a thriving younker across her lap. The left hand is uplifted, having a stout leathern strap in the act of descending upon the younker aforesaid, whose mouth is wide open, from which issues the motto of zeal, "Strike, but hear me!"

A NEW SWINDLING DODGE.

A new swindling dodge has lately come to light in Albany, which shop-keepers will do well to beware of.

A young lady there entered a grocery, and after taking a seat on a chair near the counter, ordered a variety of articles, which were weighed, tied up, and handed to her by the attentive and polite store-keeper. As each package was given her, she dropped it into an earthen vase which she held in her lap. When she had completed her purchases she placed the lid on the vase, and setting it on one end of the counter, requested the store-keeper to allow it to stand there for a few minutes, while she attended to some business in the vicinity, stating at the same time that on her return she would settle the bill. Shortly after her departure, an attendant of the store having occasion to move this vase, it was found to be considerably lighter than the number of articles placed in it would warrant, and on removing the lid the secret was discovered—there was no bottom to it! It is supposed that the ingenious female had a pocket in the front of her dress, in which to place the articles as they were handed to her. It is needless to say that she did not return for her vase.

A FATHER TRYING TO STARVE HIS CHILD TO DEATH.

A man in Cincinnati named Wm. Lally, says the Gazette, 27th ult., was lately brought before Judge Pruden, upon the charge of attempting to starve his own child to death! It appears that some two or three weeks since Lally married a second wife, and since that time the little child in question, which is only between two and three years of age, has been compelled to remain in the wood-shed, both day and night, with scarce food enough to sustain life. It had become fearfully emaciated, and presented an appearance calculated to excite the sympathies of the most indifferent. Some of the neighbors gave the child food; it devoured it most ravenously, thereby giving the lie to the assertion of the father, that he offered the child food, but that it would not eat it. The only excuse Lally made for his inhuman conduct, when arrested, was, that the child was sick, and smelled so badly that it was very offensive to have it in the house! So he thrust the poor little thing into the wood-shed to starve. Dr. Walker stated that it was suffering from starvation only.

HORRIBLE SUICIDE IN DELIRIUM TREMENS.

Phil Hickey, at Newark, found about seven dollars, and immediately went on a spree, working himself up to an incipient stage of mania a potu. Friday night he slept in a barn belonging to a Mr. Lewis, and in the morning went into a house and asked for a knife, which was given to him. Hickey returned to the barn, and, inserting the knife in his mouth, ripped open one cheek as far back toward the ear as possible, and then, turning the edge, served the other cheek in the same way, but did not succeed in cutting quite so long a gash as on the first attempt. After enlarging his mouth to his entire satisfaction, the wretched man commenced hacking at his throat. He managed to remove sufficient of the flesh to lay bare the windpipe, arteries, etc., but the dullness of the knife prevented the accomplishment of his suicidal purpose, if he can be supposed to have had any purpose at all. Even the horrible condition to which the poor fellow had reduced himself did not prevent him from craving for liquor, and he drank a glass of whisky with eagerness before his wounds had been attended to.

PERSONAL.

Perley, the Washington correspondent of the Boston Journal, writes: "Queen Isabella will probably be requested, in a quiet way, to order Signor Muruagua home to his mother's Andalusian possessions, or to transfer him to some other post, and thus relieve Mr. Corcoran from his impertinent, chivalrous, and amatory demonstrations. It is but a repetition of the action of unprincipled foreign adventurers, since the days of Lady Washington's Republican Court, when the Count de Tilly ran away with Miss Maria Matilda Bingham of Philadelphia, who afterward became Lady Ashburton. Her papa, Mr. Bingham (a Senator in Congress and a Quaker City millionaire merchant), was very much incensed at the abduction of Miss Maria Matilda, then only sixteen, and one of his friends, a transatlantic packet captain named Barry, gave the Count a thrashing. But the gallant Frenchman claimed his wedded wife, and Mr. Bingham was forced to pay him £5000 (or rather satisfy his creditors to that amount), and to settle an annuity of £600 on him. The Count then left for la belle France, the marriage was legally declared a myth, and the fair Miss Matilda was afterward wooed and won by Mr. Baring, who, in due course of time, became Lord Ashburton. 'There is nothing new under the sun,' and the Riviere-Blount case, with others of recent occurrence, are but a repetition of the speculations of the Count de Tilly."

Ex-President Tyler is in Norfolk; Van Buren remains at his home in Kinderhook; Fillmore is at Niagara Falls; Pierce is still in Europe. Governor Chase, of Ohio, is in Boston; Governor Wise is at Cobb's Island, Virginia.

Hon. A. H. Stephens, of Georgia, left Crawfordville on the 19th ultimo, in company with his brother, Linton Stephens, Esq., on a tour to the northwest, with the intention of visiting Ohio, Indiana, and several other States before they return, and to be absent till the latter part of August.

"This year," says the London correspondent of the Times, "is sending an unusually large delegation of Britons to our shores. Besides the young lordlings who have already gone to delight themselves at Newport and Saratoga, the celebrated economist, Mr. Nassau Senior, who has just come back with a new theory of Troy from Asia Minor, is shortly to sail for New York, in company with Sir David Dundas, and, as rumor darkly hints, with Lord John Russell himself, whose political functions at home are not absolutely enslaving just at this time."

The vailed murderess, Mrs. Robinson, of Troy, gives the keepers at Sing Sing a deal of trouble. Latterly she has become so troublesome that the officers are forced to confine her to her room a great portion of the time. For an hour or two each day, while the other convicts are engaged in the shops, she is left at liberty in the prison-yard. Her universal employment there is to hunt over the grass-plat for "four-leaved clover." Four-leaved clover is an ingredient in her imaginary caldron, over which she mutters incantations scarcely less weird and wild than that of the "sisters three."

The Boston matrimonial register shows that, during the last year, there has been no less than sixty amalgamation marriages, all white women with black or colored men. The white ladies of Boston and thereabouts have singular tastes.

Edward Crocker, senior boatswain in the navy, died at Portsmouth last week, aged sixty-eight years. He was on board the unfortunate Chesapeake when the collision with the Leopard took place. He served on board the Constitution, under the command of Commodore Hull, and took an active part in the fight with the Guerriere. He was one of the crew of Old Ironsides when she escaped from the British fleet out of Long Island Sound; and in the same vessel participated in the fight with the Java, in which she became a prize to the Americans. He was promoted to the office which he held at the time of his death by President Monroe.

It is supposed that the lightning which killed Miss Nancy Godfrey in Cambridge, Massachusetts, while sitting at her chamber window, was attracted by the metal in her hoops, which was partly melted, and her artificial teeth, which were found at some distance from her.

Mr. Asa Foster, a farmer of Canterbury, New Hampshire, is now in his 94th year, and his wife in her 78th year—an aged couple. The gentleman reads without glasses, and has just completed his haying, doing a good share of the mowing and raking.

Senator Hammond, of South Carolina, was complimented by a public dinner at Charleston last Thursday. Twelve or fifteen hundred persons were present.

Four Roman Catholic priests in this city make public announcement that, by the permission of Archbishop Hughes, they have organized a new enterprise under the title of "The Missionaries' Priests of St. Paul the Apostle." They propose to commence their course of missions in the latter part of September.

A gentleman, who employs a great number of hands in a manufactory in the west of England, in order to encourage his work-people in a due attendance at church on a late fast-day, told them that if they went to church they would receive their wages for that day in the same manner as if they had been at work. Upon which a deputation was appointed to acquaint the employer, that if he would pay them for over-hours, they would attend likewise the Methodist chapel in the evening.

We find in the Boston Journal: "The community will be taken somewhat by surprise to learn that Rev. I. S. Kalloch has accepted a call from the Tremont Temple Baptist Church in this city, and will enter upon his pastoral duties on the first Sabbath in September. A meeting of the church was held last evening for the purpose of taking some action with reference to a pastor. The members were requested to express their preferences by ballot. Eighty-three votes were thrown, and Mr. Kalloch had seventy-six of the number. He was immediately informed of the result, made his appearance at the meeting, and accepted the call as above stated.

M. de Pène, the Paris editor, has nearly recovered from the severe wounds inflicted upon him by his antagonists. They will probably be little pleased to learn that his contributions to the Figaro are about to be published in a separate volume, which will thus perpetuate the insults upon the French army.

Prentice tells this story about Brigham Young: "A gentleman, who went to Utah a few years ago as an officer of the United States government, subsequently informed us, that, as he was walking one day with Brigham, they saw a very bright-looking little fellow that attracted their attention. 'What is your name, little boy?' said Brigham. 'John Young, Sir.' 'Who is your father?' Brigham Young, Sir.'"

Master John Murray, of Detroit, a nice boy, has been sent to jail for sixty days, for whipping his mother. He was in the habit of beating her upon the smallest provocation, and a few days since, while at table, he became offended with his sister, and cut her severely with a knife.

We learn that Lord Richard Grosvenor, Lord Henry Cavendish, and the Hon. Mr. Ashley left St. Anthony, Minnesota, on Tuesday the 29th ult., on a buffalo hunt in the wilds of Dacotah. They went with the same great party which Mohammed Pasha, the Turkish Admiral, was to have accompanied. They will be absent in the wilderness some six weeks.

The Rev. Eleazer Williams, the Bourbon Prince, is now dangerously sick at Hogansburg, Franklin County, New York.

In Virginia, it is stated, a man sent to the Penitentiary the third time is never allowed to quit the institution. A man named Blankenship, lately sent there, finds himself in this predicament.

A Bangor paper understands that our fellow-citizen, the distinguished Fishery Commissioner (Ben Wiggin), and suite, created a great sensation at Cherryfield, before reaching the Bluenoses. The Yankees there, excited by the equipage (a coach and four), rumored it that Lord Napier had arrived, and was on his way to her Majesty's dominions. The probability of this being under discussion, one individual declared that he didn't know whether it was Lord Napier, but he could swear that they were English noblemen from a remark one of them made: "Come, Baron, let's take a drink!" The "Baron" (who is Mr. D. B. Hinckley) does not belong to the Commission, but only happened to fall into its net. He has arrived home in safety.

A. H. Pratt, of Titicut, Connecticut, gets his name into the papers because of his smartness as a shoemaker. In nine minutes and forty seconds he made a pair of No. 7 men's shoes, and, with another workman, made forty-four pairs of kip brogans, with two rows of pegs and half welt, in thirteen hours! Through the instrumentality of his wife, a shoemaker of St. Louis, named Henry Holser, has achieved some notoriety, for the papers of that city record that his wife has presented him with two boys and a girl at one birth.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The India Bill is progressing favorably, as likewise the bill for the government of India. Mr. Disraeli has introduced a bill for the purification of the Thames and the draining of London, at a cost of $15,000,000, to be borne by Government.

THE FRAZER RIVER MINES IN PARLIAMENT.

A very important debate took place in the English Parliament the 20th ultimo on the subject of the renewal of the Hudson's Bay Company's charter. Mr. Roebuck moved that the charter ought not to be renewed; that the legal validity of the exclusive rights claimed by the Company, under their charter, ought at once to be determined by process of law; and that so much of the territory hitherto held by the Company as may be needed for the purpose of colonization ought, without delay, to be resumed by the Government. He asserted that he had in view the building up in British North America of great English lines of settlement from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, which would act as a colonial counterpoise to the immense and "overshadowing" national territorial power of the United States. The Cabinet Ministers assumed, in some measure, the same tone, Sir Bulwer Lytton stating that it was the desire of the Government to make powerful military and naval stations at Vancouver's Island, and to own and control a commercial "viaduct" from the Atlantic to the Pacific, into which the immense trade of China and other Eastern countries would fall.

RENEWAL OF THE TELEGRAPH EXPERIMENT.

At latest dates the Atlantic telegraph fleet were appointed to leave Queenstown for another effort on Saturday, 17th ult. The Directors of the Company having resolved, at a meeting on the 14th, that it was desirable that a renewed attempt should be forthwith made, the English Government issued orders accordingly. The Times says, in its editorial remarks on the subject, that the Agamemnon is clearly unfit to lay the Atlantic cable. If the suggestion of the Great Eastern is not thought worth notice, or if the proprietors of that ship are not ready to lend it for that object, let a ship be built for the purpose at once. Whether it succeeds or not at the first trial, it will find sufficient occupation either in renewing the attempt or in laying down additional cable hereafter.

SIR BULWER LYTTON'S TROUBLES.

These unhappy affairs have again come before the public. A few facts may be briefly given.

Lady Lytton, when married to Sir Edward, possessed a small property worth about £400 per annum; and it is stated that, her husband being then in far less affluent circumstances than at present, she transferred this to him, in order to give him a qualification for a seat in Parliament. Her experience of the marriage state was an unhappy one, and in 1836 a separation took place by mutual consent, Sir Edward consenting to pay her £400 a year during his life, which has been her allowance from that to the present time, notwithstanding he is, or is reputed to be, a wealthy man, his annual income being estimated at from £8000 to £10,000. Lady Lytton has become involved in debt, and of late this has claimed about one-half of her income. One of her chief complaints against Sir Edward was the smallness of the means he allowed for her support. By the deed of separation, Lady Lytton was to possess in her own right any property she might hereafter acquire, which has been chiefly from her publications—in some cases remunerative, but in others miserable failures. Lady Lytton has, for some years past, endeavored to obtain an increase of her allowance, and her presence and conduct at the recent re-election of her husband for Hertfordshire (on his accepting office under Government) will be recollected.

SHE IS CONFINED IN A MAD-HOUSE.

It seems that doubts arising in Sir Edward's mind regarding her sanity, he had her examined by two physicians. The result of their last interview with her is thus given: "Her ladyship arose with her friends to depart. Dr. Thompson expressed a desire that she would not hurry away; nevertheless she proceeded, and on getting outside the room was astonished to see before her two policemen, two women who had the appearance of nurses, and a gentleman who, it has since been found, is the keeper of a lunatic asylum in the neighborhood of London. Lady Lytton maintained a calm and dignified demeanor. She was, indeed, the calmer of the two—herself and her Taunton friend—for her affrighted cousin had rushed into the street. She was ushered into another room, on entering which she observed a figure like that of Sir Edward's hastily retreating by a door at the other end. At first she refused to yield up her liberty; but the policemen were called, and she then said, 'Resistance being vain, I submit; but under compulsion.' Her friend insisted upon accompanying her, and she saw on a table in the room a paper, which she presumed to be a 'certificate' of Lady Lytton's insanity. Upon this were the names of two medical gentlemen, and, it is believed, of Sir Edward. Her ladyship being requested to proceed to the door, where, she was told, a carriage was ready to receive her, again refused compliance except under compulsion; and on this the policemen, each taking an arm, led her forward, her friend endeavoring to console her, and seeming to comfort her by the confident exclamations, 'Never mind, Lady Lytton, they may take you, but they can not take me!' 'You may be inside the asylum, but I shall be out!' Besides the lady so often referred to there was no one present on Lady Lytton's part. The policemen did 'their duty,' and her ladyship was constrained to enter the carriage, her friend forcing herself in immediately after her, and refusing to leave it. One or two gentlemen also seating themselves within it, the party was rapidly driven to an asylum at Brentford, kept by a person named Hill."

PROSPECT OF A SETTLEMENT.

It is now stated, upon the best authority, that all matters in reference to this lady, about whom certain statements have appeared in some of the public journals, are in process of being amicably settled by family arrangements to the satisfaction of all parties concerned.

LETTER FROM SIR BULWER LYTTON'S SON.

The following letter has been published:

"Sir,—As the son of Lady Bulwer Lytton, with the best right to speak on her behalf, and so obviously with the best means of information as to warrant the hope that my simple assertion will be at once believed in the matter to which I am compelled to refer, I beg to say that the statements which have appeared in some of the public journals are exaggerated and distorted, and that they are calculated to convey to the public mind impressions the most erroneous and unjust. As was natural, I put myself in constant communication with my mother, and with the gentleman with whose family, in his private house, she was placed (for I beg distinctly to state she was never for a moment taken to a lunatic asylum), and carried out the injunctions of my father, who confided to me implicitly every arrangement which my affection could suggest, and enjoined me to avail myself of the advice of Lord Shaftesbury in whatever was judged best and kindest to Lady Lytton.

"My mother is now with me, free from all restraint, and about, at her own wish, to travel for a short time in company with myself and a female friend and relation of her own selection.

"From the moment my father felt compelled to authorize those steps which have been made the subject of so much misrepresentation, his anxiety was to obtain the opinion of the most experienced and able physicians, in order that my mother should not be subject to restraint for one moment longer than was strictly justifiable. Such was his charge to me.

"The certificates given by Dr. Forbes Winslow and Dr. Conolly are subjoined; and I ought to add that Dr. Conolly was the physician whom my father had requested to see Lady Lytton; that Dr. Forbes Winslow was consulted by my mother's legal advisers; and I felt anxious to obtain the additional authority of the opinion of the latter gentleman, and requested my friend, Mr. Edwin James, to place himself in communication with him. I trust that such journals as have given publicity to partial and inaccurate statements, will do me the justice to publish this communication, to which I need add no more than to say, that this painful matter has been arranged, as it ought to be, by the members of the family whom it exclusively regards. I have the honor to be, Sir, your most obedient servant. Robert B. Lytton.

"No. 1, Park Lane, July 17, 1858."

A QUEER MARRIAGE.

An accomplished and beautiful young English woman—Miss E. Southall—has fallen in love with and recently married Juan Fernandez, a celebrated bull-fighter at Madrid. The strength and agility of the Spaniard may be imagined from the fact that he frequently tired out the fiercest bull by vaulting on its back, and remained so firmly fixed that the infuriated animal, finding every effort to dislodge him in vain, would at length fall exhausted beneath its Herculean rider; a sight that obtained more applause for Fernandez than the death of half a dozen bulls by the weapon of the stoutest Spaniard. The pair have recently arrived in London, and are now settled in Belgravia, where a splendid mansion was purchased to receive them by the father of the lady.

ANOTHER MESALLIANCE AMONG THE ARISTOCRACY.

Sir Fitzroy Kelly has justly scandalized the fashionable world by avowing his marriage some time ago with his dairy-maid. The fact has been concealed until further concealment was impossible, the lady having presented him with a son and heir, to the intense disgust of his only child by his first marriage—a daughter—who is herself married and has a family. The Attorney-General is in his sixty-second year.

OLD DORRIT ONCE MORE.

A poor man in England sued a wealthy knave for the seduction of his daughter. The suit failed by a nol pros., through the negligence of his solicitors. The cost fell on the plaintiff—three pounds eight shillings. He was thrown into prison, where he remained seven years.

FRANCE.

THE FOURTH JULY AT PARIS.

An English paper says: "Fourth of July was celebrated by the Americans in Paris, at the residence of Mr. Halkett. The élite of American society in Paris was present, and a sprinkling of distinguished foreigners also attended. The speeches—and many were delivered—were characterized by the greatest cordiality toward England. General Ward, a member of Congress, scouted the idea of the possibility of a quarrel arising between Young Yankee Doodle and Grandmother Britannia, and touchingly alluded to the common origin of the two great Anglo-Saxon nations. These sentiments were loudly cheered by the company. The American minister, Mr. Mason, was not present; but sent in a letter the 'sentiment' he intended proposing, 'The cordial union of France and the United States.' A similar toast was proposed and carried with the greatest enthusiasm in honor of the 'Old Country,' an eminent English barrister returning thanks in a spirited speech. A humorous Virginian also gave a toast to 'the prosperity of Cuba,' remarking, amidst cheers and laughter, 'that in the States they were all fond, he might say they were very fond, of Cuba.' Other speeches and toasts of an essentially patriotic character followed, which were duly honored. Without going minutely into their merits, it will be sufficient to say that these representatives of the most slangy nation in all creation talked freely of—

'——Their patriotic pa's,
And their star-spangled banner;
Their country's bird a settin' by
And cryin' out, Hosanner.'

"One of the features of the feast was the star-spangled banner in question, which was carried about the room, and waved over the heads of the guests at appropriate moments."

BLUNDERS OF THE POLICE.

The Times correspondent has the following: "Since the residence of the Emperor at Plombières, where he exposes his person every day in long walks in the neighborhood of the town, the police on the way to Plombières, as well as at the Imperial residence, exercise a redoubled surveillance over all doubtful persons. This surveillance has given rise to the following incident. A noble hidalgo, the Count de V——, of Madrid, arrived a few days ago at Paris, with the intention of visiting Plombières. At Epinal, on the route, the attention of the watchful police was fixed by the strongly-marked physiognomy and the costume of the noble Spaniard, and they demanded to see his passport. The Count had neglected to bring with him that indispensable document. He was thrown into prison, with a strong conviction on the part of the police of Epinal that they were going to save their country from a great crime. The telegraph was put in play, and the police soon learned, to their discomfiture, that their zeal had led them into a gross error. The Count was liberated with a deluge of apologies, but to show that he did not guard rancor for the mistake, he left a sum of money to be distributed among the prisoners of Epinal."

MORE BONAPARTE QUARRELS.

Prince Pierre Napoleon Bonaparte has addressed an angry letter to General de Heischman, aid-de-camp to the King of Wurtemberg, relative to some statements affecting King Joseph, the Prince's father, which occur in the newly-published memoirs of Count Miot, edited by the General, the Count's son-in-law. Miot, the Prince calls a "robber and a butcher;" a "liar or a dastard;" and the letter concludes in the following terms: "As to you, monsieur, since you have not feared to pick out of the mud the pen of the pamphleteer Miot, you will not forget, I conclude, that you carry a sword."

HOOPS GOING OUT.

The Paris correspondence of the North American contains the following: "The attempt made by Queen Victoria to resist the invasion of the crinoline is an old story. We use the word crinoline as being the one now indiscriminately applied to all skirt-expanders, though the material called by that name has been long superseded by steel and whalebone hoops. Her Majesty appeared without one at her daughter's marriage. She was probably annoyed that so much of her territory should be covered by French invention. Since that eventful day no hoops, no stiffeners of any kind swell the skirts of the English belles. On a recent visit to London we were struck by the contrast the female part of the population presented with the Parisiennes; they really seemed like creatures from another sphere; and, after all the outcry that has been raised against the outre rotundity imparted by the hoops, we must confess to preferring it by far to the scraggy, long-drawn out forms we saw in England. In Paris the traveling English women, with straight up-and-down, fork-like figures, surmounted by immense flat hats, garnished with lace, resemble open umbrellas—or, as we heard one of their own countrymen say, insane mammoth mushrooms running about the streets.

A NEW HAT FOR LADIES.

"And now we are on the topic of fashions, we must announce a new invention, intended to facilitate traveling, by obviating the necessity for numerous hat-boxes. The chapeau Gibus, which has been some years adopted by the gentlemen, has now its counterpart for the ladies; we have the chapeau mecanique pour dames, that contract and expand on the same principle as the opera hats of the celebrated Monsieur Gibus, with this difference, that the bonnet may be as pretty and as tastefully trimmed with flowers or feathers as any other not fold-up-able one, while the male convenience is invariably made up of the same dead-black mourning material, and is, if possible, even uglier than the ordinary stove pipe. The chapeau mecanique may be folded and opened one thousand times in succession without any detriment to its beauty and freshness. So says the maker; we have not put it to the test. The box that contains it is not more than two inches high, and the bonnet is not dearer than an ordinary one similarly trimmed."

FEARFUL CONSEQUENCES OF WEARING HOOPS.

The Courrier de Lyons contains the following: "Two evenings ago a young soldier, posted as sentinel in one of the principal squares of this city, was standing quietly with both his hands leaning on the muzzle of his musket, when two ladies at the moment passed close to him on the foot-pavement. The ample crinoline of one of them, distended by the breeze which was blowing at the time, and by the rapid pace at which the ladies were walking, caught in the lock of the gun, and in a moment it was out of the soldier's hands, and rapidly going along the pavement, attached to the lady's dress. It is difficult to say which of the two, the soldier or the lady, felt the most embarrassment at this singular incident." The Salut Public adds the following remarks: "The recital of our contemporary is in the main exact, but it errs in some details, which we are happy to be able to rectify. The true story is that the lady in question carried off with her crinoline, not a musket, but a 48-pounder. The lady, alarmed at this singular appendage to her dress, ran off at a rapid pace, dragging the piece of artillery after her. It was only at a distance of more than a mile from the artillery ground that the lady could be overtaken and stopped. She then fainted. Fearing that her emotion might be attended with serious consequences, the artillerymen carefully concealed from her that the gun which she had been dragging after her was loaded with grape."

BADLY COMBED LADIES.

Since the immense success which attended the invention of the word Lorette—a word designating a certain class of gay women of the higher rank of those who live maritally out of marriage—we have had a succession of words for the same class, all seeking the honors of notoriety. The last word, however, is the best. A blonde actress invented, a few months ago, a style of coiffure for the new Mary Stuart bonnets, which became a rage at once in the Lorette world. The hair of the forehead is cut short, commencing a few inches and gradually growing longer as it approaches the ear. All the hair of the side of the head, in front of the ears, thus shortened, is tied up over night in fine bands in threads, in such a way that when undone in the morning there appears on each side of the forehead an immense puff of open, ragged, wavy hair, filling completely the relief in the sides of the Mary Stuart bonnets. It has the air of being badly combed, and from this they derive the new designation—les mal peignées—("the badly combed.") At first sight you would say inevitably "there's a lady who has forgot to comb herself this morning." But all this disorder is the result of studied art; the evening's banding requires two hours of the most active hair-dresser's hands; it is but a refinement of pride, an exaggeration of vanity. The mal peignées are found almost exclusively among the blondes, because the more daylight that can be shown through the dry, frizzled puffs, the better. It is only the exaggeration of the disorder that is most comme il faut—in its kind. The night that Mademoiselle Duverger made her first appearance on the stage in the new coiffure, the entire clan of mal peignées were present to give éclat to the new fashion. For that evening there was a shower of bouquets and applause, but for that evening only. The following evenings there was a good deal more pommade and less applause. The word mal peignées, like Lorette and demi-monde, as applied to a certain class of women, has made its entrée into the French language.

DEATH FROM A FLY BITE.

The Siècle says: "A woman residing in the Rue Rochechouart was bitten a few days ago in the back of the neck by one of those large flies which feed on decayed meat, at this season of the year, and died the day before yesterday after most severe suffering, and in spite of the best medical attendance. It is supposed that the fly must have eaten carrion immediately before wounding the woman, and that the virus which it introduced into the wound quickly spread through the system."

PRUSSIA.

A VERY ODD NOTICE.

A Berlin letter of the 11th ult., says that the clerical authorities of that city have been informed of the period at which to offer up prayers for the happy delivery of Princess Frederick William. The Prince and Princess live in perfect seclusion, at the Prince of Prussia's pretty summer residence, Babelsburg, near Potsdam.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S VISIT.

Queen Victoria's visit to Berlin is to be strictly of a family character. Notice has been given that there are to be no fêtes, nor salutes, nor any of the usual demonstrations consequent upon the visit of the crowned head. The whole cause of the sudden change in the programme is unknown, and the uncertainty has caused serious alarms regarding the health of the Princess Frederick William.

ITALY.

WHO MAY GO TO NAPLES.

A gentleman from Boston, who is traveling in Europe, purposed visiting Naples, but was informed by those in authority that, his name appearing as one of the subscribers for the cannon presented to Sardinia from the citizens of Boston, he could not be permitted to "see Naples and die" in ecstasy of delight, as other strangers have been reported to do. All the gentleman's explanations and remonstrances were unavailing, and he was forced to go another way.

ANOTHER COMPULSORY CONVERSION.

The Corriere Mercantile publishes the following from Bologna: "On the 23d June a commissary of the Pontifical police of Bologna, accompanied by an escort of gens d'armes, claimed admittance into the house of M. Mortera, a Jew, and summoned him to give up one of his sons, named Edgar, to the Holy Inquisition. The surprise and consternation of the family may be imagined. It turned out, at length, that the youth had been secretly baptized through the manœuvres of a maid-servant staying in the house. The order was executed, and Edgar Mortera sent to the convent of St. Dominic, on the 24th, to the surprise of the whole town."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

On the 1st of June an engagement took place between the Calpee rebels and the troops of Maharajah Scindia, near Gwalior. The right and left divisions of Scindia's force gave way, and joined the enemy. The centre composed of the Maharajah's body-guards, fought well, but was beaten with considerable loss. Scindia fled to Agra. The rebels had occupied the fort at Gwalior, but the English have since retaken it.

General Rose's brigade was half-way to Gwalior when the fall of the place was heard of. General Rose, from Calpee; Colonel Hicks, from Jhanse; and Brigadier Smith, from Sepree, were to meet before Gwalior on the 17th of June.

The rebels were in great force around Lucknow, and interrupting communications with Cawnpore.

Another dispatch says the people at Lucknow were beginning to come in.

In Rohilcund and the Doab all was quiet.

Sir Colin Campbell was about to join the Governor-General at Allahabad.

Disarming proceeds quietly on both sides of India. The disarmed Sepoy regiments in Bengal had been discharged in small parties. The Rajah of Ransee's palace and town had been plundered by the rebels.

The rebel garrison of Humeapor, numbering 5000, with four guns, escaped pursuit.

SUFFERINGS FROM THE HEAT.

The Times Bombay correspondent says: "I do not often write of the weather, but it is at this moment the most important element in the campaign. For twenty years no such season has been known. The little rains fell a fortnight before their time, and then ceased; and the land is one huge steam bath. At Calpee the thermometer in tents is, 134 degrees; in Jugdespore it is 130 degrees; and in Lower Bengal, within the reach of the sea-breeze, it is 126. In Calcutta, in a house hermetically sealed against the light, and with the punka going, it stands steadily at 96 degrees. Sickness is all but universal. The small-pox is bursting out here and there, half the European community have fevers, and a moiety of the other half only escape the curse by an infliction which, though not unhealthy, is even more unbearable—innumerable boils. In Allahabad, out of one thousand six hundred Europeans, not nine hundred are fit for duty, and the number of deaths from 'apoplexy'—that is, sun-stroke—exceeds the mortality from all other sources. In the midst of all this there are regiments in which the stock is maintained, and in which punkas paid for by government are forbidden. The Duke of Cambridge should stop all this by forbidding the stock in India at once—its use is optional, I believe—and compelling commanding officers to leave the punkas alone. The royal artillery, for instance, are losing men at the rate of 14 per cent. per annum exclusive of fighting casualties. Again, the men are now dressed in light-colored cotton cloth, capital stuff to resist the climate; but their heads are still unprotected. They receive, it is true, a white cover for their caps, but it is no protection, except so far as its color is concerned. Routine and the sun together are beating us, and I was told this morning, that with all the reinforcements and recruits sent out, we can not muster even now 26,000 effective Europeans. By October a third of them will be off duty, for though the soldiers do not get apoplexy in barracks, they do get liver complaint and low debilitating fevers."

A DIRTY BOX.

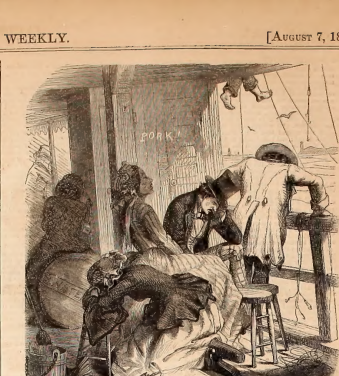
In Allen's Indian Mail, a writer dating from Lucknow, says: "Yesterday (April 27th), in a small corner, was discovered a dirty box, after an hour's digging, and when opened, behold a collection of rubies, diamonds, pearls, etc., of the value of 100,000 rupees! The soil of Lucknow is a mint of money."

CHINA.

FURTHER SUCCESSES OF THE EUROPEANS.

The fort at the mouth of the Peiho River, mounting 158 guns, and backed by a large body of troops, was attacked on the 20th of May by the English and French gunboats, and taken. The loss of the Allies was trifling. The Chinese stood to their guns very fairly.

On the 22d the forces commenced advancing up the river. The weather was cool, and the squadron in good health and spirits.



Six thousand French troops, originally destined for Cochin-China, are on their way to Pechelle.

From Canton information was that, on the 2d of June, an ineffectual attempt was made by the Allies to route the Chinese 'braves' on the mountains in the vicinity.

Nangpo was in possession of the rebels, and the English merchants had gone on board her Majesty's ship Surprise.

THE ORCHESTRA.

PASSING SANDY HOOK.

A TRIP TO THE FISHING BANKS.

"Now, boys, make this most of your time; and if you'll let an old feller give advice, get as much salt sea-air as you can!"

Thus old Bowwax, as he sent us off—Bart (short for Bartholomew) and myself—junior clerks in the house of Bowwax & Co., Grocers. Ten clear days we had before us—salary paid in advance, together with a modest douceur, timidly thrust into our open hands (as though it was a thing to be shunned) by the jovial, red-faced, but grim head of the house of Bowwax & Co.

Fierce and angry were the debates we had that night in the little attic room we shared in Brooklyn. Bart was for going to Connecticut, where—selfish brute!—his family lived. My idea was to take the route through Jersey, and spend a day or two—at Princeton, where my mother's farm was. But neither of us convincing the other, we agreed to devote the next day—Tuesday—to an excursion on the fishing banks in the "splendid fast-going steamer" Tow-an-ago, which was advertised to leave at nine A.M., precisely. I trust the honest readers of this periodical will believe me when I say that we came to this conclusion without the least reference to an arrangement which had been made some days before, in virtue of which Mrs. O'Brien and her three lovely but slightly Irish daughters had promised to honor the Tow-an-ago with their company.

The day was undoubtedly fine. As Peggy O'Brien observed, "It blooms some;" but when one has such charming nabkes as Peggy's, a bluff nor'wester is not to be frowned down. There was Peggy with your humble servant; Molly with poor Bart—he is not five feet six, and she is near six feet, and a monstrous fine woman; Kitty with her beau, Terence O'Grady, a member of a fire company (if he has any other calling he keeps it a secret); and old Mother O'Brien, a "jule of a creature," as she says herself, "barrin' a cast in her left eye," she brought up the rear with Pat Flanagan, a retired shipping-agent, who is a good fellow to have on such occasions—he is so uncommon free and friendly with the police.

We were on the wharf, looking round every where for the "splendid and fast-going steamer," when up stepped a policeman to Pat.

"Why, Pat, my boy," said he, "are you out already?"

"Whisht!" answered Pat; "don't ye see?" and turning to me, he added, "He's surprised to see me out of the house, after the way I hurted me knee."

"Oh!" said I, "indeed!" Not having heard of the accident to Mr. Patrick's knee, I took less interest in the incident than Mother O'B., who was much concerned, and the policeman, who seemed to enjoy the joke (whatever it was) mightily.

We discovered the steamer, after a while, nestling under lee of the dock, with nothing but her smoke-pipe visible; and though she may have been splendid and fast-going, we agreed that she was not large or imposing. It was a trial to Mrs. O'B., who is large—very large—to descend the abruptly-inclined plane leading to the deck; but she accomplished it, mainly through my civility. I received her and her lovely daughters as they were shot down from above. We made fast sundry fishing-lines to the railing round the deck, by way of taking legal possession; and Peggy and I having secured a sturdy nook, we waited in patience an arrival on the banks.

The crowd had poured in upon us. There were a number of modest-looking ladies, in respect to whom the captain (a friend of mine) observed that he couldn't help it; they would come; but he hoped they wouldn't inconvenience my party; and also a number of ladies who did not appear particularly subdued, but in whom I recognized the wives and sisters of people whom I knew—at least by sight. There were a few men whose faces I recognized; I had seen their portraits in the gallery of Mr. Daniel Carpenter, a very practical lover of the arts. And there were quite a number of foreigners, speaking all manner of unknown tongues, smoking preposterous pipes, and appearing as Lo—an inveterate Know-Nothing—was forced to confess, rather more gentlemanly than any fellow-countrymen. Here and there Peggy, who is very sentimental, drew my attention to a couple who, like ourselves, seemed to be desirous of seeking solitude in the throng; who had evidently come on the excursion in order to get away from the people they knew, and who seemed perfectly happy and alone in the midst of a throng of strangers.

We ate oil! The "band," in reference to which the advertisement and handbills promised so much, proves to be three hyperchondriacal musicians with wheezy instruments, who seem prepared for any thing. To judge from their faces, it would be impossible to say whether they were on their way to the Penitentiary or to the Arctic regions—so imperturbably miserable and resigned do their countenances appear. We are oil! Heavy flakes of sooty substance, which burn through shawls and capes, fall in clouds; poor Peggy's white shoulder has been laid bare by a traitorous spark, and the hole (confound it!) is not large enough to administer consolation after the manner of children. Oil! The dull, feverish-looking shore of Long Island, on one side, with houses scattered at rare intervals; on the other, first, the marshy-looking Jersey flats, and beyond, the slowly ascending heights of Staten Island, with the lonelith nestling in the hill shade; behind us, Fort William, resting in a background of city houses, shipping, and steamers; in front the Narrows, sprinkled with white sails; yes, we are oil—no doubt of it. The hypochondriacal musicians are tuning (!) their wheezy instruments; the loving couples are snuggling into shady corners; crinoline is undergoing fearful compression, and hoops are liberating, by a series of strictly mathematical conic sections, the perils of crowds and the latest fashions in pantalets; a gentle notion of the cranky Tow-an-ago is producing uncomfortable effects among some of the passengers. We are oil in earnest!

As we glide through the Narrows and approach the mouth of the Lower Bay, we encounter the rolling swell which never fails to mark that spot, and by which, I am told, captains have ascertained in a fog in calm weather where they were. Now appears on the deck a weather-beaten, strong-nerved man with a pail and a swab. His office, in mercy to the reader, I shall not state. But I submit to the charitable whether it was decent for this miscreant to approach people who had seen him in the discharge of the duties of his office, and who were wavering between sea-worthiness and seasickness, and to ask them with a sardonic grin:

"Any body want me here?"

I could have assassinated the fellow.

Presently, while we are half-sorrowing, half-laughing at the tributes which are paid successively to Neptune by old Mrs. O'Brien and her friend Pat—both of whom are clamorous for whisky, and who declare that they might be "drowned this minnit" without being sorry for it—the miserable hypochondriacs I have mentioned strike up a polka, and now half the passengers begin to dance despairingly. The girls take their hats off—a wise precaution, as otherwise, leaning their heads against their partners, as they do, to steady themselves, they would infallibly spoil flowers, ribbons, and gauze—before we can get into the spirit with reckless ardor. It was so hot that Peggy and I had the fan incessantly in use; but these frantic creatures whirled round and round, tumbling over stools, fishing-lines, bags, prostrate invalids, and each other, resolutely bent on defying consequences by inordinate exertion. After the polka some frisk-

AT ANCHOR.

AN IRISH JIG.

ish person proposed an Irish jig, and the musicians forthwith proceeded to perform that insane piece of music. To our amazement, the first two persons who sprang to the deck were Mother O'Brien and Pat O'Flannigan. Scarce ten minutes had elapsed since both were in the agonies of seasickness, and were imploring their friends to throw them overboard; to see them now, capering, and jumping, and going through an insane pantomime of passion and coquetry, you would have supposed that they were possessed of devils. Bart and Molly vainly besought the old lady not to expose herself to the jeers of "an uneducated rabble;" but the old dame protested that she must jig for the love of "auld Ireland," and jig she certainly did with a vengeance.

But we are at the Fishing Banks. The anchor is down. The swell is heavy, and Stiggs, the Englishman, whose stupid jokes render him a general nuisance, remarked that "the heavy swells" were feeling it. Not more than half the company were in a state to enjoy the fishing. Good places on the side of who have chosen seats below. Bets are made on "the first fish."

LEMONADE, OR ICE-WATER?

"Hah! a bite." "I have him." "No, you haven't." "Pull him up!" "Confound him! he's got my bait." "Another bass!"—"Jones, you're fool of my line!" "It's your fault!" "I say it's yours!" — "Waiter, more bait!" "Boy, bring two drinks — brandy!" "Molly, darlin', sit on me knee!" "Any body want me here?" "A splendid bite, by Jove!" — "Hush! the fish won't bite." "Harry, dear, I'd like to lie down." "Have a sandwich?"

In the midst of which din and clatter a heavy splash is heard, and word goes round that a man is overboard. It is even so; in his attempt to catch a fish, our unfortunate friend Bart has thrown himself into the water. Every body throws something to him. It is miraculous that he is not brained by the friendly missiles. He seizes a dozen fishing-lines, is caught in various parts of the body by as many more, and is thus rescued from the water. Every body throws something to him. It is miraculous that he is not brained by the friendly missiles. He seizes a dozen fishing-lines, is caught in various parts of the body by as many more, and is thus rescued from the water.

A SHARK!

ANY BODY WANT HIS HERE?

The boat, which had been secured by early comers, were sold at premiums ranging from a cigar to "drinks all round."

Presently a fish is caught. It is a miserable little object, about four inches long, but it rouses the patriotical enthusiasm to the very highest pitch. Peggy insists on having her line baited, and watches it with severe intentness. There is a general roar for hooks, for bait, for room, for fresh lines. To hear the din, you might imagine we were in a school of mackerel. Nobody is satisfied. Every body has forgotten something, and promises himself to come back "next week" properly fitted out. Another fish; this time a decided bass, about six inches long—an inexperienced youngling who know no better. The captor is a very lively young lady on the promenade deck. Excitement of a more intense character than any thing yet experienced pervades the assemblage. People—men and women—on the promenade deck, lean over, and the ladies' dresses form a sort of awning for us tained safely while the boat is being lowered. Meanwhile some wicked person observes that he hopes there are no sharks in the neighborhood. His next neighbor repeats hastily that "there are sharks in the neighborhood." The next man has it that "a shark has been seen," and poor Molly screams frantically to take care of "the shark." Bart, insane with terror, shouts, "Help! help! a shark! I feel him!" The fourth now passes description.

A POLKA.

"Strike out, and he won't bite you!" "Throw him a knife!" — "Where's the knife?" "Is he to be murdered before our eyes?" And on this suggestion two or three furious passengers demand the captain, and draw knives to avenge the supposed homicide.

If the boat had been a few minutes later in reaching poor Bart, he would have sunk from terror. No assurances after his rescue would convince him that he had not felt the cold, slimy nose of the shark snuffing him, as a preliminary to a bite. He lay down on the deck, feeling satisfied that he had escaped death by a miracle, and resolving to improve the occasion by amending his ways.

This little incident damped the ardor of the fishermen and fishwomen, and the day being far advanced, no objection was made when orders were given to weigh anchor for New York. Two hundred people had caught some twenty-five little fish. All were sunburned, and pretty tired. When the musicians, who had not fished, but who, to do them justice, had exhibited a remarkable degree of spirit in drinking with every one who invited them, struck up a lively polka, there was hardly a couple capable of dancing to the measure.

Several members of the party were quietly snoozing; the lovers were each other's shoulders in guise of pillows. Some had crammed so many drinks to keep off seasickness, that they were lying unconscious in stray corners. Many had grown talkative and quarrelsome. Several times the boat was summoned to quell a fierce fray among the male passengers; which they did with more regard for the general peace of the boat than for the heads of the brawlers. I confess I did not regret them their powers of arms. In the first place, the combatants were evidently all musicians, and I admired the unerring justice which made them punish each other. Next, it was gratifying to see the skill and accuracy with which the experienced dock hands cracked the skulls of the most pugnacious, and how suddenly they became submissive and calm. Last of all, these fights had the effect of compelling Peggy to shrink closer to me. How I longed for an opportunity of showing her how I could do battle in her defense!

It was dark when we reached home. The loading was tumultuous; several members of the fishing party were landed on trucks like freight, and shot down on the wharf. The day ended, in short, sulkily.

We have come to the conclusion that a trip to the fishing banks on board a splendid and fast-going steamer may be an experience worth trying once, but it should not be repeated.

LITTLE GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.

CHAPTER I.

"Hare-ware-fore-one, hatter-baliga-no-no-wa!"

"Wa!" certainly was not a pretty child. I doubt whether her own mother would have called her so, as, with every distinct hair of all her light-brown head streaming in a different direction, she stood with two dirty little fists of fat dough on the sidewalk, with a small stubby finger pressed against her breast to indicate the fact of her being "me" in the progress game of tag. An immense gingham sun-bonnet, all massed and distorted, hung back upon her shoulders, like the ivory disguise of a jersey wagon, by two stringy tapes knotted upon her throat, and out of this background protruded a face for which nature had done almost nothing, and soap hardly any more. Yet not a face contributed by failing light—for it was one on which sacrificed spotlessness, for the moment, as no inferior consideration to the healthy ones of making chiaroscuro, and playing in with the shadows among the elements of earth and air. A face as yet unlearned, with a nose too small for for the rest of the face, and therefore making the face a puzzle to physiognomists — for the nose is the great organ of character, and, before it can be developed, the face-student is actually at sea. The nose is the organism of human mind, a little machine of life, and according to its indication of progress are we old or young in mind. This little girl, by witness of body, was younger than from her stature—as we might hereafter be say thing or nothing—yet, people would be apt to infer no opinion of her. I was unwise and did. I thought aloud, and muttered—"Poor child, you are frightfully ugly!"

Little Good-for-Nothing heard me—quick of ear she was, if not of sight—and to me—and under her finger from her breast, put her arms akimbo, looked me full in the eyes, and replied unexpectedly, "Thank you—you're quite—so much the same!"

I confess myself nonplussed at the exceeding self-possession of this rejoinder. It was pert, but if I remember right, I actually blushed, and walked away from the group, feeling that my position was exceedingly awkward.

Ten rods down the street, in that pretty little village of Guilford, was a large old house, not even more than the average New England tendency to be all green and white, and two-storied, but withdrawn. Yet if these qualities were faults, they were most charitably cloaked from desultory wayfarers by the luxuriant shade of noble heritage in the great summer-old elms scattered all around the house. Between this house and the street, in fact, it was there I was to spend all the hot months to come, and it was the dwelling of my good old Yankee uncle, the retired sea-captain, Uncle Ben-yer. I had never been in Guilford before, but there was no mistaking the place—every one of the scriptions had I heard of it from all those who had enjoyed the old man's hell, blithe hospitality—and a man—more cordially presented than his stiffly-very perpendicular of Uncle Eben himself, taking his sixth akimbo-hand pipe on the front door steps, amidst a smilnes of leaves and smoke-clouds.

"What cheer, my hearty?" shouted that benignant personage, as I pushed back the gate. "Why—well—that is a good boy—come to see the old hulk at last, ha? I guess you are poor as a rat, and he's condemned! How're you? How's your mother? and Fanny? and the boys? Lizzie! boy, Lizzie! [small negative pipe, dear. Lizzie! where's Don't you, Tommy? Yes? Ha! he!—right—good boy!"

As I sat down on the step, with my hand on Uncle Eben's knee, and looked clear into the broad hall, through the wide opened doorway before, to I protrate in all the helplessness of an unsupported rig constitution, sprawled an innocent child, with her eyes staring upward to the ceiling, and a crewel of the old gentleman's pinned about its neck for a her fall. I guessed Uncle Ben's astonishment. All his hale children had long ago got too old for that sort of thing—all whom, except one, were married and keeping house for him, had pushed over their fortunes from the homestead toward the setting sun—were then, with their children, that image of child-play come from?

"Lizzie! Lizzie! Where can that little madcap be? Another pipe, dear!"

Lizzie! Oh, probably his son's young wife. But the doll? A dreadful suspicion flashed upon me in connection with the cravat. Perhaps my uncle had reached his dotage, kept young for one fun time, and they had not told me of it!

Just then—leaving all questions but the one where she belonged—fresh from the finished game of tag, Little Good-for-Nothing rushed through the gate. Exactly as when I met her in the wood "Was!" her hair perhaps flying a little more wildly, her sun-bonnet on her shoulders as before. And without noticing me, she climbed up on Uncle Eben's knee.

"Oh, I've had such a good time! There was I"—that's one—and Mary Pratt makes two, and Sally Sedgewick's dreadful cross, and all would have been small-bills on the road to Sachem's Head, you know. Then I piled up the sand till I made a fort, with battlements, just like the one you told me about that they had at Governor's Island—"

"Battlements you made, dear?"

"Yes, battlements. And then I got behind it, and the other girls they came up with their spruce full of sand, and they had it at me right and left—storm me, you know. Then I jumped up and came around on them, and made—"what did I make, grandpa?"

"A sortie, was it?"

"Oh yes—a sortie. My! how they ran! I filled ed my sun-bonnet six times all full of sand, and threw it at them; and when they ran out of sight behind some cedars, I waved my apron at them from the flag, and said, "Hurrah!' as loud as I could scream. Oh, what fun!

"Then we came up into the street again, and I was just counting out for tag, when a fellow came along—I never saw him before—and he stopped and looked at me; and then he said, 'Oh, what a homely little girl!' I told him he was another—no he was, grandpa. He had—dear me—such a big nose, and red hair and whiskers—"

My unfortunate habit of thinking aloud again! "Oh hair!" I murmured; "red whiskers! Pshaw! sailors—every body says so."

Again Little Good-for-Nothing heard me. She started, and timidly around, caught my hat from out of hearing I asked,

"Who is that child, and where did you get her?"

"That, Tommy, is the grand-daughter of the first captain I ever had. Don't you know Eben; "did you say that? Really, it was very naughty, and you must be sorry for it. Go and ask him a pipe, Lizzie, dear, and he'll never do it again."

The little girl slipped down from my uncle's knee, and ran through a long blank drawing-room out of hearing I asked,

"Who is that child, and where did you get her?"

"That, Tommy, is the grand-daughter of the first captain I ever had. I was but a boy—a little older than I was, but no,hold—I was to run from a boy, and have only about every thing else but—no, about sailing, from truck to keel. He taught me all I ever learned; and being we were 'boot of an age, we got into all sorts of scrapes. He and I were. He died a month ago—poor Bill!—and that boy and his grandchild were all he had in the world to leave me to remember him by. So, says I, 'just hand 'em over, and if I ever let either of 'em get ready to go to sea without learning all I can, then rig me ketch fashion, and sell me for a Malay.'"

Whether as a delicate tribute to his deceased shipmate, or affected by the thought of the lost-manhood grandchild, I know not, but at that time his bandana across the upper part of his face, and was bent out.

"And she's a comfort—a great comfort. It's no long since we've had any thing like the laugh of a child in this house. It seems as good as a full sound at the bows, 8 comin' in with a stiff trade and skylit in the cuddy—a cargo of sunshine. And she's sma-art—mighty sma-art. Learns every thing. I've taught her how to splice and tie, and now she wants to learn navigation. She's a regular grumsy knot."

That little Good-for-Nothing came back. She had so "improved" her absence, as the sermons say, that she looked quite like a decorous child. Her face—from which the sun-bonnet had cobb water; her hands and hair had been cared for, and the blue dress had been put on right side out. Really, a child not to be ashamed of, though incapable of being washed into prettiness, which was not her fault. She had also been a pet, as was well looked with Uncle Eben's best Spanish, and in this new and pleasing consciousness of being extended to me, with a lighted paper, as one who meant to be understood, "Out of mere politeness, Sir."

After sitting out one—yes, two—three pipes with Uncle Eben, and having been introduced, she had impatiently forestalled, arrived from Guilford Station. I was shown to my room, changed my outer clothes, and then came down to dinner, to meet a very hearty welcome from my cousin and his wife, just returned from "shopping" at New Haven.

But, in spite of this welcome, I could not help being ill at ease. I was evidently offended one of the people with whom I was to pass my whole summer vacation, and why? Simply because I, for a very little one; it's of no consequence in the least." "Don't tell me that," rejoined Native Instinct. "Big man or little man, you are to me the dignity of souls can ever afford to bear the dislike of a quick, intelligent, and affectionate child." I determined I would propitiate Little Good-for-Nothing.

CHAPTER II.

MONDAY, First exercise. "Lizzie, see those pretty sugar-plums I brought from New York in my trunk. Help yourself, dear."

"I am obliged to hear dear; thank you, I don't want any."

Tuesday, Second. "Will you go with me to New Haven to-day? I hear there is an elephant going to be shown there."

"Thank you—I am womanly pique against an elephant any day! At first, "Oh, how nice!" then in a short time, "I guess I don't much care to like to have the people at the elephant's see you with such a homely little girl!" So Uncle Eben went alone.

Wednesday, Third. "Oh, Lizzie! come up on the roof with me! I've got a fine spy-glass out on the house, and you can look through my glass!"

"Thank you—I don't care to. Let me see him spy-glass, and I can see very well from my window, dear."

I began to despair. Thomas Maurice, twenty-one years of age, glorying in a necklace of hearts sculptured from cherry-stones, and the owner of two whole New York winters, worsted utterly by a little girl of ten who made terraqueous pies in mud pies! Why, the thing was a joke—a pantomime, not to be lodged.

At last, when I had given up all hope of success, the opportunity of propitiation came. The whole of one long dreamy summer afternoon I devoted Little Good-for-Nothing, and visited all the corners of the house, diving resolutely into every one of the way-going, rummaging thoroughly the big rare-boshes, and forcing assiduously in the tall grass along the garden fence, with more zeal more of a cloud settling upon her eyes, and an increased twitching about the thoughtful lines of her small mouth. Toward sundown the cloud began to rain a little, and every now and then as she came by the shady garden-seat where I was reading, I looked up—saw and heard the low, moaning handkerchief undersoring them poor quest ful eyes of hers. At last I threw down my book, able no longer to refrain from offering the help she was too proud to ask, and said,

"Lizzie, what is the matter? Won't you tell me and let me hunt with you?"

I've lost something; don't ask, I shall never find it!" And the tears now began to run over all barriers of handkerchief.

Without asking her what it was, for I wasn't quite sure that she would tell me, I began the search, and after a very long blank attempt, I at last found it, sparkling, sunny, saying, "Pussy, pussy!" in a whistling manner, and subdued him in a scuffling and all, he was about to start for the asparagus shelter. The thing he was playing with a pretty silvered one from him, and saw it to be a worn morocco portrait case, stamped with the initials L. G. N.! Lizzie Green" was the true baptismal name of Little Good-for-Nothing.

"Lizzie! Lizzie!" I cried, holding aloft the treasure-trove, and shaking it by its ribbon, "is this what you lost?"

Like a fawn the child came bounding from the other end of the garden, the homeliness of her face actually swelled into beauty by a flood of overpowering joy. Snatching it from my hand, she cried, "that's it! that's it!" and kissed it innumerable times, as I remembered to have seen her before. Then, relapsing into her former self-sustained gravity, she looked me most earnestly in the eyes, and said, "When I was a little girl, I will put on next to grandpa." She threat the case into the breast of her little frock, and went away. And that was the last we met at tea, I saw it had been to cry a little more, in her own room.

From that time I expect seemed to have been established between us. I never asked her or my self what had been lost, but I found for her. She avoided speaking about it, and I had no wish to intrude on her privacy. It is a vulgar error that children have no privacy. I boys I have always known better.

Little Good-for-Nothing grew to respect—to like me. By degrees, when she jumped rope, I was permitted to be auxiliary engine to Mary Pratt, who held the rope. She told me as well as Uncle Eben where she had been forsaking, and consoled to me how often she had been to the post-office along the meadow brook. And she let me go out with her on some of her excursions, holding me by her hand, once or twice in the dusk before it. Last she capped the climax by kissing me good-night.

One morning, toward the middle of July, I proposed to her that we should go down together on foot to Sachem's Head, the watering-place situated pleasantly on the Sound shore, two miles or so from Guilford village. We would take dinner with us in a little basket, and fill its empty room afterward with sea-weed to be pressed on our return. The idea pleased her, and there was a true daughter of the sea, and loved, as well she might, the delicate flowers of the ocean, which at that delightful season gin lavish their mermaid-garlands of exquisite pink and green and silver on the breast of the receding tide—on the heads of the undulating rocks.

So, gayly in the face of the blazing salt breeze, we tripped over the hot dusty ways sidewalk of the sandy road toward the Head, and Little Good-for-Nothing talked tirelessly to cheer the journey. At last, as we entered upon the region of feeling, the quick-sightedness—physical and moral—of this child actually equaled a grand-daughter, another bluff captain's prestige.

"Do you know what those plants are, with nothing now but straight green stalks and no leaves?"

"No, dear; I have never been in the woods as much as I could wish. What are they?"

"They're asters. They haven't any flowers now; but to-ard-by—about the end of August, perhaps—they'll be full of great, red, gold eyes, with purple lashes. Oh, so beautiful! And when all the leaves are on the cone, and you can't pick a single anemone or wood-lily any more, and the sumach leaves get so red as fire and drop off, and the wind blows right on, and has a bright and cheerful and good as if every thing else was dead, then the asters begin to look their prettiest. I guess I shall be an aster! Don't people sometimes turn into such things afterward?"

"What shall you turn into, dear?"

"My mother, Sir."

"Why, my dear, you remember her?"

"Oh, always! Forever?"

We reached Sachem's Head. Passing down the causeway road which led to the beach we met the line of returning bathers, each with his opulent or wet towels, and shawls, some evening-dressed, others in their open basket low to display the good luck granted by Father Neptune, and others in their morning dresses with strong brown paper, probably to avoid the decomposing effect of wet garments. We waited yards of time to secure extra squids. Among them, as they faced across the hot stretch, I saw several old acquaintances, and single file, we toasted yards of time to get the little girl at my side wicked, retreating half behind me. Some children, all of whom looked upon the subject of having it said, "What a homely little girl that is with Tom Maurice!"

But any such shadow of apprehension passed away as, after our little dinner under a great rock, we began the pleasant work of sea-weed hunting along the shore. Every now and then the child called to me with some new delight over a fishy flat of silver-dappled pink or purple, and actually beamed with delight as we succeeded in getting it safely into our basket, and the delicate tissue-leaves on the moss which lined our basket.

And indeed, in her ancestral sea, she did turn into a very comely little girl. The light-brown hair grew more wavy and silky, the sun-tint faded, as the beach grew quite poetic, no longer compared with the formal incongruities of town. Very little and beautiful her girlish forces seemed, all unexamined and flexible to every new thought of pleasure or necessity of business. And as she worked, with her bare feet and tucked-up frock, so far out that I was really afraid for her, her soft rosy legs—their muscles rounded fully by the never-ceasing spring of out-door life—were graceful as those of Venus undraped.

We had our basket full, and grew a little tired. So we returned to the granny where we had left our shoes and stockings, and sat down again, then sat down to rest. I must have dozed a while in my very comfortable nook of our strong shelter, for, before I knew it, Little Good-for-Nothing had gone a few paces off, and when I looked for her, I saw she was playing intently with something she held in her hands. Rising, I found it was the old nautical prize, Jack.

"Lizzie," said I, "would you like to go home?"

She started, seemed about to put back the cracker into Jack's mouth, but then, changing her mind, came gravely toward me.

"Do you think I shall ever look like that?" said she.

I took counsel but the external portrait, and was an exquisitely beautiful woman, her hair, a rich silky brown, brought low upon her neck, and fastening behind in a knot of velvet ribbon, whose ends waved forward. Her eyes large, soulful, and clear hazel. Her mouth small and somewhat grave, thoughtful and pensive, and indescriminably so, only full of good prayers and kisses for those whom she loved. Her figure regular and delicate to the extreme with taste and sensibility. As I observed this last feature, and glanced at the little creature before me on the sea-beach, I said,

"Lizzie, I feel puzzled for an answer.

She repeated the question, "Shall I ever grow like that, do you think?"

I remembered what I had seen developement de for people—and that it was a very common one in a very cheerful tone, "I shouldn't be a bit surprised if you did, dear. Why do you ask?"

"That is my dear, dear mother."

After this we walked home, hand in hand, saying very little.

CHAPTER III.

THE summer at Uncle Eben's had gone—and a with it. That summer? Yes—and half a dozen besides. Little Good-for-Nothing never—as of them in the Adirondacks—two or three more in the Long-and-a-half life of vicissitude between Sarabogs and Newport—and twice I had seen, tasted, smelled, been soothed in (though, thank Heaven and as moral lessons) by the "Crystal Palace" Bubbles. From a love of variety, perhaps, I had not smoked a single pipe with the Yankee elms of Uncle Eben in all that time, or, perhaps, from a better reason—abstinent, I awoke to find myself twenty-nine years old, and, in the opening of the New York fall with that well-nigh score and a half, received to my pretty friend.

Got rich? Oh—as the world goes, tolerably—on what advertisements call "a safe and lucrative business." Married? Married how? Seen the world? Dear me! down to the raveling ends! Been happy? Oh—so, so. Married? In love, but not.

It was this last branch of the question which caused to come to me the large-eyed acquaintance who most of all. Natural. Some of them were daughter—some of the rest had daughters.

And I confess it occupied me almost as much. I had never, even by my long experience of it, recognized an innocent love for living as a power. You had all the expenses without any of the comforts of a home; and there was something exceedingly cheerless and shiftless in the idea of growing old at a fireside you paid a family not your own to warm for you.

But whom to marry? A question which, I must in candor say, it was not the fault of my friends if it was not settled for me. They were very kind—very. To the best of their ability they announced for me, putting my very best value while lets in the market. To-day it was Miss Rebecca, sole heiress—just think on't—to old Mountpleasant, and I ought to be ashamed of myself to-morrow rate! No bid—they but wouldn't wed Miss Rebecca. Then Miss Somebody, second young friend of the family. Next day, little Bessie Mountpleasant, Rebecca, and durable. Again no offer. Astonishing! plain Somebody, second cousin by a very heavy mother—second cousin by force relay. Finally Miss Anybody young creature, sister to the North River. Mrs. Arabella Meiggs next; very easy price on account of first owner having left town indebted to all the tradesmen—second article, and very difficult to keep in order—knocked down subsequently to Mr. Hugh Meiggs merchant—terms ruinous to buyer.

Once I did take a fancy to a young person—some half a dozen years my junior, well educated, and conversed very well. Gradually I increased the time of my visits to what two hours' sin. taken three times a week, late after dinner. Then the knowing ones checked and said it was a match. But it would not do. Her mother—a lady—would let goes a certain distance toward the irredeemable but it would not overstep the mark. Besides, to this young person's mother. In that mother I saw the exact fac-simile of the present fresh picture—only a leaves let out—of myself in the future, month-ly-ship, all the features of my adorable Annie, of they would look painted on the canvas of 1857. And time had vulgarized them—decidedly! I turned to that pretty young person—fancied every thing exhaled that was exhalable by years—and instead of her being my Annie, she was a very commonplace, ordinary, middle-aged woman.

Always get presented to the mother, if you would see whether a girl can be really in love with the daughter. If their original sketch is the same, and the elder picture is lovely with that beauty that many summers only mellow—take home the younger portrait. If it is Mrs. Fixtaile, as you choose.

But at last—thoroughly sick of being speculated about—and anxious of being settled upon some one—almost any one—I yielded to the entreaties of my married lady friend, Mrs. Fixtaile, and consented to be shown an entirely new selection.

We were to meet at Mrs. Fixtaile's. Neither of us, of course, were to know that the other one was invited. Altogether, a most delightful surprise. Then, I was to be very civil to somebody the first time—nothing more. I asked Smallbrye if he understood how this should be done, and meant that I half believed she really had never heard of me. She was tall, graceful, and retiring without, hatter—about ten accomplishments in a moment. Before the last German I was as near that pleasant state of confusion known as losing one's head and ears in love as I had been for ten years.

From that night every thing went on precisely to the taste of Mrs. Fixtaile. Miss Delhorn and I rode, walked, and talked a great deal together. By a strange coincidence we were always left out by all the same parties. By another strange one, we formed parts of the same picnic excursions. Yet I could hardly say that all this time I was becoming better acquainted with her. Perhaps the life which both of us had led, and the every-day saying of youth, in fashionable society, had not been favorable to the nurture of that character which takes off its mask and says, "Look upon the real I"! And very frequently, as I looked at her, and said to myself, "I have to be very careful with all the world expects I shall make my wife" (Smallbrye had even taken heavy odds on that fact), I added also, with the faint germ of spite within, "But how prepared are two people to live with one another forever, whose attention to each other's wishes waltzes an evening, a companionship in the march to supper, and a surface talk of brilliant banter in a conservatory?" But I still, also questioning, feeling that I was growing old even faster than we years, and would probably never see her more. "After all" (thus I lied to myself), "it is better to be married to a woman when you re-gret him not at all."

I remember the last time I said this to myself. It was on a Monday evening. Miss Delhorn had not let me kiss her finger tips, as I loved myself out, after her permission to accompany her to Wallack's the next Thursday.

CHAPTER IV.

LETTERS more than I sought to have been with that beautiful woman beside me, I leaned on the velvet of the dress-circle, and forgot the fatigue of a very hard day's work, in the sweet music, scenic sought to, in a desultory use of the footprint. There were the usual number of habitués, who came because they always had done so, and a waiting for the curtain to rise with a staid denouncer worthy of any Puritan congregation, and the inevitable young Americans, whose prevailing idea of a theatre was a place that bored and killed very hard in—until the pretty little white-and-red susceptible women who are always there to gratify their appetite for falling in love with a lorgnette—never quarreled with them, for beyond question he is one of the handsomest men in New York. All these gilded post my nonchalant glass almost without notice. At last my eye rambled to the proscenium boxes—and opposite to me I had one of the first tier.

For, leaning her cheek on her hand, there sat there one of the most exquisite specimens of earthly womanhood. She was not more of an idiot than all the rest of the world, but she looked as well as they that her arm was matchless even by Parian sculpture, and she could not help letting them admire its delicious curves, adorned by nothing but a simple bracelet of brown hair. And her face—between veils a pure spiritual beauty, and her lips, her lavished itself—oh, it was beautiful, like the loveliness of Spirito Genti!" It seemed as if I had seen it before—and I could not give a name, but thought this a mere fancy—and contented myself with a long, unpremeditated gaze.

"We are dull this evening, Mr. Thomas Maxwell," laughed a silver voice beside me.

Good-by to that face—to every other surpassing thing I had locked at in my too ungrazing life. I took down the opera-glass hastily, and put it in the lumbo of its case, saying—"Pardon me—but see—but I fear myself very heavy company."

Shall I reveal you your thoughts? A sorceress of the Past had suddenly cast her spell upon you. I saw you looking intently at the box of ex-widow Arabella Meiggs"?

Sure enough; for I looked again, and there sat the widow, in the box just above the Unknown, all gorgeous, in front of her drapery, and in a simple window of his most stylish patterns. I had not seen her before—so that the protestation of that fact made a very good one to Miss Delhorn's playful reproaches.

We sat out the play—some light thing, for it was getting too warm for tragedy—and then, not caring to stay to the farce, we rose to seek the carriage. Throwing one more lingering glance at the first tier box, I saw its occupants were going too, and sighed, as I thought that, in all probability, I should never see the lady of the matchless arm again.

Just as we were leaving the vestibule I felt a strong arm upon my shoulder—heard a well-known voice say, "Avast there, Tom!" and turned to see my uncle, Elon Sawyer. And not alone: for on his arm there leaned a lady. I started, as that the soft little glove that nestled on my own almost fell down from it.

"Why, Uncle Elon! Of all seas the most unexpected! Miss Denham, permit me—my uncle, Mr. Sawyer."

"Your servant, madam. But Tom—have you forgotten your old summer playmate, my Lizzie? Have you forgotten Tom, dear?"

Could I treat my senses? Little Good-for-Nothing? And, most wonderful of all, time had indeed made her like her mother. As my hands met in most hearty grasp—I exclaimed of "Why, Lizzie—Miss Carter, to think I should not have known you"! there still seemed to mingle with the rich flesh of mature in her face the relics of the old proud self-consciousness, and her lips smiled triumphantly, as if to say—"Are you ashamed to be seen with the homely little girl now?" I introduced her to Grace Denham, and the two women, by instinct, sized each other, as friends as the perfectly trained beauty of society, keeping her eyelows veiled to the imparted by twenty-two world-practiced years, can to with the usual sort of naturalness, outwalking, spontaneous, and unaffected.

Uncle Elon and his ward were to be in town till July. It was then early in June. We exchanged cards, and promised to see each other daily; for I myself could not get away to the country any earlier than to departure.

"Good-night, Uncle Elon! Miss Carter—pro-mised!"

[TO BE CONCLUDED IN ONE NEXT.]

THE LAST DEVIL'S WALK.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

I.

Upon his hindmost bed at break of day
A Devil lay tossing sick,
To trample and char the flow'rs to death,
To infest the air with his pestilent breath,
And to cloud the morning sky.

II.

And, pray, how was this devil drest?
Oh! he was cased in an iron vest;
His scales were clear, and his brow free,
With never a think for a spear to get through.

III.

And over the hills and over the dale,
He walked, and over the plain,
And an airgun, elegant, polish'd, and round,
That would kill shots at fifty with never a sound,
He twirl'd like a harmless cane.

IV.

And over the laurels of full-blown Fame,
And the tender shoots of the young Good Name,
He stomp'd with mischief a heap of shame,
And he left its print on each.
And leaves and flowers and fruit he wriggled his tail,
Through rose-trimm'd garden and lily-strewn vale,
Marking his course by a loathsome trail,
Like a mull-track over a pooch.

V.

He spied a laborer hard at work,
Early at his vocation.
His prominence offered a cupital shot.
"Ch!" quoth the devil, "to aim are not"
So he shoulder'd his piece and he aim'd, God wot!
With terrible calculation!

VI.

He eyed in a house, here a goodly mess,
Of time and weather had stood the chance,
And was still erect and fair.
"Ah!" quoth the devil, "to spile looks will,
But I've fire-works stuffed for nothing in hell,
It don't find out when a touch or fall
Key lord to combustible there."

VII.

That Devil could creep where no other fiends can.
He found an 'anguished spot,
Where he cramp'd a victim in his diligent hoof,
And—his train prepared—trail, pillar, and roof,
Blew up in the air like dust!

IX.

That breath in the roof is mended now:
Its wholesome air is pure.
But the Devil had done his work that day,
So he crawl'd him back for his master's pay,
Which he received in a jovial way,
With the lowest devils in Hell.

X.

"There are many devils that walk this world,
Devils great and devils small,
Devils with tails and devils without!"
Devils who whisper, devils who shout,
Devils who mystify, devils who teach,
But the CARPENT DEVIL—sit hard to reach
As the small who now safe on sooth distant beech,
In digesting the core of my favorite peach—
Is the shabbiest devil of all!

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XI.

Our old friend the Pocket-Cannibal evinces unexpected gentleness and enlightened moderation, succeeded with a stroke of his own succulent friend in the skies of his own native sky.

COLONEL MORLEY had a second interview with Mr. Poole. It needed not Alban's known edge of the world to discover that Poole was no partial friend to Jasper Lesoly; that, for some reason or other, Poole was no less anxious than the Colonel to get that formidable client, whose cause he so warmly advocated, persuaded, and, in short, had already secured, out of mote from Great Britain, in which a spirit hitherto so restless might consent to settle. And although Mr. Poole had decidedly taken offence at Mr. Darrell's discourteous rebuff of his animus, and manifested no grudge against Darrell furnished a motive for counsel's peace should be purchased by Lesoly's perpetual exile. Accordingly, Colonel Morley took leave, with a willful confirmation on Poole's determination to do all in his power to induce Jasper to listen to reason, and returned had hoped to learn something from Poole of the elder Lesoly's present residence and resources. Poole, as we know, could give him no information. The Colonel also failed to ascertain any particulars relative to the old gentleman's affairs on behalf Jasper founded his principal claim to Darrell's aid. And so great was Poole's embarrassment in reply to an inquiry on that score as "Where was the young person? With whom had she left?" that Colonel Morley felt sure Poole could see her, and hear her own tale? — that Alban entertained a strong suspicion that no such girl was in existence; that she was a pure fiction and myth; or that, if Jasper were compelled to produce some one to support his claim, he would be an artful baggage hired for the occasion.

Poole waited Jasper's next visit with impatience and unfeigned delight. He had not a doubt that the ruffian would cheerfully consent to allow Alban's brother penury, he found he had been deceived in his belief of Sophy's parentage, and that there was nothing in England a prodigal son could so little learn but what his might consent to breathe the free air of Colonial Australia, and exchange the barren heaths of Cumberland for the more luxuriant and boundless pastures of auriferous Australia! But, to Poole's inexhaustible consternation, Jasper declared that he would not consent to expatriate himself merely for the sake of playing

"I am not so young as I was," said the unwary; "I don't speak of years, but feeling. I have not the same energy, once I had high spirits—they are broken; once I had hope—I have none; I am not to ambition; I can't go out into the world. To go into new scenes, form new plans, live in a horrid raw new world, every body round me hustling, scheming—No! I am not the man to put your thin paper-hat flap-o'-my-thumbs! Look at me! How do I have increased in weight the last few years—all solid muscle and bone. I'd defy any four draymen to move me an inch if I am not to their mind to it; and to be lifted off the antipodes as if I were the down of a pestilent thistle, I am not the man for that, Dolly Poole!"

"Hem!" said Poole, trying to smile. "This is funny talk. You always were a funny fellow. But I am quite sure, from Colonel Morley's decided manner, that you can get nothing from Darrell if you choose to remain in England."

"Well, when I have nothing else left, I may go to Darrell myself, and have that matter out with him. At present I am not up to it. Dolly, don't fret! I'll tell you something; a just strong enough for any carnivorous animal, yawned—yawned much as a bored tiger does in the face of the metaphysical strident of savage manners in the Zoological Gardens.

"Bore!" said Poole, astounded, and recoiling from that expanded jaw. "But I should have thought no subject could bore you less than the consideration of how you are to live?"

"Why, Dolly, I have learned to be easily contented, and to live on very little, you know—on"

"Yes," groaned Poole, "but that can't go on forever; and, besides, you promised that you would leave off that game so soon as I had got Darrell to provide for you."

"So I will, Dorado, sir, do you doubt my word? So I will. But I don't call exile 'a provision'—Basta! I understand from you that Colonel Morley came to restore the paguzzly £200 a year Darrell formerly allowed to me, to be paid monthly in advance at the banking-house in Van Diemen's Land, or some such uncomfortable half-way house to Eternity, that you not even in a letter to Darrell I could guapply at school. But £200 a year is exactly my income in England; paid weekly too, by a respectable self, with whom it is a pleasure to talk over old times. Therefore that proposal is out of the question. Tell Colonel Morley, with my compliments, that if he will double the sum, and leave me in peace in England, I'll consider the haggling, and say 'done.' And as to the gift, since I can not find her (which, on penalty of being thrashed by mummy, you still take care not to let out), I would agree to leave Mr. Darrell free to marry her. But are you such a dolt as not to see that I put the ace of trumps on my adversary's pitiful deuce, if I depose that my own child is not my own child, when all I get for it is what I equally get out of you, with my ace of trumps still in my hands? Basta!—I say again Basta! It is evidently an object to Darrell to get rid of all fear that Sophy might ever possess upon him tooth and claw: if he be so convinced that she is not his daughter's child, why make a point of my saying that I sold him a fib when I said she was? Evidently, too, he is afraid of my power to harass and annoy him; or why make it a point that I shall only widen his cheese in a trap at the world's end, stewed at by bushmen, and wombats, and rattlesnakes, and alligators, and other American citizens or British settlers? £200 a year, and my own wife's father a millionnaire! The offer is on its nib. Ponder this; put on the screw; make them come to terms which I will make them the honor to accept; meanwhile, I will trouble you for your invoicings."

Poole had the strength to report to the Colonel Jasper's refusal of the terms proposed, and the Colonel, therefore, declared that he was commissioned to make. Alban was at first surprised, and, remembering the many allusions of his native land, which Jasper had interwoven in the coffee of Poole himself. On sounding the latter, however, he came to be disposed to, he surmised, however, one part of the truth—viz., that Jasper had no fear of better terms precisely on the fact that terms had been proposed to him at all; and this induced Alban almost to regret that he had not made any such overtures, and to believe that Darrell's eagerness to negotiate on the score of economy was a single link in an unduly mendicant, was more worldly-wise than Alban had originally supposed. Yet partly, even for Darrell's own security and quietude from that persuasion of his own powers of management which is sometimes so fatal to a man in a spit to entertain, and partly from a strong disposition to screw the audacious son of that poor dear rascal Willy, Alban resolved to urge himself into the breach, and the objects he aimed at, Alban bade Poole tell Jasper that Colonel Morley could be quite willing to convince him, in a personal interview, of the impossibility of acceding to the terms Jasper had hinted, and that he should be still more willing to see the young gentleman and Jasper assisted to be seated in the study.

Jasper, after a moment's moody deliberation, declined to meet Colonel Morley—peppily, indeed, from the sensitive vanity which once had given him such delight, and now only pain. Meet thus—uttered, fallen, inhuted—the fine gentleman whose calm eye had quelled him in the wicket of drawing-room at the bell of consumptive splendor—that in itself was distrusted in the depression of his heart but what his self should be at more disadvantage in point of argument with a cool and wary representative of Darrell's relations than he could be even with Darrell himself. And unable to produce the child whom he ascribed the whole of his wrongs, he should be but exposed to a fire of cross questions without a shot in his own locker. Accordingly, in declining the interview, he sent for Colonel Morley; and declared that the terms he himself had proposed were the lowest he would accept. "Tell Colonel Morley, however, that if negotiations fail, I shall not fail, sooner or later, to enjoy my view of seeing him hung with my own halal father-in-law, and in person."

"Hung, Jasper!" cried Poole, exasperated, "go and see Darrell yourself. He is easily found."

"Ay," answered Jasper, with the hardest look of his downcast sidelong eye—"ay; come day or other I shall come to that. I shall see Darrell not, if possible. I might not keep my temper. It is not about a matter of money between us, if we two meet. There are threats to offer. Banished his house like a mangy dog—treated by a gentleman and a lawyer like the rat in his kennel! The Lesleys, I suspect, would have looked down on the Darrells in their graves, and what if my father was born out of wedlock, is the blood not the same? Does the breed dwindle when the cross of a gold ring and bracelet? Look at me. No; not what I now am; not even as I was but ten years ago; but as I was a young lad in youth! Was I born to cast sums and sub pens as a City clerk? Ahn, my poor father, you were wrong there! Darrell is not to be said, indeed, is a saucer in a citizen's gig! Spavined, and wind-galled, and broken-kneed, he'll be long ere he gets to the knackers; but by his eye, and his pluck, and his bone, the brute shows the stock that he came from!"

Dolly opened his eyes and—blinked. Never in his quiet days had Jasper spoken so openly revealed what, perhaps, had been always a sore in his pride; and his outburst now may possibly in the results of the mere expression of the arrogance, and levity, and egotism, which accompanied his humiliation for a hour, and had converted his very claim to the blood of a gentleman into an excuse for a cynic's disdain of that very gentility for which a gentleman is most desirous of obtaining credit. But by a very ordinary process in the human mind, Jasper had fallen lower and lower into the lees and dregs of fortune, his pride had more prominently emerged from the gross of his low and most haunting vices by which, in health and high spirits, it had been partially masked out-done.

"Humph!" said Poole, after a pause. "If Darrell is not as uncivil to you as he was to me, I don't wonder that you owe him a grudge. But even if you do lose temper and bring him, it might rather do good than not. You can make yourself extremely unpleasant if you choose to; and perhaps you will have a better chance of getting your own terms if they see you can bite as well as bark. But at least you will worry him; it is not fair to worry nobody but me!"

"Dolly, don't bluster! If I could send all his door, or stop him in the streets, with the girl in my hand, your advice would be judicious. The world would not care for a row between a rich man and a penniless son-in-law. But an interesting young lady, who talks pretty fluently, and talks at his knees, he could not send her to hard labor; and if he does not believe in her birth, let his thing but just get into the newspapers, and there are plenty who will; and I should be in a very different position for treating," he just became, if I married Darrell again, I don't wish that again it should be all dark and no blue, that I postpone the interview. All your own laziness—exert yourself and find the girl."

"But I can't find the girl, and you know it! And I tell you what, Mr. Lovely, Colonel Morley, who is a very shrewd man, does not believe in the girl's existence."

"Does not he! I begin to doubt it myself. But, at all events, you can't deny that I have done I am grateful for yours; and since you have given me the credit of coming back and saying poets, I may as well take the next week's pay in advance—four sovereigns, if you please, Dolly."

CHAPTER XII.

Another ball—Change of Horses—and a turn on the road.

COLONEL MORLEY, on learning that Jasper Darrell had secured conference with Lord Ashcombe, and had had an interview with Jasper, the alleged daughter was equally scouted as yet aside, became still more convinced of the belief that Jasper had not yet been blessed with a daughter sufficiently artful to perform. And pleased to think that the sharper was thus unprovided with a means of annoyance, which, skillfully managed, might have been seriously hanging; and convinced that when Jasper found no further orders taken of him, he himself would be compelled to petition for the terms he now rejected, the Colonel dryly informed Poole that his interference was at an end, that if Mr. Lovely, either through himself, or through Mr. Poole, or any one else, had occasion to address Mr. Darrell direct, the offer previously made would be peremptorily and irrevocably withdrawn. "I myself," added the Colonel, "shall be going abroad very shortly, for the rest of the season; and should Mr. Lovely, in the mean while, think better of a proposal which secures him from want, I refer him to Mr. Dorrell's solicitor. To that person I shall leave, on your account of his destitution, he must come sooner or later—and I am glad to see that he has in yourself so judicious an adviser"—a complement which by no means consoled the miserable Poole.

In the briefest words, Alban informed Darrell of his persuasion that Jasper would not, without evidence to support a daughter's claim, but that the daughter herself was still in that part of Virginia Dales appropriated by Jasper, have not yet appeared upon the upper earth, and that James himself, although holding hope that he might be naturally expected, in the hope of condition was to his taste, had only to let his quarry to his well, meditations to the means to regain the advantages of emigration. Another £100 a year or so, it is true, he might bargain for, and such a demand might be worth considering. But, on the whole, Alban congratulated Darrell upon the probability of securing, at least the more of the son-in-law, and no more at all of the mother-in-law's daughter.

Darrell made no comment nor reply. A grateful look, a warm pressure of the hand, and when the subject was changed, a clearer brow and livelier smile, thanked the English Alban better than all words.

CHAPTER XIII.

Colonel Morley shows that he is not without reason that he enjoys the reputation of knowing something about every body.

"Well, me!," said Darrell, the day after Alban had conveyed to him the comforting assurances which had taken one thorn from his pillow—impressed one cloud in his evening sky. "Well me!," said Darrell, encountering the Colonel in two paces from his own door. "Pray walk with me as far as the New Road. I have promised Lionel to visit the studio of an artist friend of his, in whom he chooses to find a Raffaelle, and in whom I cannot, at the price of Vandyke. I shall be urbanely compelled to compliment a dauber."

"Do you speak of Frank Vance?"

"The same."

"You could not visit a worthier man, nor compliment a more promising artist. Vance is one of the few who mate gusto and patience, fancy and brushwork. His female heads, in especial, are sweetness, chastity they are. I can fess, too much like one another. The man himself is a thoroughly fine fellow. He has been much made of in good society, and remains unspoiled. You will find his manner rather offhand, the reverse of shy; partly genuine, because he has in himself the racy freshness and boldness which he gives to his canvas; partly, perhaps, also, because he has in his art the selfesteem that patricians take from their pedigrees, and shakes at ease by the handsome fortune his duke holding out to him a finger."

"Indeed," said Darrell, with but rare, manly laugh. "Being shy myself, I like men who meet one half-way. I see that we shall be at our ease with each other."

"And perhaps still more when I tell you that he is connected with an old Eton friend of yours, and deriving great benefit from that connection! you remember your Sidney Brantlwaite?"

"To be sure. He and I were great friends at Eton—somewhat in the same position of pride and poverty. Of all the boys in the school we two had the least pocket-money. Poor Brantlwaite! I lost sight of him afterward. He went into the Church, got only a curacy, and died young."

"And left a son, poorer than himself, who married Frank Vance's sister."

"I wouldn't say so. The Brantlwaites were of good old family; what is Mr. Vance's?"

Respectable enough. Vance's father one out of those clever men who have too many strings to their bow. He, too, was a painter; but he was also a man of letters, and for a time was the editor in a journal, in which he wrote Criticisms on the Fine Arts. A musical composer, too. Rather a fine gentleman, I suspect, with a wife who was rather a fine lady. Their house was much frequented by artist and literary men: old Vance, in short, was hospitable—bis wife extravagant. Believing that posterity would do that justice to his patrons which his contemporaries refused, Vance left to his family no pecuniary provision. Frank, with failures and paying his debts, there was just enough left to buy him. Fortunately, Sir—his great patron of that day, had previously conceived a liking to Frank Vance—then a mere boy—which shown genuine from time to time in all true artists do. Sir — took him into his studio, and gave him lessons. It would have been mild for even a boy of Frank's spirit to be close-tisted, to give any thing else. But the boy manifested so much independence as to be a fellow, who is now as arrogant a stickler for the dignity of art as you or my Lord Chancellor may be for that of the law, stooped neither to coincidentally with fancy-shops, and imitate Watteau on them. I have in the memory of one stiver he painted for a shop in Rathbone Place. I suppose he may have got 10s. for them, and now may admire of Frank's pictures £100 apiece for them."

"That is the true soul in which genius lodges, and out of which fire springs," cried Darrell, cordially. "Give me the fire that lurks in the dust, and answers by light the touch of the hand steel. I'm glad Lionel has won a friend in such a man. Lionel, you remember, painted Vance's sister—after Vance had won reputation?"

"No; while Vance was still a boy, Young Arthur Brantlwaite was an orphan. If he had kept living relations with her mamma to complete her education on the Continent. I remained Pleasures on a journey." Here Darrell, before his eyes—the slenderest, shyest creature—just eighteen. I never had an idea that she could prove any attraction to me. I was a boy. Well, four years afterward (just before we made our excursion into Wessex, Lionel), she returned to England, still unmarried. I went to a party at which I knew she was to be—saw her, and was cured."

"Bad case of small-pox, or what?" asked the Colonel, sharply.

Vance. "Nay; every body said she was extremely improved—that was the mischief—she had improved beyond all recognition. I had been faithful as was to one settled impression, and I had not seen a fine, full-formed, young Frenchified lady, quite at her ease, armed with eye-glass and bouquet and bustle, away went my dream of the little blushing maiden. The Colonel is quite right, Lionel; the romance once suspended, the romantic disappearance, till threw again in our way, but complete disillusion if we try to renew it; though I swear that in my own heart was still alive, and that heroine imposed in her beauty. So with you and that dark-eyed Gipsy, Miss Vance's friend. and you'll tease me no more to give you that portrait of Titania at watch over Bottom's soft slumbers. Ah, that midsummer night's Dream, Lionel. Titania fades back into the arms of Oberon, and could not be Titania if you could make her—Mrs. Bottom."

CHAPTER XIV.

Even Colonel Morley, knowing every body and everything, is puzzled when it comes to the plain question of "What shall he do with it?"

"I AM delighted with Vance," said Darrell, when he and the Colonel were again walking on in a line, "I am not one of those meagre intellects which have nothing to spare out of the professional. He has humor. Humor—strength's rich superfluity."

"I like your definition," said the Colonel. "And how much, though Jasper possesses it not without subtlety. There was much real kindness in that sketch he design to quit Lionel out of that silly enthusiasm for—"

"For a pretty child, reared up to be a strolling player," interrupted Darrell, "I don't call it silly enthusiasm. I call it chivalrous compassion. But whether in other circumstances I should not be enthusiasm, it would be degradation. Let you believe, then, that Vance's sketch of Jasper at first love, and so much a whimsical invention?"

Colonel Morley. "Not so. Many a grave truth is spoken jestingly. "I have no doubt that, allowing for the pardonable exaggeration of a vocation, Vance was naturally, as he spoke in his own life."

Darrell. "Do you think that a grown man, who has ever really felt love, can make a jest of it, and to mere acquaintances?"

Colonel Morley. "Yes; if he be so thoroughly cured that he has made a jest of it to himself. And, Darrell, I have implied as if, perhaps the more solemnly at one time he felt it. Levity is his revenge on the passion that has left him."

Darrell. "You are evidently an experienced philosopher in the lore of such folly. Cherchez les inexpensis supiciales.' Yet I can scarcely believe that you have ever been in love."

Colonel Morley. "Indeed, bluntly, "and very often! Every body at my age has—except yourself. So like a man's observation, that," continued the Colonel, with much tartness. "No man ever thinks another man capable of a profound and romantic sentiment!"

Darrell. "True; I own my shallow fault, and beg to be forgiven for my blindness. So that you really believe, from your own experience, that there is much in Vance's theory and your own very happy illustration? Could we, after many years, turn back to the romance at the page where we left off, we should—"

Colonel Morley. "Not a straw to read us! Certainly, half the peculiar charm of a person believed must be ascribed to locality and circumstance."

Darrell. "I don't quite understand you."

Colonel Morley. "Then, as you liked my former illustration, I will explain myself by another one, more homely. In a room by which you are accustomed, there is a piece of furniture, or an ornament, which you have admired. Say that you say—The prettiest thing I ever saw! I am go where I may, I shall never meet a furniture or the ornament has been moved into another room. You see it there, and you say—Yes, that is the thing that the finest I ever imagined! The strange room does not suit it—losing its old associations it has placed itself in its true charm. So it is with human beings—seen in one place, the place would be nothing without them—seen in the place which becomes them would be all the better?"

Darrell (musingly). "There are some parables in life which resemble the riddles a child asks you to solve. Your imagination can no decorated her designs by half guessed. Yet, when you are told, you are obliged to say—How clever! How stupid to learn."

"Since you have arrived at that conviction" replied Colonel Morley, amused by his friend's gravity, "I will not say that I am satisfied with the experiences of Vance not myself; and that if you have in mind to propose for one of the young ladies whose merits we have already discussed, you will not deem it necessary to try your fortune in prolonged visits to their houses on your good resolution."

"No!" said Darrell with sudden animation. "Before three days are over, my mind shall be made up."

"Indeed!—as to whom of the three you would ask in marriage?"

"Or as to the idea of ever marrying again. Adieu. I am going to knock at that door."

"Mr. Vyvyan's! Ah, it is so, indeed? Yes; I'll join you. I have a call to make."

"Do not be alarmed. I go afterward to an exhibition with Lionel and Vance, to see one of the Carr Viponts. My choice is not yet made, and my hand still free."

"His hand still free!" muttered the Colonel, pursuing his walk alone. "Yet—but, three days hence—What will he do with it?"

CHAPTER XVI.

Guy Darrell's Decision.

Guy Darrell, returning home from Carr Vipont's dinner at a late hour. On his table was a note from Lady Adela's father, cordially inviting Darrell to pass the next week in his country house. London was now emptying fast. On the table, too, was a letter containing a book which Darrell had lent to Miss Vyvyan some weeks ago, and a note from herself, declining at her father's request the loan, having, he had learned that Mr. Vyvyan had suddenly resolved to take his family abroad, with the view of passing the next winter in Italy. The letter was a kind and grateful one, and even Darrell had staid but a short time. The weather having had been somewhat formal—Flora unusually shy—Lionel and her sister and not the first lines flatlessly; those that followed, with a trembling stroke and an occasional blot. Possibly, however, I may be back by dinner time. Call me at five o'clock, and then go still to the studio. I shall require to be grown at eight o'clock."

The next morning, while the streets were deserted, no houses as yet astir, but the sun bright in the air fresh, Guy Darrell rode from his door. He did not return to the same day, nor the next, nor at all. But, late in the evening of the second day, the post-boy at the village publicly hard-ridden, stopped at the porch of Ruby Manor-House; and Darrell flung himself from the saddle, and into Farnham's arms.—"Back again—back again—and to leave no more?" and he, looking round; "Spes et fortuna valete!"

HOW MR. BARREY TAMES HORSES.

To the Editors of Harper's Weekly.

Lucknow, July 19, 1857.

Within the last three months I have issued a horse-tamer. Having leisure and money to spare, of course there was nothing for it but to tame horses. The system adopted was that of Mr. Rarey, I have become somewhat of a proficient in a science which has for its object—to conquer the most brute is more important to the great public of many which are not named in less than eight weeks. Mr. Rarey, in his way of such high accomplishment of the Western prairies in the way of subduing the rising generation of equines, it is certain that I shall have a much better idea than before of the true nature of the horse, of his surprising intelligence and docility when humanely treated, and of the utter wrong of endeavoring to master his will otherwise than by any other than gentleness and firmness united.

Owing to the publication here of a small pamphlet, originally printed by Mr. Barry in Oude in has publicly released his pupils of their promises (and bonds) to secrecy. I avail myself of this release to give your readers some account of Mr. Rarey's theory and practice, as explained by him to his pupils; feeling assured that to farmers and horsemen the information will be of the very greatest service, as well as interest; and that it will show every reasoning being the necessity of treating his horse only with the utmost humanity.

CRUISER, BEFORE MAKING MR. RAREY'S ACQUAINTANCE.

Mr. Rarey's Theory.

The principles which underlie the whole art of horse-taming, as practiced by Mr. Rarey, and, more or less, by various of his most successful predecessors, may be stated thus:

That obedience to man is a ruling principle in the nature of the horse; and, therefore, to make him obey is not necessarily to do violence to him. That disobedience is in fact forced upon him by conduct toward him which does violence to his nature.

That to make him obey, it is only necessary to make him fully comprehend what is required of him.

That he has originally no conception of his own strength or power; and,

That it is the part of wisdom to keep him in ignorance, which can only be done by mastering him without force; that is, by kindness.

That, in the horse as well as in man, fear is the result of ignorance; and

That, therefore, it is only necessary to accustom him to any object of which he may at first stand in dread, to make him lose the sense of fear. Further,

That the best means of accomplishing this end is to allow him to examine the dreaded object himself, and in the manner which is most natural to him.

All which amounts to just this: that the horse is an intelligent creature, and that the only way to develop fully all his powers of usefulness to man is to treat him as such, and to convince him that his master is also his superior and his best friend.

Until he is convinced of this fact, and by that conviction has obtained the fullest reliance upon the kind intentions and the superior knowledge of him who guides him, he is not fully educated; that is to say, he is not perfectly broken in.

For, according to Mr. Rarey's humane plan, to break in a horse is simply to educate him, and to habituate him gradually to a new condition of life; which new condition, if properly imposed, he readily accepts as a natural one.

This is the theory, stated simply; and every sensible man will recognize its truth and justice. In its application Mr. Rarey disclaims the use of any of all those odors and mysterious poises which other horse-tamers pretend to have relied on; but which, he asserts, were useful only as far as their administration was gentle and accustomed the horse to the presence of his new master.

Before proceeding to a review of some of the practical details of Mr. Rarey's art, by which will be best shown the entire perfection of his theory, it needs only to add that, to be successful, the horse-tamer must have great patience, a perfect command of his temper, and utter fearlessness. He is to understand that by nature he is the horse's master, because his superior, and that, brute as he is, the horse will not acknowledge the mastery of an inferior mind. Fear and anger are two passions which must never be displayed before the horse. The initiatory step in colt-taming is similar to that in the famous Mrs. Glass's recipe for cooking a hare. First, therefore,

JOHN S. RAREY, THE HORSE-TAMER.

CRUISER, AFTER HIS INTRODUCTION TO MR. RAREY.

To Catch your Colt.

The animal is running loose in the pasture. If you rush after him with much swinging of arms and hallooing, he anticipates bodily harm, and makes every effort to escape. Now he should never—so asserts Mr. Rarey—form the first, counect the presence of man with the fear of harm to himself. It is well, therefore, to hitch a gentle horse to the stable-door, and then, seeing all obstructions cleared, to approach the colt from the opposite side, quietly and slowly. He will avoid you; and thus gradually, and without being startled, approach the hitched horse, and unconsciously enter the stable. The unbroken colt has no idea of the nature or purpose of a door-way. He sees an opening, and walks through it, in order to get farther away from those who are approaching too near him. The presence of the trained horse assures him of his own safety. Should he get away, it is necessary to recommence operations, and, with all patience, again persuade him up to the desired place. Mr. Rarey calls stabling a colt a ten minutes' job. If it were one of two hours, his method would be more profitable than the rude means which we too often resorted to in this country, which force the colt, alarm him, and lead him from the first to unite the two ideas of pain and personal danger.

Having led out your horse, you shut the stable-door, having first given the colt a few ears of corn.

General Rules.

Mr. Rarey recommends as general rules for the various operations, that the shed or stable used should be light, and high enough to admit of a man's riding around without danger to his head; that chickens, swine, and other animals be excluded, as serving to attract the attention of the horse; that on an account that any person accompany the tamer, or be present at his operations, in order that the attention of the horse be not divided between two or more objects; that before entering the stable the tamer shall know accurately all the processes he intends to go through with the horse; and that sufficient time must be given the animal, at each stage of the proceedings, to fully comprehend what is being done, and what is wished of him—for which purpose many of the preliminary operations, as will be seen, are repeated a great number of times.

MR. RAREY EXHIBITING THE TAMED ZEBRA

Horse-Nature.

Experience has shown that the horse examines strange objects with his nose—not only smelling of them, which he could do from a moderate distance, but satisfying himself by familiar touch of the object at his fear that it is harmless. Any horseman whose horse has shied at a roadside stump has remarked this, and taken advantage of it by leading the animal up to the stump, and getting him to touch it with his nose, when the fear at once ceased. Mr. Rarey makes a point here, and asserts that no other way can you satisfy the horse than by permitting him to pursue his own plan of actual touch.

The Red Blanket.

Accordingly, when he finds a horse exhibiting fear of a buffalo robe, a red blanket, or any other inanimate thing, he throws it down in the middle of the inclosure and goes off. The horse, of course, retreats to the barrier, with a sweep of concentration, ears thrown back, and eyes glaring keenly at the object of his fear. But he is not quiet. If you watch him, you will see that his gaze is riveted upon the blanket; you will see him presently go more to it; you will round it gradually decrease his distance; stand still, watching it intently—all eyes, ears, and nose, apparently, and ready to leap away for dear life at the slightest movement. But much as he may fear, he will never be content till he has, by alternate approaches and retreats, got so near to it that, by stretching out his neck, he can touch it with his nose. Two or three such touches, and feeling no life in the blanket, he takes it in his teeth and shakes it. It drops to the ground again; but the battle is won. Fear is gone. Not yet suspicions. Perhaps he goes away and returns to give the blanket another shake, and another. He will not rest, however, till he is satisfied; and when that is done he has no more fear. Most observing farmers have watched a young colt and "skittish" horse go through the process we have just described, in the nature of the case, and seen it satisfy itself; and therefore, says Mr. Rarey, the best method that can be adopted to cure him of fear, whether of a blanket, or of a man. To return to the colt.

To approach the Colt.

Mr. Rarey takes from the seat of a leather halter, which does not hurt the colt's head in any way, while a rope halter not only cuts into the flesh, but does not sit as well, strain, elongate under the animal's breathing, and makes him lose his self-possession. Armed with this and a long cotton whip buggy whip with good silk cracker, which will cut sharply and make a loud snap, you enter the stable. But the colt has been there several days, animates, engaged in subduing some ears of corn, and examining the blue strange, new creature. If the animal is shy, it will stand as far away from you as possible, watching you keenly. You stand still for some minutes before it seems to notice you at all, and then approach it slowly, not from ahead, but a little from the side. If it moves to the right or left, you move gently in the same direction of the body. The object is to get up to the colt. Whatever motion he reach, you stop a few seconds; when the colt will turn its head to look at you, and smell of your outstretched hand. All colts will do this, Mr. Rarey asserts.

When the colt touches the hand, it must be very gently caressed; you must stop up to it, slowly and smooth with gentle passes his forehead, and, more convenient, the side of his head and neck. Petting must be used with you as often as it will, avoiding your carsses after each touch. They are soothing and encouraging like a kiss at ease, and convince him of your good intentions. At the same time you are to speak gently and steadily to him such words as horsemen use to their horses—be animal, as "Soho, my boy!" or "Pretty lady!" etc.

Should the animal be very wild, you can approach him quicker by stretching out the whip, which he will smell and touch when you are yet at a distance. You can lay the end upon his neck, and rub him gently, returning it in your hand meanwhile, till he can reach that.

Hitching the Colt.

After he has become quite at ease with you, allowing you to smooth his head and neck without moving, you drop your whip, and fasten the end of the halter-strap about his neck. By drawing very gently you pull his head toward you, and stand at the left side of the colt. Laying your right arm across his neck, pat, with your left hand, the long or buckle end of the upper part of your halter under his neck; hold it steadily with your right hand, and then loose your strap. Now you can lower the upper part; slip his nose into the appropriate place, and buckling the strap, you will have halored your colt without in the least frightening him.

Fattening, now, a long rope to the end of your halter, you permit the colt to run around you, taking care not to become him or drawn him violently in any direction, but letting him feel the weight of your hand. Gradually you may approach him, shortening your hold of the line till you touch and caress him again. As you do not make him pull, he does not learn his strength; and as you treat him kindly, he is becoming more and more accustomed to you. When you can step close to him without causing him to fly back or turn away—which Mr. Rarey accomplishes in ten or fifteen minutes—he is ready for another lesson.

Leading the Colt.

He does not yet know his strength. Were you to pull him violently, to make him follow you, he would presently become frightened, and learn by trial that he could oppose your will. You stand, therefore, at his side, and draw his head gently around. It is his weak point. He can not brace his whole system against your steady pull, and presently turns in the required direction. Whereupon you go up and caress him, and presently repeat the pull following each applause with caress and kind words. Then lead him about the stable, past the open door, back and forth; till, at last, taking hold of your strap close to the jaw, and laying your right hand across his neck, you bring him slowly out into the open air, and walk him about. For this time, Mr. Rarey asserts, the colt will be so docile that you need no more than your right hand line than a trained horse; and as he likes caresses, and finds that he gets them by approaching you, he will even follow you about the yard.

To lead a colt by the side of a trained horse, Mr. Rarey recommends the employment of a double strap to the colt's halter. Getting on the horse, he passes one strap under the horse's neck, and holds it in his left hand; the other he holds in his right. Thus the colt is held to the side of the horse. If it attempts to bolt, the left hand strap keeps it up; if to go ahead, the other restrains it. A strain on either, moreover, will bring the two animals face to face; and should the colt grow stubborn, you have only to ride your horse against him, when he will be glad to move on, and at once falls back to his position. The next thing is

To Stable your Colt.

An undertaking too often accomplished in halfan-hour or more by many rough and stupid methods, Mr. Rarey proposes to do without violence, and at farthest in a quarter-hour. He leads in his trained horse, with the hope that the colt will follow it. Should it refuse, he seizes the halter close to the jaws in his left hand, and with his right arm over the colt's back, touches it gently on the off flank with a switch. Should the colt then move ahead, and makes it press closer to its master, who easily directs it aright. Should it refuse to face the stable-door, it must be led a few times round about the yard, and with a fair allowance of caresses it will go in readily.

To Hitch the Colt.

Mr. Rarey recommends a broad but rather short stall, with a bar sitting across the back, whereby the colt will be prevented from getting down, and pull backward on the halter. Sideways he can not bring a strain upon it, and these he proves for the first to stand with a slack halter, which is a most desirable point to gain, as he will thus prevent any trouble he may have. The colt can earn will place him at ease in the stall.

Mr. Rarey proceeds to feed the animal oats—but, which will not hurt the mouth. It should have a lot at each side, to keep it in its place. He attaches it to the bar lengthwise, and then, and last the colt, thus accustomed, can loose in the yard some time, to remember that it is a horse's companion. He also halters his colts, which enables him to lead them about, when bitted, without drawing too heavily on the bit.

To Saddle a Colt.

The colt is by this time ready for the saddle, which Mr. Rarey lays gently on all along his back. He shortens the strap-straps to prevent them flying about too much, doubles up the saddle-skirts, adds the saddle-cloth, smoothes it all down, and walks up to the colt. The first thing is to press him a little with the saddle, that he may see before him, letting him see, smell, and rub his nose against it. When the colt is satisfied, the skirts are left, and the saddle is gently raised against his neck, and rattled a little, to accustom him to the noise. The saddle is then put on his back and gets accustomed to the noise. The operator moves his saddle gradually back from the neck, slips it on the back, which it carefully rubs, and it is without pain or inconvenience; and then comes the most difficult part of the whole process—girthing. He has never been bound up, and generally has his suspicions aroused at this part of the proceedings. You must draw gently at first, and lead him about for a little; and after he is a little used to it you can draw the necessary tightness. Having now place your right arm over the saddle, take one double in that hand, the other in the left, and mount him about the stable. At first you will only start time he learns to obey the motions of the bridle, keeping the left rein close to stand still, and feels satisfied with the saddle. He is then ready for the next step, which is

To Lunge your Colt.

Your arm bearing down in the saddle has accustomed him to a slight weight there. A black, slightest thing, and a little rein, will do. You reassure him by plentiful caresses; raise yourself gradually, gently to your seat at the block; and when there let down your left stirrup, place your foot in it, seize the right side of the saddle with your right hand to keep you in balance over the colt's back, and slowly lear your weight upon the animal. This must be done several times, that the colt may understand it as perfectly harmful; and presently you lift yourself gently into the saddle; you rest there a few times; it is not for the vantage ground the block gives you. You are not to ride; therefore does not need a spur. Rarey will not suffer a colt to be held when being mounted in this way, and it does not appear at all necessary.

To Ride the Colt.

Being mounted, you speak gently to him, and if he does not move, pull his head a little to the left, when he will go. The reins must hang loose (he has no martingale on), and he is permitted to walk slowly about the stable. Finally, you repeat all the operations of mounting, getting off, and riding again a different number of times for a couple of hours. When you find your colt ready to go out of doors, you lead him, and, when he once gets into the open, you have only to pull his head around, which effectually stops that. Pulling the head around is indeed a favorite dodge with Mr. Rarey, who finds it to answer much better in all kinds of equine contrariness than the whip, which he applies very sparingly. You must not ride the colt too long at first. Get off when he seems tired and caress him; speak kindly to him (which he by this time appreciates), and he will keep his temper, and go along like a good horse. By-the-way, Mr. Rarey does not drag up a colt's head violently, as many horse-breakers do. He draws it up gradually, and without violence either to the mouth or the neck of the colt; and he then proceeds to work with the more natural carriage of the head than is done by a more violent procedure.

To Harness your Colt.

You go through a similar series of operations as with the saddle. Should you can rattle the harness about him, you can lay it on and drive him about the stable, where this operation must be performed, with the colt's head to the bridle. You will find your colts shy about the lines, which you must learn how to accustom him to; when he can bear them over his back, you take him into the yard and drive him about with a trained horse, whereby he speedily learns to go gently and safely. You have then to Put your Colt in Shafts.

As he has previously before noticed a buggy, and does not in the slightest know its uses, his first experience of it inspires him—it may be supposed—with much fear. Nostrils as wide as a bull's, holding a huge spider. You must lead him gently to the buggy, and let him look at it, then walk around it, smell it, and touch it with his nose. Presently he will cease to notice it. You must then draw the buggy to him, and place the animal before the buggy. One man stands at his head, and holds him gently, gently little by little, while keeping one hand the while upon the colt's back, and drops the shafts on either side. They must not touch him if they are brought down. It is a nice job, and must be performed very deliberately. When you can touch him with the shafts, caress them, so that he may not only hear but feel them against him. At first he is a little touchy. When he no longer starts when you can lean him up and while the man at his head slowly leads him along, you work behind, get the lines over his back (which must be carefully done), and gird in. Then you must not let him go faster than a walk. Mr. Rarey recommends, saying that the horse can not at first comprehend the multifarious arrangements to which he is hitched, and if hurried is confused. Let him have a very wide, flat bitting; tie up one foot at the first drive—the manner of doing which I will present you hereafter—and, out of the mode of training an unbroken colt to the saddle and harness and to perfect docility.

To Overcome a Biting or Kicking Horse.

Mr. Rarey uses extraordinary means. In the first place, if the horse is naturally mouth and obstinate, and will not go, he has a harness made, he gives him with his long, keen whip a few sharp cuts about the legs. Being sure that the bold will strike on the inside of the thigh, high up, where he is particularly tender. This he does with peculiar quickness, but without the least excitement. His quiet and the noise of the whip surprise and scare the horse. Whatever escape he may be. There is never any fight, but a sort of decision and command master in Mr. R. seems to awe the horse almost to silence. He does not strike more than three cuts, although Crusier, the beast, required several remembrances, I am told. You see a change in the horse's head; he will allow Mr. Rarey approach him—move, perhaps, than his groom has dared to do for months. He helps to confidence. If the bowls should chance to come around toward him, there is another stinging cut. Then he takes hold of his head gradually, and presently the astonished man is hitched to the carriage, and driven off the ring. Hard as it is to believe, this is the only means used to subdue Crusier and the Zebra, described in this book, of course, the whip was used oftener than is usual.

To Drive a Rearing Horse.

Mr. R. leads the horse up until the heel is bottom upward, then draws a loop over the knee and up to the pastern-joint, and secures it there. Of course he can walk while standing on three legs, but there is this further advantage, that to handle him readily is this sorrowful plight is to conquer him, and that almost at once. Sometimes he gets very angry, strikes the knee on the ground, and otherwise lays over to get the foot loose. But R. says you can sit down and look at him at your ease for half-an-hour, when he will give in. He lets down the horse's foot, rubs his leg, and caresses him, but lets rest a little, and then puts the foot up again. This repeats several times, till the horse has learned to walk on three legs. Nevertheless, he occasionally rears when driven, but he puts even Crusier into a safety. Having his foot fastened up he can not kick, howsoever much he may desire to, nor can he run away if ever so much inclined.

Mr. Rarey's theory is that a horse kicks because he is afraid of something behind him—or of the sound or clatter of the approaching him. And he first incapacitates him from kicking, and then encourages him to whatever he was before in fear of. He is, therefore, to use a man's hand on his heels. A very few hours' time suffices to Mr. Rarey to accomplish this taming of the most vicious brute.

To make your Horse lie down.

Is only an extension of the hampering operation. The horse's left fore foot being fastened up, Mr. Rarey puts a surcingle about his body, and fastens the right fore foot to it. He then leaves the hind which strap is passed through the surcingle, and held in his hand, while he stands at the side of the left side of the animal. He then, holding the bit in his left hand, bears against the horse till it moves, when the right fore foot is raised, and in an instant loses control of it. He now gives the animal over on his side; but when he gets him there he is completely conquered. Ugly as he may have been before, you can then handle him as you please. Mr. Rarey takes off immediately all the straps, and then caresses the horse, talking him first about the head and neck, and then off over, paying particular attention to his heels, which he handles without the least fear. He keeps him thus about twenty or twenty-five minutes; and during this time you will see him astonishingly to go through this course. In half an hour he repeats the whole operation; and so for three or four times. In the course of the animal undergoes a similar course of lessons. After this time he will lie down at the word. The caution that it will lie down by merely touching its fore foot. Throughout the whole operation the whip is not once used, nothing but soft words and caresses.

To make your Horse follow you.

This seems a most difficult piece of training; and at first I doubted if here Mr. Rarey did not make use of some occult means. But no; he has talked-of of riddance. The explanation shows it to be as simple as it is a beautiful piece of training. It is accomplished in a surprisingly short space of time. Mr. Rarey takes the horse, which has been bridled and haltered, into the inclosure, and, first caressing him a little, turns him, with the halter, toward him, and touches him very gently on the lips, with the left hand which by always uses, saying at the same time, "Come along, boy!" This is next steadily and fast once of which he knows best how to assume. The horse, feeling the whip, steps forward, close up to Mr. Rarey, who gives him a few kind words forward again, and repeats the touch and the words. Each move of the horse is followed by caresses. Should he by over obtuse (for the whole operation is plainly an appeal to his sagacity) or refractory, he gets a few sharp cuts about the hind legs, the nerves of which in the horse, as in the school-boy, seem to have a close connection with the reflective organ. This will bring him to his senses; especially as he finds that moving at a particular time in the direction indicated is followed by caresses which seem to be very genteel to all horses. In from fifteen to twenty minutes Mr. Rarey makes the horse know the mere motion of the whip, and follow him about the stable, without its application, at the word of command. When the horse has been repeated in an open lot, the horse will follow it, two about, and run after you any where, even in the street.

About Bolky Horses.

Mr. Rarey asserts that the horse knows nothing naturally except talking—or rather, that his animal which practices any of the various freaks known under this expression does so either from want management lest led him into bad habits, or because, though willing to obey, he does not comprehend what his master wishes him to do. These excuses, therefore, he maintains that the whip and the long rarey voice are sufficient to subdue, bridle, and make bad worse.

If the horse balks he is excited. The first thing, therefore, is to go to his head, speak to him kindly, pat and smooth him, and then get him quieted down. The whip must not be used at all. When he is calmed you can start your team. It is not a sudden jerk against the collar which moves the horse by unexpectedly. All kinds of whickers, therefore, tend to the wrong course. The object is to start the horse where you will—but the horse generally plunges first, you are to keep him back gently till they can both take the strain together. The trick you will understand by this—but the surest way, Mr. Rarey says—is one I have myself seen practiced in Ohio. Stand by the near foot of the balky horse, and start the team. As he presses forward you let him have his foot, when he will almost to a certainty step over it with his nose. A better way, according to Mr. Rarey, is to let the horse hang on the bridle for a moment bowed down, then stand in front of them, and turn them gently to the right without letting them bring a stride upon the ground. Then you have only to go gently to the left. By this time they will be moving in a circle, and as you turn them to the left, steadily them in the collar, and they will go off together easily.

He advises to take half a day for curing a horse that has a habit of balking. You must put your self in possession of a steady and quiet beast direct upon them, tie up all parts of the harness the clattering of which might excite them, let them have their heads loose, and then start off together, stopping frequently and caressing the balky animal. When he starts and stops as you halt, he will by and by very soon, you hitch the team to an empty wagon which is placed in a favorable position for starting. Shorten in the reins, which all this steadily have a little, to let him get the first strain, then start ahead. As you start you speak encouragingly, and as soon as he appears at all excited stop and caress him. Always stop him before he motions to stop of his own accord. When they go along well drive them over a small hill, then over a larger one, and so on, increasing and a load. Keep on petting and careful you can make any horse pull true to this way, says Mr. Rarey.

I believe that the above account includes all the blunders that a horse makes naturally or through the stupidity of his driver. It is well to bear in mind that the horse will not do well if his driver is a greater brute than himself. He wants his master to be his superior, and the main reason why Mr. Rarey is so astonishingly successful in subduing the most obstinate refractory horses is because he knows how to show them his superiority. I should like to see the same process operated on from two to four bears (Powell, his most illustrious predecessor in horse-taming, allowed himself sixteen hours), and that he requires not more than half or three quarters of an hour's time to bathe any child from his native pastures, and have it running about the stable after him. Of course his pupils require longer time, having to proceed with more care and less confidence. But I am firmly convinced that any one who has more courage and common sense than his horse can do any thing with him that Mr. Earey does.

W.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Proud Spain of ——— fashions, who never allows silence for a joke to pass him, accepted the bench when it became necessary to obtain a Spaniard to sit on a whole ——— and Bourbon ——— were employed to connect. The Senior was an Hibernian Bishop, and the Junior a Spanish Governor in his native of expedients. The sheriff produced the book round the room in search of a person to call the cannot read, when he espied a Dutch Jew and called him to the table. "Can you read, sir?" said he. "Why can't understand what you mean," replied the Israelite. "what did he say?" said the Judge. "Why, he says, he can't read," answered the Governor, he repeated. "Take your seat," cried the Judge, "take your seat, sir! he's no evidence; you're all evidence, sir, you will!" Under that direction he took his seat. Who will say that he can not act as competent a judge as any in the jury?"

"If a dunce's tail is lent and enviable, will it not be better with his bowsewenskaping?" "Not egregiously; it might not offset his carriage, but would entirely stop his waggle."

Mrs. Bogg, a widow, having taken Sir Charles Price to be a convivial husband, and being taught by him to relish she liked the closeup, replied: "Oh, I have got rid of my old fogy for a young gentleman."

Aaron Burr's definition of law in general was, "what you are to boldly assume and positively maintain!" In his practice, said he, "my course was to get the case into court, and then, if necessary, to kill the judge!" "What can you do to-day?" A better reading is, "what can you do to-morrow, for to-morrow is the only day on earth we can make you regret your procrastination."

Miss Lizzie Deaton, the principal medium of Fitzpatrick, has declared that she could not conscientiously receive a sign as a medium. She said that she feared she had been blowing under a delusion, and as she considered herself responsible to God for what her lips uttered, and for the influence which her every action might exert upon those about her, she was unwilling to be made the medium of any other spirit than her own. She said that she had asked Gabriel should stand by my side, and ask me to write a message from him, but he refused, and told me to advise yourself. Hezekiah Lowell, daily address you in my own natural and conscious state."

When the brave Corporal Calhoun was asked, after the battle of Waterloo, if he was not afraid of the shot, he "Afraid! why I was in all the battles of the Peninsula." But having it explained to him, and as the question was repeated to a fear of losing the day, he said, "No, no! I'll tell you fear that; I was only afraid we should be afraid before we had time to win it!"

The Dr.—There is nothing familiar in Cockney verse more than Seneca's letter, when he is in doubt which to prefer of his two lady-loves, Pauline and Hasgill. Ho writes, "I have they stood together, then two young women, one on each side, and his endeavour, I could help comparing them: and I could help comparing myself to a certain Hamilton, who was puzzled to find it difficult to make a choice between 3 Bundles of A."

ON THE GREAT "NOTHING TO WEAR" QUESTION.

A wife, to dress
In the mode, I guess,
Finds a husband's income quite clean,
And poor Mr. Spratt
Is left in the flat
As his wife will overdraw.

The chameleon, who is said to feed upon nothing but air, has, of all animals, the nimblest tongue.—Swift.

Servant things turn sourest by their desire;
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.
Shakespeare.

THE SLEEP OF THE GRAVE.

My love, she sleeps, she sleeps, my May love sleep
As it is lasting, so be deep;
Soft may the winds breathe her creep!
I pray to God that she may lie
Till the trumpet sounds unspeeped,
While the dim-shelled ghosts go by!

A tick gluttonous, and full of blood. "I have lost my appetite," said he, in great alarm.

"All the better," said the doctor; "you'll be sure to die if you recover it."

A Dundee lassie.—"We have no desire to be separated, with what was thrown all about the bedclothes" who professed the following:

"Nature, impartial in her ends
When she made man the strongest,
To justify them, to man she Made woman's tongue the longest."

Some stupid says that "if a fox were charged to run the one 120, three miles of the same speed, how long is the time?"

A Problem for Mulkeyer.—If twenty-seven inches of wire grew inches of water, how much milk will a cow give with her full ripen farrier? Answer: Just as long as he turns on the cow's tail, then divide the product by a tenpenny nail, and you will multiply the whole by ten pence, and the total will be the answer.

Moving for a New Trial.—Courting a second wife.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, August 2, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been quite active, for Flour, Wheat, and Corn, which have been in steady request for home use and for export, at full prices. Breadstuffs have been more extensive, yet receipts have not been equal to the demand, and prices have ruled firm. Coffee, Rice, and Teas has been moderately active at former quotations. Sugars have been in fair request, at full prices. Last Thursday the sales were unprecedentedly large, amounting to 3,000 hogsheads, 900 tierces, and 1,200 bags. Molasses has also been more freely dealt in, and prices are advancing. Provisions have been sought after at former prices for Pork, Cut-meats, Lard, and Beef. Tobacco has been quiet and lower. Hay, Hops, Cotton, Naval Stores, Oils, and Seeds have been in request, at former prices. Goods have also The Dry Goods Trade exhibits a fair degree of activity, things considered, and the Jobbing Trade is quite active. Both Northern and Southwestern buyers, for the Fall trade, as well as for immediate goods of spring stock, are in the Market. Dr. Lindsay, Fancy Chinaware, and silverplated Goods are in fair request. Hardware and Cutlery are active. Business sales will commence this week. The Dry Goods Imports during the week amounted to $2,272,670, against $3,562,316, the corresponding week of last year. The value entered for consumption during the week was $1,940,139, against $3,328,326, the same week last year. The movements in other departments of business, and imports of any remarkable above mentioned, We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Ordinary to extra State Flour, per bbl.	$4 10	@ $4 85
Superfine to fancy Western do.	4 15	@ 4 25
Extra Western Flour, par barrel	4 05	@ 7 00
Fancy to extra Genesee, par barrel	4 40	@ 6 00
Super to Extra Canadian, par barrel	4 35	@ 6 25
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	4 30	@ 6 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 10	@ 3 70
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 00	@ 3 25
White Wheat, per bushel	1 08	@ 1 10
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 04	@ 1 07
Corn, per bushel	0 80	@ 1 06
Rye, per bushel	0 80	@ 0 85
Oats, per bushel	0 33	@ 0 35
Western Cotton, per bushel	0 60	@ 0 65
Western Oats, per bushel	0 40	@ 0 45
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	0 45	@ 0 47
Barley, per bushel	0 60	@ 0 65
Cotton, middlings, per pound	12 @	12¼
New York Pork, per barrel		@ 17 50
Prime Pork, per barrel	14 00	@ 15 00
Prime Cut Meats, per pound	7 @	8
Prime Mess Beef, per tierce	10 00	@ 12 00
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	11 00	@ 12 00
Lard, per pound	8 @	9
Butter, per pound	12 @	18
State Butter, per pound	15 @	20
Western Butter, per pound	12 @	14
Cheese, per pound	7 @	9
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 00	@ 3 87
Sugar, per pound	7 @	11¼
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6¾ @	8¼
Tea, per pound	25 @	84
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	7¼ @	8¼
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	44 @	60
Hyson Teas, per pound	37 @	60
Young Hyson Teas, per pound	30 @	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	24 @	25
Foreign Brandy, per gallon	1 @	2
Hay, per 100 pounds	60 @	70
Tallow, per pound	9 @	9¼
Crude Petroleum, per barrel	1 50	@ 2 00
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	44 @	45
Tea, per pound	25 @	84
Common Seals, per 210 pounds	1 50	@ 1 75
Linseed Oil, per gallon	74 @	80
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6 @	15
Ohio Tobacco, per pound	6 @	15
American Fleece Wool, per pound	37 @	46
Flax, per pound	7 @	8

Stocks of several Articles in New York about August 1.

	1857.	1858.
Coffee, packages	113,883	92,000
Hides, number	125,870	124,543
Molasses, hhds. and tcs.	52,000	168,250
Molasses, hogsheads	19,730	6,334
Molasses, barrels	17,000	5,000
Molasses, bags	2,000	4,000
Sugars, hogsheads	10,000	20,000
Sugars, bags, mats, and bbls.	30,000	40,000
Sugars, boxes	30,412	15,563
Rice, tierces, bags, and casks	3,718	1,000

Freights continue quiet. For Liverpool — Cotton, 5-16d. @ 7-16d. per pound; Flour, 1s. 9d. @ 1s. 10½d. per barrel. For Glasgow — Cotton, 7-16d. @ ½d. per pound, and Flour, 2s. per barrel. For other ports proportionate rates. The number of vessels in port on Saturday was 350, against 335 last week.

The Live Stock Markets last Wed'day were very heavy for Beeves, the receipts of which were enormous, while the demand was moderate. Milch Cows were in fair supply and dull demand. Veals were in good supply and lower. Sheep and Lambs have been more sought after at former prices. The reported receipts of Live Stock were valuable. The reported receipts of Live Stocks during each of the last two weeks reckon as follows:

	Week ending July 26	Week ending July 19
Beeves	8,217	7,844
Milch Cows	379	4,374
Veal Calves	2,107	910
Sheep and Lambs	9,613	11,107
Swine	7,000	7,000

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	2,218	Iowa	127
Ohio	630	Pennsylvania	107
New York	2,331	Indiana	100
Kentucky	891	Connecticut	45
Missouri	321

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City & Suburban Market, was as follows:

Prime to premium Beeves, per pound	7½ @	8 c.
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	32 00 @	65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	6 @	9
Sheep and Lambs, per head	2 50 @	5 00
" per pound	5 @	6½
Live Swine, per pound	4 @	5
Dressed "	6 @	7
Rousting Pigs, each	1 00 @	2 00

The Country Produce Markets have also ruled considerable activity, without any remarkable change in prices.

VEGETABLE PRODUCTIONS AT WARD-DUTON MARKET.

Cherries, per pound	8 @	8 c.
Plums, per box	6 @	8
Currants, per quart	6 @	10
Raspberries, per 100 baskets	4 00 @	6 00
Huckleberries, per quart	6 @	8
" New Rochelle, per basket	10 @	12½
Apples, per barrel	1 50 @	2 50
Apples, new, per barrel	1 50 @	2 50
Peaches, per basket	25 @	50
String Beans, per basket	1 00 @	1 12
Lima Beans, per bushel	1 00 @	1 25
Onions, new, per barrel	3 00 @	4 00
" per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
New Carrots, per 100 bunches	2 25 @	3 00
Cabbage, new, per 100	3 00 @	4 00
Egg Plants, per bushel	1 00 @	1 50
Green Corn, per 100 ears	50 @	1 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	50 @	1 00
Nutmeg Melons, per 100	5 00 @	8 00
Cucumbers, per 100	50 @	1 00
Cucumbers, per 100	50 @	—
Sage, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	14 @	—
Eggs, Western, per dozen	8 @	10
Chickens, per pair	37 @	50
Fowls, per pound	11 @	14
Ducks, per pair	50 @	75
Young, per pair	62 @	1 25
Geese, per pair	1 00 @	1 50
Turkeys, per pound	12 @	14
Pigeons, per dozen	75 @	1 00
Quails, per dozen	1 00 @	1 50
Snipe, Dowitcher, per dozen	1 25 @	1 75
Plover, per dozen	1 25 @	1 75
Plover, per dozen	2 25 @	3 75

There were rather more foreign goods imported this week than last week. Yet we note but little increase of businesses in the article of sugars, which are rather active at a shade higher prices. The movement in specie was light, the direct export being only about $200,000. There is no difference in the quotations for money to report. Foreign Exchange closes dull at the last reported rates.

Stocks are somewhat better, though they closed dull and rather lower on Saturday. The following table will show the movement of the week:

	Monday, July 26.	Saturday, July 31.
Missouri 6's	84	86
Land grants	31	34
Illinois Central and Galena	59½	59½
Pacific Mail	104	93½
Erie	113	113
New York Central	97½	97½
Erie	18	18
Reading	45	45
Hudson	71	71
Reading Rail	43	43½
Michigan Southern	54	54½
Michigan Central	70	70½
Galena	91½	87½ ex div
Harlem	14	14
Toledo	57½	58½
Illinois Central	71	71
Mo. Cons.	43	44
Milwaukie and Mississippi	30	30

ADVERTISEMENTS.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED
IS A FIRST-CLASS FAMILY NEWSPAPER, designed to entertain and instruct. Every Man, Woman, Schoolboy, and Actress among the people; to illustrate Life in all its phases, and ought to be read by every Family.

PUBLISHED WEEKLY, at Two Dollars a year, by FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.'S
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
SEWING MACHINES
ARE THE BEST.
469 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.

NEW HAND-BOOKS.—HOW TO WRITE —HOW TO TALK—HOW TO BEHAVE—HOW TO DO BUSINESS—and how to succeed in life, handsome volume, may be had, postpaid, by FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York. $1 50.

A VALUABLE CURIOSITY sent by mail for 25 cts. Address
SHAW & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Inventors, look to your Interests!!

HOW TO GET A PATENT; OR THE INVENTOR'S INSTRUCTOR. New Edition. Sent by mail for 25 cents. Address as above.

FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, Nonthampton, Mass. Terms reduced from the Stockbridge Depot. Price for Patients $12 per week.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID. Hints for Agents and Others on Subscription Books. The Terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. Every Family will be glad to obtain such a Book. For particulars address,
FOWLER AND WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

GODEY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.
Is now in market and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.
This admirable preparation of Elder Flowers is very fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from time out memorial, been considered as a mild and harmless, but most perfect beautifier of the Skin. Tan, Sun-burns, Freckles, and Pimples will speedily and entirely disappear.
CAUTION.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.
DIRECTIONS.—Spread on evening, thin, smiling, using very plentiful and all roughness, rendering the skin soft, pliable, and of a beautiful appearance. Price 50 cents per bottle. Sold at Godey's Lady's Book Office. It will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be approved.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
No. 600 Broadway, N. Y.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HALLER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an INDEX and ALPHABETICAL TABLE of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers, personally or by letter. Also Six Cents in Postage Stamps.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Academies, &c., who have access to a public press, and in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this publication will be found invaluable as a manual of reference.

To general subscribers, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller in the vicinity, they may be procured directly from the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HALLER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

A NATURAL LAW CONCERNING HEALTH.—Throughout the whole country physicians are engaged, the land is overflowed; if the entire race be vaccinated, and the whole country is covered with consumptives. When the natural outlets for the waste matters of the body are closed or obstructed, disease at once makes its appearance. It may be headache, or dyspepsia, or diarrhœa, or the mental faculties may be disordered; or fever sets in, or scrofula or cancer commences, or rheumatism, or neuralgia, or perhaps it comes on; or rheumatism or small-pox, or some of the many forms of disease that afflict the human race. Now, as these diseases are produced by obstructions; for while they can not figure, they are sufficiently powerful to open all the natural outlets for the blood's impurities to pass off, and the body is at once relieved from all aggression, and health rightway what disease had made dark. This is a simple process of nature relieved, and is now accomplished by application. No disease, however acute or painful, none, however chronic, if sufficient vitality remains, but will yield to the use of this simple remedy, and all it offers itself to the public for sale. Sold by druggists generally. Price 25 cents per bottle. Sent by mail, postage paid, for 25 cents. Address, as usual, Wild Cherry, or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
Two Copies for One Year, (each) 1 75
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 1 50

Any Person sending a Club, may add to it at any time, at the same rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office of delivery, or in remitting to Canada or Thirty-two Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
CIRCULATING in every Section of the Union.
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.
1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unsurpassed.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and are not crowded with the enormities of trade.
5. None but the most respectable sizes of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.
TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY
FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.
W. H. RAVENTLAY, A.M., ——— Principal.
A First Class Seminary, perfectly organized, thoroughly located, and well supplied with a corps of Teachers.
Board and Tuition in Common English, per Term of fourteen weeks, $30.00 Paid in advance.
Fall Term opens, August 24th. Winter Term opens, December 14th.
Address the Principal, Fort Plain, N.Y.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES are now offered for sale at the factory and warerooms, 458 Broadway, where specimens of the beauty of this machine of the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

KISS-ME-QUICK.
THE FAVORITE PERFUME.
Distilled from Fragrant
TULIPS.
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Soap,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
600 Broadway.

GOUPIL & CO.,
PRINT PUBLISHERS and ARTISTS' AGENTS,
390 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.
Engravings, Oil Paintings, Artists' Materials, Frames, &c.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—Dr. Norwood's Medical Testimony of the highest respectability are the best evidences of its great value in the cure of Scrofula, Syphilis, and Mercurial Disease.
Prepared and sold by A. H. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.
A GORGEOUS NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR AUGUST.
A SUMMER IN THE SOUTH. (Sixth Paper.
Illustrated by Darley and Townsend.
THE BOROUGH OF WYOMING.
THE SPANISH MAIN.—Illustrated.
MAGAZINE LIFE IN BELGIUM.
Illustrated by Two Original Designs.
THE HISTORY OF A PIANO-FORTE.
OLIVE WINCHESTER WRIGHT. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON.
THE FREAKS OF FORTUNE, AND THEIR LESSONS.
THE RED DEACLET.
MY SISTER'S HUSBAND.
RATHER GHOSTLY.
CUTTINGS ON ITALY.
NOSES.
THE QUIET HOME.
THE HOUSEHOLD. By W. M. THACKERAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Anxious Mother.—Precocious Boy.—Wife's Relations.—Husband's Relations.—Philanthropist.—Insensible Husband.—Sold Burglar.—Broadway Swell.—Fashionable Wife.—Country Cousin.—Director.—Verdant Youth.—Polite Shopkeeper.—Assured Widow.—Old Bachelor.—Old Maid.
FASHIONS FOR AUGUST.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Morning Dress.—Lace Bazquine.—Under-sleeve.—Chemise.

The Publishers of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE have pleasure in announcing to the public that the best assurance that its labor or expense will be spared to render it worthy of the favor with which it has been received. The Publishers are conscious that no exertion in its general plan every thing essential to an accurate knowledge of the times adapted to the wants of American Public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished, even during the commercial panic which has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises, and they are assured that every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury. It is the object of the managers to "Know Nature" for the future. They will continue to present the best productions of the most popular writers of the day, with fiction, hunting, and sporting adventure, description of scenic sketches of foreign and social manners, and such other matters as may be found interesting to men and time pamphlets agree upon points far more numerous than their differences, which fact gives to the pages of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the various political and social interests of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by issuing "specimen Numbers," or "Prospectuses," but they would call the attention of the reader to the fact that the Magazine is still growing in favor with the public, and that its circulation is steadily increasing. Its numerous and better illustrations, printed in a better manner, and its literary contents more carefully edited. Publishers are confident that it will deserve and receive the same cordial appreciation and liberal patronage which have been accorded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00

Any Person sending a Club, may add to it at any time, at the same rates.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office of delivery, or in remitting to Canada or Thirty-two Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

THE DELIGHTS OF SPENDING THE SUMMER IN THE COUNTRY.

Selfish Old Dignity! he has settled his family in a delightful farmhouse among the mountains, only a mile and a quarter from the Railway Station; but, will you believe it? as he tramps over the country road, after a hard day's work, on a warm evening, he does not appreciate the pleasures of a summer in the country.

SCENE—Delicious Rural Retreat twenty-two miles from the City.

ARDENT YOUNG WIFE. "Charles, love you brought the fruit? We haven't a thing for dessert."
PATIENT HUSBAND. "Here it is."
WIFE. "And the tomatoes?"
HUSBAND. "Yes."
WIFE. "And the game?"
HUSBAND. "All here. I left the order at Fulton Market this evening."
WIFE. "Oh! that's a dear good Charles. How people would live in the country if it weren't for Fulton Market and the Railway, I can't imagine."

FIRST ELEGANT MAMMA. "How shocking this is!—The WAY Nursery-maids neglect the Children!"
SECOND DO. "Yes, dear! And I don't see that any thing can be done. For what with Parties, and the time one naturally devotes to Dressing, and the numerous Calls one has to make, one can't look after one's own Children, you know!"

The children of the above. Time, 2 P.M., in August.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollars
SEWING MACHINES.
The FIFTEEN DOLLAR Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the public. It is simple, and can only required to learn it. Those with the Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. C. W. THOMAS & CO., 495 Broadway, N. Y.
☞ Agents wanted.

AQUARIUM.—This day is published in 1 volume 12mo, beautifully illustrated, $1 50.
Sent free by mail on receipt of the price.
LIFE BENEATH THE WATERS;
Or, The Aquarium in America.
By Professor Agassiz, M. Edwards, H. Daillebez, &c. &c.
H. DAILLEBEZ, 750 Broadway, New York.

☞ A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK
WORTH FROM 25 CENTS TO $100 00.
Our new descriptive catalogue of 60 octavo pages, embraces a larger collection and better variety of Valuable, Useful, Biographical, and Miscellaneous Books than that of any other book selling establishment in the country. Also, Stationery greater in assortment than ever before offered, mailed free to any address. Send for a Catalogue.
J. W. EVANS, } EVANS & CO., Publishers.
J. S. THOMSON, } 677 Broadway, N. Y. City.

"VROOM & FOWLERS'
WALWTOOL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
Guaranteed to suit the most fastidious.
JOHN D. VROOM, SOLE MAKER, 15 LAFAYETTE PL., N. Y.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY. The next Collegiate Year will commence September 8. A Gymnasium, horseback riding, swimming in the Mystic river (safe, &c., are enjoyed. Conditions of entrance may be known from the Catalogue, and Young Ladies will be received until vacancies are filled.
MRS. T. P. SMITH, Principal.
West Medford, Mass., near Boston.

WHEELER & WILSON'S
SEWING MACHINES,
505 Broadway, New York,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINE for all manufacturing purposes.—To ascertain the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, it is only necessary to inquire of any manufacturer or mechanic who uses them. Send for a copy of SINGER'S GUIDE, in which will be found full particulars. It gives full information on the subject.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 and $25 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 495 Broadway, New York.
Send for descriptive Circular.
H. C. BURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agent for the United States.

INVENTORS—PATENTS—PATENTEES.
PERSONS desiring to secure patents in the United States or Europe can receive full instructions, free of charge, by addressing MUNN & CO., Editors of the SCIENTIFIC AMERICAN, New York City.

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.
THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER is published weekly in the City of New York, under the editorial charge of Rev. A. A. Livermore, assisted by the most eminent writers of the Unitarian denomination. It is designed to be fresh, fearless, and reverent, a family religious newspaper of liberal thought and the most reverent Christian tone. TERMS—Universal by carrier $2 50, or by mail, $2 00 per annum. Address Christian Inquirer, 111 Broadway, New York.
The courteous and able organ of the Unitarian denomination in this city.—N. Y. Tribune.
A model paper.—Boston Journal.
One of the best religious newspapers published in America.—Boston Transcript.
The ablest of the Unitarian journals in the country.—N. Y. Daily News.
One of the ablest religious newspapers published in America.—Western Herald.
The ably conducted organ of our Unitarian fellow Christians.—Montreal Herald.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER! $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—NO. 85.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH, WITH A BEAUTIFUL ILLUSTRATION.
II. LITERARY.
III. THE LOUNGER.
IV. THE FEUDO-FÊTE IN CHINA, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS, FROM SKETCHES MADE ON BOARD THE UNITED STATES STEAMER "MISSISSIPPI."
V. MY THREE-DADS.
VI. VICTORIA, VANCOUVER'S ISLAND, WITH A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
VII. THE CRICKET MATCH BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES, PLAYED AT HOBOKEN AUGUST 2, 3, AND 4, WITH A GRAPHIC ILLUSTRATION.
VIII. LITERARY.
IX. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
X. FOREIGN NEWS.
XI. THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH EXPEDITION—TWO MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATIONS.
XII. PET WORMS.
XIII. DOWN BY THE GRANGE.
XIV. DEBAN SPENDING.
XV. MRS. DOCTOR BLACKWELL.
XVI. LITTLE GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.—Concluded.
XVII. BEAUTY—OLD AND NEW STYLE—A FINE ILLUSTRATION.
XVIII. FEMALE EMPLOYMENT—A UNION FACTORY IN LIVERPOOL—WITH AN ILLUSTRATION.
XIX. MISCELLANY.
XX. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XXI. CONSOLATION.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

At length we have the extreme pleasure of congratulating the public on the accomplishment of the great problem of the age—the laying of the Transatlantic Telegraph cable. At might have been expected, the news of so momentous an event, coming long after every one had despaired and almost ceased to think on the subject, sent an unexampled thrill throughout the length and breadth of the land. From Quebec to New Orleans people are bursting with excitement and joy.

This is the time to place on record, for future reference, a few memoranda of the history of this unexampled enterprise.

Four years ago a few merchants of New York, Cyrus W. Field, Moses Taylor, Peter Cooper, Wilson G. Hunt, Marshall O. Roberts, etc., together with the famous inventor of the electric telegraph, Professor Morse, came to the conclusion that a submarine telegraph across the Atlantic was a possibility. Wires had already been laid across the British Channel from Dover to Calais and Ostend, and were working satisfactorily. Projects were on foot to lay cables from England to Holland, across the Mediterranean, and through other seas, rivers, and straits of Europe. Electric communication under water being thus shown to be possible, Professor Morse, and the other scientific men who were consulted by the projectors of the scheme, gave it as their opinion that the extent of wire to be traversed would make no perceptible difference—that if the fluid could be transmitted through ten miles of submerged wire, it could also be transmitted through a thousand.

The principle thus established, the New York merchants went about their work with the methodical energy and perseverance characteristic of their class. They obtained charters and exclusive rights from the Legislatures of the British colonies through which the wire would pass. From Newfoundland they secured an annual grant of money and the exclusive right, for a term of fifty years, to land a transatlantic cable on the shores of the island. They then proceeded to connect the system of telegraphs on American soil with Newfoundland. In the laying of the Newfoundland cable they met with their first mishap. In a terrible storm the safety of the vessel engaged required that the cable should be cut; and when the insurance was claimed the London underwriters raised futile objections. Mr. Cyrus W. Field, who at this time, as Vice-President, became the head and front of the Company, grappled with this preliminary difficulty with characteristic energy. He ordered a new cable, and chartered a new steamer; then calmly printed in the American newspapers an account of his controversy with the underwriters, with their onus. This had the desired effect. In a few months a new cable was safely laid, the insurance was paid, and every thing was in progress for the great experiment.

Application was then made to the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain for a subsidy and aid in laying the cable. It was met with prompt liberality. Each Government agreed to pay $70,000 a year for the use of the submarine telegraph, and to lend national steamers to lay the cable. Through this liberality the Company was enabled to devote its capital to the manufacture of the best wire that could be made. The core, or conductor, is composed, like that of the Gulf cable, of seven copper wires wound together in the same manner. The protecting wires are made into strands, each composed of seven of the best charcoal iron wires. The aggregate length of the smaller wires required in the manufacture of one mile of the cable is one hundred and twenty-six miles, and as there were three thousand miles provided for the attempt last summer, the whole cable was consequently composed of three hundred and seventy-eight thousand miles of this wire. The weight of this cable is 1360 lbs. to the mile, and its strength such that it will bear six miles of its length suspended in water.

It was on 7th August, 1857, that the first telegraph squadron left Valentia Bay, Ireland, to lay the cable. The melancholy failure of that expedition is then described:

"On the sixth day from the landing of the cable —the 11th of August—the accident occurred which put an end to the undertaking for that year. About four o'clock in the morning the cable on board the Niagara parted in over 2000 fathom water. The cause of the calamity was the application of the brakes at a time when it was almost fatal to use them. There was a pretty heavy swell on, and, as usual under such circumstances, the stern of the vessel was elevated or depressed as she rose on each wave. It was while her stern was down that the brakes were put on, so that in addition to the strain produced by its rising again, the cable had to bear an additional strain of three thousand pounds, as marked upon the indicater. This was more than it could bear, and the consequence was that it parted, as has been stated. The moment the brakes were used the wheels stopped, and when the stern rose again they remained immovable, so that between the strain brought upon the cable by the vessel and that caused by the application of the brakes, it had to bear more than it was ever calculated to sustain. The indicater showed a strain of three thousand pounds; but it is impossible to calculate the strain by which it was broken. Had the brake not been applied, there is no doubt whatever that the cable would have remained perfect to the end, unless very great stress of weather had rendered it necessary to cut it."

A consultation was held among the engineers, and the amount of cable remaining proving too short, in their opinion, to warrant the renewal of the attempt, the vessels returned to Ireland. Disappointment No. 2.

And now many sagacious persons saw that the thing was "a humbug," and could not succeed. Dissatisfaction—the child of Disappointment—had crept in among the projectors. The Englishmen were jealous of the Americans, and the Americans were jealous of the Englishmen. Each engineer knew that the wire might have been laid but for his colleague's stupidity. Telegraph stock went down tremendously.

Not so the hopes or the spirits of Cyrus W.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

Field and his brave associates. Their only notice of the disappointment was to order fresh wire. And let us do the Governments justice. They never flinched from their share of the enterprise. At the very first proposal of a fresh attempt the British Government granted the Company the use of the ships it had had the year before, and when it was told them that the United States Government could not give the Susquehanna, they agreed to furnish a tender to the Niagara likewise. Nothing could be more enlightened or more noble than the conduct of the British Government to the Telegraph Company. Thus fortified, Mr. Field and his associates were enabled, as before, to spend all their means on the wire, and to order a quantity which left a third over for waste.

After due consultation it was decided that, as the only chance of accident arose from the possibility of foul weather, the least risk would be run by laying the cable, as was at first contemplated, simultaneously from both vessels, the splice being made in mid ocean. The Niagara and Agamemnon accordingly started on 10th June, 1858, from Plymouth, to rendezvous in mid ocean. On the way they met with a storm of unusual fury—so terrible a gale that even the safety of the Agamemnon was jeopardized, and officers and men were wearied out with their exertions. The Niagara, in justice to her dead builder be it said, rode the gale not only without injury, but without inconvenience. The reader will find on page 521 an admirable illustration of this fearful storm, with the Agamemnon plunging heavily through the waves.

When the vessels met the splice was made, and on 26th June the two vessels parted, each with her share of the wire. Unfortunately, owing to a blunder on the part of one of the Niagara's men, the cable caught in her machinery and parted, after a trifle over two miles had been paid out. The accident was at once discovered on board the Agamemnon; the two vessels were brought together again, a fresh splice made, and a new start taken on the same day. This time the vessels ran upward of forty miles before the cable parted. When it did so, according to the understanding, both vessels returned to the rendezvous in mid ocean, and a third splice was effected. The squadron started afresh on 28th June. For about twenty-five hours the operation of paying out the cable was perfect, and the signals from ship to ship uninterrupted. But at 9 P.M. of 29th, the electricians on board the Niagara announced that no signals were coming from the Agamemnon. The Niagara lay to till midnight, being anchored by the cable in water two miles in depth. Additional strain was then put on, to ascertain how much the cable would bear, until it parted. The Niagara then made the best of her way to Queenstown, where the Agamemnon, which had cruised five days in the neighborhood of the mid ocean rendezvous in the hope of meeting her consort, joined her on 18th July.

On the announcement of this second failure the public throughout Europe and America gave up all hopes of the success of the enterprise. Leading journals both in this country and in Europe proved conclusively that the wire could not be laid, and sympathized feelingly with the infatuated persons who had embarked their means in so absurd a scheme. The community at large ceased to think about the subject. It was known that the company was not ruined. It had nearly 2500 miles of cable left to lay over a space not exceeding 1950 miles. But the prestige of disaster hung heavy upon them, and people would not take further interest in their efforts.

Mr. Cyrus W. Field and his associates, with that obstinacy which other races so deeply deplore in the Anglo-Saxon, refused to acknowledge themselves beaten, and proceeded to renew their endeavors. They left Queenstown once more, on the 17th of July, to make one final effort to lay the cable. The result of their attempt can not be so well given in any words of ours as in the graphic but simple dispatch which Mr. Field, on his arrival at Trinity Bay, hastened to send to the Associated Press of the United States:

"TRINITY BAY, August 5, 1858.

"TO THE ASSOCIATED PRESS, NEW YORK.—The Atlantic Telegraph fleet sailed from Queenstown on Saturday, July 17; met at mid ocean on Wednesday, the 28th, and made the splice at 1 P.M. on Thursday, the 29th, and then separated—the Agamemnon and Valorous bound to Valentia, Ireland, and the Niagara and Gorgon for this place, where they arrived yesterday, and this morning the end of the cable will be landed.

"It is sixteen hundred and ninety-eight nautical or nineteen hundred and fifty statute miles from the Telegraph house at the head of Valentia harbor to the Telegraph house, Bay of Bull's Arm, Trinity Bay; and for more than two-thirds of this distance the water is over two miles in depth.

"The cable has been paid out from the Agamemnon at about the same speed as from the Niagara.

"The electrical signals sent and received through the whole cable are perfect.

"The machinery for paying out the cable worked in the most satisfactory manner, and was not stopped for a single moment from the time the splice was made until we arrived here.

"Captain Hudson, Messrs. Everett and Woodhouse, the engineers, the electricians and officers of the ships, and, in fact, every man on board the Telegraph fleet, has exerted himself to the utmost to make the expedition successful, and by the blessing of Divine Providence it has succeeded.

"After the end of the cable is landed and connected with the land line of telegraph, and the Niagara has discharged some cargo belonging to the Telegraph Company, she will go to St. Johns for coal, and then proceed at once to New York. CYRUS W. FIELD."

It might have been supposed that this would have silenced the croakers. Those who know Mr. Field were well aware that he was not the man to say the enterprise "has succeeded" so long as there was a doubt on the subject. But our honest friend, Everybody, wanted to know whether the Agamemnon had landed her end of the cable. Even when, on the following day, the Herald's special correspondent telegraphed from Trinity Bay to say positively that the Agamemnon was then landing the cable, the lineal descendants of St. Thomas were still unbelievers. It was not till Saturday that the following dispatch from Mr. Field set the question at rest:

"TRINITY BAY, August 7, 1858.

"The Atlantic Telegraph cable was successfully landed here yesterday morning, and is in perfect order.

"The Agamemnon has landed her end of the cable, and we are now receiving signals from the Telegraph house at Valentia."

The croakers are in a bad way. A few still maintain that though the wire is laid it will not work; what they will be reduced to do or to say when Hughes's instruments get to work, and the Queen's message comes over the wire, it is hard to guess.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 14, 1858.

EFFECTS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

NOW that the Atlantic Telegraph is an accomplished fact, the question which seems to vex the public mind most sorely is—What effects will it produce on international relations, on trade, on society at large? The best answer to this query may perhaps be obtained by studying the effects which ocean steam navigation produced. In its way, the navigation of the Atlantic by steam caused almost as decided a revolution as can be wrought by the telegraph. It brought us fifteen days nearer to Europe, and immensely increased our intercourse with that continent. This is precisely what the ocean wire will do.

In the first place, then, is there any reason to suppose, as many do, that the wire will prove an invincible peace-maker—that we have heard the last of wars? Looking at the history of this country and of Europe for twenty years previous to ocean steam navigation, and for the twenty years which have elapsed since the Sirius made her successful voyage, one is forced to admit that the latter period has not been less fruitful of disputes than the former. (It is true that, in the course of the general progress and growth of this country, interests have sprung up since 1838 which did not exist before, and with them opportunities of quarrel; but this development is still going on, and the opportunities will naturally thicken as the United States expand.) Historical records bear witness that steam navigation did not prevent our quarreling with foreign nations, but that since ocean steamers were established we have quarreled more than ever. If, then, the analogy between steamers and telegraphs be sound, it will not do to expect an era of perpetual peace.

Thus much of quarrels. Between a quarrel and a war there is the space between an insult and a homicide. That the telegraph wire may prove an additional barrier against a war with Great Britain there is much reason to believe. But, in truth, no fresh barrier is needed. The establishment of a monarchy in the United States is not more impossible than a war with Great Britain. Both nations are thoroughly satisfied that it would be cheaper and better for each to take two hundred millions of gold and a hundred thousand able-bodied men and drown them in the deepest part of the Atlantic, than to go to war with each other. The telegraph wire can hardly intensify a sentiment so fixed.

As to trade. Before the establishment of ocean steamers the trade between the United States and Great Britain was highly speculative. No one knew when or where the latest news might arrive; weeks sometimes elapsed without arrivals bringing later intelligence. Those were the days when fortunes were made by surprisingly lucky hits in cotton or breadstuffs; when hundreds of thousands were realized by a successful monopoly of late news, and orders dispatched far and wide by trusty messengers on fleet horses. It was exciting; it was delightful—to the lucky; but it was uncommonly like gambling. Ocean steam navigation changed all this. Regular arrivals from Europe with late news deprived the bold speculators of their best opportunity to make fortunes; the land telegraphs killed the express and fleet horse business. It is reasonable to expect that the ocean wire will operate in like manner. A great portion of the speculative business in cotton, breadstuffs, and stocks is predicated upon "the next news from Europe;" the great fluctuations in these kinds of property are usually caused by unexpected news from the other side. This agency will now cease. Our markets will pulsate simultaneously with those of Europe. They will naturally become more sensitive; we shall probably see cotton move on the news of a rising at Madrid, or Central fall on a ministerial crisis in Turkey; but the fluctuations will be more gradual. Business will become more uniform and safer.

That ocean steam navigation has tended to enlarge the social mind of the peoples of Great Britain and of the United States no one will be inclined to dispute. It has helped the two nations to know each other better, to get rid of ignorant prejudices, to share each other's progress. A volume would be required to describe the benefits which each nation has conferred on the other—through the agency of steam navigation—in respect of new inventions alone. This mutually-improving process will be further developed by the telegraph. Hourly intercourse with Europe will familiarize us with the progress of the European mind, and efface the last remains of provincialism here. Regular morning and evening bulletins from the United States will open the eyes of Europe to the real state of society here, and will dispel that ignorance and prejudice which to this day disgrace so many enlightened Europeans. It is said that one of the most sagacious statesmen of continental Europe has been from the first opposed to the telegraph; he foresaw that regular announcements of the working of our system of self-government would exercise no small effect on the popular mind of Germany and France.

SHALL THE TRADE IN SCANDAL BE FREE?

ONE Stephen H. Branch, somewhat known in this city, has, during the past week, been tried and convicted of publishing a libel on Peter Cooper, Mayor Tiemann, and others, for which he has been sent to Blackwell's Island Penitentiary for twelve months. There is no question but the statement published by Branch was a foul, false, malicious, and disgraceful libel. Yet certain newspapers express commiseration for his fate; and an ex-Alderman, together with several other citizens, accompanied him to his prison, as though he had been a martyr.

The question involved between these sympathizers with Branch and the great mass of the community, who deem him rightly punished, is simply this: Is any person to be allowed to publish false and scandalous stories about private citizens and their families or not? It is argued by those who feel for Branch—not that his libels were true or justifiable, or that he had any reason to suppose they were true, or that any good would result from their publication—but merely and simply that the libels in question were so gross, so absurd, and so preposterous, that they could do no harm to any one, and were therefore best let alone. These persons, in fact, pretend that Branch was so wretched and miserable a creature that it was taking undue notice of him to crush him out. It may well be doubted whether this contemptuous policy will stand the test of practice.

That Branch's libels were not so absurd as to be unworthy of notice is shown by the fact that over two thousand persons bought and paid for them. The appetite for scandal in every large city will, at least for a time, sustain a libeler who panders judiciously to it. Let a newspaper announce a full and true account of "the robbery of a bank by the Archbishop of New York," or "the scandalous intrigue between Mr. Buchanan and a lady of high rank," and thousands of people will be sure to have the curiosity to buy and read the tid-bit. Nor can it be pretended that the circulation of ever so absurd a scandal will be wholly innocuous to the party calumniated. With every respect for our fellow-creatures, we must say—and every observer of human nature will admit the fact—that the entire human race is not gifted with that fine discrimination which alone can separate vulgar scandal from truth. There will always be persons stupid enough to believe any story, however ridiculous, which throws discredit on living persons. And if, as in Branch's case, the calumny be built on a foundation of plausibility, the number of believers is likely to be very great.

What, then, is to be done? Shall private citizens sit down quietly while a vagabond is making a living by imputing villainies to their charge, and hundreds or thousands of dull people are believing them? No man can do so with self-respect. The party traduced has a choice of two remedies. He may shoot his vilifier, as they do in some parts of the South, or he may have him indicted, as is the practice here. If, indeed, he be a political personage, he may afford to despise the calumny; for misrepresentation and scurrilous abuse are the price every political man must expect to pay for fame. But why should private citizens like Mr. Cooper and his friends be expected to submit to be advertised as thieves and adulterers? They owe nothing to the public.

The friends of Branch may say what they like, but the sound sober judgment of the public will confirm the Recorder's sentence. Not alone on account of Branch's sins—though, really, society has been too long pestered by this cunning rogue, who, under the guise of madness, has offended the public nostril beyond endurance—but because he is the type and leader of a set of scamps who are only too ready to make a living by vilifying men's characters and traducing their wives and daughters. Society required an example: let Branch learn wisdom on Blackwell's Island.

A "BLISTER" FOR THE TRIBUNE.

IT was generally supposed that the severe castigation lately administered to the proprietors of the New York Tribune for stealing Thackeray's Virginians from Harper's Magazine, while they meanly pretended to take it from a London copy, would have operated on their minds as a wholesome warning for the future. We, in common with others, sincerely hoped that the humiliating exposure which they underwent at our hands on that occasion would have taught them that, after all, there is some truth in the old adage about honesty being the best policy. Their moral conversion it was, perhaps, utopian to expect; but it was, we still think, reasonable to imagine that they would not in a hurry allow themselves to be caught again at such pitiful work. We grieve to say that our expectations have been disappointed. Like Peter Dawson himself, whom the disgrace of each arrest and sentence only hardens, the proprietors of the Tribune have again been detected in the act of appropriating the property of others, and impudently demanding from the public profit and credit for the larceny. The following letter will explain itself:

"NEW YORK, Aug. 2, 1858.

"To the Editors of Harper's Weekly:

"GENTLEMEN,—You are not unacquainted with the peculiar penchant of Greeley & Co., of the Tribune, for appropriating literary property to which they have no claim. They pilfered from early copies of Harper's Magazine several installments of Thackeray's Virginians, pretending to have derived them from another source. You set a trap for them, caught them, exposed them, and brought them to confession. I should have supposed after the crucifixion they received at your hands, that they would have kept their 'pickers and stealers' off the literary property of other men for the future. I was mistaken. They are at their dirty tricks again. On the 30th ultimo they published a quantity of matter from a book recently issued by me, and sent to them for review. The work in question is the 'American Horse-Tamer and Farrier,' a very valuable and elaborate treatise on the best method of curing wild and vicious horses, by Jeremiah Bentwright. Taking the very pith and marrow out of the book, they transferred it bodily to their columns, first copyrighting their plunder in 'the Clerk's office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.' Whoever takes the trouble to look at the Tribune of the 30th ultimo and to compare the article referred to with my book, will find that the language of the two (except here and there, where there has been some clumsy garbling) is identical. It will be found, also, that my book, written by Mr. Bentwright, is rechristened in the columns of the Tribune, 'The American Art of Taming Horses; originally Systematized and Practiced by John S. Rarey. Its history and different methods, etc.; being a complete compendium of all that is now known of the system.' Cool, is it not, this change of the names of both the book and the author? But the idea of copyrighting the imposture caps the climax of human impudence.

"The distinguished sticklers for authors' and publishers' rights, who have thus stultified themselves, promise another article in continuation and conclusion of the first, and will, I presume, transfer the whole of Mr. Bentwright's treatise to their columns. Unfortunately it is not copyrighted, as it ought to have been, and therefore, I suppose, the author and publisher can not obtain legal redress; but I think it will be conceded, on all hands, that the proceeding, in its moral aspect, is a disgrace to the parties concerned, and gives the lie direct and circumstantial to the sentiments they have so often professed in relation to the protection of literary property from literary pirates.

"I trust that if any of the country papers copy the articles from Greeley's journal they will also copy this letter, as I am as anxious as Greeley & Co. can be that the 'proper credit' should be 'given to the Tribune.'

"I am, Gentlemen, yours, etc.,

"GEORGE HOLBROOK."

We find, on examination, that Mr. Holbrook's statement is not in the least exaggerated. A very large proportion of the paper published by the Tribune, under the title of "The American Art of Taming Horses, originally Systematized and Practiced by John S. Rarey"—and the only part thereof that is not commonplace and useless—is copied verbatim from "The American Horse-Tamer and Farrier," by Jeremiah Bentwright, published by George Holbrook. We have only space to collate the beginning of a few paragraphs, to which we take the liberty of prefixing extracts from an editorial article in the Tribune of 30th July, the paper in which the theft was committed:

THE PRACTICE OF HORSE-TAMING.

From the New York Tribune, which "is the means of bringing this invaluable art to the knowledge of the public."	From J. Bentwright's book, sent to the Tribune office for review.
"The one principle which you must establish firmly in your mind, and which is so essential in horse-taming that it is almost the corner-stone of the theory, is the law of kindness. Next to kindness you must have patience, and next to patience indomitable perseverance," etc.	"There is one principle that you must establish firmly in your mind, and it is so essential in horse-taming that it is almost the corner-stone of the theory—that is, the Law of Kindness. Next to kindness, you must have patience, and next to patience, indomitable perseverance," etc.

And so on, in the very same words, in the Tribune and in Bentwright's book, to the end of the paragraph.

HOW TO HARNESS THE COLT.

From the New York Tribune, for which "it was prepared exclusively by an intelligent and skillful professor."	From J. Bentwright's work, sent to the Tribune office for review.
"You should, by all means, have your harness made to fit your horse, especially the collar. Hundreds of horses have been spoiled by collars that do not fit as they should. A little attention to this matter beforehand will facilitate your progress very much. Take your harness into the stable," etc.	"You should, by all means, have your harness made to fit your horse, especially the collar. Hundreds of horses have been spoiled by collars that do not fit as they should. A little attention to this matter beforehand will facilitate your progress very much. Take your harness into the stable," etc.

And so on, in the very same words, in the Tribune and in Bentwright's book, to the end of the paragraph.

TO HITCH UP THE COLT.

From the New York Tribune, which, Rarey's secret being disclosed, "proceeds to lay before its readers a complete account of his system."	From J. Bentwright's work, sent to the Tribune office to be reviewed.
"This should be done with great caution, first letting him examine the buggy or sulky in his own way of examining objects; then carefully hitch him up; having every thing safe, let him start the buggy empty, and pull that at first in that way; then get in, and let him take it slow, and he will not be near so apt to scare, and by degrees you will be making a good work-beast," etc.	"This should be done with great caution, first letting him examine the buggy or sulky in his own way of examining objects; then carefully hitch him up; having every thing safe, let him start the buggy empty, and pull that at first in that way; then get in, and let him take it slow, and he will not be near so apt to scare, and by degrees you will be making a good work-beast," etc.

And so on, as before.

HOW TO SUBDUE A KICKING HORSE.

From the New York Tribune, which "has had the article copyrighted, to prevent its being printed by speculators."	From J. Bentwright's work, sent to the Tribune office to be reviewed.
"A kicking horse is the worst kind of a horse to undertake to subdue, and more dreaded by man than any other; indeed, it would not be too much to say that they are more dreaded than all the other bad and vicious horses put together. You often hear the expression, even from horse-jockeys themselves, 'I don't care what he does, so he doesn't kick.' Now," etc.	"A kicking horse is the worst kind of a horse to undertake to subdue, and more dreaded by man than any other; and I do not think that it would be too much to say, that they are more dreaded than all the other bad and vicious horses put together. You often hear the expression, even from horse-jockeys themselves, 'I don't care what he does, so he don't kick.' Now," etc.

And so on, as before.

HOW TO BREAK A BORE FROM SCARING.

From the New York Post's Advertiser's sent to the Tribune office to be reviewed.

"It is an established rule in this country, that a man is innocent of an offence without a crime, and if he does must be some cause for the scaring of a horse. The horse scares either from imagination or from fright. If from fright, there must be a cause for the fright, and this that any object will not hurt him," etc.

And so on, as before.

HOW TO LEARN A HORSE TO FOLLOW YOU.

From the article in the New York Tribune," entered, according to Act of Congress, by Horace Greeley & Co., in the Clerk's office.

"Take him into a large stable or shed, and tie him to the wall; then halter with your left hand, leave the halter with your left hand, then with your right hand over his face, then with your right hand over his shoulder with the same motion bring back so that you can touch his left ear with your right hand gently around his head, then hitch him up a little, give him a gentle jog with the whip," etc.

And so on, as before.

HOW TO TEACH A HORSE TO STAND WITHOUT HITCHING.

From the New York Tribune, which graciously consented to its contemporaries the right of "appying the whole or parts" of the article.

"After you have taught your horse to halter you, stand him in the center of the stable, begin at his head to train him, gradually working backward. If he moves, touch him with the end of the whip, and put him back to the same spot from which he started. If he stands, some him so be-fore," etc.

And so on, as before.

ON BAKING.

From the New York Tribune, which thinks that the idea who copy that "rice pudding" is the best."

"If you have boiler beans, it is your own and not the cause if they do not pull true, there is no reason why they should not remove the cause the effect will follow.

"Where your beans have been burned, salt," etc.

And so on, as before, in the very same words, in both the Tribune and Beatwright, to the end of that subject.

Mr. Beatwright, and his publisher, Mr. Holbrook, whether from liberality or carelessness we know not, omitted to copyright their work. They have supplied the deficiency. It stole the contents, and copyrighted the plunder. We submit that there is nothing in the whole annals of piracy that can compare with the act of a newspaper editor who, receiving for review a work on agriculture, appropriates the contents, assumes the authorship, copyrights the stolen property, and brazenly requests the press and the public to give him credit for his dexterity and enterprise. A Daniel Carpenter's Rogues' Gallery certainly on not yet to be considered complete.

THE LOUNGER.

THE OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

EVEN Loungers were startled by the news of Friday. The sermons of jubilation may now be preached. The speeches of the Irish Land Lieutenant have now, after lying over as waste cloquence for a year, grown into historical importance. The great event of modern times has fallen on the fortunate day, and the continents shake hands. It is perhaps the most contemporary and extraordinary of vast importance upon which every intelligent man in Christendom will congratulate every other.

There is but one way, of course, for the Lounger city to manifest its sense of the grandeur of the result. It is a way which is consecrated by our most sacred traditions.

NEW YORK MUST GIVE A PUBLIC DINNER TO CYRUS W. FIELD.

All the great orators of every part of the country, and of every shade of opinion, should be heard at this—not national festival—but Jubilee of Civilization.

And the Lounger humbly suggests that the mothers, and sisters, and wives, and daughters, who share the universal satisfaction, that at last there be feast which celebrates it, and not be put off into galleries, and behind doors and window-blinds, with the compliment of a last toast.

TWO MILLIONS.

The great literary success of the last year was the poem "Nothing to Wear," which originally appeared in the Weekly for January 17, 1857, and one of those occasions on which a man wakes up one morning to great fame. A trenchant, felicitous poem, it may be, not yet so engaging, as a social reader, that it was more than a jeu d'esprit, it was an addition to literature. A most amusing and surprising controversy, it was conceded on all sides that the author wrote it—a question which, in the cases of Homer and Shakspeare, has not yet decided to the satisfaction of every body. Having settled who wrote it, every body proceeded to involve to the next question—Can he write any thing else? The Phi Beta Kappa of Yale College put this question pointedly to Mr. Butler, and he has answered it to their satisfaction and to that of all the world. His new poem, "Two Millions," is a more carefully elaborated performance, of the same general character. It is another, coats in the epic of to-day," full of incidents, and well penetrated all through with a generous and genial humanity. Many of the most fashionable writers in literature are personal attacks, spear-tips of polished poison. But the best do not strike for individuality, but avenge individual wrongs, but defend mankind from their own passions and errors. Among such satirists the author of "Nothing to Wear" and "Two Millions" takes his place. Long may he sit upon his throne and scatter his shining arrows!

MORAL MONRAINGS

"RESPECTED MR. LOUNGER,—I am very fond of music—to me my family. I may humbly say that I hope and believe we have some small talent for it. My daughter plays the piano—she's not second, the harp; and I accompany them upon the flageolet. I am assured that my accompaniments are not altogether indifferent, but, on the contrary, our neighbors manifest a very lively interest in them. I am very much opposed to the theatre, and, consequently, to the Opera, which is performed in it a practice which my family I may humbly say that we hope and believe the theatre to be the open door of the pit (I do not refer to the parquette). But it is not that the conduct of the opera-companies are only to be heard in such a place. In fact, we have very little chance to hear good music adequately performed by reason of our objections to entering the play-house. Miss Jones, Lady ten hearts, of course; she plays the harp, who sang to the clergymen, Sunday-schools, and ladies' one pleasant Saturday morning.

"But most of all were we grateful to Mr. Thalberg, the great pianist, who charmed us all last year, and who established his musical headquarters in Dodsworth's Hall and elsewhere. You may remember that he was giving his last concert, but the first consideration was the morality of the audiences. Tickets were to be sold only to persons of the most unexceptionable morality of character. It was a lovely thought. It was indeed beautiful. It was the poetry of life written. Ah! Mr. Thalberg was not only an artist in music—he was an artist in virtue! How comely and quiet—'as you remember, Sir!'—how modest and polite-mannered! I can see him now as he makes that well-conditioned bow, and then before retiring seating himself to allow the crystal notes to leap from his lunged fingers. I am still at a loss, Sir, to say which I loved most—the morality of those numerings or the music. Scarcely in the most fashionable church have we had a more virtuous congregation of fellow-creatures. Selina, my second, recalls with fondness the liberal lockeys, with livery, and Ann says she remembers Mr. Thalberg's delightful chocolate and ices to complete the charming picture. Indeed, Sir, every thing was delightful, but coffee, music, and virtue. Heart, soul, mind, and sense were satisfied. Often, of an evening, my wife and I renew some of the pleasures and renew the felicity of those occasions. I hope I may humbly say that I feel that our morality does no injustice to the model.

"Now—pardon my delay, Sir—what I want to know is, why we could not have more concerts? Where is Mr. Thalberg? At the West or in the South? Will no, Sir, or will he not? I hope that both are both urgent. Tell us if he still continues to give the moral mornings. Has he, perhaps, taken that institution to heart, and carried it away? And you know that, wherever he goes, the moral morning goes with him.

"More, Mr. Lounger, more! Let us have more music, and morals, and morning.

"Your respectful and hopeful servant,

"FUDGE DIABOLAP."

—The Lounger having replied to Mr. Diablap that he had recently heard very little of the great pianist, receives the following with the request that he make it public:

Information Wanted.

One copy of Thalberg's fantasia upon Don Giovanni will be presented to any one who will give notice of the whereabouts of Mr. Thalberg and his moral morning; or a copy of Thalberg's fantasia upon "Home," will be sent a Dream at the best," for the M. M. alone. Apply by letter, post paid, as you please, to

DEACON FUDGE DIABOLAP,
at the S. W. Spit.

How many a lover, on land and by the sea, is singing this song which a poet sings to the Lounger:

THE PARTING.

I.

The kiss still lingers on my lips
She softly gave at parting;
Still in my head I hear the word
Which spoke, when tears were starting.

II.

Yet, sweetly treacherous on my lips
The kiss she parting gave;
"Will linger there until I die,
And thrill me in the grave!

III.

And still I press the answering hand
That through that silence spoke,
When heavy lay the weight of love on the strand,
Each on the other broke.

IV.

The carriage sinks behind the hill,
I watch until it fades;
And, slowly sinking, my clouded heart
Discovering Fate upbraids.

V.

The plaisen, and the entreated curl,
The song, the flowers she brought,
Their value all to me have lost
From whom their charm was caught.

VI.

I will not press them to my heart,
Memories sweet and fair,
For still, whether I feel my arms,
'Tis my own Love is there!

VII.

Nor land nor sea, from them and me,
Oh, darling! us can part,
For far and farther may we thus be,
Yet nearer still my heart!

STEALING NO THEFT.

A MELANCHOLY instance of hallucination, if not worse—if not, in fact, of entire abstraction—has lately fallen under the Lounger's attention. A young lady, hitherto considered entirely unobjectionable, has been lately detected in the following extraordinary offence. Whether the specious communication be a mistake or the sophistical extenuation of crime in which she indulges are most to be deplored the Lounger deprecate of deciding. He commends this sad case to his correspondents, Timothy Titus, Esq., and Deacon Diablap. Might not a course of moral mornings be useful?

Pens, pens and umbrellas are the rage now, for the summer months, and therefore it strikes me I would merely be loss to keep them for special employment.

This only, then, I may say, that I am going to Utah Thursday, and we would not repeat it: Utah is a place I have long already sited, I do not see how I can steal it.

THE LOUNGER'S LITTLE-BOX.

—THE Lounger is charmed to find that the Graefenberg philosophers preserve a steady brain while the world about them reels with delight at the successful laying of the Atlantic Telegraph. They are prepared, of course, for success. If it does not succeed, the projectors were clearly insane. If it does, what's the use of it? The point and cogency of this reasoning are beyond praise. There is nothing like observing a prudent reserve in the midst of universal excitement.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—As the laying of the Atlantic Telegraph cable likely to be successful, and we shall be flooded with letters from reading compatriots of this poor fellow who wasted time and money on an insane attempt, I will you publish the following, what good this telegraph line will do?

"Yours, contemplatively,
"AN OLD TORY."

—"I. M. F." writes from St. Albans a note commencing indignantly:

"To the Lounger.

"I have just been exceedingly disgusted by the perusal of an article in the New York Tribune for the last inst. headed 'A Swindling Business,' which evidently deserves the name of 'romance,' if by that we understand the wilful perversion of facts, coupled with the total disregard of all truth, probability, and even decency.

"In the first place I would remark that the talent and ability of its editorial corps, that it seems either strange that it should condescend to publish the minds of readers with such grossly, scurrilous, vulgar stuff as that 'Washington Romance.'"

And ending thus:

"The motive for writing this appeal, Mr. Lounger, is simply that the readers of your publication may not be also exposed to the public contempt, to the infinite annoyance and pain of the parties concerned; and that it may not be for some one to say something against it. And we feel, indeed, that the publication of this article will be a well-fated people on this subject are with us.

"I. M. F."

This is strong Lounging, but there can be no question of the tendency to unjustifiable personal gossip in newspapers and magazines. The case of Thackeray and Yates, of which the Lounger means to say a word next week, is strictly in point.

—The Lounger's friend "J. B." was fully answered by Mr. Timothy Bedrop in his letter of last week. If J. B. has any reply to make to Mr. Bedrop, he shall be heard if he be reasonably brief and lively. The Lounger admits in Hackney's drawings artistic imperfections, but certainly they are all of character.

"DEAR LOUNGER—I have just been reading Addison's pithy line and your comments in reply, chant The Virginian. I like your remarks, and I like the Virginians.' The thirty-sixth chapter, in the June number of the Atlantic Monthly, is a very able piece of thought clad in gorgeously rough Gleason lungs, and the illustrative power is almost equal to the text. But if I say this much of the text, what can I say about the author? Hawthorne might look to look for his mantle, but you to that deplorable Dr. Johnson the 'Dictionary maker,' or to the former illustrious Addison. Not to me. The conclusion I am led to is, that Thackeray, that admirable writer, has found a successor. What do you think?

"And now he it, while so many talk of Thackeray, that no few mention my favorite Bulwer and his novel? Can it be, because the 'Virginians' has been the victim of the reviewmen of the great Tribune? Believe me, I have never attempted any thing in the article line, but his nonfictions some might look to look for his nonfiction, should he ever attempt it, even in this department.

"Hoping, Dear Lounger, that you will long keep Lounging, and The King Maker's sudden exhumes into the church will not be followed by any untimely departure. Why will not the Colonial Secretary gratify us, if not with his own presence, at least by occupying one of the pews? How would Castlemaike do?

"Yours, colloquially,
"J. B."

"DERBY, Pennsylvania, August, 1858."

—The Lounger can not do better than commend the note of "H. R., Jr.," to the careful consideration of the venerated Ghost of Johnson:

"NEW ORLEANS, July, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER.—How is it that one of "The Knights of Columbo's Island," or any other ghost, in search of your lost "Dictionary Grammar," can not find them? If you will take the trouble to look into "Webster," you will find the word "Dictionary" in its place. If you are like some of your venerable brethren, the "Knights of the Spittoon," you're sure to find it where you might be able to purchase one from ——— on a slow note!

"Yours, colloquially,
"H. R., JR."

—"Hath not a Jew eyes?" asks old Shylock. "W." may be very sure that the omission of all allusions to his favorite State has not been because the Lounger was not aware of all its charms. His eyes daily see a lovely landscape, and it is made up of the woods and fields of Jersey. And he remembers that Emerson says, "The wren's wee good enough for the wren, and Washington is for Will." "W." explain to the Lounger the origin and occasion of the feeling about New Jersey mosquitoes of bugs and peaches? And perhaps "W." will kindly remember that, as re bugs and peaches, the proof of the pudding, etc., etc.

"SUNNYSIDE, NEW JERSEY, July 28th.

"MR. LOUNGER.—How is it that I never chance, when looking over your columns, to see any thing with regard to Jersey? Can it be that you agree with those letter-men individuals who believe New Jersey to be out of the United States? Sir, Mr. Lounger, that is gentlemen of your experience and sagacity should thus uphold these individuals who wear an air of ease in their faces when, at any time ago, the comet was coming to your meridian, and you looked into the earth, did not behave a place which, if it was not out of the world, was as near it as could be. In our own immediate vicinity we have some of her country places. Bandbrook, for instance, with its back shooting and its fine streets, deep overnight at the nest and roomy, not roomy, hotel. Small is the evening toward the Raritan River that winds through the place. Homebrook is a place that takes rank high among the commercial part of the community, and is far-famed for its Aqua, which, though quite unpretical, are, as you are aware, of great use in the sick room. Love lasts there, a substance not to be despised.

"But, Mr. Lounger, I will not enlarge on her scenic or her hogs, but advise you to take a quiet trip among her hills, crushing her fruits, and, what is better, change your duest not to, in printing, again overlook New Jersey.

"V."

—"M. E. M. bursts into rhyme for relief:

"NEVER MIND."

Last evening with visions of bliss,
Heard the sound of the night before,
And fair prospects for things
I stepped in at Adelaide's door.

Alecks! alack!—never was mortal
So taken aback. My Addie last night,
To a lovely spot, was not at home.

The evening seemed a very summer time,
With love-breathing flowers, and heaven's perfect rhyme.

Miss Addie this night,
To a lovely scene, was not at home.
Heed one still
As she would her coldness hide—
Yet have no, sir. "Never mind!"
Came from the lips of Miss Adelaide Bird,
And from its worn looked up
Old Harper's Weekly Lounger.

I smiled. "Dear Addie, this is kind!"
She shrugged her shoulders.—"Never mind!"
Then from the room I hurried away.
So were the little slippered feet
Upon the stairway heard,
I heard her gentleman "Never mind!"
Faintly through the hall reverberated.
Had brought about the vexing fate,
And sent me back to my room and write.
As others say—to bring her round again."

But all is not lost. She persisted in not minding, and urging M. E. M. not to mind; and he naturally declares:

Now, Harper, I am half bothered
To cut my lofty and her decreed "Never mind!"
If other girls "have a way" at eating or
Or is it confined to my own loony kind.
The peculiar use of this word is small?
Or words I should say, only my rhyme
Refused to jingle a single "Never mind!"

Oh, Harper's! Oh, Lounger! dear clever clogs,
Up with your wits, and help me out of the mess
On these very heads. Teach the giddy things
That love sometimes means "Never mind!"
And over the hills and far away——
Please to tell the young loving words
Are current coin among all lady birds.

—Will no lady bird answer?

—The Lounger replies to Ortho's first inquiry that, after the lately published card to which he refers, any subscription will be speculation, and unvaluable and impertinent. Ortho further writes:

"LOUNGERIA, July, 1858.

"A precious young gentleman of this city was recently requested by his turnmaster to favor her with an album autograph. He did so, and accordingly tore a page from the fullness of his heart as follows:

"Spell! Oh, my darling! Spell! Spell like that pootie.
Which turns within like an everlasting volcano!
Regard it not alone from the eyes of Judson,
Whose hearts on Earth no higher considerations go
Than the Sea!

"Is it negative or positive? Does it belong to the subjective or the objective—Hermetic or Illustrious? Is it the Lake of Lazarus or the Lake of Gennesaret, or sentimental?

"The question upon this burst of subdued pathos will tend to promote as well the cause of letters as to shake the cadaverity of your office.

—This seems to be clearly one of those cases in which "you takes your choice."

"NEW HAMPSHIRE.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—I should not venture to write you then did I not know that there are kind and good, and, I may almost say, pious men in your vocation.

"I come not to speak to thee of the exquisite beauties and rich productiveness of our land of flowers, or of the beautiful prairies, majestic rivers, and abundant harvests of the Mississippi valley, or of the delightful landscape in the air of the dear old homes of New England, or of the wild beauty of the Green Mountains of the Granite State; nor eat through long winter evenings of the rich products of your well-tilled soil, or of early spring, for the awesome and trading aristocracy, or, in summer, for the fashionable world of the "City of Notions?" Does the Lounger know that the hills are not all of rock, that the valleys are not unproductive, or that in the ruggedness, are productiveness in the soil, and that even now in the hardest days of winter, the sleigh and the traverse from fields of clover?

"Yes, I am a native and a believer in convention of homes and churches; in comfortable carriages and passable roads; in good schools and good teachers; in intelligent, and, more than all, in dear, familiar faces. I am not one who may barter away their birthright, resign the old homestead—formerly but me speak the word—for stranger lands, scatter to the winds the household gods, and hasten away toward the setting sun. Virtue may find a milder clime and more fertile soil, but for her sister that these are not essential to the growth of the shining virtues—industry, frugality, and temperance.

"I am a farmer's boy, and I love the farmer's harvest. Rage from our gravestone to another, lingering, but each year sees the number of the unsaved in diminished. And that not only the graves of his fathers, but a living sea, and sometimes of his own home in England. M.

And the Lounger cried "AMEN."

EXPLANATION OF THE PLAN.

1. The "Mississippi's" junk at anchor on the night of the 19th of April, under the guns of the forts.
2. Dutchmen.
3. Forts mounting 150 guns.
4. A town of thirty thousand inhabitants.
5. Fort being built.
6. Encampment on the beach.
7. Battery of 20 guns, on the beach.
8. River Pei-ho.
9. Russian frigate "America."
10. English steam frigate "Furious."
11. English frigate "Pique."
12. United States steam frigate "Mississippi," anchored eight miles from the beach.
13. Gulf of Petielle.
14. Guns on the bank of the river.
15. English gun-boats.

PLAN OF THE PEI-HO FORTS AND VICINITY.

THE ATTACK ON THE PEI-HO FORTS, IN CHINA.

We are indebted to the courtesy of the Herald for the accompanying plan of the Pei-ho Forts and the vicinity, and view of the scene, from sketches taken by an officer on board the United States steam frigate Mississippi. The reader is already aware that these forts were taken by the allied French and English, without much loss, on the 20th May. On the 23d the allies proceeded up the river.

Pei-ho, the "White River," is of consequence as the stream on which Pekin, the capital of the Chinese Empire, rests. It rises near the Great Wall, and flowing past Pekin, enters the Gulf of Petielle in 38° 39' north latitude. For some months the Chinese have been busily fortifying its banks. Early in April the allied vessels began to collect in the Bay of Petielle off the mouth of the Pei-ho. By the beginning of May they had a force large enough to commence offensive operation; and their negotiations with the Emperor proving fruitless, the attack of the 20th May (of which we have only telegraphic intelligence) was the result.

The junk lying nearest the shore in our picture is the Peiho, which has been chartered by our countrymen as a tender to the Mississippi. She had quite an adventure lately, when she was sent into the river to carry a message to the mandarins, and narrowly escaped being fired upon by the Celestials. One of the officers says, in a letter to the Herald: "As the Pei-ho entered the river, the Chinese (some ten thousand men) manned all their guns, numbering from one hundred and fifty to two hundred, and of calibre ranging from six to forty-two pounders, and crowded their battlements with armed men. The muskets, matchlocks, spears, and swords bristled, glistened, and flashed on all sides, presenting as formidable an array as a Chinaman could well conceive of; while the thousands of flags and streamers, of all colors and descriptions, the fanciful dresses of the soldiery, the long tails, peacock feathers, gilt, white, and crystal balls on the mandarins' caps of gaudy red tops, and the queer cut of their garments, of many shades and varieties, gave a fairy-like and butterfly variety to the scene, which it is next to impossible to describe."

The American officers landed in spite of the Chinese army, and performed their task; much to the disgust of the Chinese, who are distrustful of all barbarians. We may now expect to hear of the advance of the allied army upon Pekin, and of the conclusion of a peace, dictated to the Emperor in his own palace.

MY FIRST-BORN.

BY FREDERICK LOCKER.

Ir shall not be "Albert" nor "Arthur,"
Though both are respectable men;
His name shall be that of his father—
My Benjamin shorten'd to "Ben."

Yes, much as I wish for a corner
In each of my relatives' wills,
I will not be reckon'd a fawner—
That creaking of boots must be Squills.

It is clear, though his means may be narrow,
This infant his age will adorn;
I shall send him to Oxford from Harrow—
I wonder how soon he'll be born.

A spouse thus was airing his fancies
Below—twas a labor of love—
And calmly reflecting on Nancy's
More practical labor above.

Yet while it so pleased him to ponder,
Elated, at ease, and above,
That pale, patient victim up yonder
Had budding delights of her own;

Sweet thoughts, in their essence divine
Than dreams of ambition and pelf;
A cherub, no babe will be finer,
Invented and nursed by herself!

One breakfasting, dining, and tesing,
With appetite naught can appease,
And quits a young Reasoning Being
When call'd on to yawn and to sneeze.

What cares that heart, trusting and tender,
For fame or avuncular wills;
Except for the name and the gender,
She is almost as tranquil as Squills.

That father, in reverie centred,
Dumfoundered, his brain in a whirl,
Heard Squills—as the creaking boots enter'd—
Announce that his Boy was—a Girl.

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

We take pleasure in placing on record, as much for future reference as for present inspection, a view of Victoria, Vancouver's Island, taken before the rush of gold-diggers to that town. It will remind

THE PEI-HO FORTS, FROM A DRAWING MADE ON THE UNITED STATES STEAM FRIGATE "MISSISSIPPI."

VICTORIA, VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

our Western readers of many a newly-planted settlement on the borders of some Western river.

At the time our latest advices left that place, Victoria contained a population of some 2000 people, and consisted of 160 houses. Most of the miners were encamped in tents in the vicinity of the town, there being not only no houses to lodge them, but no lumber to build new houses. As the last steamer left a vessel arrived with lumber, and it was confidently predicted that houses would soon be run up like wild-fire. Several sales of lots had taken place, at some of which the audience had assembled several hours before the sale, as is the case at Western sales of public lands, and had jostled one another after the most approved Western fashion. Some lots, 60 × 100, in the town of Victoria, sold as high as $8000; others, less happily situate, varied from $250 to $1000. Californian experience has taught many of the immigrants that the best mining locations are not the "placers." Should the news of the gold discoveries be confirmed, we may expect to hear of as much speculation in real estate in Victoria as there ever was in San Francisco.

It is a fine city, with a noble harbor, capable of containing all the sailing vessels and steamers that can be sent there. Behind it lies a rich back country, producing every vegetable peculiar to the temperate zone. Coal, iron, copper, and other minerals abound; and the mountain districts contain millions of acres admirably fitted for the pasturage of cattle and sheep. The Hudson Bay Company's farms on the island are likely to be the most profitable of their possessions.

Victoria has rivals—in Bellingham Bay, Schome and Whatcom are both newly-founded settlements, which are contending for a share of the good things flowing into the new El Dorado. Both, it appears, are well situate, though the beach is long and sleeping; and to adapt them to the requirements of an extensive trade very long wharves will need to be built. But it appears to be the opinion of the bulk of the immigrants into the new region that Victoria will retain her pre-eminence, so long as no city is founded near the mines. Victoria is forty miles from the mouth of Fraser's River, and the placers are over a hundred miles from the mouth of that stream. There is room, therefore, for a nearer depôt, where the miners can exchange their dust for the necessaries of life. But, in the mean time, the centre and focus of operations is Victoria.

Should the Fraser River gold mines fulfill their promise, and the Government of Great Britain display reasonable sagacity in encouraging immigration, Victoria will ere long be as large and thriving a place as San Francisco or Melbourne. Already the shore is studded with stores occupied by American goods, and owned or leased by American citizens. A newspaper, established by an American citizen, and entitled the Victoria Gazette, already serves as the mouth-piece of American opinion, in opposition to the British Government and the Hudson's Bay Company. At this rate, many months can not elapse before the stars and stripes float over the fort which is depicted in our illustration.

THE GREAT CRICKET MATCH AT HOBOKEN.

CANADA vs. THE UNITED STATES.

THE decisive match between the United States and the Canada cricketers was played at Hoboken last week. It was the fifth match between the parties. The first match played at Harlem in 1853, was won by the United States by 34 runs; the next at Toronto, in 1854, was won by the Canadians, with 10 wickets to spare; the third in 1855, at Hoboken, was won by the States, with 9 wickets to spare; and the fourth at Toronto, in August of last year, was won by the Canadians, with 7 wickets to go down. The game last week was therefore the conquerer.

The following gentlemen composed the eleven of Canada: Messrs. Hardings, Parsons, Howard, and Napier, of Toronto; Messrs. Head, H. Phillips, and T. D. Phillips and Mr. Rykert of St. Catharines; Messrs. Sneath and Peerless, of Hamilton; and Mr. Fourdinier, of Prescott.

The following gentlemen composed the United States eleven: Messrs. Higham, Sharp, Barker, and Wiley, of the New York Club; Bingham, Lang, Waller, and Harry Wright, of St. George's; Jefferson and Hallis, of Newark; and Senior, of Philadelphia.

The game began on Monday, and lasted till Wednesday evening. It may seem invidious to pick out any players for particular eulogium when such excellent play was witnessed on all sides; but all the spectators concurred in praising the bowling of Mr. Head, and the batting of Mr. Howard among the Canadians, and the admirable play of Mr. Bingham, Mr. Sharp, Mr. Senior, etc., among the United States eleven. We do not give any detailed account of the games for want of space, and also because a thorough account might not be particularly entertaining to those among our readers who are not cricketers, as the following extract from one of the newspaper reports will prove:

Howard came in and led off for a cut for 1, and a cut to slip for 3 from Barker, from whom T. Phillips cut a 4 to the slip, amidst much applause, and followed it, after some effective play, with a drive to the on for 3, from the same bowler, who revenged himself by taking the off stump: 3 wickets, 15 runs. Parsons succeeded T. Phillips—who retired with 6 to his name—when Howard made a pretty hit to leg for 4, which was repeated beautiful and cost luck for only 1 by Wiley. The next few overs came byes were made, a wide, and 1 for Parsons to the on, when he was caught from a leg swing over the shoulder by Wright at long stop: 4 wickets, 31 runs. For several overs, "steady" was the word, for the bowlers were not to be trifled with, wides and byes being made, when Howard made another splendid leg hit, which should have gone for 6, but was sent back by Bingham for only 1; cuts and drives for once, which ought to have gone for three but for the splendid fielding, and a sky-scraper from Howard for only 1 to leg—a chance which was not taken—and Hardings was singularly caught from Barker.

* * * * *

He was succeeded by Rykert, when there was a lively time between him and Sneath, Rykert stealing several byes; Sneath was at length got rid of by Senior, by a beautiful catch which took the leg stump—a lesson to first-rate cricketers, who will try to draw or cut the ball if it is hot about the thirty-second part of an inch clear of the near or off stump—7 wickets down for 66 runs. Sneath's score of 7 was made by 2s, one of them a cut to point and singles, all prettily got, one a draw to leg, the only play at that point except Senior's and Crossley's, during the match. Head succeeded, and on the first ball made a cut for 1, which robbed of the 66 runs necessary to tie the first innings of the United States eleven.

* * * * *

Waller and Barker led off to the bowling of Hardings, who, in the first over, gave two wides, Waller making a cut for 1; on the next over Waller slipped a 1, and Barker a 3, from the bowling of Head. Hardings bowled a maiden, and Waller cut for a 1 from Head, and a slip from Hardinge for 1, and 1 for an overthrow, when he was bowled, after playing very prettily for 4: 1 wicket, 9 runs. He was succeeded by Wilby and shortly after, Barker gave an easy chance to Parsons at short leg, which was taken this time, leaving 4 to his name and 12 runs for a loss of 2 wickets.

CRICKET MATCH BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES, AT HOBOKEN, AUGUST 2, 3, AND 4, 1858.

* * * * * * *

The following is the full score of the game, with an analysis of the bowling:

United States—1st Innings.		United States—2d Innings.
Sharp, c. Peerless, b. Head	24	Not out	10
Waller, c. Peerless, b. Hardinge	2		4
Hon. H. Bingham, c. Peerless, b. Hardinge	34	Hardinge	5
Senior, c. T. Phillips, b. Hardinge	9	b. Head	2
Wilby, b. Hardinge	0	b. Head	2
Barker, b. Head	0	c. Parsons, b. Head	4
H. Wright, c. T. Phillips, b. Hardinge	0	b. Hardinge	0
Higham, c. T. Phillips, b. Hardinge	5
Jefferson, c. H. Phillips, b. Parsons	14
Crossley, not out	16	Not out	1
Hallis, c. Peerless, b. Hardinge	9		0
Byes	14	Byes	2
Leg byes	6	Leg byes	1
Wides	14	Wides	5
Total	147	Total	36

Canada—1st Innings.		Canada—2d Innings.
H. Phillips, b. Hallis	1	b. Senior	17
Rykert, b. Hallis	4	Run out	11
T. Phillips, b. Barker	6	b. Hallis	6
Heward, not out	31	b. Hallis	5
Parsons, c. H. Wright, b. Hallis	1	b. Hallis	1
Hardinge, c. Crossley, b. Barker	5	b. Hallis	12
Head, c. Higham, b. Crossley	10	Not out	11
Peerless, b. Hallis	0	Run out	4
Sneath, b. Barker	7	b. Senior	7
Napier, b. Barker	0	c. Sharp, b. Hallis	0
Fourdinier, b. Barker	0	b. Barker	0
Byes	8	Byes	18
Leg byes	4	Leg byes	3
Wides	9	Wides	6
Total	81	Total	101

ANALYSIS OF THE GAME.

	Balls.	Runs.	Maidens.	Wickets.	Wides.
Canada—First Innings.
Hallis	158	24	24	4	6
Barker	117	27	16	5	1
Crossley	38	12	5	1	2
Second Innings.
Barker	89	23	9	1	3
Hallis	130	29	15	5	1
Senior	57	17	4	2	1
Crossley	9	5	0	0	1
United States—First Innings.
Head	88	16	9	2	8
Parsons	68	32	5	1	0
Napier	12	9	1	0	0
Peerless	8	4	0	0	0
Hardinge	171	62	12	7	6
Second Innings.
Hardinge	58	17	5	3	2
Head	57	11	7	3	3

We believe there is no foundation for the report that there was not an American among the players. There was, we are told, at least one.

LITERARY.

Probably very many persons, in common with ourselves, have felt the want of a well-arranged compendium of mensuration to which they can refer for daily information. Old rules do not stay in the minds of men who attend to other business than the art of figures, and it is rather hard work sometimes to keep up with the meaning of writers who talk about metres and miles, grammes and grains, ankers and stoops, digits, cubits, palms, and spans, as if it were expected of every reader that he should know the measures of every nation in the ancient and modern world.

Haswell's Mensuration, now published by Harper & Brothers, fills the want precisely, not alone of mechanicians, engineers, carpenters, and builders, but of the ordinary book-reader, and of every man who has a house or a farm.

It is not necessary to call the attention of teachers to this excellent book, since it seems to be rather a matter of necessity that they should adopt it at once. It is well arranged, clear, and intelligible to teacher as well as scholar. It covers the whole ground, meets every requirement, and leaves nothing to be desired as a text-book for students. But we would direct the notice of all practical mechanics to it as a complete and thorough work, in a cheap form, and precisely suited to their purposes, whether they desire to measure the contents of a cask, the amount of brick necessary for a house, the portion of a tract of land necessary to fill a ten-acre purchase, or any other problem in the science of mensuration.

Biographical sketches possess an interest which is precisely in proportion to the force of character of the subject. The life of a dull or stupid commonplace man or woman is a dull, stupid book. We have too many such. But the biography of a man like Joseph Curtis, by Miss Sedgwick, published by Harper & Brothers, is worth reading and worth thinking of.

It is brief, as it should be. It is appreciative, as it must be from such a pen, and eminently instructive and valuable. Mr. Curtis was a man of mark. In this city he was known as the firm friend of the right, the upholder of truth, the defender of Christianity and the Bible, the honest, fearless man. To see him in his daily walks was comfortable. It did one good to know that such men lived. It was encouraging to see a breadth of character, a determination and force of will like his. He knew his duty, and he did it. The cause of common school education in this city had reason to know his ability, and it is only to be regretted that the times are not now in common schools as they were when such men as George T. Trimble, Joseph Curtis, and Samuel F. Mott, and others like them, had the management.

Such was the man, and such is the little book, which will be valued by every one who reads it as the preservation of the portrait of a model man.

We have another biography on our table, which possesses peculiar interest. It is not published, but is privately circulated, and we may mention it as one of the productions of the day. The title is suggestive of the contents: Correspondence with my Son, Henry Kirk White Muse, by his Father.

Mr. Muse, the father, is a distinguished member of the Louisiana bar. His son, a young man of noble promise, was a student in college at Princeton. The separation of father and son led to the correspondence which is here collected, which consists of most admirable letters on both sides, and which was abruptly terminated by the death of the son, caused by the explosion of a steamer on the Mississippi last winter, upon which he was returning to college after a visit at home. No one can read the pages without emotion. It is not often that a record of so much love and so much tenderness, combining the instructions of a wise father and the respectful affection of a manly and yet a docile son, falls into the hands of the book reader. Such treasures usually remain in manuscript, hoarded in old trunks or letter-cases, to be read and re-read till years and tears discolor the paper, and render illegible the words of love. We can not but thank the father who has in this instance preserved them for others to know what a boy he has lost; and though in reading them we feel as if we had stepped within a charmed circle and violated its sanctity, we can only retire from it leaving our words of sympathy and of admiration to be, if possible, a consolation to the keepers of his memory.

Harper & Brothers furnish the juvenile portion of the community with another of those capital pictorial histories, by Jacob Abbott, in which the younger people take so much delight. The Life of Richard III. is the story of one of the most cruel monarchs that the throne of England or any other throne has ever supported. The period which his life covers is one of the most interesting portions of English history to the young mind, when the power of the great Barons was finally broken, and Warwick perished before the Duke who was to be King. The history of Richard's cruel love of Anne, the story of the murder of Clarence, the fate of the young princes whose miserable death has always been the subject of sympathy with the young as well as the old, and the tragic account of the Battle of Bosworth—all these make up a most exciting and instructive book, which will amuse while it improves many a young mind.

Rev. John Caird, of Glasgow, is one of the most popular preachers in Scotland. A volume of his Sermons, published by Carter & Brothers, is a treasure of good reading, and sound as well as sounding doctrine. There is a new grandeur in the old truth when one hears or reads it from those hearty Scotchmen who preach it as God's truth, boldly, sonorously, faithfully. "Preach," says he, "the preciousness of time by your husbanding of its rapid hours, and your crowding of its days with duties. Though eternity, with its fast approaching realities, be a forbidden topic to the ear, constrain the unwilling mind to think of it by the spectacle of a life ordered with perpetual reference to hopes and destinies beyond the grave. Though no warning against an unspiritual, no exhortation to a holy life might be tolerated, let your own pure, earnest, unworldly character and bearing be to the careless soul a perpetual atmosphere of spirituality haunting and hovering around it."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The reader will find on first page an account of the success of this wonderful enterprise. We make room here for several extracts from Mr. Field's diary:

FIRST AND SECOND DAYS.

Thursday, July 29.—Lat. 52.50 N., lon. 32.27 W., telegraph fleet all in sight; sea smooth; light wind from S.E. to S.S.E.; cloudy. Splice made in the cable at 1 P.M.; signals through the whole length of the cable on board both ships perfect; depth of water fifteen hundred and fifty fathoms.

Distance to the entrance of Valentia Harbor eight hundred and thirteen nautical miles, and from there to the Telegraph House the shore end of the cable is laid.

Distance to the entrance of Trinity Bay, N. F., eight hundred and twenty-two nautical miles, and from there to the Telegraph House, at the head of Bay of Bull's Arm, sixty miles, making in all eight hundred and eighty-two nautical miles.

The Niagara has sixty-nine miles further to run than the Agamemnon.

The Niagara and Agamemnon have each eleven hundred nautical miles of cable on board; about the same quantity as last year.

At 7:45 P.M., ship's time, or 10:5 P.M., Greenwich time, signals from the Agamemnon ceased, and the tests applied by the electricians showed that there was a want of continuity on the cable, but that the insulation was perfect. Kept on paying out from the Niagara very slowly, and was constantly applying all kinds of electrical tests until 6 P.M., ship's time, and 11:30 P.M., Greenwich time, when we again commenced receiving perfect signals from the Agamemnon.

Friday, July 30.—Lat. 51.50 N., lon. 34.40 W. Distance run by observation in the last twenty-three hours, eighty-nine miles. Payed out one hundred and thirty-one miles nine hundred fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of forty-two miles nine hundred fathoms over the distance run by observation—equal to forty-eight per cent. Depth of water fifteen hundred and fifty to nineteen hundred and seventy-five fathoms; wind from S.E. to S.W.; weather thick and rainy, with some sea. The Gorgon in sight.

At 3:50 A.M. finished the main deck coil and commenced paying out from the berth deck. Seven hundred and twenty-three miles from the Telegraph House at Bay of Bull's Arm, Trinity Bay.

At 2:21 P.M. received signals from on board the Agamemnon that they had payed out one hundred and fifty miles of the cable.

At 2:34 P.M. had payed out from the Niagara one hundred and fifty miles of the cable.

SECOND AND THIRD DAYS.

Saturday, July 31.—Lat. 51.5 N., lon. 38.14 W. Distance run by observation in the last twenty-four hours, one hundred and thirty-seven miles. Payed out one hundred and fifty-nine miles eight hundred and fifty-three fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of twenty-two miles eight hundred and forty-three fathoms over the distance run by observation—equal to thirteen per cent. Depth of water sixteen hundred and fifty-seven to twenty-two hundred and fifty fathoms. Wind moderate, S.W., and from 6 A.M. N.W. by N. Weather cloudy, a little rain and some sea. The Gorgon in sight.

Total amount of cable passed out two hundred and ninety-one miles seven hundred and thirty fathoms. Total distance run by observation, two hundred and twenty-six miles. Surplus cable payed out over the distance run by observation, sixty-five miles seven hundred and thirty fathoms—equal to twenty-nine per cent. Six hundred and fifty-six miles from the Telegraph House.

11:4 P.M.—Payed out from the Niagara three hundred miles of the cable.

At 2:45 P.M. received signals from the Agamemnon that they had payed out from her three hundred miles of the cable.

At 5.37 P.M. finished the coil on the berth-deck, and commenced paying out from the lower deck.

Sunday, August 1.—Lat. 50.32 N., lon. 41.55 W. Distance run by observation during the last twenty-four hours, one hundred and forty-five miles. Payed out one hundred and sixty-four miles six hundred and eighty-three fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of nineteen miles six hundred and thirty fathoms over the distance run by observation—equal to fourteen per cent. Depth of water, nineteen hundred and fifty to twenty-four hundred and twenty-four fathoms. Wind moderate and fresh from N.N.E. to N.E. Weather cloudy and misty, and heavy swell. The Gorgon in sight.

Total amount of cable payed out—four hundred and fifty-six miles, four hundred fathoms. Total amount of distance run by observation, three hundred and seventy-one miles. Total amount of surplus cable payed out over the distance run, eighty-five miles six hundred fathoms—equal to twenty-three per cent. Five hundred and eleven miles from the Telegraph House.

At 3.5 P.M. finished paying out the coil on the lower deck, and changed to the coil in the hold.

FOURTH AND FIFTH DAYS.

Monday, August 2.—Lat. 49.52 N., lon. 45.48 W. Distance run by observation in the last twenty-four hours, one hundred and fifty-four miles. Payed out, one hundred and seventy-seven miles, fifteen fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of twenty-three miles, one hundred fathoms over the distance run—equal to fifteen per cent. Depth of water, sixteen hundred to twenty-three hundred and eighty-five fathoms. Wind N.W. Weather cloudy.

The Niagara getting light, and rolling very much, it was not considered safe to carry sail to steady the ship; for in case of accident it might be necessary to stop the vessel as soon as possible.

At 7 A.M. passed and signaled the Cunard steamer from Boston to Liverpool.

Total amount of cable payed out, six hundred and thirty-three miles five hundred fathoms. Total distance run by observation, five hundred and twenty-five miles. Total surplus cable payed out over the distance run, one hundred and eight miles five hundred fathoms, or less than twenty-one per cent. Two hundred and fifty-seven miles from the Telegraph House.

At 12:58 A.M. ship's time, and 3:58 A.M. Greenwich time, imperfect insulation of the cable was detected in sending and receiving signals from the Agamemnon, which continued until 5:40 A.M. ship's time, or 8.40 A.M. Greenwich time, when all was right again. The fault was found to be in the ward-room, or in about sixty miles from the lower end, which was immediately cut out and taken out of circuit.

Tuesday, August 3.—Lat. 45.17 N., lon. 49.23. W.—Distance run by observation in the last twenty-four hours, one hundred and forty-seven miles; payed out one hundred and sixty-one miles sixty-one fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of fourteen miles six hundred and thirteen fathoms over the distance run—equal to ten per cent. Depth of water, seven hundred and forty-two to eighteen hundred and twenty-seven fathoms. Wind N.N.W. Weather very pleasant. The Gorgon in sight.

Total amount of cable payed out, seven hundred and ninety-five miles three hundred fathoms. Total distance run by observation, six hundred and seventy-two miles. Total surplus cable payed out over the distance run, one hundred and twenty-three miles three hundred fathoms—less than nineteen per cent. Two hundred and ten miles from the Telegraph House.

At 8.26 A.M. finished paying out the coil from the hold, and commenced paying out from the wardroom coil—three hundred and five miles of the cable remaining on board at noon.

At 11:15 A.M., ship's time, received a signal from on board the Agamemnon that they had payed out from her seven hundred and eighty miles of the cable. During the afternoon and evening passed several icebergs.

At 9:10 P.M., ship's time, received a signal from the Agamemnon that she was in water of two hundred fathoms.

At 10:20 P.M., ship's time, the Niagara was in water two hundred fathoms, and informed the Agamemnon of the same.

SIXTH AND SEVENTH DAYS.

Wednesday, August 4.—Lat. 48.17 N., lon. 52.43 W. Distance run by observation one hundred and forty-six miles. Payed out one hundred and fifty-four miles one hundred and sixty fathoms of the cable, or a surplus of eight miles three hundred and sixty fathoms, over the distance run—equal to six per cent. Depth of water less than two hundred fathoms. Weather beautiful and perfectly calm. The Gorgon in sight.

Total amount of cable payed out nine hundred and forty-nine miles six hundred and sixty fathoms. Total amount of surplus cable payed out over distance run, one hundred and thirty-one miles, six hundred and sixty fathoms—about sixteen per cent. Sixty-four miles to the Telegraph House.

At noon received signals from the Agamemnon that they had payed out from her nine hundred and forty miles of the cable.

Passed this morning several icebergs.

Made the land off the entrance to Trinity Bay at 8 A.M. Entered Trinity Bay at 12.30 P.M.

At 22:0 P.M., ship's time, stopped sending signals to the Agamemnon for the purpose of making a splice, and at 2:40 P.M., ship's time, commenced sending signals again to the Agamemnon. At 5 P.M. saw her Majesty's steamer Porcupine coming to us. At 7.30 P.M., Captain Otter, of the Porcupine, came on board the Niagara to pilot us to the anchorage near the Telegraph House.

Thursday August 5.—At 1:45 A.M. the Niagara anchored. Distance run since noon yesterday, sixty-four miles. Amount of cable paid out, sixty-six miles three hundred and fifty-three fathoms, being a loss of less than four per cent.

Total amount of cable paid out since the splice was made, one thousand and sixteen miles six hundred fathoms. Total amount of distance run, eight hundred and eighty-two miles. Total amount of cable payed out over distance run, one hundred and thirty-four miles and six hundred fathoms, being a surplus of about fifteen per cent.

At 2 A.M. went ashore in a small boat and informed the persons in charge of the Telegraph House—half a mile from the landing—that the telegraph fleet had arrived, and were ready to land the end of the cable.

At 2:45 A.M. received a signal from the Agamemnon that she had paid out one thousand and ten miles of the cable.

At 5:15 A.M. the telegraph cable was landed. At 6 A.M. the shore end of the cable was carried into the Telegraph House and a strong current of electricity received through the whole cable from the other side of the Atlantic. Captain Hudson then read prayers and made some remarks.

At 1 P.M. H. M. steamer Gorgon fired a royal salute of twenty-one guns, and all the day was discharging the cargo belonging to the Telegraph Company.

Friday, August 6.—Have been receiving all day strong electric signals from the Telegraph House in Valentia.

LATEST FROM TRINITY BAY.

Note.—We landed here in the woods. Until the telegraph instruments are all ready and perfectly adjusted communication can not pass between the two continents, but the electric currents are received freely. You shall have the earliest intimation when all is ready, but it may be some days before every thing is perfected. The first telegraphic message between Europe and America will be from the Queen of England to the President of the United States, and the second his reply.

Cyrus W. Field.

The special correspondent of the Herald says:

"The telegraph apparatus is nearly all up, and before the Niagara reaches New York you may expect messages from Europe.

"The electric current is perfect.

"That part of the ocean near this coast where the cable is laid is north of the Banks, and in water so deep that the icebergs can not affect it, while the water in Trinity Bay, at the head of which the station is located, and which is sixty miles from the entrance, is from one hundred and fifty to two hundred fathoms deep.

"Mr. Field has received congratulatory dispatches from the President of the United States, the Governor of Massachusetts, the Governor-General of Canada, the Governor of New Brunswick, and from all parts of the Union.

"A dispatch from Baltimore asks if it is true that the cable is laid, for they can't believe it. Yes, friends, the cable is laid.

"You can not imagine the intense anxiety and suspense on board the Niagara during the whole time the cable was being laid, for negligence in a single action for one moment might have ruined the whole enterprise.

"The telegraph operators here have named this place Cyrus Station, in honor of Mr. Cyrus W. Field. The nearest village is fifteen miles off, and the nearest house five miles distant. The backward state of things here is attributable to the want of confidence every body felt in the success of the enterprise."

SHARK-FISHING.

A party of gentlemen from Providence, Rhode Island, left on Thursday morning last to try their luck at shark-fishing down the bay. After partaking of the clams and chowder at Portsmouth Grove, and spending a few hours at that delightful spot, they took their boat, and under the direction of a gentleman of Providence famous for his skill in killing sharks, crossed over to a spot well known to him, where these voracious fishes are in the habit of congregating. After a little more than two hours the party took twenty-three sharks, the largest of which measured six feet seven inches in length, and was supposed to weigh about 150 pounds. This, as well as some of the others, required the united strength of three men to get him safe over the gunwale of the boat.

HOW A MAN'S WIFE WAS KISSED.

The Aledo Record gets off a good one in regard to a citizen of Iowa, whose wife, in his absence, while giving him a glass of water, had been kissed by a drover. When he heard of the outrage, he started at once in pursuit, found the drover after a hard day's ride, and accused him of the theft. The drover admitted the truth of the soft impeachment—said he had been a long time from home, was sorely tempted, and in an unguarded moment of frenzy purloined the kiss; but that he had not damaged the woman in the smallest particular—was very sorry—thought it was no matter to make a great ado about, and begged to be excused. The husband finally concluded that this was the right view of the matter, and agreed to settle upon the receipt of $5 for his day's ride. This being satisfactory all around, the drover handed over a $10 bill, and received $5 in change. But when the aggrieved benedict returned home and consulted his detector, he found the bill a counterfeit. He found he had suffered the indignity of having his wife kissed by a "nasty drover," passed one day in the saddle, and lost $5, and concluded that it didn't pay.

LOVE IN THE CARS.

The editor of the Harrisburg Telegraph is informed of a singular adventure which occurred on the passenger train of cars arriving at Harrisburg from the East, on Saturday evening last. In one of the cars a young gentleman was seated, apparently deeply occupied in reading a book he held in his hand until he got to Lancaster. At this place a very handsome young lady entered the cars and took a seat opposite to him. Before she had been long in the train the eyes of both met, and they recognized one another as old acquaintances when young, having been separated by their parents moving apart—those of the one to the West, and the other to Philadelphia. The two soon became enrapt in earnest conversation, fell ardently in love with one another, and by the time they arrived at Harrisburg had resolved to be united as man and wife, and travel on their journey to the lady's home together. Accordingly, they took lodgings at a hotel, sent for a minister, and were united in the bonds of connubial bliss, and taking the next train, were off on their bridal tour. The Telegraph's informant says he is acquainted with the parties, and that they both occupy high positions in society.

HIGH LIFE BELOW STAIRS.

A lady at Dubuque, boarding at the Tremont House, was the happy owner of a dress of unusual magnificence and value. It had been her wedding-robe, and had cost over $500. The lace, of which it was partly composed and decorated, was of the finest point, of the most delicate finish, and of the highest price, while the fabric of the dress itself was matchless for its elegance. Although a number of months had elapsed since her wedding the lady had never worn this beautiful dress but once, but had kept it carefully laid away in one of her trunks. On the 4th of July a servant-girl belonging to the hotel went clandestinely to this lady's room, and in her absence opened her trunks, and selected this $500 dress as the one which pleased her fancy the most. Taking it to her own room she arrayed herself therein, and proceeded to the National Garden, where she spent the entire day.

She returned at night, slipped up to the lady's room again, replaced the dress in the trunk, and skulked away again.

No discovery was made of this fact until a day or two since, when the lady opened the trunk containing the dress, having made up her mind to wear it to a wedding-party that evening. What was her horror, on taking out her beautiful dress, to find the skirt of it all bedraggled with mud, the front stained with the drippings of lager beer, the breast bearing the impress of the hands of the amorous swains with whom the girl had whirled through the mazes of the waltz, and the lace torn and soiled beyond redemption!

An examination set on foot soon brought out the facts in the case, and the ambitious maid will be brought up this afternoon to receive her punishment.

TERRIBLE FIGHT WITH A BEAR.

Mr. D. M'Phail gives the following particulars of an encounter with a bear, which took place in the township of Fullarton, on Wednesday, the 14th ult. On the morning of the day mentioned, Mr. James Foster, farmer, on lot No. 4 West Mitchell Road, heard a hog making considerable noise, and sent his son George, a lad of some fifteen years of age, to see what was the matter; when, on running to the scene of trouble, the lad saw what he supposed to be a large black dog belonging to Mr. M'Phail (on whose land the combat was being waged) tearing at the neck of a hog belonging to Mr. M'Phail; and, with the intention of releasing his pigship, threw a stick at the ruthless aggressor, when, to his consternation, a huge bear, instead of the supposed dog, relinquished his hold upon the hog and made for himself. Being totally unarmed, and no assistance within a quarter of a mile, he at once made for a small iron-wood tree, of about five inches diameter. Having got up the tree, what was his terror when he saw the huge bear pursuing him hastily up the branches of the sapling. Having recovered his breath he screamed for help, and, in order to retard the progress of his assailant, began to shake the sapling; but Bruin had clutched the branches with an iron grip, and evidently calculated upon a dainty morsel for breakfast, and continued to raise paw after paw on the branches, till he approached so near as to be almost within reach. The poor lad screamed lustily, and endeavored to break off some of the branches by kicking them down with his bare feet. In this he partially succeeded, when the bear made a vigorous stretch of her muscles and seized the lad by the foot, sinking one of her fangs under the ball of the great toe on the right foot, and slightly scratching the side of the foot with her other nipper teeth. At this juncture the shaking to and fro of the sapling, with their united weight upon it, caused it to bend over until the top nearly approached the ground, when providentially the monster lost his hold, and young Foster, bravely clinging to his grasp with unshaken nerve, was elevated by the rising of the sapling. Bruin, however, did not lose her determination to feast upon his body, and again sprang to the tree, but was evidently too much fatigued to rise on so slender a ladder.

THE TABLES TURNED ON BRUIN.

At this stage of the contest, the boy's father reached the spot, and saw the huge monster standing on her hind legs, her body extended up the tree, growling fiercely, the lad nearly exhausted, clinging to the tree, only a few feet up, with the blood streaming from his lacerated foot. On approaching to the rescue of his son the infuriated beast turned upon him; but he with a club in hand showed a bold front although out of breath with running. His eldest son now arrived from another part of the farm, when they succeeded in rescuing George from his retreat. Meanwhile several other persons arrived on the spot, and a lad was dispatched for Messrs. William and Walter Walcom, who were soon on the spot, with a dog of more than usual size and courage, which immediately seized the bear by the root of the ear, and in the struggle brought him to the ground. Bruin now got hold on the shoulder of the dog, and nipped him so tight as to make him relinquish his hold. But the courage of Bruin gave way, and she made an attempt to tree, when "Keeper" again seized her by the thigh and brought her back. She now made for a large elm, and ascended some forty-five feet, and perched in a crotch to scan her assailants. A man was then dispatched for two Nimrods, who, by a joint attack both in front and rear, brought her bearship to the ground by a well-directed fire.

PERSONAL.

The Hon. John M. Wood, M. C. for the 1st District of Maine, having sued an ex-editor of a newspaper, of which he is proprietor, for advances of money, the editor puts in, as a set-off for the claim, a bill for getting up for his (Wood's) use a letter of acceptance and a speech of acknowledgment at the time of his election to Congress. Mr. Wood repels, in strong terms, the imputation implied by the bill in offset, and says that "the charges preferred and the records made on the court files by the ingrate Carter were both concocted with the deliberate purpose of extorting black mail, or, in other words, to deter the undersigned from endeavoring to collect money advanced by him to said Carter."

Three ladies, residing in the same square, at Washington, recently presented their husbands with seven interesting responsibilities—two with twins, and the third with three children.

The Church Record, a religious weekly in Chicago, says: "During a visit to Mr. Healy, a few days since, we saw, among a number of new and attractive pictures in his studio, those of John Adams and Franklin Pierce, being the third and fourth of the series of full-length portraits of the Presidents that he is executing for the Government. As before mentioned to our readers, they are intended to be hung in the principal apartment of the White House. Mr. Healy's rooms are open to his friends every Thursday afternoon."

A correspondent of the Louisville Journal writes from Denville, Kentucky, July 27, that the body of Mr. Cooper, the Greek Professor in Centre College, was found hanging on a tree in the college grounds. "He had been very melancholy and appeared in very great distress the evening previous to his death, supposed to have been caused by the hearing of some very melancholy news from his home in Ohio. His mind was somewhat impaired for some time before his death; only a few days before he became almost wholly incompetent to hear his recitations." This is suspected to be a student's hoax by the Cincinnati Gazette.

A gentleman of Cincinnati, while riding a calico pony through the streets of Newport, Kentucky, was stopped by a woman who ran out of a house and inquired of him what was a cure for whooping cough? The gentleman mentioned some remedy that was familiar to him, and added that he was not a physician. "Oh no," said the woman, "I didn't take you for one; but I have heard that whatever a person riding such a horse as you are say is a cure is one, and my children are sick." Can any person tell us where this superstition originated, or when?

Dr. A. P. Beigler, of Rochester, who was sent to Auburn State Prison for seven years for causing the death of Amelia Murr by abortion, died in prison on Monday.

A detective officer, from Chicago, fell asleep while traveling over the Alton Railroad a few days since, and some light-fingered fellow actually stole his boots!

Chancellor Lathrop having resigned his office as head of the University at Madison, Wisconsin, the Board of Regents elected Henry Barnard, LL.D., of Hartford, Connecticut, to fill the vacancy.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

The Jew Bill passed on the 21st, and Baron Rothschild took his seat in the House of Commons amidst loud cheers. On 22d, the India bill was finally passed. The Archbishop of Canterbury expressed a hope that in future the distinctions of caste in India would cease to exist. The Earl of Derby said Government would give indiscriminate and impartial protection to all creeds and religions, but would give no material assistance to any measure for converting the natives. He thought it would be most undesirable to attempt to remove the distinctions of caste, which were so interwoven with the principles and feelings of the Hindoo.

In the House of Lords on 26th, Lord Lyndhurst called attention to the right of search question, and asked for the correspondence relative to the negotiation on the subject with the United States. Lord Malmesbury said that an arrangement calculated to put a stop to the traffic in slaves under the cover of the American flag, and at the same time to avoid all causes of misunderstanding between the two nations, was in course of preparation, and would, he believed, accomplish the desired object.

A KING IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

A London paper says: "On Friday night there was seen the unusual spectacle of a veritable negro, black as a coal, sitting in the place of honor under the gallery which is set apart for the peers of England when they come down to listen to the debates in the Commons' House. The appearance of this gentleman in such a place excited a good deal of attention, and it was generally thought to be a mistake to place him there. 'Surely,' it was said, 'the gallery for strangers was good enough for a nigger; but to place him among peers was an error.' But on inquiry being made it was found that the colored gentleman bears a higher title than the proudest peer—for he is a veritable king; and not a king clogged by constitutional forms, but as despotic in his dominions as Louis Napoleon is in France—nay, more, for he is absolute; his will is law, and the life and property of every subject are entirely at his mercy. He is King of Bonny, on the western coast of Africa; and whom he will he can set up, and whom he will he can put down. His Majesty is an old man, and somewhat paralyzed in his limbs. He was introduced into the House by our metropolitan monarch, Mr. Thwaites. He talks English well, and his sway is as benevolent as it is despotic, we understand. One of his achievements deserves record. He has put down cannibalism in his dominions, and taught his subjects to feed upon the fruits of the earth instead of devouring one another."

FAILURE OF THE "GREAT EASTERN."

The shareholders of the Eastern Steam Company have again discussed whether there are any means to raise sufficient capital to finish the Great Eastern, or whether she is to lie permanently, like the Dreadnaught, in the Thames, and ultimately, perhaps, be turned to similar use as a huge floating hospital, or be moored at Gravesend as a marine barrack or an emigrants' hotel. £220,000 must be obtained before she can start as a passenger vessel, and of this amount £95,000 consists of actual debts, for which the ship is liable, and which, under any circumstances, must be paid immediately. The recent offer on the part of the Company to grant annuities of £5 for eight years for a payment of £20, although excellent in principle, has not been responded to either by the shareholders or the public; and resolutions were accordingly adopted yesterday for the formation of a committee to devise some new plan. The directors, including Sir Joseph Paxton, who has only lately joined the concern to see what can best be done for the proprietors, have used every effort to extricate it from its difficult position: and even those who have been connected with it from the first were, doubtless, wholly misled as to the possible expenditure. It seems hard, therefore, that when so grand an experiment is ready for fulfillment it should be stopped indefinitely by the want of a sum like that now sought, and that from this cause the whole of what has already been expended may prove to have been thrown away.

HOW TO RECRUIT FOR THE BRITISH ARMY.

A gentleman who has recently returned from Australia stated the other day in public, that in Victoria alone there were no less than 20,000 male convicts, who were kept in chains and supported at an expense of about £300,000 a year to Great Britain; and he suggested that if those 20,000 persons were formed into twenty regiments of 1000 strong, and conveyed to India, they would be a valuable auxiliary to the forces there, and would likely fight the insurgents like "bull dogs."

MR. THACKERAY'S TROUBLES.

Mr. Thackeray has got into a squabble with another literary man. The correspondent of the Times thus tells the story: "Mr. Yates and Mr. Thackeray are fellow-members of the 'Garrick Club,' to which the better class of London Bohemians mainly resort; but they had, I believe, no particular personal relations of any sort. Mr. Yates being thus familiarized with the person and external ways of Mr. Thackeray, availed himself of the columns of a small weekly newspaper, hight the Town Talk, to publish therein what the Saturday Review calls a 'photograph' of the illustrious novelist. I inclose you a copy of the journal, and you will agree with me that the picture is by no means an agreeable one. It is, in fact, just such a picture as no wise man would willfully bring under the inspection of any 'friend' subject to the natural infirmities of human feeling—for it is a caricature with resemblance. But Mr. Thackeray forgot the wisdom of his own social lessons in the wrath of the moment, and wrote Mr. Yates a rather fierce and intemperate letter, demanding an apology. Mr. Yates replied, acknowledging that he regretted giving offense to Mr. Thackeray, but that he could not possibly 'retract or apologize' in the face of a letter such as he had just received. Thereupon Mr. Thackeray carried the case before the Committee of the Garrick Club, where it was taken up warmly by Mr. Dickens (I regret to say) in antagonism to Mr. Thackeray, vehemently discussed, and finally decided by a vote requesting Mr. Yates's resignation. Of course, the natural consequence of all this is, that every body has now read what scarcely any body had else ever seen."

A LOVE TRAGEDY.

A family in Belgravia (says the Court Circular) has been plunged into great grief from melancholy and most singular circumstances. When Sir Colin Campbell left England many brave and manly hearts accompanied him, among whom was the eldest son of a reverend prelate high in the Church. This young gentleman left a lady behind him to whom he was passionately attached and had promised to marry. Her fortune being small, the clerical dignitary threatened to disinherit his son if he did; and to alienate his affections from the party in question he was sent to India. His father charged him at his departure never to think of her more if he wished to be remembered by him. The lover got safe to his destination, but his heart beat with undiminished affection. He could not avoid communicating his constancy, and wrote to his beloved, assuring her that no threats or anger of his unfeeling parent should ever banish the tender recollection of their reciprocal passion. Having occasion at the same time to write to his father for additional supplies, he demanded them on the ground that he had renounced his mistress forever. By a most unfortunate accident the two letters came to England misdirected—the one intended for the parent falling into the hands of the lady, and that intended for the lady into those of the parent. The latter, on receipt of his epistle, sent back such an indignant answer as fully awakened the son to the consequences of the fatal mistake he had made in the direction of the letters. Fully alive to the finest sensibilities, and not able to combat a feeling of shame for the unintentional error he had committed, he shot himself.

FRANCE.

THE EMPRESS REWARDS THE HEROINE OF DJIDDA.

On the arrival of the accounts from the coast of Araby describing how that gallant girl Mademoiselle Eveillard, after the massacre of her father, the French consul, and her mother, whom she valiantly defended, killing a fanatic and fighting her way to the Cyclops, the Empress Eugenie at once declared she would act as a mother to her, and provide her with a suitable marriage portion. The maid of Djidda will now take rank with Judith of Bethulia, Celia of the Tiber, and the maids of Saragossa and of Orleans.

AMPHIBIOUS SOLDIERS.

The Paris papers say that several regiments of the Guard were exercised on Saturday morning, the 17th, in the Champ de Mars, under the command of General Melinet. During the manœuvres 200 of the 2d Regiment of Grenadiers were ordered to swim across the Seine just below the Point d'Iena, and to discharge their muskets, as they did so, at an enemy supposed to be on the opposite bank. This movement was well-executed, and without any accident.

ANOTHER FLYING MACHINE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Herald says: "The Emperor has just made a present of 5000 francs to a private in the line, who asserts he has discovered a solution for the great problem in aeronautics—the art of flying. He has invented a kind of air ship, consisting of a platform of silk stretched over whalebone, to be propelled by two gigantic wings of the same material, placed on each side. The aerial navigator is to be suspended at a distance of about four feet from the platform, while his feet rest on pedals, by means of which the wings are set in motion, while his arms rest on a lever which imparts to the platform the direction he chooses to give it. Only a model of this machine has yet been constructed, and it appears to work well. Thanks to the Emperor's munificence, it is now about to be constructed on a large scale."

AN EXTRAORDINARY OLD MISER.

The Courier de Paris contains the following: "A remarkable instance of the mania for hoarding up money has just been brought to light in the Faubourg St. Germain during the process of taking an inventory after the decease of an old woman, who for many years had lived in a very retired manner in that part of Paris. When the notary, who was engaged in this operation, went down into the cellar to take an account of what the place contained, his attention was attracted to a small opening just over a low door. This door was opened, and the notary found himself in presence of an immense pile of bags of money. In order to take them out and count their contents, he was obliged to send for nearly all the clerks of his office. There were in the bags a quantity of gold and foreign coins, but five-franc pieces formed the principal part of this rich store. Some of the bags were completely rotten, and fell to pieces on being touched. The inventory is not yet completed, but the amount of this treasure is estimated at not less than a million. The origin of this immense fortune is as follows: About ninety years ago a poor Savoyard boy from Chamouni came to Paris, and engaged himself in singing and dancing in the streets, and at other times in sweeping chimneys. At the end of a few years he had saved up a little money, and commenced business on his own account. By dint of industry and economy he at length became a wealthy man, married, and at his death left his widow 80,000 francs a year. She scarcely spent 6000 francs a year, and the remainder she put in bags, and threw through the above-mentioned opening into the sort of cupboard in the cellar, where these thousands of francs remained until she died, at the age of eighty-eight. She had besides purchased several houses, and was the owner of the Théâtre du Luxembourg. By her will she has left 200,000 francs to the hospices of the city of Paris, 300,000 francs to other charitable establishments, 20,000 francs to her servant, and some legacies to distant relatives of her husband, who still live in Savoy. Her notary and avoué are instituted her universal legatees."

DEATH IN BALL-DRESS.

The correspondent of the Picayune tells the following story: "At this season one hears almost every day of the house-warming of a villa in some neighboring village, as the entrance into possession of a rural residence furnishes one of the best pretexts possible for giving a party. A brilliant festival of this sort was given three days ago on the Fontainebleau railway; and as it was rather more formal than most of the entertainments given at this season of the year, the ladies were all in full dress. Among the guests was a brilliant young wife from Normandy. At two o'clock in the morning she quitted the rural lodge to return to Paris, and as she wore one of the steel cages and the number of petticoats now fashionable, she occupied the carriage alone, there was not room in it for another, and her husband followed in a brougham. At three o'clock in the morning they reached Paris; her husband got out of the brougham and opened the carriage door, calling her: "Pauline! Pauline! here we are at home!" There was no answer. He called again and louder than before, and he shook her by the shoulder. It was cold, strangely cold. "Are you unwell, dear? What is the matter? Speak!" He could gain no reply. Taking down one of the carriage lamps, he entered the carriage and found his wife dead! She had been suffering from an affection of the heart, but the doctors said it was cured; and now coming from a ball, in gay ball attire, with flowers on her head and rouge on her cheeks, death had come all unawares, before she could speak, while she lay dreaming of balls and all the follies of the world. Never does death seem more hideous than when it surprises its victim arrayed to play a part in the frivolous amusements of the hour!"

ANOTHER BALLOON ACCIDENT.

M. Godard, the aeronaut, and his two sons, made a double ascent on the 19th at Amiens. The sons went up together in a new balloon, and being favored with a fine breeze proceeded rapidly in a northerly direction. The one in which M. Godard, Sen., ascended was found to be defective, even while it was being filled, but he, nevertheless, persisted in ascending. He rose to a considerable height, when, from the escape of gas, the balloon was seen to descend with great velocity, amidst cries of alarm from the crowd. Fortunately, the covering of the balloon suddenly flew out, and formed a kind of parachute, and the aeronaut came on the terrace of a house without sustaining more injury than some slight scratches on the forehead and face.

GERMANY.

A JUSTIFIABLE ROBBERY.

At one of the gaming establishments in Germany, Baron de K—— had lost large sums at play, when one morning, on opening his secretary, he found that a sum of 40,000 florins had been abstracted from it, and what made the matter worse was that the thief was an old servant, named Fritz, who, from his long services, was treated as one of the family. The man had disappeared. Some time had elapsed after the discovery, and the young Baron had begun to be somewhat reconciled to the loss, when he one day met the servant walking along composedly in the street. "You rascal!" exclaimed the Baron, going up to the offender; but a knowing smile from Fritz somewhat surprised him. Questions and explanations followed, and the result was the delivery to the Baron of a receipt for the 40,000 florins from his own father, who, Fritz thought, would be a safer banker for his son than the proprietor of the gambling-house.

A STRAY DIAMOND WORTH A MILLION AND A HALF.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says: "During the last few days, a great diamond, the property of some strangers at Laibach, in Carniola, has been much talked of here. The travelers asked 3,000,000 florins ($1,500,000) for their jewel; but the police must have heard something to their disadvantage, as it has had them arrested and brought to this city. The nationality of the possessor of the stone is not known to me, but his two traveling companions are from France."

ITALY.

ESCAPE FROM THE POPE'S DUNGEON.

A feat à la Benvenuto Cellini, not to say à la Jack Sheppard, has just been performed by a French jeweler and watchmaker, likewise the proprietor of a large mosaic manufactory, long established in Rome, who was arrested by the French authorities on the evening of the festival of St. Peter, charged with having created a disturbance at the Porta del Popolo, insisting on driving in at that gate just before the girandola, and abusing and threatening the French soldiers stationed there. On account of the quarreling and conflicts which just then prevailed between French and Romans, the French general's orders were extremely stringent for the punishment of any such offenders, whether military or civilians, and the jeweler was consequently taken off to the Castle of St. Angelo to be tried by court-martial, a trial which it was generally inferred could not end without a condemnation to prison for a longer or shorter period. Meanwhile the prisoner's wife made every exertion in his behalf, and was upon the point of succeeding, it is said, in softening the severity of the general-in-chief, when the prisoner himself, disgusted with the monotony of Hadrian's Mole, or apprehensive of the result of the court-martial, or fearful that political accusations of anterior date might be reproduced against him to aggravate the case, thought proper to abscond from the safe custody of the French, by raising a part of the floor of his room, dropping into a corridor below, and passing down the winding stairs and out at the castle gate without being challenged by any of the sentries; from which fact it is inferred that he was provided with a military uniform to disarm any suspicion at his appearance. The French general is extremely angry at his escape. He has had all the sentries placed in arrest, and gens d'armes have been busily occupied in searching for the fugitive, whose own premises have been minutely but fruitlessly ransacked.

SWEDEN.

ROMANTIC FATE OF A LIBELER.

It was mentioned some time since that M. Lindalh, editor of the Faedernesandel, of Stockholm, had been condemned to be beheaded for having accused a young lady of that city of a horrible crime (the nature of which, however, was not stated). On the 2d of July, which was the day fixed for his execution, he said to his friends who were with him in the prison, "I am about to suffer a death which I have merited, and you will at least see that I die with courage." He then took some papers from a table and gave them into the care of the chaplain. One letter, sealed with black, was in a Bible; he took it out, and placed it in his bosom. "You will take this letter," he said, "after my death, and deliver it to the person to whom it is addressed. Now, gentlemen, let us go." "Very well, Sir," replied the director of the prison, "unless you apply for pardon to Mademoiselle Mendelsohn, who has the power to grant it and spare your life." "Proceed, gentlemen," said Lindalh, and at the same time taking the arm of the chaplain, with whom he conversed in a low tone, he descended the stair-case of the prison, and with a firm step crossed the court-yard which led to the platform where the scaffold had been erected, and where the block and the executioner with his axe were in readiness. Twelve persons, as required by the law, were present as witnesses. Lindalh stopped at the foot of the steps leading up to the scaffold, when his hands were tied behind him and his eyes bandaged. He then said, "Farewell, gentlemen; to those who have seen my life be careful to relate my death and my repentance," and began to ascend the steps. In a moment he felt his hands released and the bandage removed from his eyes; and, turning round, saw that it had been done by Mademoiselle Mendelsohn. "M. Lindalh," she said, "I pardon you!" He threw himself at her feet, and taking the letter from his bosom gave it to her, saying, "I accept your pardon, for my last thought was to implore it from your kindness; I felt sure that you would at least give it at my tomb."

NEW DANGERS FROM HOOPS.

The medical attendant of the Princess of Gothland asserts that crinoline is the reason that accouchements have lately become so dangerous and difficult. He adds, that this fashion is the source of a vast number of chills, the consequences of which are always almost mortal. If this gentleman is to be credited, crinoline has as many deaths to answer for in Sweden as the cholera.

RUSSIA.

PROGRESS OF THE EMANCIPATION SCHEME.

The Emperor has arrived at St. Petersburg from his visit to Archangel. The Central Committee for the Emancipation of the Serfs has drawn up regulations for the organization and administration of the rural communes, and for fixing the relations between the nobles and the serfs. This was done by the direction of the Government, and the Central Committee confided the task to a certain number of its body. The organization recommended is of such a nature that, if adopted, it would render the emancipation of the serfs perfectly illusory, and would therefore produce consequences of the greatest gravity. For example, it is enacted that each seigniorial estate shall form a commune, and that the noble owner shall be the chief of it. Each commune is to have an administration. One of its duties will be to divide the lands awarded by the noble, to impose taxes, and to decide on the admission of new, or the departure of old members of the commune. But no admission can be made, and no permission whatever to leave be granted, except with the express consent of the noble; and most of its decisions are not to be valid unless confirmed by him. In cases of insolence, disorder, or drunkenness, the noble can, of his own sole authority, inflict punishment not exceeding ten blows from a rod or three days' imprisonment. The chief of the commune can, in his absence, transfer all his powers to his steward. The project seems intended to fulfill a threat which many of the nobles make, and that is, to cause the situation of the serf to be not only no better, but even worse than before the emancipation.

INTENSE SPECULATION AT ST. PETERSBURG.

From the following extract of a letter from St. Petersburg, in the Nord, it appears that a speculating mania prevails in that city: "In passing the other day before a house in the Great Morskaia, I perceived numerous carriages stationed before the door, and up and down the street, with bodies of police, gens d'armes on horseback, and all the other indications of a numerous meeting. On inquiry I learned that the assemblage was caused by the putting up for sale of the shares of a new company of insurance against fire. The sale had been announced for two o'clock—it was then not quite ten—and yet while I was waiting it was announced that all the shares, 9000 in number, had been disposed of. Presently men rushed from the house in disorder, some of them with their clothes torn; and one of them told me that a great many had bribed the porter of the house, paying for permission to sleep on the stair-case, in order to be the first to reach the office in the morning. In addition to this, promises of shares were sold in the street at a premium of 20 and 25 per cent."

CROATIA.

MORE MOSLEM OUTRAGES ON CHRISTIANS.

A letter from Szisreck (Croatia), on the frontiers of Bosnia, of July 11, says: "We are most anxiously expecting the Archduke Leopold, who is now inspecting the fortifications of Agram, and whose presence is very necessary to the taking of measures for placing all this country in a state of security. Within the last two days upward of six thousand Christian rayahs from Bosnia have taken refuge on the Austrian territory, flying from the Turks, who commit all sorts of violence and excesses. These unfortunate people state that between the 20th and 28th of June more than one hundred and eighty young Christian girls were carried off by Turkish soldiers, and that after this outrage the fanatics devastated churches and pillaged houses. The Christians, who were some time since disarmed by Omar Pacha, defended themselves as they best could with plowshares, scythes, and pitchforks, and for a time they made a good face against their assailants, but on July 8, they were completely defeated and put to flight, with their women and children. Our authorities received them kindly, and distributed provisions among them.

TURKEY.

HOW THE PORTE PROPOSES TO COMPENSATE THE CHRISTIAN VICTIMS.

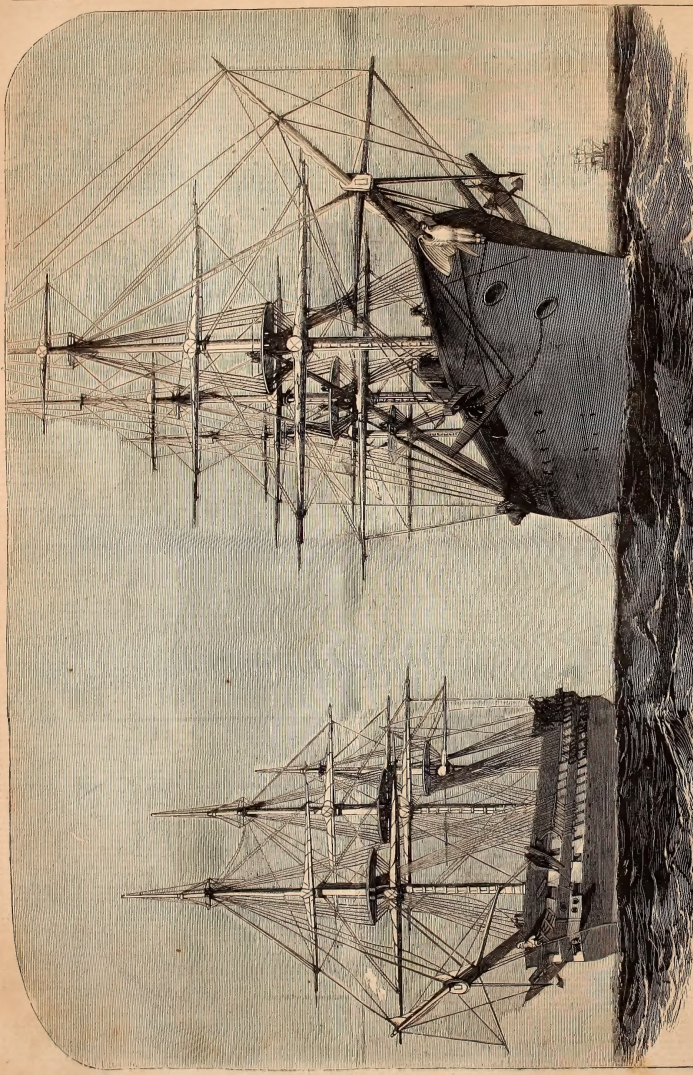
"It is related in diplomatic circles," says the Journal du Havre, "that Fuad Pacha has informed Count Walewski and Lord Cowley that the Porte is ready to pay Mademoiselle Eveillard, by way of indemnity, a sum of 150,000 francs, and a similar sum to the family of Mr. Page, the English vice-consul."

FANATICISM IN CANDIA.

A letter from Canea, in Candia, gives the following details of the late events in that town, mentioned by telegraph: "On the evening of the 2d, a Mussulman shopkeeper was murdered in his shop by a Greek, assisted, it is said, by two accomplices. The Greek was immediately arrested, brought to trial before the council, and, as he confessed his guilt, condemned to death. A capital judgment requires the consent of the chief of the Turkish religion, and the Mollah gave it, but in the regular form, that is, with the proviso that the judgment should not be executed until after an appeal to Constantinople. When the murder of the Mussulman by the Greek became known, great agitation was caused among the Mussulman population. A crowd assembled in front of the shop of the victim, and uttered menaces of death against all Christians, and bands paraded the streets crying out for vengeance. They accordingly proceeded, carrying the body with them, to the place of meeting of the council, and clamorously demanded that the assassin should be delivered up. An extraordinary scene then took place in the council. Vely Pacha refused to sign the necessary order; Bedran Pacha, formerly a Kurdish chief, said he would sooner see his three sons die before him than consent to such a piece of cowardice; and Remzy Effendi also refused to sign. All at once reports of musketry were heard in front of the house; the people were firing, not on the troops, who were drawn up in the rear, but in the air. Ahmet Pacha jumped up angrily, and cried to Vely Pacha, 'Pacha, see the result of your disobedience to my orders—sign, then, I tell you!' 'You may do what you will,' answered Vely Pacha, 'but I will not sign!' 'Well, then, I care not for your signature,' cried Ahmet, in a great rage; 'let the Greek be given up, let him be strangled, and let him be dragged to the market-place!' No sooner were these words uttered than Ahmet's servants, together with a number of the populace, rushed to the prison—they had no cord, and an officer of the Imperial navy, specially attached to Ahmet, cut off a cord which was round a trunk, and gave it them. The prison doors were then broken open, and in a few moments the unfortunate Greek was strangled. The dead body, with the chains in which the man had been bound still attached to it, was then for the long space of two hours dragged about the streets of the town, by a furious and horrible crowd, shouting and yelling. This crowd in its progress stopped before the European consulates, and shouted, 'Hurrah! Let us show to these dogs that we also can obtain what we demand!' The stay before the French consulate having been rather long, Chefik Effendi, one of the members of the council, cried, 'Go on! Drag along the dog!' and the horrible cortége continued its course."

INDIA.

SUFFERINGS OF THE TROOPS FROM HEAT.



The India dates are of Calcutta to June 19. Oude was still very unsettled. The heat was terrific, and the British troops had suffered greatly. The sun has been more deadly than the enemy. The troops are being housed until the fierce heat is over. The season is the hottest known for twenty-five years.

CHINA.

CAPTURE OF THE PEI-HO FORTS.

Advices from China are to the 1st of June, and contain full accounts of the capture of the forts in the Pei-ho.

Negotiations having failed, the Chinese were attacked on the 19th of May by the English and French, and the forts captured with much loss. The Chinese fought well. Ninety-eight guns were captured. The loss of the enemy is supposed to be very heavy.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH EXPEDITION—THE "AGAMEMNON" AND "NIAGARA" LAYING THE CABLE IN MID OCEAN.—[SEE FIRST PAGE.]

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH EXPEDITION—THE "NIAGARA" AND THE "AGAMEMNON" IN THE GALE.—[See First Page.]

PET WORMS.

THAT is a funny name for a story, isn't it? Can you interest some pets? Well, I suppose not; but I actually knew two little girls who were enthusiastic fond of some worms which they cherished and fed, and kept in wooden boxes, with great care.

I don't think myself it was very natural to fall in love with worms; but these little friends of mine chose to have something different from common pets; and so they decided on worms, as being very unique.

I never heard that these eloquatens returned the care and pains bestowed upon them with the least affection or gratitude; but they adopted not a whit the devotion of their little mistresses.

The children lived opposite each other; and early in the morning, if sometimes heard the one calling across the road, and then the two voices, melodiously, talked in sympathetic confidence.

"Orly think, Edith! Ella Clark told Mary Fay that she thought we were the silliest girls she ever knew to be so fond of two filthy worms!"

"Ella has never kept one, and so, of course, she knows nothing about the pleasure we feel, dearie! Besides, they are not dirty—they are perfectly clean. Oh, see mine! It is crawling round the edge of the box. Perhaps it is going down to the battlement castle."

"Yes, I guess so. And just see mine; it wants to come too. Will you let it walk on the edge of your box?"

"Oh, yes, certainly; they will be happier playing together. Jenny, suppose we name our worms?"

"Well (gratefully), suppose we do! I will call mine Wriggle."

"And mine shall be named Cruelty."

"Oh! what nice, appropriate names!"

Then, you see, Edith and Jenny really enjoyed their pets with all the earnestness of their natures.

Now it is always the case where you love and receive as much love and affection as you can, gradually dies away; so the ardor of their feeling began to diminish when, after several days of tender care, they found that Messrs. Wriggle and Cruely showed no signs of attachment, but, on the contrary, lay more languidly than ever in the sand on the bottom of their boxes.

It was at this stage of affairs that, one morning, I overheard another conversation between the two little friends.

"Jenny dear, don't you admire canary birds and parrots, and such things?"

"Oh, yes, dear Edith! They always get to tame and affectionate when you take good care of them."

A pause.

"Jenny, do you love your worm as you once did?"

"I am afraid I don't, Edith. Do you?"

"No, I declare not."

Another pause.

"Will you throw yours away if I'll throw mine away?"

"Why—no. Edith—I would rather not throw it away; because we have all our time and care will have been thrown away too."

"Well, then, what shall we do? Keep them, and try to love them again?"

"Yes—no—I have thought of a plan, Edith. Let us set our worms to bring us each a bird in a cage. They have been how faithful we have been to our worms, and will be very willing, I am sure, to trust us with the care of more valuable creatures; then our labor will have been for a use."

"How, Jenny? I don't see."

"Don't you? Why, just as the farmer cares for and fattens the pigs and his ducks to feed his little children, just so we will have a fattened worm to feed our birds."

Edith was charmed, and they both ran to their papas, who were talking together at the gate, to beg of them this favor. The result was their bringing out, at night, to each little daughter, a beautiful wire cage, containing, one, a fine mocking-bird, and the other, a pretty German lark.

The children thought these were pets worth having; and the birds, they believed they had found first-rate quarters, when, early next morning, they were each presented with a fine collected worm, which neither lost any time in devouring, and stood upon their perches with wide, expectant eyes, waiting for more.

DOWN AT THE GRANGE.

CHAPTER I.

WHEN I first came to Woodside, I came as curate, for the incumbent was near ninety years of age, and very infirm. I had a large population and a year, and the little cottage that is now in ruins close by the old church, to live in, and never dreamed to have done better. That would have been enough and to spare, indeed—without my good wife here and the four little children of course, who then were not in the question—for the place is not a dear one as to living. The Brent, which you have seen, runs by our door, supplied me well with trout, and I was my own fishmonger. A knife and fork, too, were always laid for me at the Squire's board; and on Sundays, without exception, I was there to tea then. No more bluff country magnate was Mr. Markham!

A test of the gentle-man and of the
A eater of huge mutton and of pine,
And pamphleteer on guano and on grain.

Or rather, he had all the qualities of such a man, and more besides: a good scholar, an elegant musician, and a gentleman, as I discovered at the first glance of my library. Latin and Greek the classics and knew the literature of his own land also at least as well; she played on flute and violin divinely; and who, when lords and bishops and county families rayed round his table, remembered not the low—a virtue very rare in humble imitators of Woodlouse. Of his real worth and goodness I need not say more. I have him by my right hand, his kindly heart, as dear even to speak of, being one proof of them, not stronger than I could give of hundreds of others, nor indeed intimated, although it affects myself. The Sunday after poor Mr. Melville died, he preached from the desk, as usual, at the Grange; and, as was natural, our talk fell, after dinner, upon his loss and on the future vicar.

"I have appointed one in my own mind," said Mr. Markham, "and if he chooses to accept the living—as there is no reason whatever for delaying—he will read himself in within the month or so. He is a young cavalier, as he pretends to be, and is well liked by them."

"I fear, then, he will yet want a curate since the parish is so small?"

"No; I fear not, Crawley. We shall be sorry to lose you, although we see as little of each other; but I will have you in my eye to sure, at least, for a time, to whom you can make some how more than they do in mine." And so we parted company for that time with a hearty handshake.

Ah, what a wife that Mrs. Markham was! a fair Hilda—sweet, gentle, and loving—and she doted o'er with gold, and wearing her thirty summers like a flower. She, with her pleasant smile, was the first person to tell me of the wealth was up that I myself was the new vicar of Woodlouse. Her husband delighted to have me to tea; but it was she who was sure to send for me when there was any thing to be done. I can not sure that the greatest gift of all to thank them for; and they were the first friends as spouses of my own heart. Ahout two years after I had been installed as vicar, I began to observe a great strangeness in Mrs. Markham. She was absent, and, with it, was abstracted—especially if by her husband—wastes visibly, and took no part in her pleasant ways. You, Squire did not see this; she had always a smile in great hion with, however she might look to others. And would not have noticed it myself, but that was regarding her, with a concentration of affection I has gone unnoticed by the rest of the family. One thing was this: the Squire's fortune being very large, his wife had a most liberal allowance, and kept quite a little establishment of her own. For this, therefore, besides those that were in common with his, were extensive. Every person employed there, and even that which I was justified in giving, I had been accustomed to apply to her as readily as to him. Let now for more than fortnight—and then all together ceased. She parted, under some frivolous pretense, with her carriage and horses, for a time being rather fastidious and choice in her attire, she chose to dress with great simplicity, and almost all the gold from about her person disappeared also. One night she was singing with us in the hall, as usual, a song of Schubert's, and in the midst of it sang a hundred times before, when her voice suddenly trembled, as though her heart was breaking, and she burst into a fit of tears. I was one of those exquisite maladies of Burns upon the domestic affections, and Mrs. Markham was deeply affected the afterward of that excessive fondness of his wife's for him who, he saw, he mistook a stone from the north to spend some time with them—a quiet elderly lady, very excellent, but not at any time fitted as her brother was to succeed her. We two struck up an acquaintance very soon, and the Squire was wont to make frequent allusions to it, of which would have been embarrassing from any lady else. She soon filled up, in some measure, that position Lady Bonsfield let vacant by which Mrs. Markham had abdicated—although I confess I sometimes called the guardianship in question—and if I were not thoroughly convinced of the badness of her late husband, that she was regretting his loss."

I had never heard until that moment of Mrs. Markham having lost ever a widow, and I expressed my surprise strongly.

"Indeed" said my companion. "I had made certain that they had intruded you with that revelation; but since you are aware of such as you, may now just as well know all."

CHAPTER II.

MRS. MARSHAM, whom, you remember, even at this time, charming and almost perfect as she appears, to be extraordinarily sensitive and unessential affections, had married Jane Raby, principal to the last degree. She eloped at school, at the age of seventeen, with an adventurer named Heathcote, who was not even worth myself, but I have been told that he was a most entertaining companion, gifted with some attractive personal and talents. After living together a short time in great unhappiness, as far as Jane was concerned, he deserted her, and never came back to her cruelties. He did not appear again for years. He must have wanted the money, however, for he contracted the horror and absolute loathing which she entertained for him. I do not know that she did so, and would that wonderful as for her own. He has openly boasted that 'he had not married a millionaire to be starving,' but for her money—if not at the moment which secured to her her property, the very day on which she became of age, brought him to her side again. She bought him off with ruinous, then and at many other times, as the Squire suspected, and I myself knew, for he was a savage, and with the like result—he became more frequent and more frequent in his demands. So far I say that he was a systematic gambler and a drunkard, I believe that I have mentioned only his failings and his vices. Of her origin and connections only remained to her, when he required of her a fresh bribe, she refused him, and he was the luckiest thing in the world. Heathcote altered the 'sins' upon the order to 'five,' and the number '200' to '2,000,' and sent it to Jane Heathcote by the commission of a felony. The next time that this fellow came to see me—his visits were not few enough—Mr. Raby had a policeman in waiting for him.

"If," said that gentleman, 'you ever again attempt to practise upon my unhappy sister, I will report you for the term of your natural life. You may thank her that I will not do so now for your just punishment this time. If it rested with me only—and luckily the proof of your penal crimes is in my possession—you would be 'starving' you should be shipped off as soon as law could ship you." Heathcote departed a good deal, and I believe to obtain an interview with his poor wife; but Mr. Raby was firm. He told him out one hundred pounds per annum, and allowed them in a cover whereupon he wrote his own name and address, to be forwarded to his sister-in-law, and that is one of the last handwriting and the last shilling of his that he should see. The conditions of gift were that Jane should never leave Cape Australia ferry, with, and never set foot again in England. 'I'm sure,' the gentleman had urged check, 'that, in your own possession, and, if I ever see your face again, shall be produced in a court of law—which perhaps you have forgotten—as the forger Heathcote.' Heathcote's brutality must have been something extraordinary, and I am sure that Jane must have had a heart like June's; but he had quite succeeded in so doing. Although she had not consented to his going to Australia, and never him—and by-the-by it is that it did not rest with her to see it—she could not but dread his return to England. She had had the experience of freedom did wonders in restoring her roses and lightening her heart of a sorrow that overwhelmed her, and, altogether, she had begun to move about less like an automaton, to wear the look of a woman who has escaped from the jaws of a mouse sort like the Jane Raby of five years before. Then came some news which made her serious and sorrowful again, but could scarce have made her sad. Heathcote was dead in the bush, slain by the hand of one of his own desperate companions. He had cracked pocket within his wet found the roll of bank-notes in their still unbroken cover. It had been given to him by a murderer, or the passing of some basest settlers had disturbed him in the midst of counting it, and had stopped the pain for Mr. Raby, with a narration of them facts. A year after this event, it would have been impossible to recognize the spirit-subdued and fragile Mrs. Heathcote in the by no means inconsolable widow which Mrs. Markham was. Thanks to her late first matrimonial career, she was not rich, but beautiful and happy as you see her with Mr. Grantley, or even as you did see her smile within these few months. My brother married her with the full knowledge that Lady Bonsfield let her what had a moment's cause, as he says himself, to regret his choice."

This conversation had left me somewhat wide-doubting little old maid-made pregnant with various garnishments of her own, in the way of flings at the chamber or stone-age girls, and the Squire's early marriages, did not much enlighten me as to Mrs. Markham's past life. Her husband's confidence it increased my interest in her fortunes. Her conduct toward myself remained unaltered, or was rendered more kindly communicative—and I began to put to me several hypothetical cases of conscience, of which I could see no possible bearing on herself, and begged me, as a clergyman, to give her my best opinion on the subject. She told me that she had often heretofore had the having no children, which she had once considered to be the sole blessing that had been denied her; but that now she thanked God she was childless. The horrible thought began to creep on that my dear benefactress and firm friend was going out of her mind. Mrs. Markham grew strong, although Miss Markham shook her head at it, and hoped it might be no worse. She is as good a person as ever lived; but she had the weakness of her order, which some one is always to think the worst that can be of all one's friends. When I had seen Mrs. Markham come out of the flower-beds, under the sundial, a little after sunrise one morning, and she told me, pale as a spectre, and quivering in every limb, that she had only been to get an appetite for breakfast, when she asked me at another time for the loan of twenty pounds, and in very pressing circumstances, begged me to keep it secret; and when I coupled with these things her frequent allusions, so transparent to myself and her sister-in-law, to the fact of my happy condition at all times—a mark most significant of an unbalanced mind—I felt quite sure of painful surmise being but too true. I was even debating how to break this dreadful fact to them, that remedial measures might be resorted to before it was too late, when a circumstance occurred which put all my suspicions into a certainty even still more terrible.

CHAPTER III.

IT was on a Tuesday, in the mid-summer, and the Squire had gone to a meeting, luckily to a stormy one, upon education, at the neighboring town of Mr. Markham, or rather to vote at the shopping, but accompanied him, and I had intended to have done so likewise, had not the illness of my parishioner suddenly taken a turn. His case requiring certain ailments which were not to be found in any of our resources at the vicarage, I walked down to the Grange, according to custom, to request that they might be sent to the sick man's house. Mrs. Markham was not visible, but the beauty of the afternoon enticed me upon the terrace, the extremity of which overlooked with the walled garden. The gate was always kept locked, I knew, and only the Squire and the gardener had the key of it; but I saw, proceeding slowly along upon the turf, and drinking in the prospect deeply with her eyes, Mrs. Markham upon the walk, and was about to turn, when I heard the whispering of voices. I could not see who the speakers were, as the screen hedged by the in the garden close below me; they had no business there, I knew, and had probably come in by some very choice melons of the Squire's. I made no scruple, therefore, of listening; but after the first few words I felt as though I had been struck down with my rather than have done so.

The voice of Mrs. Markham was unseen to the time. There is a heap of money in his desk to-day which will go to the bank to-morrow. Markham is away to Bath, and will not be back for a week. Are you ready to steal it gone?"

"Yes!" said a clear full voice which I knew to be Mrs. Markham's. "I will die first. I will go away with you yourself before I would rob my husband."

"Your husband?" said the other with a sneer. "Pish, you are mad and you are dreaming! For a few pounds, since you are in for so many pounds already. Why, you've made free of hundreds—"

"I am ashamed," she interrupted, scarcely audible; "but one single shilling have you touched of his. Is it not my money, my capital, that I had of God's own poor, have gone to support your prodigacy; but not one farthing of his, Heaven knows."

"Very well," said the other, "I have no good heat to what I say: I'll blow upon you, and tell all. But you will not, I know be frightened by, before his very eyes. What you have known of me hitherto is nothing to what you shall know of me hereafter, and I swear to live together with you. I seemed to see and feel through the wall itself the fierce look of love that through that place at home at these words. If I had thought the worst of her, instead of being assured, as I then was, that she was a martyr, and that she was indeed a saint, and persecuting her with a power more terrible than any human one, I should have died for her less painfully, my indignation against him would not have risen higher; but as it was, my heart bounded with joy, and my eyes and stick was furiously gripped, as though it were a sword. So then I had been called in to rescue an angel to the wall, and setting my feet in some convenient crevices, peered over the top of it. Mrs. Markham and their faces turned away from me; but I could see, even on the man's back, scoundrel and villain written in every line of his coarse and vulgar person, and all that I had heard of his brutality, and more than that in a sea of malignity. He was one quarter of an hour of my college-days, before I had put on that ecclesiastical garb Oh, to have had it then! After so brief a glance of that "one, two," which I remember to have had some skill in, in the by-gone days of the Squire's profession, indeed, were already so far forgotten, that I rather wished he might just have laid his hand upon her arm, or that she might have struggled, and would not have broken for some time, I think. But she did not do so, I could see by the clenching fingers; the bowed and trembling, but still graceful figure; the appealing sobs, of which I could hear every word, and moaning. I sprang forward and struck down in its joy by his cruel threats and persecutions, not by almost hysteric expressions that grew feebler every moment, I heard her say, "I do know what you say is true, woman; and if what I demand does not come to my hand within the next eighteen-and-forty hours, I will go myself to you and tell you my wife and claim you." I heard a fall upon the ground, and knew that his gore victim had fainted; but I waited until the wretch—who heeded her no more than if she were a log—had left the garden and plunged swiftly into the copse that fringed its northern side. I ran in then at the open door, lifted Mrs. Markham from the path, and revived her at the spring that flowed hard by. She was already, according to habit, to look up at me, taking me for Heathcote; but I told her how I had walked in, seeing the gate open, and expecting to find her gardening, and how I feared the heat had been too much for her. "It is excellent, dear thing!" but she murmured: "Yes, the heat, it was the heat!" as I supported her house-ward by the trellis. I got away immediately, unpretending a telegraphic message, packed up a little carpet-bag, drove down to the railway station at full speed, and arrived in time for the up-express, as I had hoped.

CHAPTER IV.

On the next Wednesday at noon I was back again, and at once took my way down to the Grange. Mrs. Markham had written kindly, though not in very good temper: the Squire was even then at her bedside. I met her face upon the gloomy staircase landing, and he came down into the library at once. If I had not been in his own house, and expecting to meet no other but himself, I should not have known him. His eyes were swollen and dull, his gait unsteady, and his cheeks white and drawn like the face of a dead man. She had told him all at last; his first and only love, his wife, the secret of his life, the partner of his most happiest years, was to be torn from him by another, and doomed to a life of misery.

"Grantley," said he, in a hollow, unnatural tone, "I have had to tell you what is in my poor, poor heart, I know—it has already broken mine; he had fallen into a chair, like one whose limbs refused to support him, and the brave combed hung in his cheeks unchecked and unconcealed.

"Markham, I will! I will!" I cried, "every thing—more, I think, than you can tell me. Your agony is not for yourself, but for your—for her, I am well assured. She shall not be parted—ever. Be comforted. He shall never touch a hair of her head."

His despairing eyes turned toward me not without a touch of hope. I was about to speak further, when the footman rang gently.

"The man is come," groaned the poor Squire, as if inexorable fate had laid its very hand upon his shoulder.

"Show him in," said I to the servant, for the master seemed to have lost all power of speech. For my part, I drew a hopeful augury from that delicate bell-ringing: a ruffian like Bayley would have rattled the house with it, and would not have waited to fear until we have replied with both his hands.

Heathcote slouched in with an insolent air, half sneak, half bully.

"I don't want the parson to hear what I have got to say to you," was his first words.

Mr. Markham, who kept his back turned toward him, waved his hand to me in sign that I should speak for him.

"You may say whatever you will," said I, quietly. "I am aware of the object of your coming. You want to extort the money from this gentleman which you tried to persuade another to steal from his own desk."

"Oh, she told, did she?" said the villain, with a disdainful smile. "It will be the worse for her presently, that's all."

"No, Sir, she did not—if you mean your wife, Mrs. Heathcote. Sir," added I, with a bow, "I am sad luck, "we are aware of all that, and very much more. You were accused in the gardens, but there is more than one thing known—enforced—Henry Heathcote, of your old doings, which you are not aware of."

I saw him turn as pale as the poor Squire himself. "Whether or not," said he, after a pause, "I shall have the money or I shall have my wife, who has committed bigamy; whichever that gentleman there pleases."

"That gentleman," said I, as I observed Mr. Markham was about to speak, "is not in a very calculated mouth after assault, as Mrs. Heathcote was, into supplying your bottomless purse. Nay, Sir, your oath is not to be trusted. I shall in the end get a warrant for your apprehension, procured yesterday from Hampshire by Mr. Bayley, on the charge of forgery, the proof of which I have now with me. The consequences are upon your own head, remember; and when you leave this house you will be for a jail."

"I will quite prepared for this, Sir," said the ruffian, with a look of indescribable malice. "Mrs. Markham that was will, however, accompany me to prison. Fine food for the scandal of the county that will be; and a good convict's wife she will make to me in my luxurious cell hereafter."

Mr. Markham writhed like one in torture upon his chair. We were indeed in the man's power, as he said, and my sparing into Hampshire had been but of small service. One desperate course, however, which had been suggested by Mr. Bayley, was left to us, and I tried it. "Miserable man," said I, sternly, "do you, then, dare to force us to extremities? Is the scaff of humanity dead that we say you to the gallows? You—" I strode up to the trembling wretch, and laying my hand upon his shoulder, whispered aloud, "You murderer!"

The sweat stood out upon his pallid brow, his knees smote together, and his left arm shook violently to bridle up, so abject was his terror.

"Produce it, say! I never found the notes," he murmured.

"No," said I; "but here is the pocket," and I produced it; "and red with the blood that still cries out against you!" At the sight of this frightful evidence the coward leapt down upon the floor, and covered his face with his hands.

"Rise, wretch—up!" thundered the Squire, who had risen up like a man returned to life from the grave. "Here is money—the sum that you demanded—take it, and never again show your cursed sight on you, as sure as there is a sun in heaven I hang you!"

The cast-down, half-paralyzed figure of Mr. Markham seemed to dilate as he said these words; he looked like some incarnate Nemesis denouncing a certain vengeance upon the creature at his feet. His shrunk itself up like a stricken hound, seized the proffered notes without daring to look at him, at the donor's face, and rushing out of the door and from the house, as though the executioner was even then upon his heels, sped away under the flaming eye of him from Worthies, forever.

CHAPTER V.

Mr. Bayley's guest had been a true one. The pocket of Heathcote had been picked by one of his wicked companions in the pub, and he had murdered the thief for the purpose of recovering the pocket, in which hope he had been foiled. This having found upon the body, he had thought it conducive to identify it with his own remains; and for many and many years he had not dared to show himself in civilized parts to gainsay it, but had lived the marauding life of a bushranger. Tired at last, and having by no means what he has obtained enough money for his transit homeward, he had come back to England, where his first fortunate native well married and in such great happiness, his hatred of her was changed to a fiend-like determination strengthened to persecute her further, at all hazards. The poor lady had never before been informed of said her husband's existence, and the horrid truth of his being still in existence; and when her confidence in the concealment of it was gone her beloved Markham for this dreadful business had, but brought her into the most dangerous state. She had prayed for death—more hourly than any dying man for life. When, therefore, the Squire told her, in regard, as angel, her future view with Heathcote—for he did not needlessly distress her with the account of his new atrocity, and of the means whereby he had found the evil of him—she was almost beside herself with joy. At first she would not believe it, but thought that as she strove to raise her attenuated form from her couch to receive and thank me, tears checked her utterance. She was not like those who are composed. With their natural confidence, which had been violently shocked, they again recover from the very life-blood, as it seemed, set once more flowing in their veins, is fell to me to take them from their hands and to administer the cordial restorative out of the real potion in which they stood. The relation free from the terrible fear of the past and from fear of safety had been too great to admit of any thoughts save those of unalloyed content. Good Mrs. Markham was all forgiveness, and wished Heathcote no ill. Mrs. Markham long still the lawful wife of Heathcote was therefore nothing to me—although it might be—and therefore making her continuance at the Grange impossible, had never once occurred to her. She had, in the midst of her sorrow, and of all, and all ides of personal annoyance as an end, felt that she was a widow, and had not found from all relations with her first husband at once. The poor lady must have indeed thought often of her first husband, and had put it from her, probably, as something too horrible to be dealt with justly; nevertheless she was free to me, and the only obstacle of the path which it was my duty as a clergyman to point out to both of them. If ever there was a time when sympathy with the sorrowful and the love of ever one sinceps an innocent error seemed to be more truthful and excusable than at this, I acknowledged that it was that of theirs. My heart was wrung for them to its core; but I had no philosophy to refer to what I was to say or do in this matter. Decisively, but firmly, I put it before them; and before I had done, I felt that I had spoken to me that it was enough. "I go," said she, "dear-est George, at once, while I have still strength to leave you."

"The vicarage, madam, is of course your home as long as you please."

"I thank you, dear Mr. Grantley, but I leave Woodlice," said she, "as far behind as possible in memory to-day."

"And I," chimed in the good little old maid, whose one-half dimple was gone, and who was for the silent a spectator; "and I wish you, sister Jane, to the end of the world, if you will. She is my care, my charge, my responsibility, my—my daughter in my heart."

The Squire's grief was terrible to witness; but he made no opposition. Miss Markham had a small estate in a distant county, to which it was arranged that the ladies should immediately remove. Boxes were hurriedly packed, the travelling-chariot ordered to be down the valley, and leave-taking as, I trust, does not often fall to the lot of mortals, the lovelaid was lifted in, in a fainting state, and the carriage driven off at a rapid pace. Darkly, indeed, it fell upon the Grange, where the sunshine had never left morning for forty years, and yet alive. Weeks and months passed by, but he would not be comforted. As the sheriff-look on the face of the picture in the hall, the flowers that her graceful hands had tended in and about the house, the garden wherein she had walked, the very trees of her favorite walks, the very prospect which her soul had so delighted in, were robed in the deepest mourning. Her name was never uttered by him, except in the prayers, and those he offered up for her were more than any dying man for life. When, therefore, the Squire died, he was happy, as regarded his future view with Heathcote—for he did not needlessly distress her with the account of his new atrocity, and of the means whereby he had found the evil of him—she was almost beside herself with joy. At first she would not believe it, but thought that as she strove to raise her attenuated form from her couch to receive and thank me, tears checked her utterance. She was not like those who are composed. With their natural confidence, which had been violently shocked, they again recover from the very life-blood, as it seemed, set once more flowing in their veins, it fell to me to take them from their hands and to administer the cordial restorative out of the real potion in which they stood. The relation free from the terrible fear of the past and from fear of safety had been too great to admit of any thoughts save those of unalloyed content. Good Mrs. Markham was all forgiveness, and wished Heathcote no ill. Mrs. Markham long still the lawful wife of Heathcote was therefore nothing to me—although it might be—and therefore making her continuance at the Grange impossible, had never once occurred to her. She had, in the midst of her sorrow, and of all, and all ides of personal annoyance as an end, felt that she was a widow, and had not found from all relations with her first husband at once. The poor lady must have indeed thought often of her first husband, and had put it from her, probably, as something too horrible to be dealt with justly; nevertheless she was free to me, and the only obstacle of the path which it was my duty as a clergyman to point out to both of them. If ever there was a time when sympathy with the sorrowful and the love of ever one sinceps an innocent error seemed to be more truthful and excusable than at this, I acknowledged that it was that of theirs. My heart was wrung for them to its core; but I had no philosophy to refer to what I was to say or do in this matter. Decisively, but firmly, I put it before them; and before I had done, I felt that I had spoken to me that it was enough. "I go," said she, "dear-est George, at once, while I have still strength to leave you."

"The vicarage, madam, is of course your home as long as you please."

"I thank you, dear Mr. Grantley, but I leave Woodlice," said she, "as far behind as possible in memory to-day."

"And I," chimed in the good little old maid, whose one-half dimple was gone, and who was for the silent a spectator; "and I wish you, sister Jane, to the end of the world, if you will. She is my care, my charge, my responsibility, my—my daughter in my heart."

The Squire's grief was terrible to witness; but he made no opposition. Miss Markham had a small estate in a distant county, to which it was arranged that the ladies should immediately remove. Boxes were hurriedly packed, the travelling-chariot ordered to be down the valley, and leave-taking as, I trust, does not often fall to the lot of mortals, the lovelaid was lifted in, in a fainting state, and the carriage driven off at a rapid pace. Darkly, indeed, it fell upon the Grange, where the sunshine had never left morning for forty years, and yet alive. Weeks and months passed by, but he would not be comforted. As the sheriff-look on the face of the picture in the hall, the flowers that her graceful hands had tended in and about the house, the garden wherein she had walked, the very trees of her favorite walks, the very prospect which her soul had so delighted in, were robed in the deepest mourning. Her name was never uttered by him, except in the prayers, and those he offered up for her were more than any dying man for life. When, therefore, the Squire died, he was happy, as regarded his future

DREAM-SPINNING.

All yesterday I was spinning,
Sitting alone in my room,
And the dream that I spun was so lengthy,
It lasted till day was done.

I headed not cloud or shadow
That fell on the face of the sun,
Or the humming bees, or the swallows,
Or the trickling of the fill.

I took the threads for my spinning,
All of blue and golden air,
And a flickering ray of sunlight
Was woven in here and there.

The shadows grew longer and longer,
The dream still passed by,
And the purple splendor of sunset
Was flooding the western sky.

But I could not leave my spinning,
For a fair face met my gaze,
I heeded not, hour by hour,
How the silent day had flown.

At last the gray shadows fell round me,
And the night came dark and chill,
And I rose from the dew in the valley,
And left it all on the hill.

I went up the hill this morning
To dream was where my spinning lay,
But the wheel and the dream had vanished
Remained of my dream to-day.

DR. ELIZABETH BLACKWELL.

We take from the Englishwoman's Magazine the following interesting account of the career of a Lady who, we are happy to know, is now highly successful in her profession in this city, and who has a host of friends, admirers, and clients by the score:

Elizabeth Blackwell was the eldest of a family of seven, three with their mother on the verge of early death of their father in embarrassed circumstances. She had a strong desire for study, and, striving to maintain herself and help the junior branches by teaching. At length, having by incessant exertion saved a little money, she entered upon a course of education for the profession of a physician, being confident of increasing interest, what difficulties, in addition to those of poverty, she had to overcome before the attainment of her wishes.

In May, 1847, after three years of incessant application, during which the closest study had occupied every moment not engaged in teaching, she left Charleston, and went to Philadelphia, where she endeavored to obtain admittance to the medical schools, but without success. The physicians of the latter place were either shocked or angry at her request, and the doors of all those schools were closed against her. She obtained an application; and finding it impossible to avail herself of the facilities provided for students of the other sex, she entered upon a course of private anatomical study and dissection with Drs. Warrington, and, at institutions with Dr. Warrington, of Philadelphia. But although she could undoubtedly learn much from the private lessons of competent instructors, she felt that so fragmentary a mode of study could not give her the solid medical education resulting from a regular collegiate course; and, moreover, as it was her aim not to isolate herself or half-educated female pretenders to an unauthorized position, but to take her place, if she can, on the contrary, to procure the opening of the legitimate approaches of the medical career to women seriously desirous of qualifying themselves for worthy discharge of its duties, by passing through the same course of examination prescribed to men, admission to a regular medical college, and the acquisition of the medical diploma—as a sanction for her own moral character, and as the only guarantee were essential to the carrying out of her plans. She therefore addressed a list of all the medical colleges in existence in the United States, and presented herself in person at each for admission to each of them in succession.

"I am sending out arrows in every direction, uncertain which may hit the mark," she remarks in a letter written at this time.

"Her applications, though accompanied with certificates of her having gone through the requisite preparatory study under Dr. Dickson, was refused by the faculty of every college. In some cases the refusal was couched in the shape of a homily on the impropriety of the position assigned to women by nature and society, and her presumption in attempting to enter a sphere reserved to the nobler sex; in others the impropriety of the step was delicately implied in a woman's attempting to learn the science of medicine in a mixed class organization. For several months it appeared as though even her tenacity of purpose would fail to break through the barriers which the prejudices of custom had for her on every side. But at length her path, so long and wearily trodden in grey obscurity,

"Among the applications she had made throughout the length and breadth of the United States, was one which was addressed to the Medical College of the University of Geneva, in the State of New York, the oldest of the institutions of learning organized her request, agreed that they saw no reason why a woman, possessed of the requisite preparatory acquirements, should not be admitted; but feeling that the question was one whose decision was of a delicate kind, which should be deliberated upon—as it would have been easy for them, if so disposed, to render a place in the amphitheatre unendurable by the jeering—they referred the whole matter to them, and, having called them together, left the applicant's fate in their own determination and decision. The students, having discussed the subject, decided unanimously in favor of the new applicant, and the professors, when consulted, were drawn up and voted by them, inviting her to enter the college, and pledged themselves individually and collectively, that, should she do so, no word or act of theirs should ever cause her to regret the step.

"A copy of these 'resolutions,' accompanied by a letter of warm congratulation thereupon, was soon transmitted to her by the faculty of the university, the work of years was in favor of God's year, was entered on the college books as 'No. 612,' was there herself into the study of the various branches of medical science then open to her, with an ardor proportioned to the difficulties she had had to overcome in gaining admission to it.

"But the position she had striven so hard to attain was not without certain inconveniences, inseparable from the nature of the case; and though she had weighed, and was prepared to endure them, for the sake of the end in view, yet so that of obtain in no other way, it will be readily understood that a young and sensitive woman could not find herself placed in so singular a position, and assist at all the demonstrations involved in a complete course of anatomical study, without occasional severe trial to her feelings. Aware that the possibility of her going through with such a course depended upon her keeping her mind unmoved spectator, to have her presence there to be regarded as a matter of course, not as that of a woman among men, but of one student among five hundred; conducted only with the truth and dignity of science, she resolved that, should her position after her entrance into the college, in a diet so rigid as almost to border on starvation, it was not that no involuntary change of color might betray the feeling of embarrassment occasionally created by the unusual and plain-spoken nature of the subjects. How far the attainment of a self-command so complete as that her countenance presented at that of a statue can be attributed to the effect of such a diet, or how far it may be the result of years such an expedient is too characteristic to be omitted here.

"When her first admission into the college until she left it, she also made it an invariable rule to pass in and out without shaking hands of the students; going straight to her seat, and never looking in any other direction than to the professor who was then lecturing.

"How necessary was her circumspection to the maintenance of her position in the college, a circumstance may be inferred from an incident which occurred during the lecture in the amphitheatre, a short time after her admission to the college. Whether it happened to be a particularly trying one, and while the discourse was proceeding with much animation, a folded paper—evidently a note—was thrown by somebody in one of the upper tiers behind her, and fell upon her arm, where it lay, conspicuously white, upon the sleeve of her black dress. She felt, instinctively, that this note contained some gross impertinence, that every eye in the building was upon her, and that, if she meant to remain in the college, she must repel the insult, then and there, in such a way as to prevent the recurrence of any similar act. Without moving, or raising her eyes from her note-book, she continued to write, as though she had not perceived the paper; and when she had finished her notes, she slowly lifted the arm on which it lay, until she had brought it clearly within view of every one in the building, and then, with the slightest possible turn of the wrist, she caused the offensive missive to drop upon the floor. Her action, at once a protest and an appeal, was perfectly understood by the students; and, in an instant, the amphitheatre rang with their energetic applause, mingled with hisses directed against her cowardly assailant. Throughout this scene she kept her eyes constantly fixed upon her note-book, taking no more apparent notice of this welcome demonstration than she had done of the unwelcome aggression which had called it forth. But her position in the college was made from that moment; and not the slightest annoyance of any kind was ever again attempted throughout her stay. On the contrary, a sincere regard at once kindly and respectful, was thenceforward evinced toward her by her fellow-students; and though, for obvious reasons, she still continued to hold herself aloof from social intercourse with them, yet, whenever the opportunity of so doing presented itself in the course of their common studies, they always showed themselves ready and anxious to render her any good offices in their power, and some of them are among her truest friends at this day.

"The feeling of embarrassment which had caused her so much pain on her first appearance among her fellow-students was, however, soon modified by familiarity with topics forming the subject of daily study, and was at length entirely absorbed in the growing interest and admiration excited by the wonderful and beautiful mechanism of the human frame. But the suffering it had caused her, on her entrance into the college, suggested to her the desirability of providing a first-class medical school for the reception of female students only—an institution which she hopes to establish in the course of time.

"But though the 'lady-student' had thus made good her position within the walls of the college, the suspicious and hostile curiosity with which she was regarded in the little town was long in subsiding. She could not, at first, obtain admission to a suitable boarding-house; the heads of those establishments having been threatened with the desertion of their 'best' inmates if she were received. As she went through the streets, on her way to and from the college, audible whispers of 'Here she comes!' or rude cries of 'Come on, Bill, let's have a good look at the lady-doctor!' would meet her ears; and not only idle boys, but well-dressed men and women, would place themselves before her, or draw up in little knots along the pavement, to see her go by, as though she had been some strange animal from another planet. But the passage of the quiet-looking little figure, dressed with the utmost simplicity, taking no notice of the rude people about her, and looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, gradually ceased to excite remark; and when she had been called upon by the wives of some of the professors, the most 'respectable' of the boarding-houses consented to receive her as an inmate. . . . .

"From the time when she had first resolved to enter upon the study of medicine, until a very recent period, she pursued a system of self-denial in every branch of personal expenditure so rigid that it would be hardly credible to those who had not witnessed its details, and involving privations that only her exceptional temperament could have enabled her to undergo. Her arrangements were invariably made on the most inexpensive scale; she put up with the simplest accommodations, dressed with more than Quaker plainness, went about on foot in all weathers to the utmost limit of her strength, and resolutely denied herself every thing, without exception, that it was possible for her to do without. Her refusing herself a little bottle of Eau de Cologne, which she could have bought for fourpence half-penny, and to which, being very fond of scents, she happened one day to take such an especial fancy that she was haunted for years with occasional visions of that same little bottle, was in accordance with the invariable rule she had marked out for herself. Acts of rare generosity on her part toward others during this period might be cited; but with regard to herself—although additional resources were placed at her disposal by her relatives in England—her self-denial was inexorable; every farthing thus economized being regarded by her as so much gained for the exigencies of future study, and treasured accordingly. Such having been her mode of action from the beginning of her student's career, it was not without an almost heroic effort that, as her course of study drew toward its close, she compelled herself to purchase a handsome black silk dress for the grand affair of her graduation. In a letter written at that time, she says: 'I am working hard for the parchment, which I suppose will come in due time; but I have still an immense amount of dry reading to get through with and to beat into my memory. I have been obliged to have a dress made for the graduation ceremony; and meanwhile it lies quietly in my trunk, biding its time. It is a rich black silk, with a cape, trimmed with black silk fringe, and some narrow white lace round the neck and cuffs. I could not avoid the expense, though a grievous one for a poor student; for the affair will take place in a crowded church; I shall have to mount to a platform, on which sits the president of the university in gown and triangular hat, surrounded by rows of reverend professors; and of course I can neither disgrace womankind, the college, nor the Blackwells, by presenting myself in a shabby gown.'

"In January, 1849, the ceremony in question took place, as just described. The church was crowded to suffocation; an immense number of ladies being present, attracted from every point of the compass, from twenty miles round, by the desire to witness the presentation of the first medical diploma ever bestowed on a woman; and among the crowd were some of her own family who had come to Geneva to be present on the occasion. When the preliminary ceremonial had been gone through with, and various addresses had been delivered, the wearer of the black silk dress ascended to the platform with a number of her brother-students, and received from the hands of Dr. Lee, the venerable president of the university, the much-desired diploma, which with its seal and blue ribbon, and the word Dominus changed to Domina, admitted her into the ranks of the medical fraternity, hitherto closed against her sex. Each student, on receiving the diploma, returned a few words of thanks. On receiving hers, Dr. Elizabeth replied, in a low voice, but amidst a hush of curiosity and interest so intense that the words were audible throughout the building:

"'I thank you, Mr. President, for the sanction given to my studies by the institution of which you are the head. With the help of the Most High, it shall be the endeavor of my life to do honor to the diploma you have conferred upon me.'

"The president, in his concluding address, alluded to the presence of a lady-student during the collegiate course then closing, as 'an innovation that had been in every way a fortunate one;' and stated that 'the zeal and energy she had displayed in the acquisition of science had offered a brilliant example to the whole class;' that 'her presence had exercised a beneficial influence upon her fellow-students in all respects;' that 'the average attainments and general conduct of the students during the period she had passed among them were of a higher character than those of any class that had been assembled in the college since he had been connected with the institution;' and that 'the most cordial good wishes of her instructors would go with her in her future career.'"

Dr. Elizabeth Blackwell is now a highly successful doctor at New York, where she has been latterly joined by a junior sister, Dr. Emily Blackwell, who has passed through the same professional education with equal éclat, but under greatly less difficulty.

LITTLE GOOD-FOR-NOTHING.

[CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST NUMBER.]

CHAPTER V.

CERTAINLY there had been nothing in my very nonchalant behavior at the theatre of a tendency to stimulate a woman accustomed to men's incense into any thing like an excess of the grand passion for me. It was very natural, I said to myself, as I noticed, for a week after the play, Miss Denham's manner, if possible, even more superficial to me than before. Of course, it was not in her rôle to play the injured heroine; I doubt whether it was possible for her to show pique. Yet I could see, unmistakably, that she was offended — what in other people would be hurt—by my conduct.

One evening, as I sat between Uncle Eben and lovely Little Good-for-Nothing, in her boudoir, the young girl said to me—"That is a very beautiful lady, Mr. Maurice, to whom the world calls you engaged."

"Perhaps the world overrates my good fortune, Miss Carter. She is very beautiful indeed, whether engaged to me or not, but just now I am so miserable as to be out of favor."

"Oh, I am sorry! Do you think so?"

"To be sure. It is beyond concealment. Won't you, I added laughingly, intercede for me with her majesty?"

"Why, don't you love her—don't she love you—so that you know all about each other's feelings, and can make confessions by yourselves?" And Little Good-for-Nothing opened wide her great brown eyes.

"Oh, we have the very highest degree of consideration for each other."

"Well, I will intercede. You ought to love one another very much."

A few nights after this—all of us—Uncle Eben, Lizzie, Grace Denham, and myself, were honored by an especial glorification in our behalf at Mrs. Fixitalle's. In all the glory of quarter-deck pumps, and a coat radiant with blue and brass, my Uncle led our hostess down the mazes of a real old-fashioned reel, played for his especial benefit, and managed to distinguish himself to the perfect ecstasy of Smallboys and his friends by the resurrection of several steps, which, on the authority of the eminent cognoscenti, I state to have slept since the year one. And he managed to be very happy and agile, in spite of his acknowledged utter ignorance of certain other dances, which he described as bearing up in convoy, close hauled, and going in stays every two seconds.

Uncle Eben was still dancing; neither Grace nor Lizzie were any where to be seen; and as much ennuyé as a well-bred gentleman ever permits himself to be, unless he goes with Smallboys, I threw myself down on an ottoman by the conservatory door, and looked at the frisking world through half-open eyelids. I heard women's voices, low among the fuschias. Grace and Lizzie were talking—quite gravely too, for such an occasion as this at Mrs. Fixitalle's.

I could not help hearing a few words before I rose and moved away.

"Do be kind to him—he is so good and noble—he loves you so much, I am sure—and his life has not been very happy."

"Miss Carter, excuse me; but I believe Mr. Maurice loves—you."

"You are mistaken; he never could bear me, even when I was a little child. He always called me—to other people—Little Good-for-Nothing."

As I arose and changed my seat I felt like one giddy with overmuch wine. The perplexity of that suggestion—"In love with Little Good-for-Nothing?" Again she seemed to be reproduced from that day six, near seven, years ago; and I saw her stand once more with her hair blowing, her immense crumpled sun-bonnet, her unformed nose, and the stumpy forefinger on her bosom, indicating "Wac!" "In love with Little Good-for-Nothing?" Impossible! Yet—how much she had changed!

So my wife to be was jealous! Ha, ha, madam! Yet, perhaps, not in the least. She may have seen what she thought facts, and been perfectly indifferent to them. More comfortable for her—less complimentary to me.

Some time during that evening it was decided that, if the wind and weather held fair on Wednesday, I was to take Lizzie, Grace, and about a dozen other nymphs with aquatic tendencies, down to the Hook and back again, in my "dear duck of a yacht," the Aphrodite. Beside the abstract pleasures of the sail, there were to be several sandwiches and a nice young man to every young lady on board. For these purposes I organized myself into a commissariat department the next morning. I sent James, my faithful shadow in knee plush, to contract for innumerable Bologna sausages; and myself enlisted some dozen or so old salts, of sixteen years and upward, who knew every thing about sailing without having ever been to sea.

And though this chapter has been a short one, I shall take another before finis, ending my story with a full and veritable account of the cruise of the good sloop Aphrodite.

CHAPTER VI.

"ALL aboard! haul aft there, Tucker! Bows fend off! So—steady!"

As the Aphrodite made faster and faster out into the stream, in faith she was a goodly creature to look upon. A six-knot breeze right abeam just careened her so much as to clear her long bright pennant, and lift out her shiny new-leaded side to windward, till it gleamed like the breast of some strong-minded dove who had taken to swimming. All along the flush clean deck on their camp-stools sat pretty sea-exhilarated girls in their picnic dresses, their eyes as bright, their cheeks as rosy as the blue and red of the streamers that floated from their gipsy hats. And in exaggerated sea-tog sported the young men—blue-shirted, black-neck-tied—leaning on their palms over the sun-bright gunwale to make their little white hands broad and brown. No quarter-deck taboo—every body went every where at will; they of constitutions internally tremulous on the water, to the waist—others, who liked the motion, to the bows, making a pleasant grouped figure-head as they rose and fell, leaning stanchly sideways against the free wind that bowled us on.

Unquestionably the two most beautiful women on board were Grace Denham and Lizzie Carter. And beautiful in very different ways. Grace, the queenly, rose-suffused brunette, because she brought to sea with her all that same unruffled elegance and repose which made her the adored of gas-lit rooms a-land, and wore it so easily that it did not seem incongruous. Lizzie, the fair, the brown-haired, because now all the native Arab freedom of her soul broke forth, and she reveled like a very sea-goddess in the kisses of the wind and spray. She seemed made to swim with that matchless arm of hers around the arching neck of my Aphrodite.

As little Taggles, one of my old salts, informed me, we made the Sou'west Spit at just two bells, which he imagined to be the salt-water translation of two o'clock. I had held the tiller all the way down, and being rather tired now gave it up to my man Tucker, who united in one personality all three mates and bo'sun, at the same time giving him strict private orders not to let any body else steer, however specious his nautical capabilities might seem.

We had just left the spit on our windward quarter, when the mainsail flapped, and we began to lose headway. The wind was hauling around astern. I eased the sheets and let her run before it.

I mingled with my guests. All of them seemed very happy, none of them sea-sick; and when James brought up from the locker sandwiches, deviled turkey, and bottle after bottle of iced Champagne, my freight of delicate city appetites showed itself wonderfully refreshed by the salt.

Lunching and laughing in messes of half a dozen—flirting in groups of two; now singing, now spinning yarns, we reached the mouth of Shrewsbury River. A dance was proposed: we cleared the deck for action. Every body paired off for a reel—that is, all the gentlemen save myself and little Taggles. I sat on the combings of the hatchway and played the violin. Taggles said he would go aft and see Tucker steer. His default threw out one lady from the dance. Lizzie Carter said she would be that one, and sat down on a stool, just clear of my bow arm.

Merrily they were footing it away to "Money Musk," when I chanced to look aft over my shoulder. Little Taggles was in earnest conversation with Tucker, and I saw him pull a bill from his porte-monnaie, and press it into my Lieutenant's hand. Rather curious, I thought, but I was too busy to pay much attention to the act just then.

Perhaps there is no portion of our coast where the wind is more variable than at this identical spot over which we were then running, just outside the Shrewsbury River. "Look out for squalls!" is particularly the motto of every small-boat skipper who sails there. I was not much surprised, then, to find ourselves all at once drifting stern foremost in a dead lull. Just then Grace Denham and Belle Hudson, the two most beautiful girls in the reel, were holding their graceful white arms aloft, making an arch for the two cavaliers at the other end to run under. I dropped my bow—sprang to my feet, and shouted, "Quick! let go halliards and luff!" Good Heavens! I looked astern, and little Taggles was steering! That was the price of his bill! God forgive him; I will not speak a word of censure now; he is beyond my reproaches. And Tucker had gone below.

Before I could jump to the cleets, while little Taggles stood like one dreaming at the tiller, now moving it this way, now that, without any notion of what end was to be gained by either movement, the squall came. That slender frothing line, which just before looked miles off upon the larboard bow, crawled on to us more like some instant electric impulse than any slower thing of water. Once! and a feathery claw of foam grasped at us over the combings. Twice! and like a falling castle, down with all her burden of shrieking souls, on her beam ends went the Aphrodite. For a moment, little Taggles clutched the tiller, then his hands slipped, and I never saw him again.

They say that when we drown a whole life marches by us in an instant. I can believe it; for in that moment of close destruction I settled one great awful life-question, viewing all its arguments on both sides. I was a bold, stout swimmer; whom should I save, if God let me save any body? There were but two my soul could choose from; and conceive, if you can, a more terrible alternative than mine. Grace Denham, to whom the world had already married me—Lizzie, whom, in that great awakening, I found I loved more than life.

My God! I could not let her die—the perishing of them all seemed, to the selfishness of that love, a trifle, by the side of losing her. Like a flash I made up my mind, and grasped her in the water.

Some of the other men swam. Results, in several households, spared the agony of drowned daughters, showed that those few who could had acted nobly.

But at that moment I had eyes and ears for one alone—Little Good-for-Nothing.

Oh, the cruel waves that now looked so big, that from deck had looked so small and kindly! The narrow, snowy strip of beach—now wave-hidden, now suddenly disclosed, yet ever seeming so far off—so desperate of access!

She was a light burden, and lay perfectly still in my arms with her mute, astonished face, whiter than the foam, turned upward to the sky. Yet the water seemed like a wall of lead against my breast, as with muscles made steel by the horrible exigency, I struggled forward, half-blinded by the spray, pushing our double weight. Yet, with all the events that hung suspended on my prolonged strength, I feared not to waste it by saying over and over again, "O God, how I love—how I love you!"

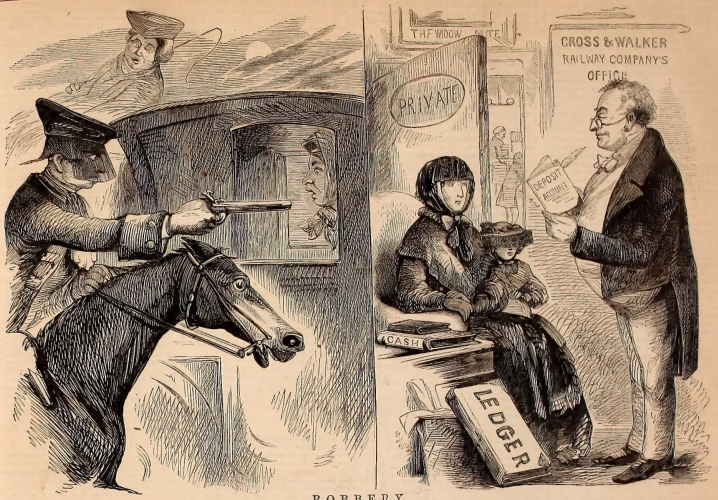
At first, when I spoke it, she opened her brown eyes full upon me as one waking from the trouble of a dream. I repeated it—in that weird perilous bridal chamber our lips met passionately — and God saw that we were married!

But no time for vows, save such as come silently from the eyes that pray toward heaven; none for love caressings, when the jealous sea was at the door of our hardly understood great happiness to snatch the bride from my arms. "Father in Heaven, oh, let us reach the shore! All the gold of earth for a foot of those white sands!"

Almost out of the water, with her in my arms, did I spring over the head of a broad landward roller, to be in front of it and catch its impulse. Another strikes us—I swim shallow to be above the undertow. Another—"Oh! my God, I thank thee—ground—ground, solid ground!" I spur myself upward from the bottom, now plainly felt—I hurl us both into a shoal where it is waist deep—now it just reaches to the knees—now ankle deep—ashore!

Unspeaking, motionless, we sat down on the clear sand, hugged closely to each other's breast. Far out we could see the rising and falling heads of a few swimmers coming after us. What a nightmare to think that, on that uninhabited, that boatless beach, we might have to sit still and see them drown!

But no; for the pilot-boat, that lay close-reefed a mile off our bows when the Aphrodite capsized, has seen them, and has almost reached them with her yawl. And now, one by one, the swimmers are lifted in, so near to us that we can almost see the brine drip from them as they are pulled over the gunwale. And as we think what great anthems must be just now going up from those rescued hearts, their music is echoed in our own.



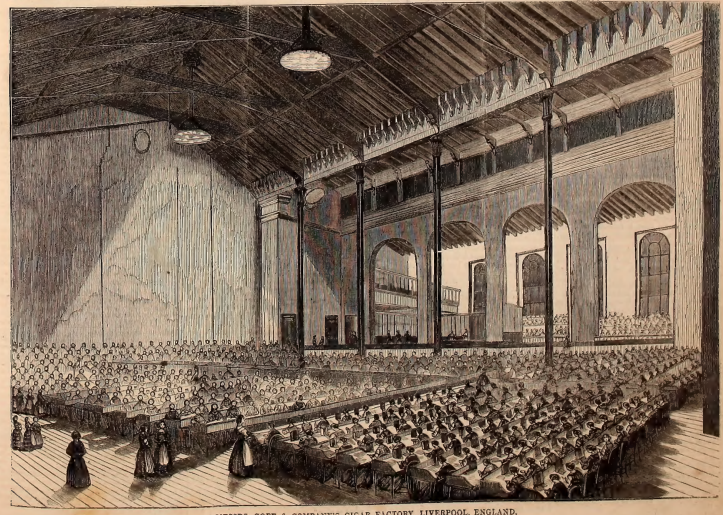
We stand and wave our handkerchiefs to the rowers. They see us and give three great cheers for the two more saved, but sign to us that they are full. We can perceive that; yes, and one other thing whose value to me, you who have comprehended the alternative that met me as the sloop went down, will also understand. In the stern-sheets, motionless, pale as a snow-flower but still living, reclined Grace Denham! Oh, thank Heaven! thank Heaven!

Through the deep sand did Lizzie and I plow our way—sometimes I carried her like a child—until, at nightfall, we came opposite the Shrewsbury Lights, just as they were beginning to brighten up. From the hotel below them we were seen—a boat sent for us—and we came once more to fire, food, rest, and the grateful grasp of human hands of sympathy.

And the prayers we prayed that night! As they were too holy then to be spoken, let them now be too holy to be spoken of.

The next day we reached home—to find Uncle Eben in unspeakable anguish, thinking us lost; to bless him, as ones living from the dead. To hear that out of the thirty who sang as the Aphrodite made out into the stream there were but fourteen unpillowed on the deep-down sand. To meet—oh hardest of all!—Grace Denham, and to be received by, without one look of reproaches—with nothing but calm words of gratitude to God. She married the man that saved her. He made her a better husband than I could have done—for they loved one another as wife and husband should love—dearer than their own saved lives. To weep vain tears with those who wept, heart-broken.

But still more—after the cloud of that terrible calamitous memory had been somewhat blown away by the breath of Time, and stricken through by the after sunlight of Heaven's goodness—to sit through long, sweet evenings under the vines of Uncle Eben's porch at Guilford, clasping my true wife's hand, thinking of the old times and wondering how it were possible that I had ever been deemed good enough for—Little Good-for-Nothing.



ROBBERY.

OLD AND NEW STYLE.

FEMALE EMPLOYMENT.—No. I.

We propose to devote a considerable portion of our space to the subject of female employment. It is becoming a topic of general interest, and sound philanthropy will welcome, while quackery will suffer by, a careful exposition of the true state of the question. Our illustration this week is a picture of the cigar factory of Messrs. Cope & Company, of Liverpool, England.

In this country, it is believed, female labor is employed in cigar factories to a very moderate extent. In Havana, it is said, the share of work allotted to females—negresses—is largest; some of the finest descriptions of "plantation" cigars are said to be made by stout negro girls, who, cubans rassed by little clothing, roll the leaves into the shape desired on their seeding limbs. In Liverpool less primitive methods are in use.

MESSRS. COPE & COMPANY'S CIGAR FACTORY, LIVERPOOL, ENGLAND.

After the leaf has been moistened and "sweated" it passes into the hand of a girl called a stripper. She tears away the stalk which intersects the leaf, and inasmuch the latter to the sorters, the stalk passing into the milling department, to be ground into snuff. The sorters divide the stripped leaves into three collections—"inside fillers" "outside wrappers" and "cutting wrappers." The only difference between the two last is in preference; the "outside wrapper" consists of leaves which are more perfect and free from tears and flaws than the "inner wrapper," while the latter are in the same respect superior to the "inside filler." The cigar-maker proceeds to take a handful of inside filler, which she rolls on a prepared surface into the shape of a cigar. She then wraps in a leaf of bunch wrapper. Then, choosing a fine leaf of outside wrapper, she cuts it into strips one and a half inch broad, and twists one of these strips neatly round the material just rolled up. The edges are pasted together with brown paste, and end is cut off square with a round knife, and the cigar is complete.

We understand that girls in this factory can, if they are quick and adroit, make fifteen shillings, or nearly four dollars a week, which, considering the relative value of labor in the United States and Great Britain, is equal to six dollars here. The most interesting item in connection with the Messrs. Cope's factory, is the fact that a number of deaf and dumb girls are employed there, earning as good wages as their more fortunate sisters.

The reader will admire the lofty ceiling of the room in which the girls work, and the admirable arrangement of the seats.

There is no reason why all the cigars made in this country should not be the handiwork of women. Man laboring at manufactures where dexterity and slight of hand, not strength, are required, are evidently inferior to women.

Miscellany.

—The following curious broadside is taken from an English newspaper of the year 1774, and is there called "Cards in Spiritual Language."

"or The Perpetual Almanac, or Soldier's Prayer-book, giving an account of Richard Lone, a private soldier belonging to the 17th Regiment of Foot, who was taken from the mayor of the town of Glasgow, for playing at cards during Divine service."

The sergeant commanded the soldiers at church, and when the parson had read the prayers he took his text. Then we had a little more of it, but then the soldier had neither Bible nor Common Prayer-book, but he drew a pack of cards from his pocket before him. He first looked at one card, and then at the other. The sergeant of the company saw him, and said,

"Richard, put up the cards, this is no place for them."

"Never mind that," said Richard.

When the sergeant was over, the constable took Richard prisoner, and brought him before the mayor.

"Well," says the mayor, "what have you brought that soldier here for?"

"For playing at cards in church."

"Well, soldier, what have you to say for yourself?"

"Much, Sir, I hope."

"Very good," said he, "I will punish you more than ever was punished."

"I know that," says the soldier, "about six weeks on the march. I have had but little to subsist on. I have neither Bible nor Common Prayer-book, but having nothing but a pack of cards, and I hope to satisfy your worship of the purity of my intention."

"Very good," said the mayor.

The Counts the Cards.

Then, spreading the cards before the mayor, he began with the Ace:

"When I see the Ace, it reminds me there is only one God.

"When I see the Deuce, it reminds me of Father and Son.

"When I see the Trey, it reminds me of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.

"When I see the Four, it reminds me of the Four Evangelists that preached—viz., Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John.

"When I see the Five, it reminds me of the Five Wise Virgins that trimmed their lamps. There were ten, but five were wise, and five foolish, and were shut out.

"When I see the Six, it reminds me that in Six days the Lord made heaven and earth.

"When I see the Seven, it reminds me that on the Seventh day God rested from the works which He had made, and hallowed it.

"When I see the Eight, it reminds me of the Eight Righteous Persons that were saved when God drowned the world—viz., Noah and his wife, his three sons and their wives.

"When I see the Nine, it reminds me of the Nine Lepers that were cleansed by our Saviour. There were ten, but nine never returned thanks.

"When I see the Ten, it reminds me of the Commandments which God handed down to Moses on a table of stone.

"When I see the King," said the soldier, "it reminds me of the Great King of Heaven, which is God Almighty.

"When I see the Queen, it reminds me of the Queen of Sheba, who went to hear the wisdom of Solomon; for she was as wise a woman as he was a man. She brought with her fifty boys and fifty girls, all dressed in boys' apparel, for King Solomon to tell which were boys and which were girls. King Solomon sent for water for them to wash themselves; the girls washed to the elbows, and the boys only to the wrists, so King Solomon told by that."

Who is the Knave?

"Well," said the mayor, "you have given a description of all the cards in the pack except one."

"Which is that?" said the soldier.

"The Knave," said the mayor.

"I will give your honor a description of that, too, if you will not be angry."

"I will not," said the mayor, "if you will not term me to the knave."

"Well," said the soldier, "the greatest Knave I know is the constable that brought me here."

"I do not know," said the mayor, "as to the greatest knave in the universe, but I know he is the greatest fool."

"When I count how many spots in a pack of cards, I find 365—as many days as there are in a year.

"When I count the number of cards in a pack, I find there are fifty-two—as many weeks as there are in a year. There are four suits—the number of weeks in a month.

"I find there are twelve picture-cards in the pack, representing the number of months in the year; and on counting the tricks, I find thirteen—the number of weeks in a quarter. You see, Sir, the pack of cards serves for a Bible, almanac, and Common Prayer-book to me."

—Overcome differ in the matter of a tariff; some are for protection, some for free trade. But very few, even of the strongest protectionists, think in their secret hearts that the

Whole Duty of Man

can be properly comprehended upon a man to pay duty on goods if he has ingenuity enough to smuggle them in. As for "bringing in" articles subject to tax in the accustomed, it is not easier to commission to conscientious for conduct that would detach from the Diary of a Smuggler.

It was autumn, and I was crossing the Channel to have certain articles of furniture smuggled, and most all of whom were dreadfully inconvenienced by a strong westerly wind. All of course, I do assure you, was never proved to be so false a thing before. Numerous as the company was, it was all of one mind, or of a mind of one mind on the deck, as a modern wit (who I wish was my friend) once observed, and was soon heard sprite. It was terrible, as I stood at the bow, to see nothing but the drooping hats and bonnets of my fellow-beings, on the most dipped and the most extreme qum of pitch-and-toss, where nothing turned up but head. One neighbor, for instance, a fat old fellow, the property of a middle-aged lady of large dimensions, and it interested me very deeply. I have never seen a human being suffer so, that countenance vainly striving to look unconcerned, as I imagined at one time, which the most extreme of some smuggler running her first corps. She would have been ill, I could see, only she had too great a weight of stomach and to spare any such relaxation. Sue was that I was looking fixedly at her, and in this came over her face, as if she "making the green one red." Yes, it was plain she smuggled; she was stouter than any woman of her general appearance had any right to be.

"Madam," said I, approaching her by a series of gymnastics on an old sailor, which the appearance of the plane whereon I moved compelled, "I see you have no attendant; can I be of any service to you? I am an old sailor, and know, as you see, my seadogs under my jib."

The poor woman gazed on the limbs referred to with an unintelligent and frightened air; she had evidently never heard of "seadogs," or else she had understood me to say that I had been long, and she stared accordingly.

"I want nothing, Sir, I thank you," replied she, feebly, "unless you could put me on shore."

"We shall be, my dear madam," said I, taking out my watch and hanging my right leg across my bow, "We shall be in less than ten minutes at the custom-house."

A spasm—a flicker from the guilt within—glanced over her countenance.

"You look very much troubled, Sir," stammered she. I bowed, and looked considerably more so, in order to heal her confidence. I used to tell you a secret, which I find isstoo much for me to keep to myself, oh, would you hold it inviolate?"

"I know it, my dear madam—I know it already," said I, gently; "it is Lent, is it not?"

She uttered a little shriek, and— Yes, she had got it there, among the crinoline. She thought it had been stolen, and got you, unknown to me.

"Oh, Sir," cried she, "it is only ten pounds' worth; please to forgive me, and I'll never do it again. As it is, I think I shall expire."

Dumb Influence.

"My dear madam," replied I, sternly but kindly, "here is the pier, and the officer has fixed his eye upon us. I must do my duty."

I walked up the ladder like a lamp-lighter; I pointed that woman out to the legitimate authority.

I turned round her eyes met mine, as I retired to the marching-house. I did not see her march past, but I knew she was gone, and I saw her fined and dismissed with ignominy.

Having generously given up my emoluments as an officer of the customs, I returned to the deck in search of the betrayed woman to her hotel. She had not even an umbrella, and I, who had not, indeed, refused to hear a word that I had to say. At last I overcame her solicitude as far as to get her to look at a piece of gutta-percha I had to the value of that which had been to ruthlessly taken from her hand. I then placed it in her hand, in the amount of the fine in which she had been mulcted. Then I began my explanatory statement:

"You had ten pounds' worth of smuggled goods about your person, madam. I had nearly fifty times that amount. If you were alarmed for the possible consequences of your rashness, what, think you, must have been the state of my feelings upon my own account. I compel you, madam, to admit, I am convince you, for the sake of both of us. You have too expensive a countenance, believe me, for this sort of free-trading, and the officer would have found you out at all events, even as I did myself. Do you understand, my dear madam?" If you still feel aggrieved or injured by me in any manner, pray take more lace; here is lots of it."

We parted the best of friends.

The Best Regulator.

I had a second adventure, the other day, of a more ludicrous and less serious character, but which, as it happily illustrates my great natural ingenuity, I here take leave to add. Having come from the Mediterranean in the same ship as Soulaingne, she happened to be in possession of a couple of pounds of cavendish cut tobacco, supposed to be of excellent taste, and which I was determined to custom-house fingers should meddle with. As soon as the vessel was brought alongside the quay I left my cabin and made my way to the movable gangway.

"Sir," said the official at the head of it, with a malicious grin, "I think I must trouble you to take off your hat."

"I beg your pardon, I never! You are not Prince Albert in disguise, I suppose, nor the Duke of Devon?"

"Come, come!" exclaimed the fellow—official persons, it is to be observed, always have the greatest possible dislike to being rallied, or, as the vulgar have it, "chaffed," by any body—"none of your nonsense, Sir, but take off your hat, or it will be worse for you."

"Which hat?" asked I, innocently, "When hat is?"

"Yours!" replied he, savagely; "yours! He tipped up my wide-awake in a way which convinces me that you have something in it."

"My wife's hat-box, you mean, Sir," said I, "of course I have something in it. I always carry my pocket-handkerchief there; and there's my head inside."

Hard Oath!

The cold-blooded official smiled grimly without reply, and took me to his superior, by whom the matter was more closely inquired. I told him, in sorrow, and not upon compulsion, I would touch my hat to him; but that I would not take it off without a warrant. He was marched over the deck, entirely of a sort of grunt of honor to the office of the custom-house, and I was then commanded to use all his right to enforce this absurd request of taking off my hat; and under protest, and to oblige him, to keep it on. I was extremely peevish, I did it. There was nothing in my hat, as I had affirmed from the very moment my pocket-handkerchief chief. Officials never apologize; but I do hope that they felt they had wronged a fellow-creature by their cruel suspicions. I asserted back to the vessel, dived into my cabin, and presently rejoined the deck with my tall hat tipped over my forehead more than ever.

"Would you like me to take my hat off?" inquired I of the superior, with a sneer. "Would you like me to take my hat off?" asked I of the second, more savage. Then, a better I should again turn my injured head, of every custom-house officer who had been superfluous about that ceremony before. But I was asked sheepish or ashamed, and replied that they had had quite enough of me for one day, and that I might go before certainly not my fault, but their own, that my two pounds of special regulus, which really were in my hat the second time, were not to be found in their proper quota of sense eighteen shillings, to swell the revenues of my native land.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

In court, young Crichton, an impudent limb of the law, trying to break down a female witness's evidence as much as possible, addressed her thus: "Come, stand less steady, and look me in the face."

"Sir," replied the witness, "I am not in the habit of looking at rogues."

In the commencement of that memorable campaign, the conquest of Canada, a volunteer, at the election of two Cree, says that, during the bombardment, General Wolfe was walking to and fro, unknown to the most of the soldiers raining their heads above the embankments which served as a protection to the troops. One called out, thinly, "Better take care there; some of you will get your heads shot off, if you don't mind." "Hadn't ye better take care of your own head, Gen-eral?" replied the other, with a sneer at the general's size. "I don't care, myself, if these shot should get killed," replied the veteran warrior, good-naturedly.

An anxious Scotch mother, on the occasion of her son's leaving home, called him and gave him a piece of good advice, concluding with, "My dear Sammy, my auld man, gies guid advice, but ill does either him or himself. Tak' every thing you can; but the English are a lave ing people, and will take care of them, Sammy. My dear son Sammy, never fight a bold man, for you can not catch him, but run from a coward, for he will run from you."

Calman, when a boy at school, having, together with one of his fellows, been guilty of the crime and misdemeanor of getting through a certain portion of his studies in a surreptitious manner, was called up before the dominie, severely reprimanded, if they chose it, to omit writing their impositions. On the master's departure, Calman, who was said to his comrade, "Well, what shall we do? Shall we write them, or shall we not write them, what do you?" "Oh on the contrary," replied Master George, "I shall certainly not write them."

Some years ago, at the "South End," the Rev. Dr. Hedge was looking at some holes which a countryman was offering to sell. The countryman handed him a jack-knife to note the butter-ill was covered with tobacco crumbs. The Doctor refused the dirty knife, upon which the countryman wiped the blade on his pantaloons, and handed it back.

"I don't like to be troubled the matter much," said Dr. H.

"Some folks are more nice than nice!" says the countryman.

Dr. H. replied, "If you were nicer than you are, you would be nicer."

When Lord Townsend was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the Lord Provost of Dublin lost an opportunity of paying his respects to the Viceroy for "some days." He said his lordship, "you have a great many things and a great many people to attend to, and consequently I excuse you," replied the Viceroy. "What, you take a compliment," answered his lordship. "Zounds! it is impossible I truly meant it as a joke." "And so I accept it," replied the provost, "merely to show you that I can take a joke."

Russell, the singer, was once singing in a provincial town "The Gambler's Wife," and having uttered the words,

"Hush! he comes not yet
He is a wretch indeed,"

he struck the key to imitate the sudden knell of the devoted wife, when a voice from the gallery, loudly exclaimed, to the amusement of every body, "Wouldn't I have his head off!"

This epitaph is inscribed on the grave of a smuggler across the Atlantic:—It was also shot by the excise-men.

Here I lies,
Killed by the XIth.

The following "notice" is posted in the newsroom of a country town:—"Gentlemen leaving it spell are requested to use yesterday's paper."

A certain Irishman, in the heat of his life, was one night walking down a street in the neighborhood of Orford Ness, when he was met by a great ruffian, or shabby fellow, who asked the way to Tyburn. To which Paddy replied, "Sir, if you have any mind to ask the road to whatever you want, and you'll find your way easily." The fellow very heartily thanked him for his advice, and presenting a pistol, ordered him to deliver his money, or this or instant he would shoot him dead. The poor Irishman in his request to comply, though to his great mortification he had but a few shillings in his pocket, which the fellow took, and then rode off with about "the way."

A wealthy Mancunian of considerable pugilistic proclivities, having a costly and sumptuous entertainment in his parlors, the other day said to himself, "Now, I'll have "Suppose I had extra it?" And sparing the funds, addressed to those friends who had been invited to the feast, he had a grand message, which it called, from the incidents, "Extra Invite."

At the municipal election in St. Louis, last April, a great deal depended on the vote of a man named Bill for the Citizens' Consolidate, the opposition to the free Democratic ticket. Just coming up to the polls this person showed that he was not yet entirely rid of the native vehemency of "Kilkenny." "Now, my boys," cried he, "vote the Citizens' ticket, Sir! vote the Citizens' ticket! Destroy your Democratic enemies, and bring home the bacon, I say, and, 'tis me; I'm vote Citizens' ticket! I'm citizen myself, and I'm vote it! Destruction to the top of the polls and exposure a free Democratic ballot."

"Poor Dr. Briggs is dead," said a fond lady. "Of what disease?" "Why, an attack of cholera." "Ah! I thought that he had fitted a newfangled remedy."

"Yes," said the lad, and he tried, He found it true—the Doctor died."

Overheard in a fashionable assembly, a gay youth to a pin a few lectures on poetry. "Yes," said he, "such questions as 'Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?' are not at least to be answered in a judge." "It would be hard," replied the lady, "to find a more severe and unsparing critic of criticism without spending too much of your time. But I infer from what you say, that you would like a poet to be, and then criticise, 'Sad stuff' wretched pentameter! Execrable doggerel—ninety-nine leaves in a hundred you will surely be right."

A man in Ireland, charged with highway robbery, was put on his trial. Counsel for the defense, in some rural district in Ireland, was trying to make out that his client was a victim of "Not Guilty." The astonished judge exclaimed, "Why, counsellor, you don't say that you yourself believe his guilt?" "Why, my lord," replied the counsellor, "I am sorry to say I am compelled to do so, we know that there is no intention a law that he never told a word in all his life."

The following epitome of "counsel learned in the law" is worth at least a hundred of any attorney ever given by limbs of the profession:

"For—single and a single fee,
To all the world I'll be
As zealous as I can be,
Retained for the defense."

A countryman was dragging a calf by a rope in a cross-road, when a passenger asked him if that was the way he treated his fellow-critters.

Hon. J. H. Darby, formerly United States Senator from Delaware, the most distinguished Democrat in politics in his district. He was "stumping" the orange region in southern Florida last May, and just after getting out of the orange, he came to a town, where he was to make a speech. He was met with the request to preside during the course of his harangue got out the following decision in favor:

"Fellow-citizens,—When I was in Florida, a few days ago, swamps below here, yesterday, toward this town, my friend, who was driving me, was attacked suddenly by the tenants of the watery element; and, right in company at the time, I was called upon to decide between them. I, as a soldier, a lot of the biggest kind of bull-frogs stuck up for my side, and the alligators for theirs. Now, gentlemen, it seems my appointment has a strong constituency here. I am sorry that I am not able to decide this case, but refer it to my nerves, when I was yet more startled, for another bull-frog, and the alligators, and I am sorry to say that I am not able to decide this case, but refer it to my nerves, when I was yet more startled, for another opponent has his friends here too. I wonder how I stand in this connection. Oh, I see, I am to be the umpire, and expecting my constituents to raise their voices in my behalf, but I hope they will not do it in such a way that you why. The vote rascals know that if I get elected to the Senate I will go for the Anti-Secret Societies, and their occupation, like Othello's, would be gone, and they would have to look for some other branch for new operations.

A lady advertising for a husband is particular to have it understood that "none need apply who are under six feet high, or over twenty-seven inches." That lady is strongly in favor of hymen?

A lawyer at Lowell having found ninety-five dollars, and inserted a notice to that effect in a paper, the owner says the act may be honest and honorable, but it is certainly not legal tender.

When Lawyer Coe, the other day, at the trial of Jem Smith, in Kent Court, was examining a witness, he observed the box-book he would have many lies in his stomach before he got to the bottom of them. "Gentlemen of the jurors, the great little giant of Georgia, who, were he not so modest, would be a Napoleon, has expressed a wish in discussion with an opponent of unusually large stature, to know his measure, as he desires to get a coat of a commensurately suit of size to the little man, "Why, I should say, from your appearance, that you require about 'Six' to which sarcastic remark Stephens smiling quietly retorted, "I am sure, Sir, from your words that you have more room in your stomach than you have in your head." Thus the laughter which followed effectually dissipated the ill-humor which was gaining ground.

One of our finest writers says, that "the nightly dews come down upon us like blessings." How very differently they come down upon a cockney!

The Philadelphia Ledger says that there are one hundred thousand barrels, of thirty-two gallons each, of liquor lost annually in that city in a year. What a barrel for every man adult in the city!

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, August 9, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have evinced more firmness for flour, suitable brands of which, especially of Genesee, have been sparingly offered, while they have had a good request at advancing prices—closing 15 @ 20 cents per barrel higher than last week. With an active inquiry, prices of sound lots of Wheat, Rye, and Oats, as well as of unassorted and inferior Corn, have favored sellers. Sound corn has not been so much sought after, and it has tended downward. Corn-fed hogs have slightly lost in all unaltered rates. Groceries have been less active, yet, as a whole, the tone of prices has not varied. Provisions have evinced an improvement in general request. Provisions have attracted considerable attention, and, under fresh and stringent orders, the Cattle Yards have exhibits more animation at generally unchanged rates.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were firmer for Beeves, which were less than usually plenty, and in good request. Milch Cows were scarce and quiet. Veal Calves were limited and firmer. Sheep and Lambs were plenty and were heavy. Swine were abundant and dragging.

The Country Produce Markets have exhibited considerable activity. Potatoes are ripe and plenty, and cheap. Other articles tend steadily downward.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT AT THE WASHINGTON MARKET.

Grapes, per pound	$ .10	@ .12
Plums, per basket	3 00	@ ....
Currants, per quart	....	@ ....
Raspberries, per 100 baskets	6 00	@ 8 00
Blackberries, per bushel	2 50	@ 3 00
" New Rochelle, per quart	.05	@ .06
Huckleberries, per bushel	1 00	@ 2 50
Apples, new, per barrel	1 00	@ 2 00
Peaches, per dozen	.12	@ .25
String Beans, per basket	....	@ ....
Onions, new, per barrel	1 50	@ 2 25
Onions, new, per string	.12	@ .25
" per 100 strings	3 50	@ 4 00
Cabbages, per 100 heads	2 75	@ 3 50
Cabbage, new, per 100	2 00	@ 2 50
Squashes, per bushel	....	@ ....
Green Corn, per 100 ears	.50	@ 1 00
Watermelons, per 100	6 00	@ 8 00
Nutmeg Melons, per barrel	1 00	@ ....
Transient Potatoes, per bbl.	....	@ ....
" per 100	1 00	@ 1 50
Corn, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	.14@	.18¾
Eggs, new, per dozen	....	@ ....
Chickens, per pair	.37	@ .75
Ducks, per pair	.50	@ .75
Fowls, per pair	.75	@ 1 00
Ducks, per pair	.63	@ 1 00
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@ 1 50
Turkeys, per pound	.14	@ .16
Pigeons, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Woodcocks, per dozen	2 00	@ 3 00
Snipe, Dowitcher, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 50
Rapes, Cit-eyes, per dozen	1 00	@ ....
Plover, per dozen	3 00	@ 4 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS.
CONDUCTED BY CHARLES DICKENS.
New Series, Volume I. No. 1 (Number 67).
Republished Monthly by the Subscriber.
Decidedly the best Literary Periodical in the English language.
Terms $3 00 a year.
Address
FREDERIC A. BRADY,
196 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET PAID WELL.—"Life's a game to play"—and the Rules and Terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. Never YANKEE will be disappointed in the result. For particulars address, FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

THE REGULAR MAIL LINE via STONINGTON, FOR BOSTON AND PROVIDENCE.—Inland route, the shortest and most direct, carrying the Eastern Mail.

The steamers DELAWARE, Capt. Cook, and STONE, Capt. Comstock, leave Pier No. 2, North River, foot of Courtlandt street, for Stonington and Providence, at 5 o'clock P.M., and Stonington at 8.30 o'clock P.M., or on the arrival of the mail train, which leaves Boston at 5.30 P.M.

The C. VANDERBILT from New York—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday. From Stonington—Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

The PLYMOUTH ROCK from New York—Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. From Stonington—Monday, Wednesday, and Friday.

Passengers leave New York and Stonington, per Railroad to Providence and Boston in the Special Trains, reaching said places in advance of those by other routes, and in ample time for all the early morning trains connecting North and East. Passengers that prefer it remain on board the steamer, enjoy a night's rest undisturbed, breakfast if desired, and leave Stonington in the 7.10 A. M. Train, connecting at Providence with the 11 A.M. Train for Boston.

A Baggage Master accompanies the Steamer and Train through each way.

All baggage, berths, staterooms, or freight, apply on board the steamer, or at the Freight Office, Pier No. 2 North River, or at the office, No. 16 Broadway Pier.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FAIR
will open at
CRYSTAL PALACE
Sept. 6th,
Goods received on and after Sept. 7th.

MOUNT AUBURN CEMETERY
Hand-Book to Mount Auburn, second edition, just published; 12mo, 91 engravings, and a copper-plate plan of the Cemetery. Sent free by mail on receipt of price, 75 cents in stamps.
Address
WM. Y. SPENCER & CO.,
128 Washington Street, Boston.

KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.—To know that when a person worries or suffers from any disease, he physician can benefit as half as much as a dose of Brandreth's Pills, is to be ignorant of the wonderful curative powers of these Pills. Because they at once commence the expulsion of the disease, and before the system absorbs any spread, the disease passes off, the blood is purified, and health is restored. One or two days' use of these pills will save months of sickness and long confinement. A knowledge of them is indeed power, and worth dollars. Principal office, No. 294 Canal street. Sold also at 206 Bowery and 241 Hudson Street, Mrs. H. Jones, Fulton Ferry, Brooklyn; and by all druggists. Price 25 cents a box or 12 pills.
BRANDRETH'S PILLS.—Up-Town Office: at Mr. CAMPBELL'S Drug Store, corner Eighth Avenue and Twenty-Eighth Street.

TO THE BOOK TRADE.
Special Notice.

HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully invite the attention of Booksellers to their

SPECIAL TRADE-LIST FOR THE FALL,

in which their Books are offered at

TRADE-SALE PRICES,

from the 16th of August to the 30th of September, after which their prices will positively be as heretofore.

For Terms, see Special Circular, which may be obtained on application to HARPER & BROTHERS.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y., Aug. 10th, 1858.

THE
"OLD DOMINION"
TEA POT.

ONLY HALF THE USUAL QUANTITY REQUIRED, AND A SUPERIOR BEVERAGE OBTAINED.

THE "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT is made on the same plan as the "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. It is composed of the boiling PLACK TEA. Only ONE HALF the usual quantity of tea required, and a beverage obtained as much superior to the ordinary infusion of tea, as the coffee made in the "Old Dominion" Coffee Pot is superior to coffee made in the common boiler. This is not mere assertion, but fact, as any housekeeper may prove for herself.

The Chinese, who, it is presumed, know something about tea, have used this mode of preparation for ages, and Americans do, a weak infusion. In the latter case, at least half of the expensive article is wasted.

As a matter of economy, to say nothing of the superior excellence of the tea which it produces, the "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT commends itself to all housekeepers.

ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 and 119 South Street,
Philadelphia,
Manufacturers under the Patent for the United States of the "OLD DOMINION" TEA AND COFFEE POTS, and ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

☞ For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

THE
"OLD DOMINION"
COFFEE POT.

The great invention of the day is the "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT, in which coffee can be made without the loss of aroma. Even ordinary coffee in the hands of these pots makes as good drink as the best old Java in such as are commonly used. Wherever introduced, they have given the most complete satisfaction, and, as the round from all parts of the United States is large, and rapidly increasing.

Dr. Hall, of New York, in his Journal of Health for July 15th, says: "We consider the OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT to all lovers of good coffee, as we perceive, a great boon; it is one of the best things offered to the public, in which no imposition is practised, and which fairly performs its promises, and common sense."

The New York Mirror says: "We unhesitatingly pronounce the OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT the most ingenious to simple that a child can use it, and it saves one fourth of the coffee and all the trouble of watching it."

The New York Mercury says: "Virginia, which has given to the world the Washington, the Jefferson, and the Old Dominion, has added to this list a Coffee Pot that was ever invented. We speak for the ladies."

The New York Times says: "The OLD DOMINION French 'Bright,' which American travelers usually bring home with them, is certainly to be said of the 'Old Dominion,' and we doubt if there can be such perfection in beverages produced by any other than the invention placed on our breakfast table daily."

The Christian Intelligencer, Newark, N. J., says: "He who has been luxuriating in the delicious beverage which the OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT yields, will find that for once he tasted since we drank it at the world-renowned Restaurant Vefour, in the Palais Royal, in the Rue Mille Colonnes, Paris. This instrument of philosophy may be obtained, &c."

The Boston Evening Gazette says: "The OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT is decidedly a great institution, and we cannot wish them, in furthering its benefits at the 'Old Dominion,' and we doubt if there can be such perfection in beverages produced by any other than the invention placed on our breakfast table daily."

The Christian Intelligencer, Newark, N. J., says: "He who has been luxuriating in the delicious beverage which the OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT yields, will find that for once he tasted since we drank it at the world-renowned Restaurant Vefour, in the Palais Royal, in the Rue Mille Colonnes, Paris. This instrument of philosophy may be obtained, &c."

The Boston Evening Gazette says: "The OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT is decidedly a great institution, and we cannot wish them, in furthering its benefits at the hand."

The praises are in every woman's mouth. "—Springfield Republican.

The Subscriber will give up our 'OLD DOMINION' for four times its price, if another could not be obtained."—Boston Evening Gazette.

We have given up our 'OLD DOMINION' for three years, and would not exchange it for any other coffee pot we have ever used."—Boston Evening Gazette.

It gives us the entire strength of the coffee."—Boston Evening Gazette.

The 'Old Dominion' is a simple contrivance, and one of use, always to order, and furnished good coffee at one trial."—Boston Evening Gazette.

"The 'Old Dominion' is a simple contrivance, and one of boiling."

"The draught which it makes is nectar compared with that of old-time coffee pots."—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

The Lady's Book says: "The OLD DOMINION is beyond question the best coffee maker ever introduced to the public, and the only one by which all the strength and flavor of the coffee is preserved. It is also admirable for tea or chocolate, and, in short, for every purpose requiring ingenious, and an accurate, scientific principle. We recommend it to all our readers who use coffee. We find that is claimed for it."

The editor of the New York Day Book says: "The economy of the affair is not its least merit, as it extracts the strength of the berry so completely that one quarter less of the coffee was used generally produces that luxury in a degree of perfection we have never before known."

"It is simple in construction, easily used, and will give good coffee always, or not worth the cost thus by the old modes of boiling."—Home Magazine.

The Home Journal says: "Before concluding, we never formed any opinion more rapidly, for we now have daily at our morning meal. It is the perfection of coffee."—New York Delight Journal.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Is manufactured, under the Patent for the United States, by
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 and 119 South Street,
Philadelphia.
Also manufacturers, under the Patent for the United States, of "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT, and ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS AND JARS.

☞ For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE FOR YOUNG GENTLEMEN, Nos. 47 and 49 East 23d Street, near Madison Park, Boarding and Day School. Full course in Engl. Classical, Commercial Mathematics, English, Spanish, German languages, besides the French, which is the language of the school. A Junior Department has been added. For details, references, &c., circulars to be had.
PROF. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY
AND
FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE,
W. H. RAINSFORD, A.M., ... Principal.
A First Class Seminary, perfectly arranged, beautifully located, and with a full corps of teachers.
Board and Tuition in Common English per Term of Twelve weeks, $30 00 if paid in advance.
Fall Term opens, August 23d. Winter Term opens December 14th.
Address the Principal, Fort Plain, N.Y.

"Sparkling with Life and Animation to the very End."

DR. THORNE. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Barchester Towers." One Illust., Muslin, $1 00.

Mr. Trollope has a real sense of fun—a thing not common with novelists. We can premise a hearty laugh to the reader."—Boston Traveller.—"Apart from any good in the author, there is much in the book to please. Mr. Trollope has the gift of telling a story that makes us laugh. There is genuine humor in 'Doctor Thorne.' Its style is natural or ambitiously displayed, but arising from the natural play of the characters. The characters are real creatures of human nature, flesh and blood, vigorously and broadly drawn, but not caricatured. The book is full of fun and natural zest, and as such we commend it to our readers."—Athenæum.

"Mr. Trollope's many admirers will confound with the mass of manufactured fiction that is only meant to last a day, and will welcome 'Dr. Thorne' in its new and handsome dress as a most interesting, and in a literary point of view, valuable addition to English."—London Illustrated News.

"We do not propose to say more than a few words of Doctor Thorne among the illustrations living writers of fiction. * * * Mr. Trollope has the handling in broad and powerful but sure, and under strong restraint; every touch tells, however rapid it may be in the result—firm and telling, subdued with rare technical skill." "The author's broad and vigorous humor, his delicate touch upon character, his subtle and penetrating observation, embrace the whole range of human life, and from the social system into the individual. It is within the strength and consistency of a purpose and a character that the author's humor and observation are unscrupulous in its congruities in dependence and brave humanity."—The London Examiner.

"Mr. Trollope's characters not rarely come as welcome for the author's fun or comments, but really interested in his stories, and, what is more to the purpose, interesting the reader."—The Spectator.

"In Doctor Thorne Mr. Trollope sketches his characters with a firm, powerful hand. There is honesty of intention in the book." "We hear hearty testimony to the healthiness of tone and cheerfulness of spirit which pervade it. Its humor is genuine, and its pathos sweet and natural."—The Examiner.

"Mr. Trollope's exquisite delineations of clergymen and their wives."—John Bull.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Works by Mail, postage paid the any distance to the United States within 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

Ancestors, look to your Interests!!

HOW TO GET A PATENT, OR THE LAWS RELATING THEREIN. New Edition, Revised Text, for 6 cents, or 3 Three-cent stamps. By FOWLER AND WELLS, 308 Broadway, New York.

MISS SEDGWICK'S LIFE of JOSEPH CURTIS.
MEMOIR OF JOSEPH CURTIS. A Model Man. By CATHARINE M. SEDGWICK, Author of Married or Single," "Live and Let Live," &c. &c. "Home Life," "Letter to Young Ladies," &c. &c. 16mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

Joseph Curtis was a merchant and a philanthropist. In the course of his mercantile career he had numerous business relations with Europeans, and he gained the friendship of many of the most distinguished of them. He was one of the Manumission movement in New York, the originator and first superintendent of the Juvenile House of Refuge, and as a most active and practical member of the Society for the Prevention of Pauperism he was one of the citizens of New York. As a careful, kind, and loving father, his life is a model for fathers. His whole character is a plain statement of facts, without empty ideal forms that conceal the facts themselves. Mr. Curtis' career is a model for the youth of our land.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of Fifty Cents.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
TULIPS
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Soap,
Kiss-me-quick Soap.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
692 Broadway.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY STATE AND TERRITORY IN THE UNION.

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the public, because

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unsurpassed.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and are closely scanned by readers.
5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.
TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

TO NERVOUS SUFFERERS.—A retired gentleman having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of great nervous suffering, is willing to assist others by sending (free) on receiving a post-paid directed envelope, information of the name and of the prescription used. Direct the Rev. JOHN M. DAGNALL, 169 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

A SPLENDID NUMBER.
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER.
CONTENTS.
THE FINISHING TOUCH.
Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.
THE THIRD OF THE THIRTY-FIFTH PARALLEL.
Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
THE DEATH OF LOUIS XVI. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.
Illustrated by Three Engravings.
OLD CHARLEY.
Illustrated by Six Engravings.
MUSIC AND DRAMA.
LYDIA LAXTON'S WEDDING.
THE LITTLE ROOM.
OUR HUSBANDS.
THE FOOT RACE.
MEMOIRS OF GENERALS LEE, GATES, STARK, AND MORGAN.
THE IDENTIFICATION.
Illustrated by Six Engravings. By W. M. THACKERAY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Did News from Dunbridge.—A Pathetic Picture.—Lydia Laxton.—Mrs. Grundy.
CHAPTER XXXVIII. In which various Matches are Made.
CHAPTER XXXIX. Sponges and the Philistines.
CHAPTER XXXX. How the Bo Sponges Received the News.—Lydia Laxton's Fairy page of an old Debt, and learns some new ones.
MISCELLANEOUS REVIEWING.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
METHODS OF WORK. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
A NEW SYSTEM OF MUSICAL NOTATION.
4 Illustrations.—A Sketch.—A Sea.—A Double Bar, Rest, and Pause.—Love-letter.—Chickens.—Solos.—Sharps.—A Flat.—A Natural Concert.—Sharps and Flats.—Appendix.
FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.
With Eight Illustrations. Engravings.—Riding Habit.—Hood Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year.....$ 2 00
Two Copies for One Year.....3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

GOUPIL & CO.,
PRINT PUBLISHERS and
IMPORTERS OF COLORMEN,
No. 366 BROADWAY,
NEW YORK.
Engravings, Oil Paintings, Artists' Materials, Frames, &c., &c.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—Before other sewing machines are ever equired this, either as respects the beauty of the stitch, the simplicity, perfection and ease of the work, or the extent of its range.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS
Is the most useful and really the most perfect
BEAUTIFIER IN NATURE.
This admirable preparation of Nature is every day fragrant as a perfume. Elder Flowers have, from the earliest ages, been held in the highest estimation as the most perfect beautifier of the skin. Tan, sun-burn, Freckles, Blotches, &c., it will speedily and completely remove.
BEWARE.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.
Sold by all Druggists. Observe the name, GODFREY, on the wrapper, and all counterfeits, bearing the word and spelt, pronounced, and so completely for the exact, will be avoided. The Proprietor of Elder Flowers will be found beyond all praise, and needs only a trial to be appreciated.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
692 Broadway, N. Y.

"The most perfect Biography of an Artist ever written."

MEMOIRS OF RACHEL. By MADAME DE R——. Two Vols., Muslin, $1 00.
Madame de R—— is full of spicy gossip and anecdote of the great Hebrew tragedienne. The authoress follows her subject through every step of her eventful career, and with her never; recounting with French liveliness and spirit the many incidents of her life, and giving to the whole a strange and confidentiary character. She gives, besides, many interesting particulars of the private life of Rachel, which must confer a high degree of interest upon the great curtain in France.
A book which will attract public attention, and well nerriting it.—Globe.
A clear, concise and interesting book.—Chronicle.
The deep interest felt in the life of so great a dramatic genius will render the book for it a large and ready sale with readers.—Sun.
A work which will be read with avidity.—Advertiser.
The authoress is a lady of remarkable talent, and is evidently a close observer of the human character. Her style is of the highest merit. Her descriptive powers also have already won it, claim for it the high merit of having also written a thoroughly interesting work.—Corr. N. Y. Times.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid to any part of the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of One Dollar.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—
Is the most powerful extirpating purifier of the blood of the body, cleansing them from all deleterious particles, and from the foundation of disease. Ulcers speedily combined, it is unequaled.
Prepared by DR. J. C. SANDS, 100 Fulton St., New York. Price $1 per bottle, or six bottles for $5.

AN ILLUSTRATIVE CATALOGUE
Of HARPER & BROTHERS' Publications, with an Alphabetical and Analytical Index of Subjects, is now in distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing Six Cents in Postage Stamps.
Persons ordering Books, Periodicals, in town or country, desiring to have Libraries or enrich their literary collections with valuable Works at the lowest prices, should be found to procure a large proportion of the standard Books they require from this Catalogue. Gentlemen connected with Public Institutions, Booksellers, Newspaper Editors, &c., will find it, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.
To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.
To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, when ever books can not be obtained through any bookseller in the country, immediate application should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will receive prompt attention.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

A WARNING TO YOUNG LADIES.

POOR JOSEPH he was going to marry the lovely Miss SMITH, of Louisiana, when, late one evening, happening to step out of his room in the boarding-house where they both lived, he met her on the stairs coming out of the bath room. He says the shock was too great: if she'd had twice the money, he couldn't have married her after seeing her so.

HOOPS FOR EVER—NEW STYLE OF BATHING DRESS.

A HINT FOR THE SEA-SIDE.

DREADFUL BOY. "My eye, Tommy, if I can't see the Old Gal's Legs through the peep holes!"

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK WORTH FROM 25 CENTS TO $100 00.

Our new descriptive catalogue of 60 octavo pages, embraces a larger collection and better variety of Standard, Illustrated, Biographical, and Miscellaneous Books than that of any other book selling establishment in the country; also, contains greater inducements than were before offered, mailed free to any address. Send for a Catalogue.

D. W. EVANS & CO., Publishers,
J. S. PRESTON, } 631 Broadway, N. Y. City.

"VROOM & FOWLERS"
WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
Guaranteed to suit the most fastidious.
JOHN B. VROOM, SOLE MAKER, 72 Cherry St., N. Y.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED is a First-Class Family Newspaper, designed to encourage a spirit of Hope, Manliness, Self-Reliance, and Activity among the people; to illustrate Life in all its phases, and ought to be read by every Family.

Published Weekly, at Two Dollars a year, by Fowlers and Wells, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
135 Broadway, New York,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Essex, Connecticut, Hillsboro, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest social position, &c.

NEW HAND-BOOKS.—HOW TO WRITE —HOW TO TALK—HOW TO BEHAVE—and HOW TO DO BUSINESS.—Issued in one large, handsome volume, may be had, prepaid, by Fowler and Wells, for $1 50. Address, FOWLER AND WELLS, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 and $25 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 405 Broadway, New York.
Send for descriptive circular.
E. C. ATWATER & CO.,
Sole Agent for the United States.

CHRISTIAN INQUIRER.
THE CHRISTIAN INQUIRER is published weekly in the City of New York, under the editorial charge of Rev. A. A. Livermore, assisted by the most eminent writers of the Unitarian denomination. It is designed to be fresh, fearless, and reverent, a family religious newspaper of liberal thought and the most advanced Christian tone. Terms.—Delivered by carrier, $2.50 a year; by mail, $2.00 per annum. Address Christian Inquirer, 151 Broadway, New York.
The contributed title-page of the Unitarian denomination in this city.—N. Y. Tribune.
A model paper.—Boston Commonwealth.
One of the best religious newspapers published in America.—Cincinnati Gazette.
One of the ablest Unitarian journals in the country.—N. Y. Daily News.
One of the ablest religious newspapers published in America.—Western Herald.
The ably conducted organ of our Unitarian fellow Christians.—Montreal Herald.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
Five Cents a Number; $3 00 a Year.
TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.
Harper & Brothers, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

COLERIDGE'S COMPLETE WORKS.
The Complete Works of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. With an Introductory Essay upon his Philosophical and Theological Opinions. Edited by Professor Shedd. Complete in 7 volumes. With a fine Portrait. Small 8vo, Muslin, $7 00; Half Calf, $14 00.
Vol. I. Aids to Reflection — Statesman's Manual. II. The Friend. III. Biographia Literaria. IV. Lectures on Shakspeare and other Dramatists. V. Literary Remains. VI. Second Lay Sermon and Table-Talk. VII. Poetical and Dramatic Works.
This is the first complete American edition of the works of the great Poet, Philosopher, and Theologian. It is of a very convenient size and shape, and is set up on good paper and with clear type, and at a price to bring the whole within every reasonable means. The editor's truly valuable introduction, when taken together with the admirable essay of Dr. Marsh, places the edition far above any other, not excepting the one in England published by Coleridge's daughter. It ought to find its way into every well-selected library in this country.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

ANOTHER WARNING TO YOUNG LADIES.
Beware of silks, if you wear skeleton skirts. This unhappy young creature had been two hours in the above position, when our Artist gallantly took her portrait, and then set her free.

COMMERCIAL AGENTS WANTED. For particulars, address (inside enclosed) H. E. L., Litchfield, Conn.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER CURE AT FLORENCE. Descriptive Circulars sent free. Northampton Depot, Duffy & Co., Franklin Pier No. 1, foot of Murray st., N. R.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

AQUARIUM.—This day is published in 1 volume 12mo, beautifully illustrated, $1 50.
Send free by mail on receipt of the price.
LIFE BENEATH THE WATERS;
Or, The Aquarium in America.
By Andrew N. Thwaites.
H. Ballière, 290 Broadway, New York.

THE "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT.
Thousands of this new Coffee Pot have already been sold, and the demand from all parts of the United States is rapidly on the increase. Wherever introduced, it has given the most complete satisfaction.
THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Makes better coffee than it is possible to obtain in any other way, because, by an ingenious but simple arrangement, the grounds are not boiled, but the coffee is drawn through them, without loss of aroma, thus securing all the elements of the coffee in their natural and proportional combination.
THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Is manufactured under the patent for the United States by
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
117 & 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia.
Also, manufacturers for the United States of ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED PATENT AIR-TIGHT SELF-SEALING CANS AND JARS
For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and Storekeepers generally.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINE for all manufacturing purposes.—To ascertain the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, it is only necessary to inspect any manufactory or dwelling who uses one. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, which will be supplied gratis. It gives full information on all points.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. II.—No. 86.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.

It is a just cause of exultation on the part of the people of the United States that the inception and the completion of the oceanic telegraph are due to American genius and American enterprise. The possibility of realizing the dream of that connecting the continents of Europe and America was first seriously discussed at the residence of Cyrus W. Field; and it is a remarkable fact that the seven gentlemen then present not only at once organized themselves into a Company to carry out the project, but also practically established themselves as the twenty-seven elements demanded to accomplish the object.

Cyrus W. Field, who has so entirely identified himself with the enterprise that, in all future time, his name will be a synonym of that, the greatest triumph of the nineteenth century, is a perfect specimen of the Americans in their manner, habit, and those practical minds, joined with vast conceptions, that have raised our people to their present proud pinnacle of superiority among the nations of the earth. His father is the Rev. David D. Field, pastor of the Congregational Church at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, where he still performs his sacred duties.

Cyrus is one of six brothers, each of whom is distinguished for superior natural ability and high moral worth. The name of David Dudley Field, the eldest brother, is familiar throughout the Union for his legal ability, and, as the author and originator of the "Code," for world-wide fame. His law-reputation, which will identify his name with the great results of the nineteenth century, is that of new Dickinson Field and Jonathan Edwards Field are leading lawyers in their native State, and have been recipients of some of the highest honors of the Commonwealth. Stephen Johnson Field is at present one of the Supreme Judges of California. Timothy Martyn Field, the youngest brother, is an eminent clergyman, and editor of the New York Evangelist. Cyrus Field, who is the second brother save Henry, was born at Stockbridge, in the year 1819. After arriving at an age when business busines he came to New York, and made his first essay under the guidance of A. T. Stewart, the eminent merchant of Broadway. Displaying, from fullness in the discharge of all his duties was characteristic of the man, he soon left the counting-room to be at the head of one of the largest houses in the Union engaged in the manufacture and sale of paper. Some four years ago, he, and as we have already stated, in a social circle at Mr. Field's became the idea of the Atlantic telegraph was discussed, and Mr. Field at once became inspired with the idea of its practicability, and formed the whole energies of his active mind to bring about the result. An association was at once formed, composed of Peter Cooper, Moses Taylor, Marshall O. Roberts, Chandler White, S. F. B. Morse, David Dudley Field, and the first step Cyrus, with his brother Dudley and Chandler White, went to Newfoundland. Their reception by the inhabitants was cordial, and every facility was afforded them to carry out their wishes. Every assistance was rendered by the men of war this sagacity displayed at the outset of the enterprise that subsequently procured in its favor such confidence among the commercial men of unusual sympathy.

A first telegraph was at once constructed from St. John, Newfoundland, across that island, of more than three hundred miles in length; passing through a rough, wild country, covered with forests, tangled forest, and broken rock. Then followed the submarine telegraph across the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the laying of which at the time attracted so much attention, particularly from the citizens of New York. The first attempt, as is well known, terminated, was a failure, and the cable was lost. Undismayed by the catastrophe, Mr. Field quickly returned from the disastrous trip, ordered a new cable, and then set to work vigorously for the recovery of the one at the bottom of the sea. The story to all expectation he was successful, and the Company, by his magnificent and indefatigable perseverance, was secured against any material loss. A communication was now consummated with Cape Breton, connecting with the then existing line in Nova Scotia. The Company then obtained grants and charters for lines from Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Maine, and Canada.

The preliminary labor on this eminent having been thoroughly accomplished, Mr. Field, in 1856, started for Europe. Few encouraged him in his expectations; all persuaded him to desist. On the his last trip across the Atlantic, when leaving a number of his friends, one said, "When shall we see you again?" "Not," returned Mr. Field, "until I have laid the cable!" Such was the spirit of confidence he maintained under all the discouragements which beset his path. Failure never could his order, or lessened his abiding faith in a final triumph. As the third time he left for the cable, it will be remembered that the cable from some unexplained cause would run out from the Agamemnon, and the hearts of the most sanguine sickened. In the midst of the gloom occasioned by this disaster, the news reached us that Mr. Cyrus W. Field is still sanguine of success." The terrible storm following that meeting, and the most active to have insensible preparations made to "try again." Such energy and indomitable action to triumph, has an inspiration about it that thrilled through the hearts of all who were engaged in the enterprise; it communicated itself to the commander, officers, and men attached to the ships engaged in the expedition, and made them all work as one man, throwing into their labors a religious fervor that partook of the sublime. When the possibility of laying the cable had ceased to be discussed, when success or discouragements were alone indulged in; when it was deemed almost impossible to unite the continents by the electrical current; when, in fact, the subject had ceased to occupy the public mind, save as a reminiscence of the past, the joyful announcement was made that the cable is laid." The heart of the whole world was thrilled at the news, and there went up rejoicings to Heaven more universal, more solemnly thankful, than has ever been called forth by any human event—the mightiest triumph of the nineteenth century was accomplished—not equal to the civilization and grandeur of the age.

We conclude this brief sketch with the following from the Springfield Republican:

"Mr. Field is about 39 years of age, rather slender, of medium size, has a light, little body, all muscle and nerves, and no flesh, five feet eight inches high, and weighs rather less than 150 pounds. His features are sharp and prominent, a nose that almost exhausts his face; eyes small, sunken, gray or blue, and apparently half closed; a large fore-head, and a full head of auburn hair. There is a youthful, almost boyish appearance about him, that makes him seem younger than he really is. There is little of the ingenuousness of figure and manner about him that distinguish his brother Dudley of the New York bar."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 21, 1858.

THE UNITED STATES AGAIN A BANK.

FOUR times since the formation of the Constitutional Federacy have the United States come into the market to borrow money. First, for the most legitimate of all borrowing purposes, the defence of Independence; next, for a very necessary purpose, the war which secured American vessels from search by the Foreign Powers; third, for the war which was waged with Mexico; and now, lastly, for the ordinary expenses of the Government, being borrowed because the revenue are inadequate to defray. There is at all events a satisfaction in reflecting that the six years of peace being found on the average for the United States and their posterity, in the shape of a national debt, which will be paid by the means of gratifying any greedy lust for unnecessary territory, or any ignorant prejudice against unnecessary slavery. Nobody, therefore, can complain that in the years 1847 and 1848 errors of judgment laid an unnecessary load on the backs of the American people. The loss was imperatively required.

Those who resist Mr. Buchanan's administration for the purpose of getting rid of him, find some serious honesty to party prejudice. They know, if they know any thing, that Mr. Buchanan is virtuous enough to relieve the pecuniary embarrassments of the Government. There has been no material increase in the cost of the Government since the year 1856. Taxation, indeed, considering the constantly increasing cost of every commodity which must be purchased, and the increased wants of the country, for which it is necessary to be more economical and parsimonious than ever, in the country, for half of its servants are underpaid, has been a very oppressive taxation—a very costly performance, undoubtedly, for the unfortunate taxpayers. But the policy of Mr. Buchanan's administration may be said to have added nothing to the usual burdens of the country. This was natural. The present administration of government arises not from an increased expenditure, but from a diminished revenue—a diminished revenue which has arisen from the entire control than the Queen of Great Britain.

It was undoubtedly a mistake in the early financial difficulties of the country to make the whole substantial revenue of the country from customs duties. Protective fallacies probably sometimy the Democratic party, and the fact must be remembered, when even the clear-headed Southern Democrats thought well of the Protective policy. But from whatever cause the false coin sprang, of its baseness there can now be no question. The United States, which, a couple of years ago were almost ready to pay taxes to pay at twenty per cent premium, are now in the market as a borrower; and the reason simply is, that they have not the cash. The banks, merchants, and corporate institutions of various kinds, the people of the country have been forced to pay their own premium for the specie coin-notice. Thus it appears that when Mr. Buchanan, in his message to Wisconsin, chooses to deny himself French claret, and revile Lyons silks, or his children British pearlware, this country is not materially benefited, or brought to a dead lock for want of money.

However, the nation is generally so prosperous, and the system of government in general so satisfactory, that even those who see most clearly the radical failure of our present financial system are disposed to be patient against hope. The suggestion that the Government ought to meet the present deficiency in the revenue by increasing the duties was considered by many unjust; but no one took it up, and it was hardly considered worth discussion by Congress. An idea prevailed that next year, at furthest, the revenues from customs would reach their old standard, and that the Government would begin again to redeem its bills payable, so that no burden would be laid on posterity. Furthermore, people generally, being used to form superficial judgments, saw that the want of money was indirect and concealed, to a light one which they could see and feel in the exactions of the tax-gatherer. They would rather pay twenty-five cents additional on the pound of coffee than contribute a dime in coin to relieve the necessities of the Government. Thus, even if every citizen or landholder could have paid his proportion of a direct tax in specie—in which shape alone the Government could receive it, no matter how scarce coin might happen to be in this or that region—every very loyal citizen would have decidedly objected to pay it; and so all, or nearly all, have gladly acquiesced in a scheme which relieved them from a present exaction at the cost of future indebtedness. It is wrong, said Aristides, borrowing over the sea and over ten loan, but Providence and the revival of trade will mend all.

Meanwhile it is pleasant to know that neither the revulsion nor the slavery quarrel has shaken the credit of the Confederacy. The loan was taken at 6 per cent which is really about 5½ per cent. interest to its holders. This is nearly as well as the European governments can do; better perhaps than any save only Great Britain. Foreigners offered a premium of 3 to 3½ per cent people took it at 4 to 5, and will probably be able if it be to have some foreigners at a comfortable advance on these rates. And our country friends ought to know that, but for the prospect that Mr. Cobb may do-morrow advertise for other ten millions, the premium would have been 8 to 10 instead of 3 to 5. This does not look as though there were any timid people—the capitalists—had any lively faith in the schemes of the Secessionists.

A HINT FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

In view of the lull in the slavery excitement, and of the probable consent of Congress, next session, to the admission of Kansas, with the constitution she likes best, into the Confederacy, we beg to suggest to the Administration the propriety of diverting the public thoughts into new channels.

It is not generally known in this country that the present ruler of the fifteen or twenty odd German States of Europe becomes, by the mere act of birth, liable to military duty in each of those States. German Princes, like princes, and dukes, commence to have rights of property in their subjects as the cradle. Every male child born in Germany is the subject of a prince. So many years of that child's labor, or a compensation in money therefor, are secured to the ruler of the principality in which he was born to light, by the law of the land, which can not be changed any more than the laws of Medes or Persians. The law of the people of the United States have no right to interfere. If the Germans should submit to a law which dedicated their children's life to the service of the little princes and grand dukes, that would be their business, not ours.

But the Germans, like the old English law, conveniently denies that the subject can divest himself of his allegiance. A German, having become a child, coming to this country, becoming naturalized, and living here as a citizen ten, twenty, thirty, forty years, can not escape from the land of his birth without being liable to arrest and condemnation to military service. No prince, however, the lawyers say, has any claims of his prince upon him. He can not shake off the incubus; nor can time wear out the tie. The subject left his home in the nurse's arms, and may return a gray-headed grandfather: the prince will be upon him with the law of the Medes and Persians. No lawyer can find a plea that will save him from the warring sentence of the courts. No United States Consul can protect him. The naturalization treaties of States citizen who has had the misfortune to be born in the realm of the Grand Duke of Baden or the King of Prussia.

We are putting no imaginary case. Several United States citizens are at this moment cavalry soldiers of the Grand Duke will in the army of the King of Prussia. Their appeals for protection have been unheeded. No step has been taken for their rescue. Had they been Englishmen, and their oppressor Great Britain, the country would have resounded with frantic appeals for sympathy, and every able newspaper would have shrieked for leave to punish the insolent English. Yet the Germans are not Englishmen, and we don't feel any particular emotion one way or the other about Germany—and so these citizens are left to their fate. Probably Mr. Vroom and Mr. Murphy have done what they could.

Under Mr. Buchanan to borrow a hint from General Jackson, and insist on the surrender of these citizens of the United States, the act of naturalization of whom which the municipality of the martyrs would be forgotten. People would at once realize the importance of vindicating the sovereignty of the United States citizen in Germany, and Congress would sustain the President to any length. No hostilities would be needed: a mere embargo on Prussian merchandise would soon bring the Government to terms. Mr. Buchanan might, if he were so disposed, exact and obtain the surrender of these fellow-citizens of his with all military honors and any reasonable indemnity; and he would be a popular man. He will never have such a popular for the time as if he had conquered a kingdom. Remember Marcin Koszta.

SCARIFICATION AFTER THE BLISTER.

EVERY medical man has met with cases of internal irritation and inflammation that were too acute to be wholly cured, though they might be relieved, by the primitive remedy of the blister. In such cases the common practice is—leaving to his patient too well to shrink from the infliction of necessary pain—will resort to the severer remedies of scarification, the cautery, and the moxa. We apprehend that our relations with our patient, the New York Herald, are somewhat similar. That the blister we applied last week has been followed by some satisfactory results; but we can see very plainly that, in this case, the internal symptoms are too acute, and the irritation (which appears to arise from comparatively decreased vitality) too deeply seated, to disappear without further excternal treatment. We therefore proceed, at present, to all moderateness, to scarify the seat of the disease, reserving the cautery and the moxa for future use, in case of absolute need.

Our readers will remember how, last week, we proved that a work on horse-taming, written by Messrs. Rarey and Murphy, and published by George Holbrook, having been sent to the Tribune office for review, was by the editors of that sheet cheerfully seized, reprinted, copyrighted in the name of Horace Greeley & Co., published as original matter in the Tribune issue and in pamphlet form, and presented to the world as the Tribune's contribution to the literature of the season. We showed that eight different sections of the Tribune's essay—and the only parts thereof which contained any thing like original composition—were literally and correspondingly sections of Bentwright's work, even the faulty punctuation and bad grammar having been copied by the Tribune. To this that journal replies by admitting that "there is a coincidence in language between certain passages of our publication and certain passages of Mr. Bentwright's."

This is sublime. Between two and three whole columns of the Tribune were filled with matter copied from Mr. Bentwright, and the Tribune calls it a "coincidence in language." We should rather think it was a coincidence. Just as the Pentateuch was a coincidence with the Tribune version of the "Virginians," which was "carefully expurgated from a large edition," and the version bought by the Harpers from Mr. Thackeray, and reprinted with catchwords in the margin. Just as there was a coincidence between two copies of the same book, or two impressions from the same type. Just as there was a case in the old-fashioned comedy: "John, you rascal" says the old Baronet, "how dare you wear my clothes?" "Why, Sir?" says John, "why—why—the fact is, I've got one just like yours—in shape—" "Coincidence, coincidence, Sir!" replies the old baronet, "coincidence! don't I see my papers in the pocket?"

But the Tribune has another excuse. It says:

"These coincidences . . . grew out of the fact that we had received from Mr. Rarey the MS. which he had given him full credit for the whole; while Mr. Holbrook's book has had only the same general basis."

Assuming, for argument's sake, this very wretched excuse to be in the main true in fact, it aggravates the offence. By what right does the editor of the Tribune copy or "make extracts" (without quotation marks) to the extent of nearly three columns from a book which, from another and a rival, Rarey's or Holbrook's, it matters not which—and then publish the extracts as original matter? By what right share has Mr. Rarey in the profits of the Tribune pamphlet? Here is a man, Rarey, who has spent his life in studying the art of horse-taming, the fruit of his labors is this book, on the sale of which he relies for his reward; here is the announcement of the Tribune step in, gut the book, republish it, copyright it in their own name, and carry off the profits. What kind form of writing is this—familiar and more indecent than this?

If a man set another on to steal, not when the Tribune has robbed—whether Mr. Holbrook or Mr. Rarey. We will only remark that in denying, at first, the charge that the Tribune had robbed, and in confessing that they robbed Rarey, the proprietors of the Tribune have to the full the consciousness that they made when they first published their horse-taming article. The following comparison will show this:

From the Weekly Tribune of July 31.	From the New York Tribune of July 24.
"We lay before the readers of the Tribune this week a very interesting account of the art of horse-taming, as practised by Mr. Rarey, of Ohio. We feel sure in fact that the Tribune is the veriest dullard that ever lived, if it is not the knowledge of the public in regard to the matter of this art. . . . It has been prepared for us by Mr. Rarey himself, and is full of interest."	"This is a coincidence in language between certain passages of our publication and certain passages of Mr. Bentwright's. There is a coincidence in language between certain passages of our publication and certain passages of Mr. Bentwright's. . . . We received from Mr. Rarey the MS. which he had given him full credit for the whole."

We might go on to show that the Tribune never did, as it says it did, "give credit to Mr. Rarey for the whole" of its publication, or that remark upon its mean flap at "speculators who might attempt to republish the article in book form," when the fact is that the book was the most valuable and honest literary speculation we have ever seen. But we forbear. One word suffices.

The principal editor of the Tribune, to whom we presume we do no injustice in holding him responsible for the course of that journal, is now fast advancing in years. He is said to be in possession of considerable wealth, is surrounded by his friends, and well known to a very large section of the people of the United States. We put it to him whether his reputation will be a gainer by despoiling men like Mr. Holbrook or Mr. Rarey. The profits on the sale of the Tribune pamphlet can not be very great; are they worth the shame he must now feel? Are they worth the loss of respect this affair must cost him? And these little lucrenies are trifling in comparison with the sacrifice of truth which the Tribune has made every wretched quibbles and falsehoods this Horse-taming speculation has cast the Tribune! Can a few hundred additional subscribers to the Weekly Tribune compensate Mr. Horace Greeley for the ruin of his character as a truth-speaking man? We protest that these remarks are suggested by the purest kindness, and that we should rejoice to see him set himself straight with the public. But how can he expect people to disbelieve the current stories with which his political opponents love to couple his name, when they see that, for a few hundred dollars, the Tribune takes the bread out of poor men's mouths, and humiliates itself by all kinds of prevarication to hide the fact?

A CABLE-ISTIC LAY.

BY EBENEZER SPROUT.

The cable is safely locked
  In Davy Jones's locker,
And not entirely gone to "old Nick,"
  As some old Knickerbocker

Prognosticated long ago,
  Before this joyful day;
But now one end's on the land of "Bulls,"
  And t'other's in the Bay.

Then hurrah for th' Atlantic cable!
  And useful may it be,
For though in truth it's out of sight,
  It lies safe in the sea.

We're glad that the work is done,
  We're proud of those who have done it,
Though we wonder the wire wasn't broke by the strains
  The poets put upon it.

'Tis said that way down in the deep,
  Away from the light and the air,
The mermaids have often inspected the wire,
  And call it a "Shocking affair!"

But the murmurs of these maids
  Will be of no avail,
For we never can b'lieve the tale of a fish,
  Or a maid with a fish's tail.

What a saving of pens, ink, and paper;
  And only to think how fine,
To get all the news from the other side
  By dropping a single line!

New Jersey, Aug., 1858.

THE LOUNGER.

AUTHORS AND LECTURERS.

"Let laws and learning, art and commerce die,
But God preserve to us our old nobility."

Thus, or similarly, sings Manners, the celebrated bard of Britain.

Who is Manners?

What a question! What woeful ignorance! Let us hasten to know our Manners, and behave. His name is John—he is a lord—he is the son of the Duke of Rutland—he was the leader of "Young England," a party whose poetic existence is passed in Disraeli's novels—he has been, we believe, "Woods and Forests" in the old Derby Ministry—but Lord John Manners is chiefly famous for the distich above quoted.

Inspired by that generous sentiment, some great and good men of England concluded to correct the obliquity of the earth's axis by means of a new paper—the Saturday Review—of which about one hundred and fifty numbers have been issued, and which is one of the cleverest papers, and by far the most conceited, that John Bull produces for his weekly entertainment. This astute periodical has discovered many mares'-nests; but the most interesting and important treasure of that kind which it has unearthed is the fact that "Mr. Thackeray is the great creator and support of the 'new profession'—that of what is euphemistically called lecturing, but what is really taking a man's personal appearance into the market."

This passage occurs in the course of an article upon the Thackeray and Yates controversy, which is one of the coarsest, meanest, and most ungentlemanly articles ever printed in an English journal. The title of the paper is "Gentlemen Authors:" its philosophy is that no gentleman who is an author would ever make capital out of gossipy, and scandalous, and caricatured sketches of fellow-authors; and then, by way, doubtless, of illustrating gentlemanly conduct in editors, says of one of the most eminent literary men of this century:

"He took into the market his 'silvery hair,' his 'bloodless and not particularly expressive face,' his 'fractured nose,' and his 'small gray whiskers.' He sold a good stare at them to thousands of curious and eager purchasers. * * * * Mr. Thackeray makes money by showing himself at a lecture, and Mr. Yates makes money by describing what is shown. * * * * We must admit that all Mr. Thackeray would have gained by refusing to be Barnumized was something infinitesimal and inappreciable; and he would have lost a sum of money which the aspect of a bloodless face and a broken nose can rarely procure. To go to market with himself, and satisfy curiosity at a scale of prices regulated according to proximity, was not to do any thing dishonorable. It was not any thing ungentlemanly, like cheating at cards or telling a lie."

Whether such writing as this, of a man like Thackeray, is considered, by the readers of the Saturday Review, "any thing dishonorable," "any thing ungentlemanly, like cheating at cards," is impossible to say; for what can be predicted of people who considered that poor popinjay, George the Fourth, the first gentleman in Europe, and whose laws sent a man to jail for calling him a fat Adonis of sixty? In a country where such painful and ludicrous stuff as this is put forth as reputable journalism in defense of gentlemanly conduct (which was assumed to be in danger because Mr. Thackeray, being a gentleman, had also delivered lectures), it was certainly high time that the caustic of "Vanity Fair" and "The Book of Snobs" was applied.

The English press is never tired of talking about American rudeness and coarseness, and disgusting personal and private discussion in the newspapers. But never, in the worst article of any respectable paper in this country of standing like that of the Saturday Review in England, was there such indecency as this. That such a paper should undertake to dictate the canons of gentlemanly behavior is a joke beyond Rabelais.

But if such are its instincts of delicacy, its intellectual perceptions are equally ludicrous. A lecture delivered by a gentleman of celebrity is an exposure of his person for pecuniary profit! Coleridge, Carlyle, Hazlitt, Sir Humphrey Davy, Dickens, Sir Charles Lyell, Sir Roderick Murchison, Emerson, and all who have been paid for speaking in public, have concluded "to let Barnum have his Chinese dwarf;" every one of them has "gone to market with himself," has "degraded literature," and goes "about in his literary caravan." The article quotes Tennyson (whose name be always mentioned with a blessing!) as choosing the better part by publishing poems instead of reciting them.

But does not Tennyson receive money for his poems? And what is lecturing but publishing your work by your own tongue instead of types? Thackeray's "English Humorists" is one of his most delightful books. Would the Saturday Review have been scurrilous about him if he had sold the MS. for a thousand pounds? Why fling dirt, then, because he chose to make the thousand pounds by reading it himself, deepening by the mysterious charm of personality the just impression and effect of his own work? If a sensible man would give five shillings for Dickens's "Christmas Carol," wouldn't he willingly give ten shillings to hear Dickens read it? Had there been types in his day, would it have been "ungentlemanly" for Homer to sing his songs? Would it be "ungentlemanly" for Shakespeare to play his own "Hamlet?"

That the Saturday Review represents in any degree the public manners of educated and thoughtful Englishmen we are very slow to believe. But that one of the men whose names are justly dear to all who honor English literature should be so wantonly and personally insulted, is a very grievous offense to honorable men every where.

THACKERAY AND YATES.

The names of the three most eminent English novelists have lately been thrust before the public under very disagreeable circumstances. The unfortunate domestic difficulties of Mr. Dickens and of Sir Edward Lytton have furnished delicious staple for scandal; and a quarrel of Mr. Thackeray with Mr. Yates, a London litterateur, has been the occasion of a good deal of bitter criticism.

The facts are simply these:

Mr. Thackeray and Mr. Yates belong to the Garrick Club, in London. They are both authors, and Mr. Yates is a contributor to a two-cent paper called Town Talk—a journal of social, literary, theatrical, and political gossip, established a few months since. A recent number of that paper contained a personal sketch of Thackeray, closely describing his appearance, and saying:

"No one meeting him could fail to recognize in him a gentleman; his bearing is cold and uninviting; his style of conversation either openly cynical or affectedly good-natured and benevolent; his bonhomie is forced, his wit biting, his pride easily touched; but his appearance is invariably that of the cool, suave, well-bred gentleman, who, whatever may be rankling within, suffers no surface display of his emotion."

In the Ninth Part of "The Virginians," published in Harper's Magazine for August, at the beginning of the twenty-fifth chapter, Thackeray writes, after saying some things bitter-sweet:

"Women will be pleased with these remarks because they have such a taste for humor, and understand irony; and I should not be surprised if young Grubstreet, who corresponds with three penny papers, and describes the persons and conversation of gentlemen whom he meets at his 'clubs,' will say, 'I told you so! He advocates the thrashing of women! He has no nobility of soul! He has no heart!' Nor have I, my eminent young Grubstreet! any more than you have ears."

But besides this notice of the conduct of Mr. Yates, Thackeray wrote him a letter demanding an apology, which Mr. Yates declined, upon the ground that Thackeray's letter was offensive. Thackeray then brought the matter before the Garrick Club. Mr. Dickens, one of the committee, censured Thackeray; but it was finally decided to ask Mr. Yates to resign.

There may be great differences of opinion as to the treatment of such publications. It would, doubtless, have been wiser, at least more politic, for Thackeray to remain silent. But no man can well judge the conduct of another under such circumstances. Thackeray's ground probably was, that a club of gentlemen can not exist if any member is suffered to be guilty of ungentlemanly conduct and remain a member. Consequently, considering Mr. Yates's conduct merely from that point, Thackeray might justly claim his expulsion by the Club, not out of regard to himself, but as a sign of the respect which the Club owed to itself.

The defense of Mr. Yates is, that Thackeray has sinned in the same way—if sin it be—much more shamefully; that his "Book of Snobs" was so faithful a caricature of gentlemen belonging to various clubs as to be entirely recognizable, and the source of constant mortification; and, according to the latest account, Mr. Yates had refused to apologize.

Of course this opens the old, old question in literature, how far, and how much, and in what way an author may use his personal experience in writing his books. The only just and generous rule seems to be this: that no author will so individualize a character by personal defects or eccentricities as to make it necessarily and offensively recognized as the portrait of a particular person. But while this is so, of course individual traits must be described. Thus it is not fair to assume that an English statesman who is described in a novel as a gentleman who gets drunk and spends money freely, is therefore Sheridan. A satirist of course satirizes society and character as it appears to him; but it does not follow that he intended Becky Sharp as a portrait of Mrs. Toad because Mrs. Toad is a woman of the same character and principles and ambition as Becky Sharp. It is the multitude of Mrs. Toads, of various individualities, but of the same general character, which gives a certain tone to society, that stimulates the satire.

Now any reader, at this distance, easily sees that the men in the "Book of Snobs" are typical club men. The very titles of the chapters show the nature of the work: "On Clerical Snobs," "Military Snobs," "Great City Snobs," "On some respectable Snobs," "Party-giving Snobs," "Continental Snobs," "On literary Snobs." Of course individual instances furnish the basis of the generalization; but when, in the "Book of Snobs," Thackeray is personal, the disguise is so thin that you see through it, as he means you shall. "TheodoreCrook," "The Right Honorable Tom Macau," "Young Ben de Minories," "Mrs. Wallop," are very transparent names. And when the author speaks of Theodore Hook, or Macaulay, or Disraeli, or Mrs. Trollope, he speaks of their public performances—of what they have challenged the public to speak upon. So, when he describes Lieutenant-Colonel Snobley—who wore japanned boots and mustaches, lisped, drawled, and left the r's out of his words, always flourishing about and smoothing his lacquered whiskers with a huge flaming bandana that filled the room with an odor of musk—any military gentleman of such peculiarities of manner would be an extremely foolish gentleman if he flew into a passion and bellowed "That's me! and I'll suck the villain's heart's-blood!"

So Dickens, who, it appears, censured Thackeray, has drawn in his "Bleak House" a character, Harold Skimpole, which is universally declared to be founded upon Leigh Hunt. The charge is not just; for, however pecuniarily easy and careless Leigh Hunt may be, he is not a smirking idiot like Harold Skimpole, and neither he nor his friend can be justly angry with Dickens for drawing such a character, although he may have some traits in common with the genial poet and charming essayist.

Mr. Yates's defense seems to us entirely untenable upon simpler grounds. That an author, in his observation of society, should cull certain peculiarities, and, in pursuing an evident general and literary purpose, should reproduce them in various forms, is no excuse for another man's conduct, who, being a fellow-member of a club upon the tenure of ordinary gentlemanly behavior, deliberately uses the opportunity of his association with that author to describe him personally and offensively—doing dirty work to gratify a dirty love of gossip, and to earn a dirty penny.

Of course there is a natural personal curiosity about famous people, and only those who know them—whether in a club or any where else—can describe them. But delicacy and decency easily determine the limits within which such work is possible. And they are very narrow limits indeed.

RACHEL ONCE MORE.

Madame B—— has written a life of Madame R——, which has been translated and republished here. Every thing relating to the famous actress is interesting. The paper of personal reminiscences in the July Number of Harper's Magazine was very attractive. In fact the personality of every celebrated man or woman is full of charm, whether we approve or disapprove the career.

The present life of Rachel seems, upon the whole, just. It gives a detailed account of her theatrical life from the beginning—and it is fairly a question whether she had any other. She was born an actress; and the tragic tone and element pervade her whole career. There was a certain loneliness in her splendor and success which is very touching. After all, she seems to have been a kind of gladiator, fighting for life, for glory, and for gain. In Madame B.'s estimate, her most brilliant triumphs had a sordid strain. Perhaps quite half of the statue was clay.

The constant contest with the public in Paris, and her many failures, will surprise those who imagine that Rachel walked over flowers and ducats from the café where she first sang to the fatal night at Charleston when she played last. The story is instructive for those who suppose that genius has no struggle even after it is universally conceded. It is in vain that Napoleon has filled the world with the renown of Marengo. When he deploys at Austerlitz he puts the glory of Marengo at stake. We say it is a question whether Rachel had any other life than that of the stage. We mean, of course, any describable life. But the peculiar interest in the woman is such—the tragic tone is so evident—that the reader wonders, as he lays down this book, what thoughts, hopes, disappointments, dreams, lay beyond and beneath all that can be told.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—A modest poet sends a specimen of song to the Lounger, to know if it be poetry. Let him read it carefully in print and consider if it be grammar.

ENCOURAGEMENT.

Look up, poor wounded, tortured heart!
  Too long hath grief held scope,
So filled with woe—so pierced and wrung—
  Oh! hast thou room for hope?

Sorrow, and wrong, and hopelessness
  Hath been thy portion long;
Full bravely hast thou borne their weight,
  Will joy find thee as strong?

"Virginia, August, 1858.

"Dear Mr. Lounger.—There is quite an interesting little love affair going on in our quiet country village. Can you give a few moments to the touching recital?

"A lovely young poetess, desperately smitten with a youth who twirls an elegant mustache between his delicate thumb and forefinger, is about to pay a visit to the city. He—the youth—is as much in love with the poetess as she is with him.

"He is after the most approved style of modern Southern gentlemen, plays the guitar and sings—oh! such delightful songs—a la mode. (In fact, all of us girls are a little taken with him.)

"You should see the love-glances that the two lovers cast at each other when they meet—she, full of soul, looking such worlds of love into his dark eyes, and he casting back glance for glance.

"But they must part to-morrow. I fear they can not say, like Juliet,

'Parting is such sweet sorrow
That I shall say good-night till it be morrow.'

"Would it not prove sad if they were to marry, and, in after years, when the love-dream shall be dashed away, quarrel, and prove—as a distinguished couple have lately done—love to be all a myth.

"Dear Mr. Lounger, do you believe in love?

"Respectfully, Belle Heron."

—Venerable Loungers, dear Belle, who have loitered about the world, learn that there is but one treasure. What that is your "lovely young poetess" may discover before she is aware, if she marries her friend of the guitar. That they love each other seems to be no reason for supposing that they are to be unhappy. Suppose they did not, and thought of marrying?

"New York.

"Dear Lounger,—Can you oblige one of your lady readers by telling her where she can obtain a piece of poetry, written by Mrs. Norton some time ago, called The Soldier of the Rhine, or Bingen on the Rhine? I have looked for it in vain. Could you either publish the verses or give an answer through your Letter Box, and so oblige, Yours, respectfully, W. S. W."

—The Lounger is glad to gratify his correspondent, and his readers and himself, by republishing the very pretty poem of Mrs. Norton's, which leads a doubtful and dangerous life in the corners of newspapers.

BINGEN ON THE RHINE.

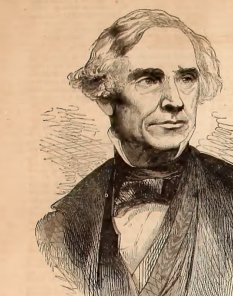
A soldier of the Legion lay dying at Algiers,
There was lack of woman's nursing, there was dearth of woman's tears;
But a comrade stood beside him while his life-blood ebbed away,
And bent with pitying glances to hear what he might say.
The dying soldier faltered as he took that comrade's hand,
And said: "I never more shall see my own, my native land.
Take a message and a token to some distant friends of mine,
For I was born at Bingen, sweet Bingen on the Rhine!

"Tell my brothers and companions, when they meet and crowd around
To hear my mournful story in the pleasant vintage ground,
That we fought the battle bravely, and, when the fight was done,
Full many a corpse lay ghastly pale beneath the setting sun,
And 'midst the dead and dying were some grown old in wars—
The death-wound on their gallant breasts, the last of many scars;
But some were young, and suddenly beheld life's morn decline;
And one had come from Bingen, dear Bingen on the Rhine!

"Tell my mother that her other sons shall comfort her old age,
That I was still a truant bird that thought his home a cage—
For my father was a soldier, and even as a child
My heart leaped forth to hear him tell of struggles fierce and wild:
And when he died, and left us to divide his scanty board,
I let them take whate'er they would, but kept my father's sword,
And with boyish love I hung it where the bright light used to shine,
In the cottage wall at Bingen, fair Bingen on the Rhine!

"Tell my sister not to mourn for me, nor sob with drooping head,
When the troops are marching home again with glad and gallant tread;
But to look upon them proudly, with calm and steadfast eye,
For her brother was a soldier too, and did not fear to die!
And if a comrade seeks her love, I ask her in my name
To listen to him calmly, without regret or shame,
And to hang the old sword in its place—my father's sword and mine—
For the honor of old Bingen, dear Bingen on the Rhine!

"There's another, not a sister, and in happy days gone by
You'd have known her by the merriment that sparkled in her eye,
Too innocent for coquetry, too fond for idle scorning;
Oh! Friend, I fear the lightest heart makes sometimes heaviest mourning—
Tell her the last night of my life (for ere the moon be risen
My body will be out of pain, my soul be out of prison),
I dream'd I stood with her, and saw the yellow sunlight shine
On the vine-clad hills of Bingen, sweet Bingen on the Rhine!



"I heard the blue Rhine sweep along; I heard, or seem'd to hear,
The German song we used to sing in chorus sweet and clear—
And down the pleasant river and up the slanting hill
The echoing chorus sounded through the evening calm and still;
And her glad blue eye was on me as we passed in friendly talk
Down many a path beloved of yore, and well-remember'd walk,
And her little hand lay lightly, confidingly in mine—
But we'll meet no more at Bingen, dear Bingen on the Rhine!"

His voice grew faint and hoarse, his grasp was childish weak;
His eyes put on a dying look, he sighed and ceased to speak;
His comrade bent to lift him, but the spirit of life had fled—
The soldier of the Legion in a foreign land lay dead;
And the soft moon rose up slowly, and calmly she looked down
On the red sands of that battle-field, with bloody corses strewn—
Yes, calmly on that dreadful scene her pale light seemed to shine,
As it shone on distant Bingen, fair Bingen on the Rhine!

"Messrs. Editors.—In reading your paper several weeks ago I saw the language of ladies' names. If you know that of gentlemen's, will you be kind enough to publish it as soon as possible, and oblige

"A Lady Reader."

—Will no kind friend help the Lounger to answer this letter?

PROFESSOR MORSE.

THE TELEGRAPH ENTERPRISE.—MORSE AND HUDSON.

We give herewith portraits of Professor Morse and Captain Hudson — men whose names deserve to be, and will be, remembered in connection with the Atlantic Telegraph so long as it lasts. We subjoin beneath another illustration, depicting the laying of the cable in mid ocean. So unexampled a scene can not be too often portrayed. This time last year, or a little earlier, we gave a good deal of information respecting the Telegraph; the reader of this and the last Number of this paper may refer to it, and he will then find that he is acquainted with the subject thoroughly.

Professor Morse is a man of sixty-seven years of age. He was born at Charlestown, Massachusetts, on 27th April, 1791, and having graduated at Yale, in 1810, went to London, England, to study painting under Allston. He returned to the United States a few years afterward, and made a living by painting. This time last year we had occasion to speak of him as follows:

Forty years ago, when he was an art student in London, a pupil of Allston, West, not Copley, he would have gladly discounted his glory in advance for the satisfaction of painting a picture like the Death of Wolfe. Thirty years ago, when he was a poor portrait-painter at Charlestown and Boston, when he traveled thro' the country villages painting portraits at fifteen dollars apiece, and not unfrequently at a less for work, a very few dollars secured safely would have satisfied his worldly aspirations. — Twenty years ago, when he dreamed out the electric telegraph on board an ocean steamer, the realization of that magnificent dream seemed so distant that, though his genius saw it, his judgment shed a mist of doubts, and he dared not be positive in his conviction even to his own mind. And now all his brightest hopes are realized; he enjoys fame, a competency, a world-wide recognition.

Not many days since, in conversation with the writer, and in reply to a remark on the subject of the rival claims of Wheatstone and the European "discoverers" or "inventors" of the electric telegraph, Professor Morse cried, hastily, "Ah! Sir, but they are noble fellows; they behaved nobly to me, Sir; they are true men of science." He would not hear a word said in disparagement of the men who had done their utmost to rob him of his fame, and who had succeeded in robbing him of half his fortune.

The writer ventured to suggest a doubt of the feasibility of the transatlantic Telegraph; adding that "many persons believe the line can be laid."

"Can't! Sir, can't!" replied the venerable Professor, quickly; "I have forgotten the meaning of that word. We must succeed. When Lord Clarendon said to Mr. Field, on the occasion of their last interview, 'But suppose you lose the wire, as you lost the one to Newfoundland?' Mr. Field answered, quickly, 'Then, my lord, we shall give orders directly for the manufacture of another'— and that, Sir," continued the Professor, with energy, "is the spirit with which we go about this matter."

Professor Morse has, unfortunately, not been connected with this last expedition. He is now in Europe collecting from the governments of Europe the subsidy they have at last agreed to pay him for the use of his telegraphs. No one will rejoice more heartily at the success of the enterprise than he.

Of Captain Hudson, of the Niagara, it is hardly necessary to say any thing. No man in the navy is better known than he, though he has not figured as prominently in actual warfare as some of his fellow-captains. He stands high in the estimation of the chiefs of the service, and when the finest vessel in the navy, the Niagara, was put in commission, he was placed in command, with the general approval of the officers of the navy. His first service on board this ship will preserve his name from oblivion long after battles and sieges are forgotten. He has labored earnestly and effectively in the great cause in which he has been engaged, feeling as much interest in the enterprise as its promoters themselves, and giving them such aid and intelligent advice that there is something more than mere compliment in Mr. Field's remark, that the success of the telegraph is in great measure due to the labors of Captain Hudson.

The picture below needs no explanation. We have on former occasions described the vessels engaged; it only remains for us to draw attention once more to the striking character of the scene when such vessels met, in such a place, for such an object.

CAPTAIN HUDSON.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE MACHINERY.

In order that our readers may the better understand the accounts which are being published of the successful laying of the Atlantic cable, we give herewith two illustrations of Mr. Everett's admirable machine for paying it out, by whose aid the entire cable was laid without accident, together with a picture of the Hughes instrument, the only telegraph battery, it is believed, which can transmit intelligence through the submerged wire.

THE PAYING-OUT MACHINE.

The machinery devised for laying the cable is pronounced by competent engineers to be as ingenious as it is simple. The great difficulties to be guarded against in paying out the wire—the difficulties, in fact, which defeated the enterprise last year—arose from the tendency of the cable to "kink" and then break, and from the sudden strains and jerks which the motion of the sea occasioned, working upon the hull of the vessel, and raising and depressing her alternately. Mr. Everett, the chief-engineer of the Niagara, who, at the request of the Telegraph Company, was detailed for duty as their engineer on this expedition, spent last winter in devising a machine which should overcome these difficulties. This machine, of which we give two drawings on the next page, may be described as follows:

The machine is placed on deck in the after-part of the vessel, and somewhat on the starboard side, to be clear of the mast, etc. The cable, as it comes up from its enormous coils in the hold, passes first through a guiding groove, A, and over a deeply grooved wheel, B, on to the drum, C, D, which are each furnished with four deep grooves, each groove being cut one-eighth of an inch deeper than the former to allow for slack. The cable, after winding round these drums, passes on from the last groove over another guiding wheel, E, to a distinct piece of machinery, also standing on the deck, and laid over between the brakes and the ship's stern. Here a grooved wheel, F, works on a sliding frame, G, furnished with weights fixed on a rod, which ends in a piston inside of a cylinder, H, full of water. This piston, being made not quite large enough to fit the cylinder, the water has room to play about it, but with difficulty. It is obvious, therefore, that, yielding freely to every alteration of pressure, it can do so to some with a jerk, as the piston must be allowed some little time to dislodge the water from one side of it to the other; it sets, in short, as a water cushion. From this last piece of machinery the cable passes over a wheel or sheave projecting well over the stern of the ship and so down into the ocean depths.

The working of the brake-machinery is as follows: The engineer having fixed in his mind what amount of pres-

LAYING THE CABLE IN MID OCEAN.

we will keep the cable at the required tension, weights the slide ascending, the weight being lightly on the shaft of the grooved wheel under which the cable passes, and, in point of fact, therefore, sliding on the cable itself; an index or dynamometer is placed on the side of the frame and indicates the exact amount of pressure exerted. Underthis index is a wheel, I, with spoke handles like the steering- wheel of a river steamer, and from the drum of which a chain passes over a wheel, K, to another, M, on the shaft of which letter are connected by rods with the handles of four powerful brakes, N N, etc. which action drums, W W, etc., carried on the same shafts, S and T, as the grooved drums, C and D, and the bevilled wheels, X X, etc., which are connected with the steam-engine. The brakes, like the sliding frame, are supplied with sliding weights, which may be slipped on or off at the engineer's pleasure, and with a quick working in a cylinder of water, R, and acting also as a water cushion to prevent any sudden jerk. Each brake is furnished with Appold's apparatus, O, and works in a tank of water, P P, etc. The consequence of all this is, that any man of moderate intelligence and of all used to steering, stands at the steering-wheel, I, with his eye fixed on the index, just as the helesman's on the bisnacle compass. The engineer increases him what weight to keep to, just as the officer in charge tells the helmsman what point to steer for. As the rolling and plunging of the vessel increase or diminish the strain, the slide descends, G, will have a tendency to rise or fall with the tightening or slackening of the cable. The man at the wheel corrects this tendency by a slight turn of the wheel one way or other, which acts instantly through the chain over the pinion, K and M, on the brakes, N N, and so through the drums, W W, etc., on the drums, C D.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—PLAN OF THE PAYING-OUT MACHINE.

A simpler or more ingenious contrivance it is difficult to conceive. The index always indicates accurately to the man at the wheel the tension of the cable; the least turn of the wheel acts instantaneously and powerfully on the four brakes, which, however, are prevented by the water cylinders from acting with too abrupt a jerk.

This machinery, which was pronounced by some wiseacres emphatically unsuited to the duty it had to perform, seems to have worked admirably both on board the Niagara and on board the Agamemnon. From the hour of their parting in mid ocean to their respective arrivals in Ireland and Newfoundland, not the least accident occurred. The enormous vessels freighted with the cable rose and fell with the roll and swell of the sea; but the ingenious contrivance above described saved the cable from any sudden strain, and the careful handling of the mechanics employed, together with the simple but effective nature of the machinery, evercame the tendency to kink.

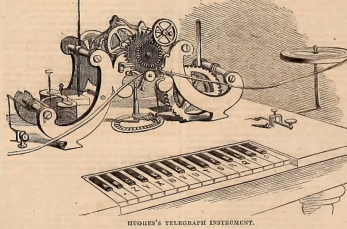
HUGHES'S TELEGRAPH.

It only remains to say a few words on the Hughes telegraph instrument, the inventions of Mr. Hughes, of Kentucky, and the fruit of seven years' arduous labor. It is said to be the only instrument which can work perfectly with the transatlantic wire. Mr. Whitehouse, the English electrician, can only, it is said, get two or three letters through the wire per minute; Mr. Hughes can transmit several words.

The following graphic description of the Hughes instrument appeared when it was first brought into public notice:

"The Hughes instrument consists of a train of clockwork, keys for closing the circuit, an electric magnet, and a vibrating spring to govern the type-wheel, which revolves by aid of the train of wheels. The clock-work consists of four cog-wheels, turned by a weight, which turns a shaft with a wheel, upon which are engraved the letters of the alphabet. This wheel is linked by a small police. Below the type-wheel a small press moves the paper to be printed upon against the letters. This press moves only when the armature of the magnet acts by a current of electricity being sent along the line.

"This system is based upon division of time—the Morse upon the number of waves, and the Morse upon the length of break and closing of circuit—the letters in the latter depending on the number and length of the waves sent; and if the magnet at the receiving-station is moved in a different letter is received. In the Hughes's system this is impossible, as every wave sent is of the same duration, and every wave records a letter. The particular letter depends upon the timing of the type-wheels, which are governed in their revolutions by a vibrating spring. The type-wheels being entirely independent of electrical influences, it follows that if they keep time together on a short circuit, they will also on a very long circuit, as time is the same every where, and time being divided into twenty-eight parts for the letters of the alphabet, must ever remain the same, provided that all the instruments move through the same space in the same time.



"Two clocks, keeping exact time with one another, will represent the Hughes instrument—that is, if both clocks start at one o'clock they will both arrive at twelve together. Suppose a wire stretched from each clock with a magnet each end so that it would sound a bell when the circuit was closed; if a person at one end on the closed the circuit at the moment the clock was at twelve, it would sound at the other end at twelve also. Now suppose a type-wheel took the place of the bands, and the magnet pressed a piece of paper against the letters. It would print the same letter as was touched at one end at both stations; and as those clocks would keep time equally as well 7000 miles apart as in the same room, it follows that the writing from one to the other would be correct, no matter what the distance, provided the magnet would act as well on a long circuit as on a short one.

"The magnet of the Hughes instrument is a peculiarly simple and effective arrangement by which electricity is made to work at its highest development instead of its smallest, as in all other systems—the Hughes magnet working by the power of the holding force of electricity, the Morse by its attractive. An electro or natural magnet will sustain one hundred times more when placed in contact with the armature to be held than when having to attract the same body, or will sustain the same weight with 100th part of the battery required to attract it at the distance of one-sixteenth part of an inch; but when the armature is let loose from the magnet it would take a very strong battery to draw it back again, without it was placed there by some other force. The Hughes magnet uses these principles, and electricity only holds the armature while in contact. As soon as it is cut free by the distant operator closing the circuit, it falls against a detent which brings a small cam in play and restores the armature to its resting-place in contact with the electro magnet. This operation is performed every letter that is printed, the magnet never acting until a letter is sent, and then only once to each letter: thus every electrical wave produces a letter. The nonliveness of this arrangement is so remarkable that it works perfectly with a pen. The rapidity of the instrument is not equaled by the operator's ability, for before the machine he has the more rapid it will print. Five and six keys can be touched at the same instant, the instrument printing off every letter correctly, thus allowing operators to send words by a single movement of the hand, while in the Morse system the key has to be moved several times to each letter.

"The average speed of the instrument is about 250 letters per minute, and at this rate both ways at the same time, being an actual transmission of 500 letters per minute, or five times as fast as the Morse.

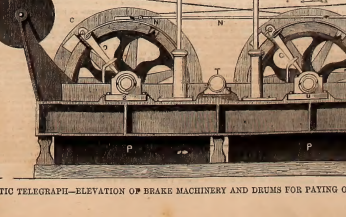
"The fact of the possibility of writing both ways simultaneously on one wire has been fully demonstrated, working so perfectly both ways as one, and both ourselves being actually on the same wire at the same instant of time. This is accomplished by the arrangement of the battery so that it does not effect the instrument at the office sending, but the instant that a distant office puts on battery the magnet acts; that cuts the circuit off from the distant battery, and is not affected by its own writing, while it receives perfectly what is sent to it.

"The messages would always start by this instrument the moment received, as there is no necessity of waiting until the line is unoccupied, as in all other systems, the line always being ready for the receipt of a message at the same time; then the message would not only be sent very rapidly, but would lose no time at the office from which it was sent. Another great feature in this machine is the freedom of disturbance from atmospheric causes. This is caused by the line being always open except at the instant of the letter being sent; then, if in same direction, can only assist the current from the battery. It is not by its action spoil the dispatch or throw the instruments out of adjustment. This has been fully tested, working perfectly from Bangor, Maine, to New York direct, through seven thunder-storms, at the same time that the Morse and House systems had to repeat four times over the same wires and distance.

HUGHES'S TELEGRAPH INSTRUMENT.

"The principle of making all the instruments keep exact time with one another, so that they always present a certain letter opposite the press at the same instant, and also to revolve rapidly, has been accomplished by the union of a well-known law in acoustics to mechanics. Thus a certain number of vibrations per second produces a certain musical tone; if a spring vibrates a certain tone, it must always vibrate in equal times. If this spring in its vibrations releases a tooth of an escapement-wheel and that a letter of the type-wheel, every vibration, this type-wheel must revolve always a certain number of times a minute, and these times must ever be equal. If these two instruments have each a vibrating spring of the same tone, the two instruments must always revolve in exact time with each other.

"These type-wheels, receiving by means of clock-work, carry around with them a circular-index, which travels over twenty-eight dots, corresponding to the letters upon the type-wheels. Large of these pins are touched by corresponding keys the circuit is closed at the moment the index passes that point. The armature immediately falls off, opens the detent which locks the press to the wheel-work; this moves up the press, and when the letter is printed unlocks itself until again acted by the action of the armature. It follows that if the right key is touched the letter intended must be printed. The same as in a piano-forte, and in short time a operator becomes an expert that he knows the keys four or five times faster than he can possible to write with a pen. The rapidity of the instrument is not equaled by the operator's ability, for before the machine he has the more rapid it will print. Five and six keys can be touched at the same instant, the instrument printing off every letter correctly, thus allowing operators to send words by a single movement of the hand, while in the Morse system the key has to be moved several times to each letter.



"The average speed of the instrument is about 250 letters per minute, and at this rate both ways at the same time, being an actual transmission of 500 letters per minute, or five times as fast as the Morse.

"The fact of the possibility of writing both ways simultaneously on one wire has been fully demonstrated, working so perfectly both ways as one, and both ourselves being actually on the same wire at the same instant of time. This is accomplished by the arrangement of the battery so that it does not effect the instrument at the office sending, but the instant that a distant office puts on battery the magnet acts; that cuts the circuit off from the distant battery, and is not affected by its own writing, while it receives perfectly what is sent to it.

"The messages would always start by this instrument the moment received, as there is no necessity of waiting until the line is unoccupied, as in all other systems, the line always being ready for the receipt of a message at the same time; then the message would not only be sent very rapidly, but would lose no time at the office from which it was sent. Another great feature in this machine is the freedom of disturbance from atmospheric causes. This is caused by the line being always open except at the instant of the letter being sent; then, if in same direction, can only assist the current from the battery. It is not by its action spoil the dispatch or throw the instruments out of adjustment. This has been fully tested, working perfectly from Bangor, Maine, to New York direct, through seven thunder-storms, at the same time that the Morse and House systems had to repeat four times over the same wires and distance.

LITERARY.

THE voice of the great tragédienne has hardly ceased from the memory of Americans, and her memoirs now come to revive the recollection of her triumphs. RACHEL, in the title of a book, published by Harper & Brothers, which contains all that can be said of the greatest of modern actresses. It is like a romance, only that the romance has the excitement of truth. Her life was a strange, indescribable life. The author of this book wisely refrains from the attempt to cite it as a biography. She only gives those incidents in it which are of interest to the world to whom the heroine belonged. The chief of these are too well known for us to repeat them here. The minuter incidents of her life; the growth of her fame; the genius with which she received her first present from royalty—a trifling bauble, which was nothing to her later magnificent gifts; the craving of her strangely-compounded mind for money, jewelry, and fame; the princes and peers who were at her feet; the relations she sustained to her own nation; the peculiar relations to her own family; the progress of her triumphs; the victories over opposition, rivalry, and enmity, which are like the victories we read of in rich old romances as Artemis and Zaire were accustomed to write—these make the book one of the most readable that could have been collected or written. We suppose that the name of the author, Madame de B——, is well known to be wholly fictitious. The lady is one not unknown to literary fame from her former works.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—ELEVATION OF BRAKE MACHINERY AND DRUMS FOR PAYING OUT THE CABLE.

Mr. Squier has completed his new work on THE STATES OF CENTRAL AMERICA, and Harper & Brothers publish it. The book is one of the most elegant issues of the American press, being finely illustrated with maps, wood-cuts, and tinted lithographs, in a style of great superiority, bringing the Central American provinces, their cities, landscapes, and inhabitants before the eye of the reader while he listens to the author's explanations.

The whole world is in ignorance about these States, and has been in a state of perplexity since Stephens reported to the Home Government that he had made diligent search and found no government there. Mr. Squier's former work, which was but the basis of this, was the first light shed on the mystery. The volume before us is a complete and succinct statement by one who knows that whereof he writes. It contains a full account and history of all the powers that be in those regions of disputed authority and questionable governments. The reader will find himself, after examining the work, in condition to read the newspapers which contain so much in our day about Nicaragua and its neighboring States.

Mr. Squier is no ordinary book-maker. He has a work to do, and he does it in a careful and masterly manner. Writing with the air of one who understands his subject, and convincing the reader of his mastery over all doubtful questions, he makes a readable book, one which is to be relied on, and one which will take its place in the library as the safest reference on Central American affairs. Probably no man lives who is so well qualified to do this work. His thorough knowledge of the subject, derived from long study in both hemispheres, as well as his residence in Central America and his official position there, have qualified him to speak with authority. The historical, geographical, and artistic value of the book are beyond praise. The information it contains is nowhere else to be found, and the book is therefore invaluable.

We have heretofore alluded to the progress of Art as illustrated in the store of Messrs. Williams & Stevens, on Broadway. We can imagine no greater pleasure to the lovers of the beautiful than an hour passed among the superb works of the pencil and the graver which are now collected and exhibited by these gentlemen. Our readers out of the city will not be offended at the information that they know but little of the advance of the illustrative arts, when we confess that we are ourselves left far behind unless we make at least a monthly visit to their folios.

Never, since Carlo Dolci painted that saintly face which looks down on the slumber of the Grand Duke of Tuscany from the wall of his bedchamber—most saintly and most womanly of all the faces of Mary painted by the old masters—never since that has there been a Madonna produced by an artist's imagination so beautiful as this by Sant, an engraving from which is now one of the chief ornaments of this store. To possess one of these prints is to own a world of beauty. The divine eyes, lifted in rapt adoration to the God who has made her most blessed among women; the expression of exultant awe, of faith, yet wonder beyond all, at her own exaltation; the holy, yet childlike beauty of her countenance; the lips half open to utter the Magnificat—all mingle the human and the heavenly most perfectly. Such a picture is a treasure in a house. Its influence is good. It calms and quiets a room. It makes the atmosphere around it seem unfit for boisterous word or rude thought. If any one think such praise enthusiastic, let him but sit down before the picture for ten minutes, and judge us then.

Rosa Bonheur's Cattle-Fair and those fine cromo-lithographs hang near, of which we have heretofore spoken. The folios swell with pictures, from which he is a strange man and she a strange woman indeed who can not select that which will prove an unending pleasure.

The splendid "Florinde" of Winterhalter has a remarkable feature, which no one can avoid noticing. The face of Florinde is that of the Empress of France, and she is surrounded by a group of ladies not altogether correctly costumed for a public appearance. It is a superb engraving, however, and a study of beauty.

There is a small but exquisite picture of the Execution of the Lady Jane Grey, engraved after Paul De la Roche—a most delicious engraving, reminding one, in its softness and delicacy, of the Dusseldorf Genoveva, which is one of the immortal works of modern times. The old world is here in photographs. This art has imported palaces and ruins, the modern splendor and the wreck of old glories; so that, for a dollar a sight, the inhabitant of Minnesota may look on Egyptian ruin or Temple stones of Jerusalem, on the Louvre Palace or a street in Vienna. The photograph, however, has given place to the stereoscopic views which are now to be found in all houses. With these in a little box one may almost literally carry the world around in his trunk. We have already mentioned the Magazine illustrated with stereoscopic views, of which we have now received the second number.

If our friends who are decorating their houses will call at Messrs. Williams & Stevens's and look over the various specimens of art, bearing in mind that one good engraving is worth a hundred poor paintings, they will thank us for thus directing their attention.

A gossipy series of letters, about all the world, and Newport and New York in particular, which have appeared in the Southern papers, over the signature of BELLE BRITTAN, are collected in a volume, and published by Derby & Jackson. The Belle is sometimes sufficiently sharp and piercing in tone to give one suspicions of her composition; but whether "bell-metal" or made of "sterner stuff," she says a great many things in a pleasant way, and the reader will be repaid who listens to her. We might mark some passages that were better left out of such a book, but prefer to ascribe them to the inexperience of "the lady."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE Queen's message has not yet come through. The following, our latest news from Trinity Bay, partially explains the delay:

"TRINITY BAY, N. F., Sunday, August 14.

"To the Directors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, New York:

"The cause of our not transmitting and receiving intelligence through is, that the instruments require a great deal of care and adjusting in getting them ready. I am doing this as fast as it is possible. You should not look upon the cable as an ordinary short telegraph line, that can be worked through directly. The cable has been successfully laid, and telegraphic signals are passed through it at our pleasure, but we have encountered many little difficulties which it requires time and many experiments to entirely overcome; but we see no reason to doubt that we shall be able, within a few days, to surmount all difficulties. I will send you the earliest intimation of the probable time when the Queen's message may be expected. DE SANTY."

[NOTE. In addition to the above, we have seen a private dispatch from a reliable gentleman at St. Johns, who is in a position to obtain the earliest and most correct unofficial intelligence concerning the cable, which states that the instruments at Trinity Bay record with a good degree of success the communications from the electricians at the Valentia office, but that owing to some as yet unexplained cause, it has been impossible to send that or any other intelligence to the operators at Valentia. This is a state of things which often occurs upon the land lines, i. e., one office can receive correctly from a distant operator, and yet be unable to send a word in return; and the difficulty, sooner or later, is found to be in the battery, its connections, or the instruments, and there is no reason to doubt that the present difficulty in working the cable will, as soon as the electricians can compare notes, be entirely overcome.—Reporter.]

LATEST FROM UTAH.

Letters from Utah up to July 10th confirm previous advices, and describe the return of the Mormons from Provo to Salt Lake City. With their limited means of transportation, at least a month must elapse before they can get back again and be settled. Governor Cumming continues to be treated with the greatest possible consideration by the Mormons, whereas the other Gentiles are left severely alone, and are compelled to sleep out of doors in ambulances or wherever they can find a shelter.

The correspondent of the Times says that Brigham Young and his people are very anxious for admission to the Union, and are exerting every effort to accomplish that result.

They maintain that it is their constitutional right to be admitted, and they desire it, so that they can make a law legalizing polygamy, and placing it within the charmed circle of "States' Rights." They do not admit for a moment that Congress can impose any condition upon their admission prohibiting polygamy.

The correspondent adds: "Within a few days it is probable that their loyalty will be put to the test, Judge Eckles, who is bold and fearless in discharge of his duty, proposes to issue writs at the suit of an ex-Mormon named Wadsworth, for the arrest of certain parties at Payston, seventy miles south of this, for kidnapping Wadsworth's adopted child. Mr. Dotson, the United States marshal, is expected to serve the writ within a few days, and to take the accused (William Young and George Wadsworth) to Fort Bridger for trial. This will test the power of the law, and show us whether the threats uttered in my hearing—that any man who attempts to serve writs upon 'this people' is to be shot—are idle or otherwise."

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE MORMONS.

The Washington correspondent of the Times telegraphs: "The Peace Commissioners, Messrs. Powell and M'Culloch, arrived yesterday morning from Utah. Their representations of the present agreement between the Mormons and the Government do not vary in any material points from what has already been published. The most important consideration is the fact that peace, at all events, has been secured, and the supremacy of the laws and the authority of the Government recognized. Still the Commissioners do not hesitate to say that much remains to be done before the Mormons will be brought to that obedience which is necessary for the continuance of amicable relations. Accepting this proposition, I am credibly informed that the Government will so mature its plans to this end that their purpose must eventually be accomplished, in the face of the opposition which may be arrayed against it. The Commissioners also verify the accounts published of the conduct of the redoubtable Brigham Young toward his deluded followers. So unjust and tyrannical has this become that it is deemed necessary to repeat the instructions heretofore given to the officers of the Government in Utah to afford them all the protection in their power."

JOURNALISM AT FRAZER'S RIVER.

The editor of the Victoria Gazette, the new paper just established at Victoria, Vancouver's Island, draws the following amusing sketch of the establishment in which his paper is got out: "The present number of the Victoria Gazette is prepared for publication in a room more remarkable for extent than convenience. Its walls abound in crevices, through which the wind bears with an impartial equality the seeds of catarrh and bronchial afflictions to the editors, proprietors, and typographers. Its floor is of a shaky character, and each passer imparts a tremulousness to its surface which occasions the present writing to assume a character that Champollion, were he one of our compositors, would find it difficult to decipher. Cavities, large and small, lie in wait for individuals passing into and about the establishment, which have already resulted in serious shin-damage to the major part of its occupants. The 'editor's desk' is a bundle of printing paper, skillfully poised upon a leather trunk, vibrating with each movement of the writer's hand, and compelling him to double up his person in the act of preparing 'copy' in a manner more curious than graceful. The 'Editor's Easy Chair' is a Chinese trunk, whose top would be on a level with the desk, but for the brilliant idea of increasing the height of the latter by the paper expedient alluded to. The striking thoughts which pervade the brain of the individual favored with these facilities would find a much readier expression at the point of his pen but for the drawback of being compelled to retail copies of this journal, receive items of news and correct misdirected intruders on the point of their destination, simultaneously with inditing these conceptions.

"Two huge fire-places adorn our sanctum. These ornaments, having been built with a view to convey all the heat as well as the smoke up the chimney, are as little dangerous in the matter of risk of a conflagration as they are but slightly conducive to comfort in modifying the blasts of Boreas, which dispute occupancy with the present sojourners in the establishment we are describing. We had designed supplying these fuel-eaters with a pile of lumber belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company, stored in the premises, but the printers having occupied it in lieu of a table, we have been compelled to postpone indulgence in that (to us) economical expedient. It is possible, also, that the corporation in question might entertain some objections to the proposed use of their property, which objections, although we consider them absurd in view of our necessities, we are bound to respect. The pleasant sounds of wood sawing, nail hammering, etc., add to the facilities for editorial labor of which we are now in existing enjoyment, and an occasional procession of Indians, cheers and invigorates the writer by stopping and surrounding his locality of labor, and gazing upon his deeds with the expression of intelligence common to the physiognomy of the intellectual race of which they are the representatives. Under such circumstances our readers will see that making up an interesting sheet is but a trifling task."

CONFESSION OF A PIRATE.

We find the following in the Boston Traveler: "Peter Williams, under sentence of death, at Auburn, Maine, with a colored man, named Abraham Cox, for the murder, at sea, of the captain, two mates and one man, of the brig Albion Cooper, of Portland, has made a confession, which is printed in the Lewiston Falls Journal. Williams represents that he was born in Ostend, Belgium, in 1830, his father being a sailor; he ran away from school, and never learned to read. He first went to sea when nine years of age, and has served on shipboard in all parts of the world ever since—at one time on a German man-of-war, and then again in the employ of the East India Company, acting as captain of the main top in one of their vessels. In July, 1857, he became acquainted with an Irishman named Thomas Fahey, and both went to Portland and shipped in the Albion Cooper. The brig, soon after leaving port, was found to be leaky; the second mate is stated to have treated both Williams and Cox, the negro, with great barbarity, and finally Williams stabbed him, for which he was placed in irons. Afterward the mate called him into his room, drove a nail into a beam and hung him up by the beam, the forward part of his feet just touching the floor. He was in great pain, and finally fainted. Finally Cox broached the project of a murder of the captain and crew, and supplied some knives and razors, which Williams fastened to sticks. The Irishman, Fahey, was alone taken into their confidence. They first killed Captain Humphrey, who was asleep on the deck, with two blows on the head with a hatchet. His head partially turned, but he died without a struggle. He then went behind the second mate and struck him in the head with a hatchet. His cries brought out the first mate, who was also struck in the head. He retreated to his cabin, where he had a hard struggle with his murderers, but was finally dispatched. As he came out Williams met the second mate, whom he had left for dead, and finished him with a few blows of the hatchet. The last murder was of a seaman named Burns or Davis. They put iron with the bodies and threw them overboard. Afterward they set the vessel on fire and abandoned it, and were picked up by another vessel, when Fahey disclosed the horrible tragedy in which they had been engaged. Williams and Cox will be hung on the 27th inst. Dr. J. Haynes, who has visited them, says that the phrenological organs of Williams denote that his origin and organization were gross and sensual, and his intellect of a low order, though by no means repulsive or dangerous. He has light or sandy hair, and is of the sanguine, phlegmatic temperaments, and bears a strong resemblance to the low Dutch. He somewhat resembles Heath, now in the Charlestown State Prison.

"Cox, the negro, has what negroes seldom possess—much of the nervous temperament—is quick, restless, and impulsive. His head is comparatively large, and we should think he possesses considerable intellect. His forehead is high and slightly receding, but the lateral portion of the brain is immensely large, especially in the region of combativeness, destructiveness, secretiveness, and acquisitiveness. Caution, firmness, and self-esteem are likewise large. His moral faculties are fairly developed. His peculiar cast of intellect predisposes to suspicion, jealousy, and revenge."

SWIFT PUNISHMENT OF A MURDERER.

A North Carolina paper says: "On the 26th ultimo our whole community was shocked by the receipt of intelligence that Mr. Constant Melancon, a young gentleman widely known and esteemed, had been killed by one of his negroes, at his residence in St. James, about eight miles below Donaldsonville. Mr. Melancon had discovered in the negro's cabin a portion of some things that had been stolen some nights previously from a store. His master determined to punish him, and, with that intention, took him to the sugar-house to get irons for him. Arrived there, he made the negro (a blacksmith, it seems) forge some manacles for his legs, and while stooping down to try their size he received a blow from the slave which felled him to the earth. The weapon used was a huge blacksmith's hammer. Leaving his master for dead, the scoundrel started off, but had not gone far when, chancing to look back, he saw his unfortunate victim essaying to rise. He immediately returned and finished his bloodthirsty deed; after which he cast the body into a pond, mounted his master's horse, and rode off toward the woods.

"Dogs were obtained and the murderer was hotly pursued. In his flight he abandoned the horse; but he felt the impossibility of escaping, ran to the river and threw himself in. Before the witnesses of his act came up the murderer was drowned."

LOVE, DESERTION, AND SUICIDE.

An Albany paper of 10th has the following: "Three or four years ago, a then well-known Albanian removed with his family to Central New York, and engaged himself to a manufacturing firm as traveling agent. The business ramifications of the house compelled him to visit nearly every county in the State, and being possessed of great conversational powers, and much general information, he rapidly won the friendship of all the patrons of the house he represented. Among them was a Mr. R——, a thrifty merchant, who invited him to his house.

"There he made the acquaintance of Miss R——, then a beauty of eighteen. She became greatly attached to D——, who represented himself as a single person. His visits were ultimately satisfactory after an engagement of marriage had blinded the deluded girl. Miss R—— pleaded for a fulfillment of his promises. He informed his victim that a legal objection prevented their marriage, that he had a wife and children, and that the best he could do was for her to flee to some city where he could care for her, promising not to divulge the proceedings to her parents, but to allow him to call as usual. D—— never meant to renew his calls, but a hasty summons from his victim informing him that she was enciente again brought him, and he persuaded her to come to this city and become her destroyer's mistress. D—— had induced her to leave behind a note setting forth that she had determined upon leading a life of infamy, that pursuit would be unavailing.

"The parents smothered their misery by giving out that their child had gone to the Far West. D——, with unblushing effrontery, called upon them, a month after he had stolen their child, ostensibly to pay his addresses to her. For the past fifteen months Miss R—— has resided here. When tired of her, D—— introduced a friend for the purpose of affording him a pretext to cast her off, but failing in this, the friend of D—— worked upon her jealousy.

"To this was added prolonged absence, a withdrawal of communication, and the withholding of money, the whole culminating on Tuesday in an attempt on the part of the poor girl to end a life that was loathsome to her. Procuring a large dose of laudanum, she took it all, but the effect was to make her seriously, dangerously ill, instead of killing, as she desired.

"Saturday night's 11.45 train West took with it as passengers, a man about forty, disguised with a wig and heavy false whiskers, accompanied by an invalid female. Whither they went we know not, but may add, that their going has placed us in possession of this 'o'er true tale.'"

WIFE-TAMING IN BOSTON.

A Boston paper tells the following story: "Mr. Fitzgerald resides in Congress Street, and is married to a woman who takes snuff and is fond of spinning street-yarn. Yesterday afternoon Mrs. F. announced her intention of visiting Mrs. Dunlap and getting her daily supply of rappee. Mr. F. issued positive injunctions against such a course, but as the wife insisted the husband adopted a novel method of keeping her at home. He got a chain, about an inch in diameter, wound it around her ankle, and then passed the ends through the handle of a flat-iron and secured them by means of a heavy padlock. Putting the key in his pocket he walked off to his work and chuckled at his originality.

"Mrs. F. considers herself just as smart as her 'old man,' and as soon as he had left the house she took one of her aprons, half a dozen towels, and a string, and managed to confine the flat-iron to her knee, and thus heavily laden, she walked out, got her snuff, and was quietly putting it into a box, when some person discovered the chain, and gave information at the second station-house, and Lieutenant Whitcomb, with great delicacy, relieved the wife of her extra burden, although he was compelled to smash the lock with a hammer in doing so. Mr. Fitzgerald will have to invent another method, and if he succeeds he can make a fortune in teaching his secret to others, à la Rarey."

A SAGACIOUS VERDICT.

Some boys last week having noticed a man lying on the mountain several days, ventured to the spot and found him dead, a pistol at his side, and every thing indicating that he had taken his own life. He was evidently a Spaniard or German, twenty-five years of age. An inquest was held by Squire Hahn, at which, after a full investigation, the following intelligent verdict was returned: "Suicide, by his own hands."

A THREE YEARS' CHASE AFTER A SEDUCER.

We find the following item in a late number of the Review, published at Cleveland: "One day last week there passed down on the steamer Michigan a man having in irons another who had some three years since seduced his sister. The seduction was under promise to marry, and the wedding-day fixed, but the seducer ran away the day before. The brother of the injured woman started in pursuit, and caught him at Erie, but by some means the rascal escaped. The brother still kept on his track and found him again, but again he lost him. Month after month passed on, and the resolute brother wandered about in pursuit, but could get no trace of the object of his search. A little while ago, however, he saw a paper published at Ripon, Wisconsin, in which the name of the seducer appeared as editor. Thither he went, armed with a requisition from the Governor of Pennsylvania, and arrested him; and now, after a pursuit of three years, has the violator of his sister's honor firmly in his grasp. The parties live in Pennsylvania, but where or what their names are we failed to learn."

A CAT NOT PROPERTY.

A "cat may look at a king," says a quaint old proverb; but a jury of twelve men have decided that a cat has a right to forfeit his life when disturbing the quiet of any neighborhood in this community. We learn from the Newark Evening Journal that a suit was tried in that enlightened city last week, before a justice, brought to recover $15 for losses sustained in the death of a cat, alleged to have been shot by defendant.

Counsel on both sides made eloquent addresses to the jury, the main point being whether a cat is or is not property. The jury retired about five o'clock, and came in about half past nine with a verdict of "No cause for action." The case excited great interest, and the justice's office was crowded with anxious spectators during the trial. Let this be a warning to the feline species.

NEARLY A SUICIDE.

We learn from a correspondent that the fashionable notion of suicide has found its way into the fashionable circles of at least one summer resort. At one of these, known to the pleasure-seeking world as "Deal," quite an exciting scene occurred, a few days since, tinging with something more than the wonted life those who bask in the happy, genial pleasures of this famous but quiet retreat. The house at Deal stands some four hundred and fifty yards from the sea, between which there is a walk some seven feet wide, which serves as the thoroughfare. Near the beach, to prevent the walk from being filled with sand by passing wagons, two upright pieces of timber are erected, about eight feet in height, with a cross-piece near the top. An interesting young Philadelphia lady having fallen desperately in love with a gentleman, whose attentions were monopolized by a couple of New York ladies—albeit he was a faithful and devoted attendant until their arrival—resolved to make it the last time that she should be so gayly deceived. At the hour for bathing two ladies and gents were on their way to the beach, when, horror-stricken, they beheld dangling from the cross-beam (which, since the occurrence, has been named the "Lover's Swing") the form of a lady in her bathing-dress. She was at once recognized by the party as "the lady in love." The gentlemen quickly lowered the lady by the rope by which she was suspended, and carried her to the arbor on the beach, when it was discovered that her pulse was actively beating. By the application of some water to her face, and rubbing her wrists, she speedily revived; and in less than half an hour she was seen dashing about in the surf—none more full of life and spirits than she. Since the above occurrence, which has been the current topic of conversation among the guests at Deal, it has been rumored that a gentleman from a neighboring city attempted to "shuffle off this mortal coil" at the same place; but the facts being in the possession of his immediate friends, it has been impossible to learn the cause which impelled him to the rash act.

A SAD STORY.

A melancholy story of a deceived wife is told by the Sing Sing Chronicle: "It will, perhaps, be recollected by most of our readers that a desperate attempt was made in February, 1857, by four or five convicts confined in the Sing Sing prison to escape by crossing the river on the ice. But one of their number, however, Thomas Sinclair, alias Winslow, succeeded in getting away, the others being speedily captured. Winslow has managed to keep away until last week, when information was received by the officers of the prison that a fellow answering his description was confined in the jail in Boston on suspicion of burglary. An officer was at once dispatched, and on Friday last returned with the runaway. Winslow's term will expire on the 21st of September next, but an indictment is pending against him for attempting to escape on another occasion. On this he will be tried, and probably convicted, and sentenced to a term of five years' imprisonment. We understand that since his escape Winslow has been married to a respectable young lady of Boston, who, it seems, was totally ignorant of his character at the time of her marriage, and who is now in the deepest distress."

PERSONAL.

A letter dated Bedford Springs, August 9, to the Baltimore American, says: "There seems to be considerable excitement among the Democratic politicians here on account of the marked friendliness displayed by the President toward those who sustain him in his Kansas views. In the dining-room there are two general tables and ten private tables, at one of the latter of which the President presides, which is occupied by his family and that of Sir William Gore Ouseley, Robert M. Magraw, Esq., of Baltimore, being the constant attendant of Miss Lane and the daughter of Senator Bright.

"There are still four vacant seats, which are only filled by invitation from the President. Mr. Carrigan, who expects to be the Anti-Lecompton Democratic candidate for Congress from one of the Philadelphia Districts, had been here with his lady for several days without being invited to the reserved seats; when Mr. Vandyke, the United States District-Attorney from Philadelphia, arrived with his lady, he being a Lecompton Democrat, they were immediately invited to a seat at the President's table, and Mrs. Vandyke was escorted to her seat by the President. This mark of distinction between two Democrats of equal standing has caused considerable feeling between the two wings of the party, and is the subject of general comment, especially as there are still two vacant seats at the table."

The case of Senator Sumner is alluded to by the Paris correspondent of the Tribune, under date of July 26. The writer says: "I have been spending an hour this morning with Mr. Sumner. Though my report of June 23 remains of generally correct application to his present condition, some further details may now be added that can not fail to interest men of science as well as personal and political friends. His physical sufferings have been constant and rather increasing than diminishing since I last wrote. The moxa has not been administered anew, but none of the wounds on the neck and back left by the six first burnings are yet healed. These render every change of posture difficult, slow walking very painful, and the constantly irritating motion of a carriage nearly intolerable. The bed gives only a cramped, labored repose, for the nature and position of the fire-wounds are such as to forbid the poor privilege of 'tossing about' under penalty of fresh agony. This state of things has lasted now for nearly six weeks. Meanwhile, however, the burns are slowly closing over, and Dr. Brown-Sequard, who is in daily attendance, does not propose to apply the moxa again for the next two months."

It is announced that, after leaving Cherbourg, the Empress of the French will go on a pilgrimage to Auray, a small village in Brittany, celebrated for its butter, and a shrine of the Virgin, which enjoys a wide reputation. Like that of Del Pilar in Spain, its virtues are akin to those which pagan superstition assigned to Lucina—a fact which has given rise to a report of an early addition to the imperial family.

The Detroit Free Press says that the injuries inflicted upon Senator Chandler by the recent gas explosion at his residence will disfigure him permanently, and in a marked manner. His face will suffer the most from the ravages of the fire—the lips, forehead, and nose bearing evident traces of it, which will remain in the form of scars. The hands are also badly burned, so much so that a large portion of the skin came off in dressing the wounds. Mr. Chandler is doing as well as can be expected, however. His little daughter will bear some scars on her forehead, and perhaps upon one of her cheeks. Her injuries are more slight than any of the other persons, however. The two men who were injured at the same time will soon recover, but will each bear the scars of the disaster through life. Their worst burns are on their faces. They are both doing well and will soon be about again.

The Lafayette Courier tells the following story of a desperate "lovyer" in a little town in Montgomery county: "A young man named Paxton, having received the 'mitten' from a young lady at Darlington, in Montgomery county, to whom he had been paying his 'distresses,' met her at church on last Sabbath, and drawing a revolver, snapped it three times in a vain attempt to shoot her. A gentleman came to the rescue of the lady, and Paxton leveled the revolver at him, but fortunately it again missed fire. He was immediately disarmed, and was yesterday arrested and taken to Crawfordsville, where he was lodged in jail. Strange to say, the pistol was recapped, and every barrel which had before missed fire was discharged on the spot."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

Parliament has not done much that is important since our last record. The Lords have receded from some of their amendments to the Indian Bill, and appointed a Committee of Conference. In the course of discussion on Indian affairs, Lord Stanley said it was impossible to form an estimate of the present strength of the mutineers. The total number of the Queen's force in India, or on their way out, was 78,416; but 7456 were reported sick, and 1159 were drafts on their way out. At the latest returns there were 60,000 effectives and 11,000 drafts. As to the Company's forces, they were 18,858 Europeans on the 1st of July. After a deduction for casualties, there was then a total of between 86,000 and 87,000 European troops in India. With regard to the Indian loan, £4,421,000 had been borrowed, leaving £3,500,000 still to be borrowed. There would be ample means from this source to defray the expenses for the whole of the current year. Instructions had been sent to proclaim, in her Majesty's name and authority—and the instructions sent out clearly announced the intention of the Government—not to interfere with the religion of the natives.

Both Houses are actively engaged in clearing up the business of the session, and an adjournment is expected on the 2d inst.

THE FIRST JEW IN PARLIAMENT.

In the Commons, on the 26th of July, at the morning sitting, Baron L. N. de Rothschild, introduced by Lord J. Russell and Mr. Smith, presented himself at the table to be sworn.

A copy of the new oath being offered to him, he stated to the Speaker that he had a conscientious objection to taking the oath in the form tendered to him, and he was thereupon requested to withdraw.

Lord J. Russell then moved a resolution in conformity with the act, to the effect that the Baron, a person professing the Jewish religion, was prevented from sitting and voting in the House by reason of his conscientious objection to take the oath in the form required by the act.

After some remarks by Mr. Warren, it was agreed to.

Lord J. Russell then moved a further resolution, likewise in pursuance of the act, "that any person professing the Jewish religion may, henceforth, on taking the oath prescribed in an act of the present session of Parliament, to entitle him to sit and vote in this House, omit the words, 'And I make this declaration upon the true faith of a Christian.'"

Mr. Warren said he should take the sense of the House upon this resolution.

The House was divided, and the resolution was carried by 69 to 37.

Baron Rothschild then reappeared at the table, and having been sworn upon the Old Testament, took his seat.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO CHERBOURG.

Both London and Paris journals just now are very much occupied in discussing the approaching journey of Queen Victoria to Cherbourg. But beyond the fact that her Majesty is going to Cherbourg very little indeed appears to be positively known with respect to the royal visit. We are told that her Majesty will not land at Cherbourg, but be entertained on board the flag-ship Bretagne. Nevertheless the people of Paris report with increasing confidence that the Queen will land; and they say that the Emperor and Empress will try to prevail on her Majesty to prolong her visit beyond the limited period named for its duration. Perhaps the truth is that the Court, oscillating between a desire to gratify its "august ally" and a wish not to offend public opinion at home, scarcely knows what to do, and will end by making the contemplated visit as brief as courtesy will permit.

DISCOVERY OF THE PRETENDER'S HOARD.

The London Court Journal has the following: "A most extraordinary discovery, which, for obvious reasons, is sought to be kept a profound secret, has taken place in an old ruined house at Iriel. An immense chest full of gold and silver coins of English stamp has been found concealed in one of the cellars, where it had been carefully walled up. From the papers and documents contained likewise in the chest, it has become evident that the house was once inhabited by Bolingbroke, who must have lain concealed here during the period wherein his whereabouts has always remained a puzzle to biographers and historians. In one of his letters he mentions that 'his retreat is convenient to the Seine,' and the house in question is found to possess a subterranean passage leading down to the water's edge. The money is evidently the result of the subscription raised by the party of the Pretender, for want of which the latter was prevented from striking a decisive blow."

FEARFUL PREDICAMENT.

One day lately, while four little boys were diverting themselves by leaping in and out of an old corn-chest that stood in the stable of a farm in the Carse of Gowrie, the whole of them got into it at one time, and drew down the lid, which, being furnished in the common way for a padlock, the holder caught the staple, and made them prisoners at once, beyond the possibility of extricating themselves. Fortunately, however, the horses had to be suppered; but the plowman whose duty it was to do so had performed this task, and was leaving for the night, when he thought he heard some movement in the chest. Aware there was no corn in it, he was convinced he was deceived; but, curiosity prompting him, he lifted the lid, and found the now missed and anxiously sought for prisoners still alive, but quite unconscious, or unable to make the least effort for their deliverance. Had a movement on the part of one of them not drawn the attention of the plowman at the last moment, the whole four would doubtless have been dead before morning.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AT PLOMBIERES.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "The life the Emperor is leading at Plombières is in strong contrast with that of the Tuileries. Plombières is but a small village, situated in a valley so narrow that it has but one street. This street, since his Majesty's residence there, is decorated with flags, and every Sunday evening the citizens illuminate their houses for two hours. The Emperor lodges in the house of the Prefect, which is given up to his use, with a house adjoining; and he has, besides, a cottage in the environs, to which he walks in the day time, and where he stops for refreshment. The Imperial park is but a ten-acre lot, a piece of swamp bought three years ago by the Emperor, drained and planted with trees and flowers. In this park the Emperor is now laying out, under his own engineering and supervision, a lake and river. He spends hours sometimes with the workmen, directing their labors. The Emperor rises early, takes his bath, and then writes or reads. Between eight and nine o'clock arrives M. Mocquard, his famous secretary, with an enormous portfolio under his arm, with work for his Majesty. They work together until all the business of the day is finished and ready to be sent off to the Ministers at Paris, and then, if there is time before the twelve o'clock breakfast, his Majesty takes a walk in the park, while M. Mocquard dispatches the courier. His Majesty never allows business to accumulate on his hands, and in this he is well seconded by his secretary. The confidence of Napoleon in M. Mocquard is so great that he leaves much of his minor business to his discretion, and he never allows any measure to issue to the public that has not first passed under the scrutinizing eye of his intelligent secretary. M. Mocquard's influence with the Emperor is said to be beyond that of any of his Ministers. Fortunately, he is a man of superior ability and judgment, and is thus enabled to render his Majesty valuable assistance.

THE SWORD OF DAMOCLES.

"Yet with all his impassibility of character, and with the calm which reigns in appearance around his daily life at Plombières, the Emperor can and dare never forget that he is surrounded wherever he goes by an unknown band of men, who mysteriously make part of and creep through every crowd he encounters, charged with the protection of his person, and what is worse, that this band is necessary to the protection of his life. Another infernal plot to take his life has just been discovered at St. Etienne, and thirty or forty arrestations made. A foundery of fulminating bombs, of the model of those of Orsini's, was found, and several finished bombs were seized. According to the Lyons journal, the whole population is in a state of fermentation, and it is supposed that the plot was an extended one."

THE EMPEROR'S JOURNEY TO PARIS.

The Moniteur of the 28th states that the Emperor Napoleon left Plombières at half past six on Tuesday morning, and arrived at the palace of St. Cloud about seven in the evening. In his passage the people, who assembled in crowds along the line, cheered him with the greatest enthusiasm; triumphal arches were raised at many points of the road, and his Majesty stopped at several places and examined the various magnificent works which were to be found at them. "This journey of the Emperor," concludes the Moniteur, "amidst his faithful subjects of the east, gave rise to some very touching scenes. Among the most striking episodes there was one which will remain engraved on the memory of all who witnessed it—it was the emotion felt by all present when at the Longueville station the Mayor of Provins presented to the Emperor two officers who had belonged to the army of Egypt, the sole remains of those immortal bands who at the close of the last century supported the glory of the arms of the French from the mouths of the Nile to the pyramids of Egypt."

RUMORS OF MORE HEIRS TO THE THRONE.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says: "Whispers have been passing about as to the Empress being again in an interesting situation, but there has been no public confirmation of the fact, nor am I much disposed to credit it. Her Majesty has never fairly recovered the shock which her whole system sustained in her first and last accouchement, and those immediately about her person do not seem to think it at all probable that she will furnish any more heirs to the throne of France; but all predictions on such matters, as in politics, are essentially unsafe."

RECEPTION OF THE HEROINE OF DJIDDA.

A Paris letter says: "Mademoiselle Eveillard, the heroic daughter of the murdered Consul at Djidda, has arrived at Paris, and is, for the moment, the lioness of the town. She is a girl of nineteen, tall, with dark hair and eyes, an expression of decision of character, and decidedly handsome. One of the wounds which she bears is a sabre cut which extends from the ear to the corner of the mouth, and is not yet healed. M. Emerat, the Chancellor of the Consulate, a young man of twenty-five, arrived at the same time, and bears several wounds not yet healed. Mademoiselle Eveillard has brought her maid, who assisted in the defense of the house against the barbarians, and M. Emerat has brought his servant man, a native Arabian, who also fought bravely. M. Emerat says that after a long resistance in the several approaches to the upper part of the house, where the Consul and his wife had already been killed, unknown to him, and after having killed three or four of the enemy himself, he was finally overcome, and but for Mademoiselle Eveillard would have been killed.

"Mademoiselle Eveillard was called to the Palace of St. Cloud to-day to see the Empress, who intends to offer her a place in her household. The Sultan of Turkey has already awarded her a large life pension, and the Empress will add sufficient to give her an income, perhaps, of three or four thousand dollars a year. M. Emerat has been named Chevalier in the Legion of Honor, and, it is expected, will return to Djidda in a man-of-war as Consul."

MORE CAPITAL FOR THE EMPRESS.

A short time since a young peasant girl, in the neighborhood of Quintin, who had just finished her education at a rural school, upon her return to her home found her family in great distress in consequence of her brother, the sole support of his parents, having been compelled to become a soldier. The young girl having heard, when at school, a great deal said of the kindness of the Empress, determined to write to her Majesty, explaining the situation in which she and her parents were left in consequence of the absence of her brother. This letter—the unassisted composition of the young girl—was, with the address "A Madame l'Imperatrice, à Paris," confided to the post. The young girl said not a word of what she had done to any one. She regarded it as a secret between herself and her Majesty; and she was not surprised (although every one else in the village was amazed) to hear from the postman that he had a letter, sealed with the imperial arms, addressed to the young maiden. This letter was written by her Majesty's secretary, and assured the little peasant girl that the wrong done to her family should be speedily repaired. The letter was followed in a few days by the return of the girl's brother to his native village. The young soldier and his sister are about to erect an altar of turf, and to decorate it with flowers, and at that altar both, accompanied by the maidens and young men of their village, will offer up their prayers for the health, long life, and happiness of the Empress as she passes on her way from St. Brieno to Dinan.

M. DE PENE ALL RIGHT AGAIN.

M. de Pène, the writer in Figaro, is, to the astonishment of all his friends, after a wound that would have sent ninety-nine men out of a hundred to their graves, walking about Paris. His health is still delicate, but all immediate danger seems to have passed away. It is the general opinion that both the liver and diaphragm were pierced. The only material inconvenience he suffers is a difficulty of making a long respiration. It is not generally known that M. de Pène was the author of a sobriquet given in Figaro to the St. Helena medal, and which also gave great offense to the military. He called it the "Contremarque du Père-Lachaise." It is customary at French theatres, as at all others, to give to parties leaving the theatre, and desiring to return, a "contremarque," which secures their readmission; and as each recipient of the St. Helena medal must be at least sixty years of age—that is, the very youngest of them—and therefore well-nigh to that "bourne from which no traveler returns," M. Pène termed it the "Contremarque of the great Paris cemetery," indicative of the holder's speedy return to the dust from which he sprang. The gloomy color of the badge, its triste-looking ribbon, and the tottering form it too frequently adorned, gave a truth to the witticism which foreign rather than native journals were not slow to avail themselves of. In England particularly, where a secret consciousness existed that whatever specious reasons might be put forward, the St. Helena souvenir could have but one object, M. de Pène's sobriquet was eagerly caught at, and Figaro very speedily received a hint to be careful how it thus played with edged tools. The fact of M. de Pène being known as the author might possibly have much to do with the cold sympathy his subsequent mishap met with in high places.

HOW TO TAME SEA-FISH.

A Paris correspondent says: "Reality is after all more interesting than fiction, as is proved by the great attention a paper of 'pisaculture,' communicated by M. Coste to the Academy of Sciences, has received. This gentleman has formed an observatory off the coast of Finistere, by which he has been enabled to make a study of the habits of various sea-fish. By means of an ingenious apparatus formed of wire, he separates the fish, and has them under control without their consciousness. Some species, such as the mullet, the stickle-back, etc., grow perfectly tame, will follow the hand that offers them food, and even allow themselves to be taken out of the water. The gaby and bull-head are less familiar; the turbot, which looks so unintelligent, will nevertheless take food from the hand; it changes color when irritated, the spots with which it is covered growing pale or dark according to the emotions excited in him. It swallows fish of a much larger size than would appear compatible with the apparent smallness of its mouth. Thus a young turbot, not more than ten inches in length, has been seen to swallow pilchards of the largest size. The pipe fish has two curious peculiarities. These fish form groups, intwining their tails together, and remaining immovable in a vertical position, with their heads upward. When food is offered them, says M. Coste, they turn round on their backs to receive it. This is owing to the peculiar position of the mouth, which is placed under a kind of beak, and perpendicular to its axis. The crustaceous tribes have also furnished much matter of observation. The prawn and crab, for instance, may be quoted as exercising the virtue of conjugal fidelity to the highest degree; for the male takes hold of his mate and never lets her go; he swims with her, crawls about with her, and if she be forcibly taken away from him, he seizes hold of her again. The metamorphoses to which various crustaceans are subject have also been studied with much attention, and can not but form a valuable addition to our knowledge of natural history."

TURNING THE TABLES ON A ROBBER.

A corn factor was returning a few days ago from Montlery, on the Orleans road, when suddenly a man, holding a large stick in his hand, stepped out from behind a tree, and demanded his money or his life. "Why, you seem somewhat peremptory," was the reply, "but here is my answer," and he drew out a revolver. Then, presenting the weapon at the man, he said, "If you do not obey my injunctions in every respect, I will fire. It is an unpleasant thing to kill a man, but with respect to you I should not have the slightest hesitation. First of all throw down your stick; and next, turn out your pockets, and place there on the road every thing of value you have about you—money, jewels, no matter what." "I can not resist a demand so strongly supported," said the other; "but if you do business on the highway also, I must say that it is very irregular to rob a confrère." "Come, make haste," said the other, in a menacing tone. "It is a punishment I inflict on you; I want to give your money to the poor. Dispatch!" The foot-pad made no further delay, but laid his stick and portemonnaie at the feet of the factor, and then took to flight across the field. The contents of the portemonnaie, one hundred and three francs and ninety-five centimes, were duly deposited in the poor-box of his parish church by the dealer.

GERMANY.

A DIAMOND WORTH TWO MILLIONS.

Several of the German journals have lately spoken of the discovery of a diamond of extraordinary size and value. A letter from Vienna, in the Journal de Francfort, gives the following account of the affair: "The owner is an old Portuguese major, who found it in a collection of minerals forming part of the property of a governor of India who died in Europe. He is now at Laybach with a French chemist, who at first valued the stone at 139 millions of francs, but now says that it is not a pure diamond. It is of the size of a small hen's egg; very clear and limpid, but without all the brilliancy of the diamond. The price, however, is no longer 139 millions of francs, but three millions of florins. The manner in which this diamond got to Laybach is as follows: A foreigner residing near that town, happening to be in Paris, became acquainted with the owner of it, and on his return home induced a merchant of Laybach to advance a sum of 4000 francs to enable the owner of the stone to come with it to Vienna. The money was sent, and in a short time he arrived at Laybach, accompanied by a chemist and an agent. The stone was greatly admired, and steps were being taken to find a purchaser, when one day the owner and his two companions thought fit to leave the place, they afterward asserted, for the residence of the person who had first spoken to the merchant; but, as suspicion was excited, they were arrested on a charge of wanting to make off without having paid what they owed. They were forthwith taken to Vienna, and are still in confinement at the suit of the merchant."

ITALY.

THE NEW IMPROVISATRICE.

An Italian correspondent says: "The popular favorite just now is the improvisatrice Gianni Milli, a blooming maid of some twenty summers, and the Sappho of the Academy. A niece of the late Francesco Gianni, who improvised entire tragedies with marvelous fluency, and was pensioned by Napoleon, she is, besides being learned in the ancient and modern tongues, confessedly the most successful of the living declaimers in extemporary verse; and this dance of the poets yields only in popular attraction to the poetry of the dance. The selectest circles crowd her 'Academies,' and jealous cities contend for her favor. That Florence may gain nothing by the hospitality which has made her its ornament, Sienna holds out to her the golden crown. During a recent visit she even divided the suffrages of Vienna with the queen of the ballet. But her habitual presence here, in the midst of these rivalries, betrays a preference for the city of Dante, where her public appearances are veritable ovations.

"On these occasions subjects are proposed in writing by the audience and lodged in an urn, when the number agreed upon, usually half a dozen or more, are drawn by lot before her appearance. When she enters, the music, which fills the intervals of recitation, ceases; the theme is presented in the midst of the general salutations, and then, after a moment's pause, her charming voice runs into an easy flow, like an endless river, without obstruction—never weary, rarely hurried."

TURKEY.

MORE PERSECUTION OF THE CHRISTIANS.

A letter from Szisset, on the frontiers of Bosnia, to Paris, gives further particulars of the insurrection among the Christians against the Turks. After the male population had left their wives and children in safety on the Austrian territory, they marched against the Bashi-Bazouks under the command of a Servian named Jaraczei. The latter, who has 4000 men under his orders, armed with swords and pikes, attacked the Bashi-Bazouks of 1400 men encamped on the heights of Dibamka. The Turks were defeated and fled, leaving a quantity of arms and ammunition behind them. At present the Turkish regulars are marching against the insurgents.

INDEMNITY TO CHRISTIAN SUFFERERS.

A Paris letter in the Nord of Brussels, says: "Intelligence has been received here that the Sultan has accorded from his privy purse an annual pension of 12,000 francs to Mademoiselle Eveillard, half of which, on her death, is to go to the other children of the consul at Djidda. The Sultan has also placed at the disposition of the French embassador at Constantinople, a sum of 250,000 francs, to be distributed to the French families who suffered most in the recent events in that town. These donations of the Sultan are independent of the reparation which will be awarded officially."

BEHEADING A DEAD CHRISTIAN.

At Erzeroum, in Armenia, no rain having fallen this summer, the Turkish clergy could devise no better expedient to propitiate the heavens than the infliction of capital punishment on a Giaour or Christian; and, being merciful in their management, had the dead body of an unbeliever disinterred and decapitated. This proceeding has actually caused a greater sensation in Asia Minor than the everyday occurrence of ordinary beheading; and, added to the tumult of all around Lebanon, and the general outbreak of Ottoman fanaticism in the East, the state of affairs is truly alarming.

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

The Bombay mail of July 3 reached Suez on the 23d. The recapture of Gwalior is confirmed. The rebels lost twenty-seven guns, besides elephants and treasure to a large amount. The fugitives from Gwalior are said to be hemmed in on all sides by British troops. On the 13th, Sir Hope Grant gained a brilliant victory at Newa Gunge, near Lucknow, capturing a large number of guns and driving the enemy across the Cogra. The celebrated Moulvie, for whom £5 00 had been offered, was killed. Oude continues much disturbed. The Governor-General, on receiving Lord Ellenborough's dispatch, issued a proclamation giving an amnesty to all but murderers. The results are not yet known. The details of Sir Hope Grant's victory near Lucknow state that the rebels were nearly 20,000 strong, and their loss was six hundred men and six guns. The British had six killed and thirty wounded. The fight lasted three hours, and the rebels were utterly routed. A good effect was anticipated. The Azinghur and Gheseport districts were much disturbed by the rebels, who plundered the town and burned the forests. The Gorruckpore and Allahabad districts had been quieted. In the Agra division Sir H. Rose's activity had restored confidence and tranquillity. A rebel Rajah had surrendered in Rohilcund, where the rebels were also being put down.

DREADFUL STRAITS OF THE BRITISH.

The Calcutta Englishman has the following observations on the general condition of affairs in India:

"We therefore can not hesitate any longer to impress upon the attention of our readers at home our present position, which will be best understood when we state that while the British hold every fortress and place of importance throughout the disaffected provinces, the country itself may be said to be in possession of the rebels. Delhi, Agra, Jhansi, Barelly, Shajehanpore, Calpee, Lucknow, Cawnpore, and Allahabad are protected by European troops, but our authority scarcely extends beyond the reach of our guns, and the intervening districts are overrun by rebels and budmashes, who move about as they please, marking their course by plunder and destruction of property, and setting at defiance every attempt to restore order and tranquillity. Indigo factories, public and private bungalows, and railway dépôts have been burned, and we are thankful that these deeds have not been accompanied by the murder of Europeans, though, doubtless, not for want of inclination on the part of the rebels, but want of opportunities. It will be seen that our troops have again been engaged on several occasions with the enemy, and although in each instance perfectly successful, yet the majority of the rebels have as usual managed to escape. This, however, can hardly be wondered at, for, in the absence of adequate cavalry, and with the dreadful heat of the season, pursuit of the fugitives would have been useless, and in all probability only added to the frightful mortality of our brave men who fall daily victims to the sun. We are not overstating the fact by mentioning that sun stroke and heat apoplexy are regularly decimating the several corps engaged in the suppression of the rebellion—an apprehension which we have frequently expressed and which unhappily is fully realized.

CHINA.

CAPTURE OF THE PEI-HO FORTS.

We have further details of this important operation. A British officer who was engaged says: "At 7 A.M. Captain Hall, of the Calcutta, pulled in and desired the forts to surrender, telling them if the flags were hauled down by 9 A.M. the forts would be taken possession of peacefully; if the flags were not hauled down, firing would commence and the forts be captured by force. Nine o'clock came, but with no sign of surrender, and another hour was given them. The two admirals were on board the gun-boat Slaney, with the English and French pennants flying. The Cormorant, which was the leading ship of the attack, had been lying close up to forts on the right bank of the river, and the people of the forts had been observed training their guns on her. At 10 A.M. the flag of battle was hoisted by all the gun-boats and steamers along the line, with the exception of the Cormorant, which ran up the French flag, almost at the same moment running her anchor up to her bows, and getting under weigh. On her deck were only to be seen three solitary individuals—the captain, Saumarez, the master conning the ship, and the steersman, the men lying down at their quarters. She gradually edged over toward the forts on the right bank, running past them in beautiful style, fired upon as she passed each fort without returning a gun. During her passage she got hulled ten times; but, owing to closing so much on the forts, their shot for the most part passed over her without doing damage. After passing them she ran over to the left shore, and, running into the mud with her broadside to the forts on that side, commenced the action. She was followed by two French gun-boats and the Nimrod, which latter vessel came to the assistance of her comrade. The different gun-boats took up their stations, and as they fell into them opened fire with precision. After about an hour's cannonading, to which the Chinese reply was quick but ineffective, the Slaney, with the Admirals on board, ran straight up through the fleet, towing the attacking columns under Sir F. Nicholson of the Pique, and Opossum towing another party under Captain Hall. The French supplied an attacking party for the forts on the right bank. The boats pushed off, and the men were soon on shore. Then followed the usual scene—the Chinese bolted, and the French attack being made very quick, a mine was sprung which caused them considerable loss. The forts on the left bank were taken by the British without much loss, although mines were also exploded on their advance, by the bursting of one of which the carpenter of the Calcutta and two seamen were killed. In about an hour and forty minutes we were in possession of all the forts at the mouth of the river.

LOSS OF THE ASSAILANTS.

"We are happy to say the loss on our side was very slight, only one officer, the master of the Opossum, being severely wounded by a shot in the side and thigh. We have no exact or reliable particulars of the loss on the British side, but do not hear that it exceeds twenty-five killed and wounded. Our allies, we are sorry to say, owing to the explosion of a mine, suffered more severely—fifteen men, it is said, being killed, and forty men wounded; some of the latter dreadfully burned and torn by the explosion. Among the killed are four lieutenants. One, the first of the Fusee, was cut in two by a shot; another had his cap knocked off by a shot, on which he exclaimed, 'I am lucky to-day!' but immediately fell down dead, without the mark of any wound on his person.

HOW THE CHINESE FOUGHT.

"The Chinese stuck to their guns manfully, and there were the usual acts of self-sacrifice. One blue-button mandarin was found by the French in the fort which they had captured, dead beside a gun, having cut his throat; and in the assault on the highest fort of thirty-one guns a mandarin jumped out and charged the party single handed. The officers did all they could to prevent him being killed, but one of the men on the flanks, at some distance, shot him through the neck and killed him, to the regret of those near, who admired his brave action. About ninety-eight guns were captured, sixty-eight of which were brass or composition metal. Some were eight-inch guns, but we believe they had none of the usual appliances of sights. The loss of the Chinese is supposed to have been very heavy, as the firing was very accurate, the shells bursting with great precision in the embrasures. The Chinese fired grape, and even attempted shells, but, as their fuse was only a piece of common slow match, the shell generally burst close to the gun."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE success of the Atlantic Telegraph is still the event of the day, and we devote a large portion of our space to its illustration. We gave this time last year several graphic pictures of the enterprise, wire, vessels, etc. In pursuing the subject, we give on the first page of this paper a fine portrait of Mr. Cyrus W. Field, to whom, more than to any other man, the world owes the noble benefit it is about to enjoy, and who deserves a statue in every great city in Europe and America. On these pages we give a portrait of the Governor of Newfoundland, an illustration of the reception of the Niagara at St. John's, Newfoundland, and favorable views of Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, and Valentia Bay, Ireland, the termini of the Transatlantic line.

THE GOVERNOR OF NEWFOUNDLAND.

Sir Alexander Bannerman is a Scotchman by birth, of a very ancient family, their surname being one of the earliest which was assumed in Scotland. He is heir-presumptive to a baronetcy conferred on an ancestor of his by Charles the Second, in 1682. His cousin, the ninth baronet, now holds the title. Sir Alexander was born in Aberdeen in 1793.

Having in early life adopted the liberal and popular side of politics, in local as well as public affairs, his fellow-townsmen, when the franchise was conferred on them, chose him to represent them in the House of Commons, which he continued to do for four successive Parliaments, where he supported, and had the satisfaction to see, numerous important measures triumphantly carried which, before the passing of the Reform Bill, had been withheld from the people. During his parliamentary career he enjoyed the friendship of many of the leading statesmen of the day; and during various changes of administration lived on intimate terms with several of his able political opponents. For a short period he held the appointment of Commissioner of Greenwich Hospital, previous to which he was offered the government of Demerara, and subsequently Barbadoes, both of which he declined. After the passing of the repeal of the corn-laws, a measure which he strenuously supported, he retired from Parliament, to the great regret of his constituents, who soon afterward presented him with an elegant and valuable service of plate, in token of their regard for him and estimation of his public services. On Sir Alexander retiring from Parliament he passed much of his time at Brechin Castle, in Forfarshire, the residence of his old and attached friend, the late Lord Panmure.

The government of the Island of Prince Edward falling vacant about the latter end of the year 1851, on the death of Sir Donald Campbell, the then Colonial Minister, Earl Grey, on Lord Panmure's suggestion, offered Sir Alexander the government of that colony, at the same time warning him that difficulties would beset his path on questions both agrarian and political, which for some time had been sources of great discontent in that Island. Sir Alexander, however, accepted the offer, on condition that he should have the power, according to the best of his judgment, on the one hand to uphold the law, on the other to redress the just grievances of the colonists; and he was accordingly vested by the Colonial Minister with the fullest authority that a governor could ask. He left England early in the year 1852, and crossed the dangerous Strait of Northumberland in the ice-boat—the only conveyance to the island in winter, and a route which was never before, and perhaps never will again, be taken by its governor. It is well known that some years before he crossed the Atlantic, what is termed "Responsible Government" had been conceded to some of the British North American Provinces. The inhabitants of Prince Edward Island eagerly desiring the same system, it was introduced into the island by Sir Alexander, and succeeded admirably during his administration.

SIR ALEXANDER BANNERMAN, GOVERNOR OF NEWFOUNDLAND.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

It was during his administration that the Fishery Question arose, which terminated in the Reciprocity Treaty between Great Britain and the United States. In this he took a great interest, representing to the British Government the danger which might arise from a collision with the fishermen of both nations from their frequent disputes, each party construing the then existing treaty, which was expressed in ambiguous terms, to suit their interests.

In the year 1852 a small naval force was sent from England to cruise on the coasts of the North American provinces. The United States Government adopted a similar course. The frigate Princeton and sloop-of-war Fulton lay at anchor at Charlottetown for some time, the Commodore during his stay acquiring information for his Government, and living on terms of intimacy and friendship with the Lieutenant-Governor. The latter had been corresponding upon the Fishery Question with the late lamented Daniel Webster, Sir Henry Bulwer, Mr. Crampton, etc., and he had the satisfaction to see most of his views carried into effect. A copy of the proposed treaty was sent to him early in the year 1854, and, soon after, the question was amicably settled, to the mutual satisfaction of both nations.

He left Prince Edward Island on the 10th of June, remained in the United States for several months, and arrived at New Providence on the 12th October, where he assumed the government of the Bahamas in the beautiful town of Nassau, and continued to administer it for upward of two years, receiving, before his departure, unanimous addresses from the Legislative Council and House of Assembly, complimenting him on the unintermitted harmony which had existed in the colony, among all parties, during his administration.

He left Nassau on the 10th of May, on his route to Newfoundland, via the United States, where he arrived on the 8th of June. He may have difficulties to encounter in that important colony; but it is to be hoped that the administration of his government may prove as successful there as it was in Prince Edward Island and the Bahamas.

On this side of the Atlantic he has always shown kindness and hospitality to citizens of the United States when he had an opportunity of doing so. No one will rejoice more than the Governor of Newfoundland at seeing Great Britain and the United States now so closely united with each other by the successful accomplishment of the great enterprise which is now the absorbing topic of conversation.

THE RECEPTION AT ST. JOHNS.

The reception of the Telegraph fleet at St. Johns, of which we give below an illustration, was of course celebrated in the highest degree. The shipping came out to meet the Niagara, and, in the language of the telegraphic reporter, "every thing wore the appearance of a gala day."

On the morning of 10th, at 11 A.M., the Legislative Council presented an address to Mr. Field. In the course of his reply Mr. Field said:

"We claim the exclusive privileges conferred by the colony on the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, made her the subject of severe criticism; and it is, therefore, with satisfaction I observe the approving terms in which you refer to them. Every enlightened country recognizes a right of property in those who organize a work where science, or skill, or capital has been invested. This protection is necessary to draw out the efforts of men in new works of public utility—for who would vex if he could not reap?—and while the beneficial use has its reward, society is the gainer by his labor. In the exclusive privileges you have conferred on the Company I represent, the principle of copyright only is involved; and I think there can now be no doubt that your policy has conduced to the interests of the colony."

In the afternoon the Chamber of Commerce presented an address, in the course of his reply to which Mr. Field observed:

"It would not only be ungenerous but unjust that I should for a moment forget the services of those who were my co-operators in this enterprise, and without whom any labor of mine would have been unavailing. It would be difficult to enumerate the many gentlemen whose scientific acquirements and skill and energy have been devoted to the advancement of the work, and who have so nobly promoted the issue which has called forth the expression of your good wishes in my behalf. But I could not do justice to my own feelings if I failed to acknowledge how much is owing to Captain Hudson and the officers of the Niagara, whose hearts were in the work and whose toil was unceasing; to Captain Daymon, of her Majesty's ship Gorgon, for the soundings so accurately made by him, and for the able manner in which he led the great circle are while laying the cable; to Captain Otter, of the Porcupine, for the survey made by him in Trinity Bay, and for the able manner in which he piloted the Niagara into Trinity Bay, at night, to her anchorage; to Mr. Everett, who has for months devoted his whole time to designing and perfecting the beautiful machinery which has so successfully payed out the cable from the ships—machinery so perfect in every respect that it was not for one moment stopped on board the Niagara until she reached her destination in Trinity Bay; to Mr. Woodhouse, who superintended the coiling of the cable, and so zealously and ably co-operated with his brother engineers during the process of paying out; to the electricians, for their constant watchfulness; to the men, for their almost ceaseless labor; and I feel confident that you will have a good report from the commander, engineers, electricians, and others on board the Agamemnon and Valorous, the Irish portion of the fleet; to the directors of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, for the time they have devoted to the undertaking without receiving any compensation for their services—and it must be a pleasure to many to know that the director who has devoted more time than others was for many years a resident of this place, and well known to all of you—I mean Mr. Brooking, of London; to Mr. C. M. Lampson, a native of New England, but who has for the last twenty-five years resided in London, who appreciated the great importance of this enterprise to both countries by giving it his most valuable services, and bringing his sound judgments and great business talents to the service of the Company; to that distinguished American, Mr. George Peabody, and his partner, Mr. Morgan, who not only assisted it most liberally with their means, but to whom I could always go with confidence for advice."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—RECEPTION OF THE "NIAGARA" AT ST. JOHNS, NEWFOUNDLAND.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—TRINITY BAY, NEWFOUNDLAND.

At nine in the evening (we quote from the telegraphic report) the celebration ball commenced, at which were present the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor, Cyrus W. Field, the Chief Justice, and all the other Judges of the Superior Court, Captain Hudson and officers of the Niagara, Captain Dayman and officers of the Gorgon, Mr. Whitehouse, etc., and the leading members of society of St. Johns. After the evening had been passed in the most pleasant and delightful manner, the assembled company adjourned at twelve o'clock for supper, which was got up in the most perfect taste. Walter Grieve, Esq., President of the Chamber of Commerce, was called on to preside, when the following toasts were given:

The Queen—The best-beloved and most popular sovereign that ever sat on the British throne—one who reigns in the hearts and affections, as well as over the persons, of her subjects—May God long preserve her reign over a free and happy people!

The President of the United States—Chosen by the voice of the people, he has shown himself worthy the high honor of presiding over the destinies of a free and enlightened nation. (This toast was coupled with the Queen's.)

The Governor and Lieutenant, and Captain Hudson and the officers of the squadron, and other gentlemen engaged in the expedition. (This toast stated that the combined skill of Captain Hudson and those associated with him had overcome all the difficulties that had previously been supposed insurmountable, and they had accomplished the greatest wonder in the world—the union of the Old and New World by the electric cable.)

This was appropriately responded to by Captain Hudson.

The honorable Colonial Secretary then proposed, and the honorable President of the Council seconded, the health of Cyrus W. Field, Esq., whose name had become a household word in this country.

Mr. Field replied, saying that he should never forget the pleasure of this day. It was a season of anxiety to him during the six and a half days the Niagara was accomplishing her mission. Great praise was due Captain Hudson, his officers and men, for their zeal in working day and night over the eleven hundred and fifty miles of the ocean they had to cross. The successful accomplishment, however, of the greatest event of any age, amply compensated all who had become a partner in its achievement, for the toil, anxiety, and care they had experienced. Mr. Field continued in a strain of eloquence and power that went to every heart.

Other toasts were then given and properly responded to.

Dancing was then resumed and kept up with great spirit till three o'clock in the morning, when the party broke up—all on the best terms with the world and each other.

TRINITY BAY.

The two landing-places of the cable are destined to more celebrity than has ever been their share in times past. The cove in Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, which has been selected as the site of the American terminus, is in a wilderness. The nearest house is several miles distant; nothing surrounds the Telegraph House but bleak rocks and barren forests. A recent visitor has thus described the spot:

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—VALENTIA BAY, IRELAND.

"The approach to the bay in which the cable is to be laid is exceedingly picturesque, and possesses all that wildness and grandeur of scenery which distinguish nearly the whole coast of Newfoundland. If the weather should prove clear, the peaks of the high headlands can be seen some thirty miles from land, and a nearer view shows a country of peculiarly mountainous character. The first thing that strikes the visitor is the barren and rocky nature of the land; but there are some parts which are particularly susceptible of cultivation, and where, considering the inhospitable character of the climate, farming has been successfully carried on. It must be confessed, however, that the prospects for agricultural operations are not of the most encouraging kind, and that cod-fishing is, as it must always prove, the most lucrative occupation. Between those bleak, wild mountain ranges there are some beautiful little valleys, through which run streams of the purest sparkling water. Indeed, there is an inexhaustible supply of this common but valuable and necessary article, both in the numerous lakes, rivers, and rivulets with which the whole island abounds, and which come gushing out of every rock in the summer time, or are frozen up in icy stillness and death during the long and cheerless winter.

"The entrance to Trinity Bay is about thirty miles wide, and on either side rise the bold headlands of Baccalo and Horse Chops—the latter of which is about five hundred and the former seven hundred feet in height. The shore of the bay is marked by indentations and smaller bays, and inlets have been worn into its rocky boundaries by the restless action of the sea, which breaks here with resistless fury. Large caves, running far into the mountain barriers, have been hollowed out by the same agency, and the deep seams that scar the front of the rocks show that time has also left its mark upon them.

* * * * * *

"By looking at the map of Newfoundland it will be seen that Trinity and Placentia bays are separated by a narrow neck of land about four miles in breadth. Now this spot has been selected, not only on account of the sandy character of the beach, but for another reason no less forcible. It is intended hereafter to lay a submarine cable from Placentia Bay to the best point either in Nova Scotia or near Portland, Maine, and the brief distance, therefore, between the two bays, will tend greatly to facilitate this design. A subterranean line, four miles long, will be all sufficient to connect the two cables, the one extending to Ireland, and through Ireland to England, Europe, and Asia; and the other to the United States and the whole of North America. At present the connection will be formed with the land line running from St. Johns, the capital city, to Cape Ray, the most extreme southwestern point on the island, where the cable which spans the Gulf was laid in the month of July, 1856. The great advantage of the proposed submarine line extending from Placentia Bay to Nova Scotia or Portland will consist in its being free from those accidents to which all land lines are liable, and to which that in Newfoundland is more particularly exposed on account of the severity of the climate and the wild and uncultivated state of the country.

At the head of the Bay of Bull's Arm, about half a mile from high-water line, the Telegraph House will be erected. This will be a spacious frame building, containing, in addition to the office or operator's department, a sitting-room, a kitchen, eight bedrooms, and all the other et ceteras of a well-appointed household.

VALENTIA BAY.

The special correspondent of the Herald thus describes the scene:

"The other terminus of the line is in Valentia Bay, which is perhaps the most available point on the whole southern coast of Ireland, both on account of its being the nearest to Newfoundland, and on account of its particular adaptability for a telegraph station. The county of Kerry, which is indented by Valentia Bay, and in which the shore-end of the cable was landed on the evening of the 6th of August last year, is very similar in its natural features to that part of Newfoundland where the cable is landed. Huge mountains rise up on almost every side, and great masses of rock, in a thousand fantastic shapes, stand out in solitary isolation miles from the land. Two of these, of such gigantic dimensions that they almost approach the dignity of mountains, guard the entrance of Dingle Bay, like weather-beaten sentinels; while further in from the ocean is a long mountain range, the face of which is worn with deep fissures, while its base is hollowed out at irregular intervals by caves, some of which extend, according to the statements of the peasantry, several hundred feet into the very heart of the mountains. The bay has a depth in some places of over a hundred fathoms, but it is so open to the sea, and the anchorage is so bad, that it is one of the worst places which a vessel could select in a storm. Valentia Bay is more protected, and although not safe in a storm, affords much better anchorage. The land, for miles into the interior, is very rocky and barren, and affords a poor pasturage for the diminutive but hardy race of cattle for which the county Kerry is famous. The huts of the peasantry which dot the hill-sides show too plainly the poverty of the lower classes of the people, and how miserably their labor is rewarded. The ruins of churches, which were built by pious Christians as long ago as the fourth or fifth century, are strikingly in accordance with the impoverished appearance of the land and of the people. The Island of Valentia suffered fearfully during the famine in Ireland, and hundreds died of starvation on the roadside or in the miserable dwellings, some of which still remain, and in which their bodies were found many weeks after their death, unburied, and in a horrible state of emaciation. The small land cove in which the bay terminates was decided upon last year as the place for the landing of the cable, and has not been changed since. It is, in fact, the very best spot that could be selected. About four hundred yards from the beach a telegraph building, somewhat similar to that at Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, has been erected and supplied with every thing necessary for the business and accommodation of the operators. The junction with the cable will be formed by a land line running to Cork, from Cork to Dublin, thence across the Channel to England, and by other connections with the great net-work of telegraphs which extends over the whole continent of Europe, and which has already embraced within it portions of Asia and Africa."

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XVII.

A Man's Letter—unsatisfactory and provoking as a man's letters always are.

Guy Darrell to Colonel Morley.

Fawley Manor-House, August 19, 18—.

I have decided, my dear Alban. I did not take three days to do so, though the third day may be just over ere you learn my decision. I shall never marry again. I abandon that last dream of declining years. My object in returning to the London world was to try whether I could not find, among the fairest and most attractive women that the world produces—at least to an English eye—some one who could inspire me with that singleness of affection which could alone justify the hope that I might win, in return, a wife's esteem and a contented home. That object is now finally relinquished, and, with it, all idea of resuming the life of cities. I might have re-entered a political career, had I first secured to myself a mind sufficiently serene and healthful for duties that need the concentration of thought and desire. Such a state of mind I can not secure. I have striven for it; I am baffled. It is said that politics are a jealous mistress—that they require the whole man. The saying is not invariably true in the application it commonly receives—that is, a politician may have some other employment of intellect, which rather enlarges his powers than distracts their political uses. Successful politicians have united with great parliamentary toil and triumph legal occupations or literary or learned studies. But politics do require that the heart should be free, and at peace from all more absorbing private anxieties—from the gnawing of a memory or a care, which dulls ambition and paralyzes energy. In this sense politics do require the whole man. If I returned to politics now, I should fail to them, and they to me. I feel that the brief interval between me and the grave has need of repose: I find that repose here. I have therefore given the necessary orders to dismiss the pompous retinue which I left behind me, and instructed my agent to sell my London house for whatever it may fetch. I was unwilling to sell it before—unwilling to abandon the hope, however faint, that I might yet regain strength for action. But the very struggle to obtain such strength leaves me exhausted more.

You may believe that it is not without a pang—less of pride than of remorse—that I resign unfulfilled the object toward which all my earlier life was so resolutely shaped. The house I had promised my father to refound dies to dust in my grave. To my father's blood no heir to my wealth can trace. Yet it is a consolation to think that Lionel Haughton is one on whom my father would have smiled approvingly. At my death, therefore, at least the old name will not die: Lionel Haughton will take and be worthy to bear it. Strange weakness of mine, you will say; but I can not endure the thought that the old name should be quite blotted out of the land. I trust that Lionel may early form a suitable and happy marriage. Sure that he will not choose ignobly, I impose no fetters on his choice.

One word only on that hateful subject, confided so tardily to your friendship, left so thankfully to your discretion. Now that I have once more buried myself in Fawley, it is very unlikely that the man it pains me to name will seek me here. If he does, he can not molest me as if I were in the London world. Continue, then, I pray you, to leave him alone. And in adopting your own shrewd belief that, after all, there is no such child as he pretends to claim, my mind becomes tranquilized on all that part of my private griefs.

Farewell, old school-friend! Here, so far as I can foretell—here, where my life began, it returns, when Heaven pleases, to close. Here I could not ask you to visit me: what is rest to me would be loss of time to you. But in my late and vain attempt to re-enter that existence in which you have calmly and wisely gathered round yourself "all that should accompany old age—honor, love, obedience, troops of friends"—nothing so repaid the effort—nothing now so pleasantly remains to recollection—as the brief renewal of that easy commune which men like me never know, save with those whose laughter brings back to them a gale from the old playground. "Vive, vale;" I will not add, "Sis memor mei." So many my obligations to your kindness, that you will be forced to remember me whenever you recall the not "painful subjects" of early friendship and lasting gratitude. Recall only those when reminded of Guy Darrell.

CHAPTER XVIII.

No coinage in circulation so fluctuates in value as the worth of a Marriageable Man.

Colonel Morley was not surprised (that, we know, he could not be, by any fresh experience of human waywardness and caprice), but much disturbed and much vexed by the unexpected nature of Darrell's communication. Schemes for Darrell's future had become plans of his own. Talk with his old school-fellow had, within the last three months, entered into the pleasures of his age. Darrell's abrupt and final renunciation of this social world made at once a void in the business of Alban's mind, and in the affections of Alban's heart. And no adequate reason assigned for so sudden a flight and so morbid a resolve! Some tormenting remembrance—some rankling grief—distinct from those of which Alban was cognizant, those in which he had been consulted, was implied but by vague and general hints. But what was the remembrance of the grief, Alban Morley, who knew every thing, was quite persuaded that Darrell would never suffer him to know. Could it be in any way connected with those three young ladies to whom Darrell's attentions had been so perversely impartial? The Colonel did not fail to observe that to those young ladies Darrell's letter did not even allude. Was it not possible that he had really felt for one of them a deeper sentiment than a man advanced in years ever likes to own even to his nearest friend—hazarded a proposal, and met with a rebuff? If so, Alban conjectured the female culprit by whom the sentiment had been inspired and the rebuff administered. "That mischievous kitten, Flora Vyvyan," growled the Colonel. "I always felt that she had the claws of a tigress under that patte de velours!" Roused by this suspicion, he sallied forth to call on the Vyvyans. Mr. Vyvyan, a widower, one of those quiet gentlemanlike men who sit much in the drawing-room and like receiving morning visitors, was at home to him. "So Darrell has left town for the season," said the Colonel, pushing straight to the point.

"Yes," said Mr. Vyvyan. "I had a note from him this morning, to say he had renounced all hope of—"

"What?" cried the Colonel.

"Joining us in Switzerland. I am so sorry. Flora still more sorry. She is accustomed to have her own way, and she had set her heart on hearing Darrell read 'Manfred' in sight of the Jung Frau!"

"Um," said the Colonel. "What might be sport to her might be death to him. A man at his age is not too old to fall in love with a young lady of hers. But he is too old not to be extremely ridiculous to such a young lady if he does."

"Colonel Morley—Fie!" cried an angry voice behind him. Flora had entered the room unobserved. Her face was much flushed, and her eyelids looked as if tears had lately swelled beneath them, and were swelling still.

"What have I said to merit your rebuke?" asked the Colonel, composedly.

"Said! Coupled the thought of ridicule with the name of Mr. Darrell!"

"Take care, Morley," said Mr. Vyvyan, laughing. "Flora is positively superstitious in her respect for Guy Darrell; and you can not offend her more than by implying that he is mortal. Nay, child, it is very natural. Quite apart from his fame, there is something in that man's familiar talk, or rather, perhaps, in the very sound of his voice, which makes most other society seem flat and insipid. I feel it myself. And when Flora's young admirers flutter and babble round her—just after Darrell has quitted his chair beside her—they seem very poor company. I'm sure, Flora," continued Vyvyan, kindly, "that the mere acquaintance of such a man has done you a great deal of good; and I am now in great hopes that, whenever you marry, it will be a man of sense."

"Um!" again said the Colonel, eying Flora aslant, but with much attention. "How I wish, for my friend's sake, that he was of an age which inspired Miss Vyvyan with less—veneration!"

Flora turned her back on the Colonel, looking out of the window, and her small foot beating the ground with nervous irritation.

"It was given out that Darrell intended to marry again," said Mr. Vyvyan. "A man of that sort requires a very superior, highly-educated woman; and if Miss Carr Vipont had been a little more of his age she would have just suited him. But I am patriot enough to hope that he will remain single, and have no wife but his country, like Mr. Pitt."

The Colonel having now satisfied his curiosity, and assured himself that Darrell was, there at least, no rejected suitor, rose and approached Flora to make peace, and to take leave. As he held out his hand he was struck with the change in a countenance usually so gay in its aspect—it spoke of more than dejection, it betrayed distress; when she took his hand she retained it, and looked into his eyes wistfully; evidently there was something on her mind which she wished to express, and did not know how. At length she said in a whisper, "You are Mr. Darrell's most intimate friend; I have heard him say so. Shall you see him soon?"

"I fear not; but why?"

"Why? you, his friend; do you not perceive that he is not happy? I, a mere stranger, saw it at the first. You should cheer and comfort him; you have that right—it is a noble privilege."

"My dear young lady," said the Colonel, touched, "you have a better heart than I thought for. It is true Darrell is not a happy man; but can you give me any message that might cheer him more than an old bachelor's commonplace exhortations to take heart, forget the rains of yesterday, and hope for some gleam of sun on the morrow?"

"No," said Flora, sadly, "it would be a presumption indeed in me to affect the consoler's part; but—(her lips quivered)—but if I may judge by his letter, I may never see him again."

"His letter! He has written to you, then, as well as to your father?"

"Yes," said Flora, confused and coloring, "a few lines in answer to a silly note of mine; yes, tell him that I shall never forget his kind counsels, his delicate, indulgent construction of—of—in short, tell him my father is right, and that I shall be better and wiser all my life for the few short weeks in which I have known Guy Darrell."

"What secrets are you two whispering there?" asked Mr. Vyvyan from his easy chair.

"Ask her ten years hence," said the Colonel, as he retreated to the door. "The fairest leaves in the flower are the last that the bud will disclose."

From Mr. Vyvyan the Colonel went to Lord ——'s. His lordship had also heard from Darrell that morning; Darrell declined the invitation to —— Hall; business at Fawley. Lady Adela had borne the disappointment with her wonted serenity of temper, and had gone out shopping. Darrell had certainly not offered his hand in that quarter; had he done so—whether refused or accepted—all persons yet left in London would have heard the news. Thence the Colonel repaired to Carr Vipont's. Lady Selina was at home, and exceedingly cross. Carr had been astonished by a letter from Mr. Darrell, dated Fawley—left town for the season without even calling to take leave—a most eccentric man. She feared his head was a little touched—that he knew it, but did not like to own it—perhaps the doctors had told him he must keep quiet, and not excite himself with politics. "I had thought," said Lady Selina, "that he might have felt a growing attachment for Honoria; and, considering the disparity of years, and that Honoria certainly might marry any one, he was too proud to incur the risk of refusal. But I will tell you in confidence, as a relation and dear friend, that Honoria has a very superior mind, and might have overlooked the mere age: congenial tastes—you understand. But on thinking it all over, I begin to doubt whether that be the true reason for his running away in this wild sort of manner. My maid tells me that his house-steward called to say that the establishment was to be broken up. That looks as if he had resigned London for good; just, too, when, Carr says, the crisis, so long put off, is sure to burst on us. I'm quite sick of clever men—one never knows how to trust them; if they are not dishonest, they are eccentric! I have just been telling Honoria that clever men are, after all, the most tiresome husbands. Well, what makes you so silent? What do you say? Why don't you speak?"

"I am slowly recovering from my shock," said the Colonel. "So Darrell shirks the crisis, and has not even hinted a preference for Honoria, the very girl in all London that would have made him a safe, rational companion. I told him so, and he never denied it. But it is a comfort to think he is no loss. Old monster!"

"Nay," said Lady Selina, mollified by so much sympathy, "I don't say he is no loss. Honestly speaking—between ourselves—I think he is a very great loss. An alliance between him and Honoria would have united all the Vipont influence. Lord Montfort has the greatest confidence in Darrell; and if this crisis comes, it is absolutely necessary for the Vipont interest that it should find somebody who can speak. Really, my dear Colonel Morley, you who have such an influence over this very odd man should exert it now. One must not be overnice in times of crisis; the country is at stake, Cousin Alban."

"I will do my best," said the Colonel; "I am quite aware that an alliance which would secure Darrell's talents to the House of Vipont, and the House of Vipont to Darrell's talents, would—but 'tis no use talking, we must not sacrifice Honoria even on the altar of her country's interest!"

"Sacrifice! Nonsense! The man is not young, certainly; but then, what a grand creature—and so clever!"

"Clever—yes! But that was your very objection to him five minutes ago."

"I forgot the crisis. One don't want clever men every day, but there are days when one does want them!"

"I envy you that aphorism. But from what you now imply, I fear that Honoria may have allowed her thoughts to settle upon what may never take place; and, if so, she may fret."

"Fret! a daughter of mine fret!—and of all my daughters, Honoria! A girl of the best-disciplined mind! Fret! what a word—vulgar!"

Colonel Morley. "So it is; I blush for it; but let us understand each other. If Darrell proposed for Honoria, you think, ambition apart, she would esteem him sufficiently for a decided preference."

Lady Selina. "If that be his doubt, reassure him. He is shy; men of genius are; Honoria would esteem him! Till he has actually proposed, it would compromise her to say more even to you."

Colonel Morley. "And if that be not the doubt, and if I ascertain that Darrell has no idea of proposing, Honoria would—"

Lady Selina. "Despise him. Ah, I see by your countenance that you think I should prepare her. Is it so, frankly?"

Colonel Morley. "Frankly, then. I think Guy Darrell, like many other men, has been so long making up his mind to marry again that he has lost the right moment, and will never find it."

Lady Selina smells at her vinaigrette, and replies in her softest, affectedest, civilest, and crushingest manner—

"Poor—DEAR—OLD MAN!"

CHAPTER XIX.

Man is not permitted, with ultimate impunity, to exasperate the envies, and insult the miseries of those around him, by a systematic perseverance in willful—Celibacy. In vain may he scheme, in the marriage of injured friends, to provide arm-chairs, and footstools, and prattling babies for the luxurious delectation of his indolent age. The avenging Eumenides (being themselves ancient virgins neglected) shall humble his insolence, baffle his projects, and condemn his declining years to the horrors of solitude—rarely even wakening his soul to the grace of repentance.

The Colonel, before returning home, dropped into the Clubs, and took care to give to Darrell's sudden disappearance a plausible and commonplace construction. The season was just over. Darrell had gone to the country. The town establishment was broken up, because the house in Carlton Gardens was to be sold. Darrell did not like the situation—found the air relaxing—Park Lane or Grosvenor Square were on higher ground. Besides, the stair-case was bad for a house of such pretensions—not suited to large parties. Next season Darrell might be in a position when he would have to give large parties, etc. etc. As no one is inclined to suppose that a man will retire from public life just when he has a chance of office, so the Clubs took Alban Morley's remarks unsuspiciously, and generally agreed that Darrell showed great tact in absenting himself from town during the transition state of politics that always precedes a CRISIS, and that it was quite clear that he calculated on playing a great part when the CRISIS was over, by finding his house had grown too small for him. Thus paving the way to Darrell's easy return to the world, should he repent of his retreat (a chance which Alban by no means dismissed from his reckoning), the Colonel returned home to find his nephew George awaiting him there. The scholarly clergyman had ensconced himself in the back drawing-room, fitted up as a library, and was making free with the books. "What have you there, George?" asked the Colonel, after shaking him by the hand. "You seemed quite absorbed in its contents, and would not have noticed my presence but for Gip's bark."

"A volume of poems I never chanced to meet before. Full of true genius."

"Bless me, poor Arthur Branthwaite's poems. And you were positively reading those—not induced to do so by respect for his father?—Could you make head or tail of them?"

"There is a class of poetry which displeases middle age by the very attributes which render it charming to the young; for each generation has a youth with idiosyncrasies peculiar to itself, and a peculiar poetry by which those idiosyncrasies are expressed."

Here George was beginning to grow metaphysical, and somewhat German, when his uncle's face assumed an expression which can only be compared to that of a man who dreads a very severe and long operation. George humanely hastened to relieve his mind.

"But I will not bore you at present."

"Thank you," said the Colonel, brightening up.

"Perhaps you will lend me the book. I am going down to Lady Montfort's by-and-by, and I can read it by the way."

"Yes, I will lend it to you till next season. Let me have it again then, to put on the table when Frank Vance comes to breakfast with me. The poet was his brother-in-law; and though, for that reason, poets and poetry are a sore subject with Frank, yet, the last time he breakfasted here, I felt, by the shake of his hand in parting, that he felt pleased by a mark of respect to all that is left of poor Arthur Branthwaite. So you are going to Lady Montfort? Ask her why she cuts me!"

"My dear uncle! You know how secluded her life is at present; but she has charged me to assure you of her unalterable regard for you; and whenever her health and spirits are somewhat more recovered, I have no doubt that she will ask you to give her the occasion to make that assurance in person."

COLONEL MORLEY. "Can her health and spirits continue so long affected by grief for the loss of that distant acquaintance whom the law called her husband?"

GEORGE. "She is very far from well, and her spirits are certainly much broken. And now, uncle, for the little favor I came to ask. Since you presented me to Mr. Darrell, he kindly sent me two or three invitations to dinner, which my frequent absence from town would not allow me to accept. I ought to call on him; and, as I feel ashamed not to have done so before, I wish you would accompany me to his house. One happy word from you would save me a relapse into stutter. When I want to apologize, I always stutter."

"Darrell has left town," said the Colonel, roughly; "you have missed an opportunity that will never occur again. The most charming companion; an intellect so manly, yet so sweet! I shall never find such another." And for the first time in thirty years a tear stole to Alban Morley's eye.

GEORGE. "When did he leave town?"

COLONEL MORLEY. "Three days ago."

GEORGE. "Three days ago! and for the Continent again?"

COLONEL MORLEY. "No, for the Hermitage. George, I have such a letter from him! You know how many years he has been absent from the world. When, this year, he reappeared, he and I grew more intimate than we had ever been since we had left school; for though the same capital held us before, he was then too occupied for much familiarity with an idle man like me. But just when I was intertwining what is left of my life with the bright threads of his, he snaps the web asunder; he quits this London world again; says he will return to it no more."

GEORGE. "Yet I did hear that he proposed to renew his parliamentary career; nay, that he was about to form a second marriage with Honoria Vipont?"

COLONEL MORLEY. "Mere gossip—not true. No, he will never again marry. Three days ago I thought it certain that he would—certain that I should find for my old age a nook in his home—the easiest chair in his social circle; that my daily newspaper would have a fresh interest in the praise of his name or the report of his speech; that I should walk proudly into White's, sure to hear there of Guy Darrell; that I should keep from misanthropical rust my dry knowledge of life, planning shrewd panegyrics to him of a young, happy wife, needing all his indulgence—panegyrics to her of the high-minded, sensitive man, claiming tender respect and delicate soothing; that thus, day by day, I should have made more pleasant the home in which I should have planted myself, and found in his children boys to lecture and girls to spoil. Don't be jealous, George. I like your wife, I love your little ones, and you will have all I have to leave. But to an old bachelor, who would keep young to the last, there is no place so sunny as the hearth of an old school-friend. But my house of cards is blown down—talk of it no more—'tis a painful subject. You met Lionel Haughton here the last time you called—how did you like him?"

"Very much, indeed."

"Well, then, since you can not call on Darrell, call on him."

GEORGE (with animation). "It is just what I meant to do—what is his address?"

COLONEL MORLEY. "There is his card—take it. He was here last night to inquire if I knew where Darrell had gone, though no one in his household, nor I either, suspected till this morning that Darrell had left town for good. You will find Lionel at home, for I sent him word I would call. But really I am not up to it now. Tell him from me that Mr. Darrell will not return to Carlton Gardens this season, and is gone to Fawley. At present Lionel need not know more—you understand? And now, my dear George, good-day."

CHAPTER XX.

Each generation has its own critical canons in poetry as well as in political creeds, financial systems, or whatever other changeable matters of taste are called "Settled Questions" and "Fixed Opinions."

GEORGE, musing much over all that his uncle had said respecting Darrell, took his way to Lionel's lodgings. The young man received him with the cordial greeting due from Darrell's kinsman to Colonel Morley's nephew, but tempered by the respect no less due to the distinction and the calling of the eloquent preacher.

Lionel was perceptibly affected by learning that Darrell had thus suddenly returned to the gloomy beech-woods of Fawley; and he evinced his anxious interest in his benefactor with so much spontaneous tenderness of feeling, that George, as if in sympathy, warmed into the same theme. "I can well conceive," said he, "your affection for Mr. Darrell. I remember, when I was a boy, how powerfully he impressed me, though I saw but little of him. He was then in the zenith of his career, and had but few moments to give to a boy like me; but the ring of his voice and the flash of his eye sent me back to school, dreaming of fame, and intent on prizes. I spent part of one Easter vacation at his house in town; he bade his son, who was my school-fellow, invite me."

LIONEL. "You knew his son? How Mr. Darrell has felt that loss!"

GEORGE. "Heaven often vails its most provident mercy in what to man seems its sternest inflictions. That poor boy must have changed his whole nature, if his life had not to a father, like Mr. Darrell, occasioned grief sharper than his death."

LIONEL. "You amaze me. Mr. Darrell spoke of him as a boy of great promise."

GEORGE. "He had that kind of energy which to a father conveys the idea of promise, and which might deceive those older than himself—a fine bright-eyed bold-tongued boy, with just enough awe of his father to bridle his worst qualities before him."

LIONEL. "What were those?"

GEORGE. "Headstrong arrogance—relentless cruelty. He had a pride which would have shamed his father out of pride, had Guy Darrell detected its nature—purse pride! I remember his father said to me with a half-laugh, 'My boy must not be galled and mortified as I was every hour at school—clothes patched and pockets empty.' And so, out of mistaken kindness, Mr. Darrell ran into the opposite extreme, and the son was proud, not of his father's fame, but of his father's money, and withal not generous, nor exactly extravagant, but using money as power—power that allowed him to insult an equal or to buy a slave. In a word, his nickname at school was 'Sir Giles Overreach.' His death was the result of his strange passion for tormenting others. He had a fag who could not swim, and who had the greatest terror of the water; and it was while driving this child into the river out of his depth that cramp seized himself, and he was drowned. Yes, when I think what that boy would have been as man, succeeding to Darrell's wealth—and had Darrell persevered (as he would, perhaps, if the boy had lived) in his public career—to the rank and titles he would probably have acquired and bequeathed—again I say, in man's affliction is often Heaven's mercy."

Lionel listened aghast. George continued, "Would that I could speak as plainly to Mr. Darrell himself! For we find constantly in the world that there is no error that misleads us like the error that is half a truth wrenched from the other half; and nowhere is such an error so common as when man applies it to the judgment of some event in his own life, and separates calamity from consolation."

LIONEL. "True; but who could have the heart to tell a mourning father that his dead son was worthless?"

GEORGE. "Alas, my young friend, the preacher must sometimes harden his own heart if he would strike home to another's soul. But I am not sure that Mr. Darrell would need so cruel a kindness. I believe that his clear intellect must have divined some portions of his son's nature which enabled him to bear the loss with fortitude. And he did bear it bravely. But now, Mr. Haughton, if you have the rest of the day free, I am about to make you an unceremonious proposition for its disposal. A lady who knew Mr. Darrell when she was very young, has a strong desire to form your acquaintance. She resides on the banks of the Thames, a little above Twickenham. I have promised to call on her this evening. Shall we dine together at Richmond? And afterward we can take a boat to her villa."

Lionel at once accepted, thinking so little of the lady that he did not even ask her name. He was pleased to have a companion with whom he could talk of Darrell. He asked but delay to write a few lines of affectionate inquiry to his kinsman at Fawley, and, while he wrote, George took out Arthur Branthwaite's poems and resumed their perusal. Lionel having sealed his letter, George extended the book to him. "Here are some remarkable poems by a brother-in-law of that remarkable artist, Frank Vance."

"Frank Vance! True, he had a brother-in-law a poet. I admire Frank so much; and, though he professes to sneer at poetry, he is so associated in my mind with poetical images that I am prepossessed beforehand in favor of all that brings him, despite himself, in connection with poetry."

"Tell me, then," said George, pointing out a passage in the volume, "what you think of these lines." My good uncle would call them gibberish. I am not sure that I can construe them; but when I was your age, I think I could—what say you?"

Lionel glanced. "Exquisite indeed! nothing can be clearer; they express exactly a sentiment in myself that I could never explain."

"Just so," said George, laughing. "Youth has a sentiment that it can not explain, and the sentiment is expressed in a form of poetry that middle age can not construe. It is true that poetry of the grand order interests equally all ages; but the world ever throws out a poetry not of the grandest; not meant to be durable—not meant to be universal—but following the shifts and changes of human sentiment, and just like those pretty sun-dials formed by flowers which bloom to tell the hour, open their buds to tell it, and, telling it, fade themselves from time."

Not listening to the critic, Lionel continued to read the poems, exclaiming, "How exquisite! how true!"

MY UNFORTUNATE UNCLE.

I THINK my grandfather was born in Salem. On this point, however, and on many others relating to the earlier part of his career, he was rather reserved. The mystery attending his birthplace was no bar to his attaining a highly respectable position in society, which the general knowledge of the fact that the foundation of his fortune was laid in the profits of the slave-trade did not materially disturb. He took excellent care of his money, watchfully avoiding public and private charities; he held, in his day, many offices of trust and honor; his old age seemed tranquil and happy; and he died, without a struggle, one afternoon, after a hearty dinner of roast pig, leaving a large fortune to be divided between my uncle and myself—my parents being dead.

The fortune was divided in this way: my uncle came in for about half a million, and to me the moderate, and perhaps disproportionate, sum of five thousand dollars was, by a codicillary afterthought, kindly bequeathed, with an expressed hope—probably intended as posthumous waggery—that the disposition of the property would prove satisfactory to me, and an allusion to the fact that my education and college expenses had already been at his, the testator's, charge. This last hit had been a favorite one with my grandfather during his valuable and entertaining existence, but as it originated from his only charitable act—the consolidated generosity of a lifetime—he could be pardoned for his frequent resort to it.

The disposition of the property did not, as my grandfather had wished, prove satisfactory to me; and I felt called upon to say as much to my uncle, the executor, who replied, with an attractive smile, that it could not be expected every body would be satisfied: this seemed reasonable, and I politely withdrew.

It now became necessary to choose a profession—a matter of some consequence, frequently meditated upon but never yet decided. Hitherto I had quieted myself with the belief that, as my grandfather had endowed me with a collegiate education, he intended to add to the obligation by bequeathing me a competency at least, instead of forcing me, by this wretched conduct, to the drudgery of a professional apprenticeship—a thing taken to kindly in youth, but vexatious, and generally unavailing, later in life. In truth, the business looked far from easy to me now; the medical and legal professions—and the fact has often impressed other minds—were comfortably filled, if not crowded; as for the ministry, I felt I was unfit for that; fortunately perhaps, for that vocation lay under the same disadvantage.

So here I was, at the age of twenty-nine, in a very uncomfortable position; the more perplexing from the fact that, a week or two before, I had, in a very agitated and rapid manner, confided to Sarah Jane Williams the secret of my heart; that I loved her a great deal better than my own existence, which would be hateful without her; that she was the only girl I had ever looked upon with sentiments worthy of more than passing notice; that for the future all other females would excite in me but a feeble interest; to this I had added that my prospects, pecuniarily, were of the most flattering description, nearly the same, indeed, as two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars cash in hand, and concluded by firmly asserting she alone possessed the power of making me supremely happy, which I then begged her to do.

To which Sarah Jane Williams had made reply, that she had long hidden the esteem and love in which she held me; that she now, with pride, seized the opportunity to confess it; that she would marry me with great pleasure; that, as her aunt was a lady of firm temper, with a general inclination toward opposition, it would be well, perhaps, for the present, to keep our pleasing secret to ourselves, at all events, until something more definite touching the two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars, of which mention had been made in my declaration, should transpire.

To this, from Sarah Jane Williams, I had assented; and, at the same moment, regretted I had not remained guardedly silent concerning the two hundred and odd thousand dollars. But who is discreet in love? In that state a man, particularly a young one, moves toward general and full confession as surely as we all move toward death. Instructing the adored one in every thing of note bearing upon the all-absorbing topic of their mutual affection, he goes further, and dazzles her imagination with fantastic plans, which, mostly subject to future contingencies, and faintly connected with the present, the blindness of love, nevertheless, converts into the soundest reason. The two hundred and odd thousand dollars had, it is true, some connection with the matter in debate; but I now decided, should it ever be necessary again to speak of that sum, it should be approached in the gentlest and most cursory manner.

Sarah Jane Williams was a very lovely and intelligent young lady; naturally she must have been this, or I could not have become so exceedingly enamored by her. I first saw her, five years before my grandfather's death, on the day I closed a negotiation for board and lodging with her aunt, Miss Elizabeth Williams, a maiden lady of great purity of character, who, a short time before, had taken charge of Sarah Jane and her brother Tom, then left orphans. We all know how these things turn out in every well-regulated narrative, so it may be needless to acknowledge that I loved her from the first. But so faithful was the watch and ward maintained over her by Miss Elizabeth; so entirely had she been impressed with the belief that all young male boarders were the special emissaries of Satan; so honestly did she obey the command to avoid them, unless in presence of witnesses, that my love could only be fed, and the spark of her growing affection fanned into a healthy existence, by a ready word, here and there, and the hundreds of minute attentions, half tolerated because almost imperceptible, of which, when a chance offered, I eagerly took advantage. One who has never lived in a large boarding-house can not understand the difficulty of this sort of an affair. Over a pretty girl of seventeen the vigilance of her lawful guardian or guardians might be considered a tolerable protection; but as all the young fellows in the house are generally, in different degrees, fascinated, and are continually striving to exhibit to her, and to her alone, in various extraordinary ways, the intensity of their passion, it falls out at last that each aspirant becomes a self-constituted policeman, always round the corner, prepared to make an unexpected entrance on the scene, whenever any one of the volunteer force, after days of watching, foolishly supposes he has secured the opportunity of a private conversation with the guarded treasure. Such a patrol was in regular service about the person of Sarah Jane Williams; and it was solely because I was more at leisure than the others, and could remain at home while they were compelled to go regularly to their respective places of business, that I had succeeded, in the course of years, in acquiring her favor, and, at last, in securing the opportunity, already noticed, of ascertaining her sentiments by a frank and hurried confession of my own. Henceforth the affair was more simple; no prudery need stand in the way, and by a stream of three-cornered billets our plans and hopes could float from one to the other without detection.

During my early domiciliation in this house I became acquainted with Tom, Sarah Jane's brother. He was then about twenty. His habits were so very erratic, his manners so unregulated, that he very nearly, at one time, revolutionized the whole establishment. An extensive acquaintance with the world has never brought to my notice a young gentleman whose property in the article of wild oats has been so large as Tom's, or who could sow them so systematically, constantly, and enthusiastically as he. His consciousness of being the only person of whom his aunt was in awe did not serve to quiet his manifestations; the reckless course of conduct he adopted in regard to chambermaids—seizing every opportunity to kiss the handsome ones on the landings in regular order as he, ascending or descending, might meet them—caused the banishment of every girl with any claim to youth and beauty; so that, finally, there was no female servant in the house under forty-five, and the faces of these had generally suffered from the ravages of the small-pox. The deep disgust which the successive dismission of the youthful "help" excited in Tom he was in the habit of manifesting openly to his aunt and the assembled respectability of the house at meals. Day by day he grew in wickedness. Sometimes he invited seedy young men, in very dingy shirts, home to dine. Once six harmonious gentlemen slept with him in his apartment from two o'clock A.M. until nine, at which hour a boy, hired by Miss Elizabeth Williams to clean knives, being seduced from his allegiance and furnished with a lot of small change—contributed by the guests in proportion to their means—was dispatched for eight quart bottles of strong ale, with which, and a pail of iced water subsequently carried up by the same misguided youth, they partially assuaged their thirst, and in single file walked down stairs into the street, each brandishing an empty bottle, and all notably drunk. Sometimes an apoplectic snore would attract the attention of servants to secluded corners of the building, where our young friend would be found in what he was pleased to call a "water-logged state," and taken to bed. Often, too, when going down to breakfast, I encountered a pungent odor of gin coming up accompanied by Tom, an indication that the preceding night had been passed away from home.

He remained with his aunt but a few months after my arrival, when his genius expanded to such an extent that a new sphere of action became necessary. Early one morning—some hours before sunrise—as he was sauntering home from a protracted orgy, it occurred to him that the despondency of mind consequent on the reaction from brilliant society to the loneliness of the street might be alleviated by a resort to song. Never much in the habit of controlling his inclination, he sat down on the curb-stone, and in lofty but shattered tones commenced a ballad more suitable to a bachelor audience than the open street—indeed, a song most chaste and delicate would hardly have been appropriate at that time and in that place. A citizen immediately opened a window, and, after a short and animated conversation with the singer, called the watch; two of these came and boldly advanced on Tom, who remonstrated with them on their ill-breeding in cutting short a serenade, threw himself into a defensive position, and dared the officers of the law to "come on." Tom passed the rest of the night in the station-house, and the next morning, with a miscellaneous collection of people of both sexes, was up before his Honor, the Police Justice. The respectable standing of friends saved him from the ignominy of imprisonment; he was discharged on payment of a fine, and on condition of immediate departure from the city. He readily consented, remarking that "he had about used up all the fun ashore," and a few days after went to New Bedford and shipped for a whaling voyage.

And now, having disposed of Tom—who, since his departure, nearly five years before, had not been heard from—I will return to the point from which digression was made to him and his beautiful sister.

When I informed Sarah Jane of the shabby manner in which my grandfather had seen fit to leave this world, she replied, as I knew she would, that the loss of the two hundred and odd thousand dollars made no difference to her; she was prepared to marry me whenever the sacrifice should be demanded. She again admonished me to keep our little affair from her aunt, who would never consent to the marriage with me on my poor five thousand dollars, since her virtuous and uncompromising spirit was firmly set on twenty-five thousand and a profitable business. Sarah Jane added, in an artless way, that her aunt had once alluded to my indolence—which required a series of years for the choice of a profession, and at the end of that time left me more undecided than at the beginning—and thought the active nature of her revered relative was, partly on this account, embittered against me. A sly gleam of humor lurking in the corner of her eye led me to suppose that the young lady herself was, in some degree, responsible for this piece of flattery. My cheek betrayed the shot was a good one. I felt impelled to an immediate decision on the subject of a profession: on the spot I sternly closed my ears against the siren voices of law and medicine, to which I had bewilderingly listened for many years, and resolved to apply to my uncle for some one of the clerkships in the corporations where he held influence.

My uncle was reputed very rich. In the manufacturing and financial circles he filled many lucrative and unlaborious offices. He was a power in the business world. Timid people with more money than self-reliance, working men with a few hundreds in savings, widows with goodly portions, heirs with more ready cash than they could immediately squander, all came beseeching him to assume the labor of investing, with his famed discretion, their stray property; and he, blandly smiling, would lock up their troublesome funds in this manufactory of which he was treasurer; in that, where he was selling agent; in this bank, whose crisp notes bore his admired autograph; in that railroad, where he had the honor of being director—and sometimes would kindly soothe the anxiety of those whose confidence in corporate bodies might be small, by taking their money himself, giving his own note on demand therefor—which was the favor he conferred on me to the extent of my five thousand dollars.

To this gentleman I now applied. Not being the sort of person one would choose as a confidant in affairs of love, I did not mention the name of Sarah Jane Williams, but proceeded directly to business. He shook hands with me cordially.

"I am very glad, my dear nephew," said he, "you have given up all thoughts of law and medicine. They are, as you say, too crowded—too crowded for comfort! You are right in seeking for some mercantile clerkship. You will there acquire a knowledge of business, so that, by-and-by, you can commence, on your own account, with the pretty little capital the generosity of your grandfather has placed at your disposal. In your search after a place you are at liberty to refer to me. I shall certainly give a satisfactory statement of your capacity and education, and although your habits have not been so industrious as active business demands, they soon will be, I have no doubt."

"But, Sir," said I, "my acquaintance with business men is very limited, and the object of my calling here was to ask for some situation in one of the many establishments under your direction. It would be almost useless to ask a stranger for a place."

"My dear fellow!" replied he, with an inimitable smile, "I fear you exaggerate my influence. To take advantage of my position, and, swayed by the partiality of relationship, place you in an office requiring a business man, would be manifestly improper. Such a course would injure my reputation."

"I see very plainly what you mean!" said I, with a sneer; "Guard your reputation by all means! And don't soil the purity of your character, even by giving favorable testimony regarding my capacity; indeed, I fear your friendly offices in my behalf might go far, from your extreme caution, to ruin my chance—"

"You forget yourself," interrupted he, coldly.

"No—I did, when I asked a favor of you! And to prevent the vexation of another interview, I must inform you that the little property I received from my father's estate is nearly exhausted, consequently I am compelled to ask for the money which you have charge of for me; I shall soon need it for my current expenses. At some early day you will oblige me by sending it by your clerk."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed he, in mock rage; "do you threaten me with your paltry five thousand dollars? You shall have it within a week, and let the payment of it be the last transaction between us!"

"I desire nothing better," answered I, and left him.

"I left him in deep, but, I trust, manly sorrow. My wavering mind reverted to law and medicine. Never before had I felt so acutely the truth that misfortunes come not singly. Was not the exquisite torment of love sufficient without this last blow? I walked on, muttering incoherently strange passages—which oddly enough came into my mind at that time—from the formula of excommunication adopted by the Church of Rome, wickedly inserting, at proper intervals, the name of my respectable uncle and some of his more vital organs, feeling all the while a horrid necessity for certain stronger and more curt expressions, which early education prevented from escaping me. I reached home, sat down and wrote a long letter, depicting in florid language what had passed that miserable morning; this I addressed to Sarah Jane Williams, and handed it to her soon after, on the stairs; then, in a fit of utter desperation, darted back to my room, and endeavored to describe in verse the passions raging in my breast. I was unable to achieve the first stanza. I had never engaged in the manufacture of poetry before. I have never meddled with it since, except to read it.

The following day I wandered about like a lost spirit. I strolled into those streets occupied by lawyers. The number of this abused profession was startling; of this fact, whole sides of granite, brick, and iron buildings gleamed with evidence. Staring at a careless, unobservant public, appeared by scores, in characters of dingy gold, the names of young attorneys never to be heard of beyond the limits of their dusty offices; and it occurred to me, for the twentieth time, what an insult it would be to those young men, what an unmanly desire to steal a portion of their scanty meal it would betray, were I to distract the eyes of passing litigants by the blazoned delusion of my name! As for medicine, at every turn the unmistakable tokens of a "sawbones" met the wearied vision, and at last I walked home again, tired and uncomfortable.

"Mr. Thompson," said Miss Elizabeth Williams to me on my return, her grim features twisted into a smile, "your uncle has been here to see you. And a very agreeable man he is, too; not at all stuck-up and aristocratic-like, as one would think a man of his standing would be. He was really very entertaining company both to Sarah Jane and me, and seemed to take a great interest in the house—staid here nearly an hour, and said, at parting, that he had serious intentions of breaking up his bachelor-hall, as he called it, and taking apartments in some good boarding-house for the sake of mere society. He is coming to look at some rooms here to-morrow."

"Did he leave any message for me?" inquired I, astonished at the visit, when but the day before we had parted forever.

"This letter only."

I took it and hurried to my room. It proved to be a letter signed by my uncle, and addressed to a firm down town, recommending me to some small situation. I sat down calmly in one chair, deposited my feet in another, and soliloquized:

"Now," said I, "what particular scheme of wickedness pushed that liberal-minded citizen this way, to fire off his big guns for the delectation of the elderly Williams?—for he certainly has no more idea of boarding with that lady than I have of studying medicine. This stupid subterfuge!" and I threw his commonplace letter into the empty grate; "does he think to satisfy me with so weak a sop? And his stately presence will again bless us to-morrow: Mother Williams will exhibit her rooms, and mention, in an easy way, her fearful prices; and fancy, all the while, she is enticing him from that bachelor-hall to the charming society of this establishment! Pshaw! There's nothing charming about it, with the slight, but to me important exception of Sarah Jane—and her I regard as out of the market."

Unable to understand the matter, I resolved to wait until the arrival of my uncle, and seek, at the earliest moment, the reasons for this devoted attention to the aunt. Sure enough, at four o'clock the next afternoon, he came in his carriage, driven by a foreign flunky, who, from his elevated seat on the box, sniffed with evident contempt the republican air of that boarding-house locality.

There had been a great deal of fluttering on the part of Miss Elizabeth, and, resplendent in a new silk dress of flaring pattern, she now awaited the entrance of the rich man. They were alone together nearly an hour, but no move was made in the direction of the rooms he was to have looked at. At the end of that time Sarah Jane was called in, and there was another secret session. With growing anxiety I longed for the result, and at last my patience was rewarded, and my heart torn, by the sight of Sarah Jane Williams running up stairs, weeping bitterly; while my uncle, with gentlemanly ease, bade adieu to the landlady in the hall, and dashed off in company with the disconsolate flunky. As I came down stairs Miss Elizabeth came up, jubilant and exulting. The interview must have been gratifying. Later, this is what I discovered. I put it in condensed form, for it is not a pleasing subject to dwell upon.

My uncle pretended he had frequently met Sarah Jane—her figure and face had bewitched him. A few days before he had ascertained her name—had immediately called, ostensibly to leave a message for me, but really to behold the lady he had learned to love; he now came, not to look at apartments, but to gaze once more upon her lovely features—nay, to ask her hand in marriage, to bear her away from her estimable aunt—he might say, mother—and place her at the head of his house, no longer, he hoped, to be a bachelor-hall. Miss Elizabeth, after a proper degree of shyness, accepted the proposal. The lady in question was then sent for, and received the offer of his hand, heart, and fortune. She replied only by sobs and tears and a hasty flight from the room—a course of action conceitedly attributed to the pleasurable shock caused by so brilliant a proposition.

As soon as I was informed of all this, I went to my uncle's and rushed, in a very abrupt manner, into the presence. I advised him to abandon all hopes of a marriage with Sarah Jane, for the simple reason that she had, a few weeks before, accepted me, and, as a matter of course, could not, however splendid and flattering the circumstances, consent to marry another. I also hinted, that if, under any temporary aberration of mind, she were forced to a show of acquiescence, I would in person forbid the bans.

"Nephew," replied he, coolly, "our encounters are destined to be any thing but agreeable. There is, allow me to say, a certain selfishness in your character which you ought to control. Nothing makes one so unpopular in the great world as the vice of selfishness. Cure it or disguise it. You wish to drag a young lady down to poverty and misery, a state she will ultimately reach if she marry you; I, on the contrary, wish to place her at the head of a luxurious home, where she will be honored and sought after by the best society. If you really love her as you pretend, you would not selfishly place yourself in the way of her good fortune."

"That's all humbug," said I, "and you know it. I didn't come here to argue with you on the moral view of the question, but simply to tell you, as I have done, that the lady is engaged to me, and, both before and since your disinterested offer, has sworn she will marry no one else. So to save trouble, and avoid scandal, I again advise you to withdraw—as quietly as you can."

"Your advice is of the cheering sort, but I don't like it. Moreover, the aunt, who has something to say in the matter, is most decidedly in my favor. I shall continue to live in hope, in spite of your boisterousness. Good-day!"

The next day he came again to the house, and told Miss Elizabeth what had passed between us. She was very indignant, informed me I had violated every rule of propriety by stealing, in a mean and clandestine way, the affections of her dear niece, and requested me to find another boarding-house within twenty-four hours, which, of course, I did. Before my departure I succeeded in having a private conversation with the fascinating and unhappy cause of all this commotion, in which, among other important subjects, it was arranged that she should, to avoid being continually harassed, appear to consent to the marriage so vehemently encouraged by her aunt.

Tuesday of the week following this—so great was the haste of my uncle—was the day fixed for the wedding, and on Wednesday the married pair were to sail in the English steamer for a tour on the Continent. In grateful consideration of the quiet and resigned way in which I had taken the matter since the first explosion, and at the earnest, imperative desire of the betrothed, I received an invitation to the wedding. Miss Elizabeth herself, beaming with good-nature, on meeting me one morning on her way to the market, had graciously stopped and spoken to me. She should be very happy to see me, she said, at her house on the auspicious occasion, and hoped the folly of fancying myself in love had entirely vanished from my mind as she assured me it had from Sarah Jane's. I gayly answered I had, at last, grown old enough to be heartily tired of such common nonsense, and was fully determined never to fall in love with any body again. I protested no malice lurked in my breast; that I now regarded my uncle as one of the best of middle-aged gentlemen; and, indeed, had decided to honor the nuptials by my presence, solely because I knew such a course would be eminently enlivening to him.

I was there. Among the small number of invited friends, I stood pre-eminent, joking carelessly with two or three young gentlemen boarders—crushed victims of the beauty of Sarah Jane—and I could see I was looked upon as the one most particularly jilted. Soon came the portly minister, jovial in the expectation of a heavy fee, and then down stairs, with majestic step, my uncle and the blooming bride. I think the cool and patronizing stare that young lady gave me as she swept into the room, and the dignified, not to say queenly manner in which she drew herself up by my uncle's side, preparatory to the awful ceremony, may be classed with the most magnificent things I have ever witnessed. To think of what had passed between us—vows, letters et cetera—and then to glance at her imperturbable air, was startling—and so it seemed to the young gentlemen acquainted with the circumstances.

"Very good thing!" whispered Mr. Augustus Wilkins. "By George, how superbly she does it! It will be needless for the steamer to bear down on an iceberg for the sake of coolness while that young woman's on board."

But just as the minister opened his mouth to commence the service, Sarah Jane, dropping the arm of the expectant bridegroom, glided quickly to me, gave me, before all, a loving kiss, then placed herself at my side, and, for the first time during the evening, began to tremble.

"What is the meaning of this?" cried my uncle, while all started in surprise.

"It means," said I, "that, unless you wish to throw away your valuable time, it will be hardly an object to proceed further in this business."

"I don't understand your buffoonery," said he, passionately.

"Then it becomes my pleasing duty to inform you that Miss Sarah Jane Williams and myself were married three days since—a statement you can verify by calling upon the Rev. Nehemiah Jones, and at the City Hall, where, no doubt, documents may be examined strong enough to convince the most skeptical. Certain other witnesses will be happy, at any time, to wait upon you with such additional testimony as may be requisite."

"So," said my uncle, recovering his calmness and even a portion of his chilly smile, when he saw that all was over; "so, you have won! I thought you were too lazy to play the game, but I was deceived. Still, my dear nephew, if it ever fall in my power to repay you for this admirable joke, believe me the chance shall not escape me. Miss Elizabeth Williams, I congratulate you on your new nephew. Cherish him—he'll prove a treasure. Miss Williams—pardon me, Mrs. Thompson—for a young lady, you have managed the thing remarkably well. Ladies and gentlemen, I bid you good-evening!"

After his departure my aunt—mine now by marriage—forgetting that the night was warm and the windows raised, drew about the house an inquisitive, jocund crowd, and cast discredit on the family by her ridiculous and noisy conduct. Errant reporters hastened to the spot and collected the details, furnished, I fear, by the too ready Augustus Wilkins. While it shall be conceded that the enterprise of our newspaper press is a just matter for exultation to every citizen, it is, nevertheless, depressing to a sensitive mind to be placed too prominently before the American people, as I found I was on the following morning; for, by that time, a full statement of the occurrences of the evening, including the disagreeable epithets with which Miss Elizabeth Williams had linked my name, soiled the purity of the bulletins, and traveled in flaming "extras" over the land.

And now being married, it was necessary to demand again my five thousand dollars, which had not yet been repaid. For ready cash I now relied upon it alone. The next afternoon I went to my uncle's office, and found his confidential clerk, pale and uneasy. I asked for his employer.

"He sailed in the steamer this morning," was the reply.

I was astonished. I had presumed the failure of the previous evening would have postponed his tour.

"Yes, Sir," said the clerk; "he got off this morning, leaving things in a very bad state. Ugly rumors, started a few days since, have increased surprisingly, and he has left me a note in which he says, to save me trouble, there is truth in them."

"What do you mean?" said I, uneasily.

"I mean that his affairs have been rotten for a long time. I know that now, although he has for some time past kept many important matters of business from me. He has taken a large sum in specie with him; and the whole affair is bad—very bad! He has lately been ruinously unfortunate in large speculations, and, in fact, he is now a defaulter. There! the murder's out! But here is a letter I found in his private desk, which may, from what I see in the morning papers, interest you."

It was from San Francisco, and evidently, by its date, received by my uncle some few weeks before. It read as follows:

"My dear Sir,—You will please immediately ascertain whether there is now living in or near your city a young person named Sarah Jane Williams, niece of Miss Elizabeth Williams; the aunt was, and probably is, at the head of a large boarding-house in your place. The brother of the young lady, Mr. Thomas Williams, died in this city on the 2d inst., leaving a very large property in gold and real estate to his sister. We have, of late, been his agents. He landed here some three years since, during the height of the gold excitement, and became, almost in spite of himself, immensely rich. You will confer a favor by attending to this matter immediately; and, should you find Miss Williams, please request her to send the needful papers, and her instructions in regard to the property. We remain," etc., etc.

This letter, besides reconciling me to the loss of the five thousand dollars—which sum, I firmly believed, was on the way to Europe—also enabled me to give a guess at the reasons which had urged my uncle toward matrimony.

There is but little more to tell. The intelligence I carried home restored to our aunt her equanimity of temper; and, although my wife sat down and cried bitterly for poor Tom, still his long absence and silence, and the remembrance of the wild life he had led at home, after a time quieted her grief. We learned afterward, that when the vessel which bore Tom and his fortunes touched at San Francisco, soon after the first gold discoveries, he, with other adventurous mariners and officers belonging to the ship, deserted without delay, leaving the "barkey" to rot in the harbor, which she nearly did. Fortune favored Tom notwithstanding his reckless and dissipated habits, and when, at the end of three years of California excitement, he departed this life, at the close of a protracted fit of delirium tremens, he was, in lands and tenements and "yellow earth," a prosperous gentleman. The crowning act of his life—namely, the execution of his will—had been consummated about three months before his melancholy end.

Some six months after my marriage I received a letter from my uncle, dated from some obscure place in Germany. He requested a loan of two thousand dollars, or such smaller sum as I might be able to spare, intimating he could "do a good thing with it." He perhaps referred to some plan he had formed for breaking a faro-bank. I sent him the following reply:

"My dear Sir,—Your letter has been received and attentively perused. When you started on your travels you took with you what you were pleased to call 'my paltry five thousand dollars'—at least I may be pardoned for saying so, inasmuch as that sum was placed in your hands, and has never been seen by me since; and as there appears to be no possibility of ever beholding you or the money again, I freely, by these presents, give to you the above-mentioned sum, but I must at the same time decline advancing more. For two reasons: first, I am engaged in large farming operations requiring all our ready money; secondly, you have already had your share. You state that a smaller sum than two thousand would be received. A pearl bracelet, presented by you to Mrs. Thompson, was the only visible remembrance we could find of you; this was converted to cash, and the proceeds have been deposited in the Savings' Bank for your benefit, and when sufficient interest shall have accrued to make the amount worthy the notice of a gentleman of such elegant and expensive habits as your own, principal and interest shall be remitted.

"The sum deposited is fifteen dollars.

"Your nephew, John Thompson."

Sarah Jane, on the receipt of her fortune, gave to her aunt a handsome competency, and Miss Elizabeth Williams has passed from the ranks of boarding-house keepers to the quieter circles of private life.

THE LITTLE SURPRISE.

"I'LL BREAK YOUR NECK IF YOU BREAK IT!"

Old Alfred Bodgers, and Ann, his wife,
Every year of their wedded life,
Whenever their birthdays came,
Had a romantic sort of a way
Of making each other presents that day,
Of dresses, or jewels, or game.

His sixtieth birthday being at hand
(For Alfred's days were long in the land,
And, for one so rich, rather pleasant),
His wife, as only a woman can,
Endeavored to fish from her dear good-man
What he would like for a present.

"If you have any Johannisberg left,"
She wrote him, "such as you sold Van Cleft
(He says you've a basket still),
Send a bottle or two, I don't care which—
(It must be from the cellar of Metternich!)
And myself, not Bodgers, the bill."

Now Monsieur Mery—I knew him well—
Was, like his wine, a bit of a sell,
And yet the fellow was able;
He was posted up in vintage and brand,
And could fill your orders, if small, off-hand,
Complete to the very label!

He had brandies of every shade and year,
With prices to suit, but most were dear;
His cheapest wine was Champagne;
His dearest Madeira (the vintage of Mery),
And a wonderful seal of golden sherry,
From his grand chateau (in Spain!).

He knew old Bodgers the millionaire,
And, wishing to please his lady fair
(You may add the "forty" at leisure!),
He summoned his son, and gave him the key,
And told him to go to Number Three
(The bin containing the treasure),

And straightway bring him the bottle he saw.
And, shaking his finger, "Mind, François,
That you don't disturb or shake it;
'Tis real Johannisberg—real, I say—
I meant it for Madelaine's wedding-day;
I'll break your neck if you break it!"

Now good François was a trusty youth,
But he had, like myself, a liquorish tooth
(For wine is a thing I dote on!),
So, after watching its bubbles wink,
He drew out the cork and took a drink,
And filled up the void with Croton.

HE TOLD HIM THE PRECIOUS FREIGHT HE BORE.

"Here, Gretchen, come here!" Mrs. Bodgers cried,
Calling the German cook to her side,
"And put this wine on the ice:
Cool it till dinner; let no one see:
'Tis a birthday present for Mr. B.,
He likes a little surprise."

"Ja wohl! It ish good!" the Teuton replied,
And, her mistress departed, the bottle eyed—
Such looks! if Bodgers had caught her!
She couldn't resist the wonderful wine,
But drank, and thought (perhaps!) of the Rhine,
And filled it with cistern water!

HE... FILLED UP THE VOID WITH CROTON.

But never a nibble the lady got,
For wary old codgers like Bodgers are not
Apt to snap at flies:
So, trusting to luck, she wound up the line,
And ordered a splendid bottle of wine,
To give him a little surprise.

She heard one day, by a happy chance,
Of a famous warehand de vin from France,
A Monsieur Hypolite Mery,
Whose stock had won him a notable name,
And, to judge by the price he asked for the same,
It must have been excellent—very!

MIKE WENT TO A BRACKISH PUMP HARD BY.

The warehand took it, and said "All right!"
And holding the bottle up to the light,
He watched the beads as they rose:
"'Tis a pity," he thought, "to waste so rare
A wine on a gouty millionaire:
I'll try it before it goes."

So ordering François back to his work,
He drew the curtains and drew the cork,
And filled his glass to the brim:
"Parbleu! its flavor is gone, I think,
But I guess it will do for Bodgers to drink:
I'm glad I sold it to him!"

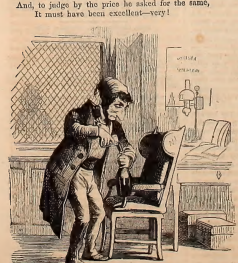
Dreaming of orders he filled the flask
With something ardent, out of a cask,
And rubbed his hands with glee:
And charging her man (he had charged her before!),
He told him the precious freight he bore,
And sent it to Mrs. B.

But ill luck never comes single, they say,
For what does Michael do by the way
(Ah, Michael! you needed a hasting!),
But draw out the cork, just to give a friend
A smell of the wine: you can guess the end,
From smelling they fell to tasting.

"I don't think much of the Jonnie's bog,
It's a kind of a Hum," said his friend with a shrug.
But they worried half of it down:
Mike went to a brackish pump hard by,
And filling the bottle again on the sly,
Took his tortuous way up town.



He reached the house in Madison Square,
A little the worse for the brick in his hair,
But the bottle being safe and whole,
Nobody noticed his building freak:
The day was hot, and they thought him weak
From walking so far. (Poor soul!)

SHE... FILLED IT WITH CISTERN WATER.

"I've a little surprise for you this year,"
"My birthday present: what is it, my dear?"
And the pair exchanged their kisses.
"'Tis something you'll like." "Well: show it to me."
"Here, Alfred, here; did you ever see
Such a bottle of wine as this is?"

He filled a bumper, and tossed it down,
With a stifled oath, and a terrible frown;
Breathing of fire and slaughter—
"You're an excellent woman, Mrs. B.:
But you'd better leave buying the wine to me;
For this is nothing but water."

"I GUESS IT WILL DO FOR BODGERS TO DRINK."

"BUT YOU'D BETTER LEAVE BUYING THE WINE TO ME."

GOSSIP ABOUT RACHEL.

TWENTY years ago the twenty-fourth of last June, on a hot mid-summer night, a handful of languid people, gathered together in the Théâtre Français, Paris, were startled as if a thunder-bolt had fallen in their midst by the sudden outbreak of one of a new tragic actress in the person of a half-childish, thin, not well-looking Jewess. Three years before, in 1855, a well-known French writer gave the child, Eliza Rachel, then playing small parts to small audiences in a small theatre of the suburbs. Here is his account of the interview: "When we entered the theatre, my friend stopped before a dressing-room which was a mere hole, and against which was leaning a meagre, black, scraggy, poverty-stricken little girl, in an apple-woman wrapped than I can describe. 'Eliza,' quoth the amateur consolation to this child, 'which would you rather have, a dress for fried potatoes, or fried potatoes,' was the reply.

"My friend, who is playing great characters, had acquired habits of reckless prodigality, drew from his pocket a two-sous piece. Seized with spirit of emulation, I bestowed a similar coin. The child disappeared, and returned almost immediately bearing a paper bag full of fried potatoes, unsparingly hot and brown. She offered the horn to her benefactors, and this was the only time I ever partook of a meal with Mademoiselle Rachel. Young Eliza was to appear in an after-piece.—I do not know what one—in what part. I only know her: my friend had made such poor work of the part of Danville, I had had quite enough of it. Going home, I said to myself, 'That child has little thing. 'That,' said he, 'is a very intelligent but very poor child, as you see, who eats an occasional with authors and managers, might perhaps get her employment in some theatre, and the children portion would thus do her a great favor.'

"But people are not apt to interest themselves in scraps, dark, wretched-looking children, even when they are gifted with intelligence. The manager's recommendation was not in the present case more successful than such efforts usually are. When Rachel was no longer in need of assistance, it would have been joyfully proffered."

The early struggles of the future prodigieuse were not encouraging. She had a fancy for comedy characters—she, who was the soul of tragedy, and of whom it was said, in her prime, that when she again attempted comedy, that she "played with her fan as though it were a sceptre." Her talent was perceived by an august critic to "go and sell bonnets;" stole an umbrella with the proceeds of the sale of which to buy her cardboard crown; and Rachel played even her aforesaid famous parts for some time to half-empty benches, and with the sad effect that Jules Janin, returning to town about the time, heard of her only as a sort of juvenile novelty, and was astonished to find her name in bills "stretch at least once."

How the "little wretch" proved a "great prodigy:" how she went on from one success to another; how she first ruled the public, and then the theatrical management; the stories of her triumphs, captives, lawsuits, exactions, hasty journeys, and stormy partings; of her fine qualities and her mournful death—all this is sketched with a light and lively hand in the "Memoirs of Rachel," by Madame de Crisenoy—just published.*

She obtained an engagement at 1000 francs (one $200) per year, her chief recommendation being that she was old and eccentric. She thought this a very extraordinary salary. At the beginning of 1838 she transferred her allegiance to the Théâtre Français, where she was engaged for three years at 6000 per year. On the 1st of February, 1838, the theatre, completely crammed—every seat having been taken beforehand—received 4000 and odd 6000 francs. The triumphant days of Talma and Mademoiselle Mars, when at the zenith of their fame, were even equaled. The princes of the House of Orleans all came in succession to see the phenomenon. The Duchess of Orleans, her appointed as the girl of a bracelet—a gold chain clasped by a cuirass bearing a dog. Louis Philippe himself, who never went to any theatre, honored the star by going to see her in the part of Emilie in "Cinna." A judicious friend took care that the royal guest read the heroine as he passed out. His majesty, taking her trembling hand in his, assured her very kindly that he had been much pleased with her performance, and would be glad to see her again. Bashful and embarrassed, struggling to control her gratitude, Mademoiselle Rachel addressed the King as Monsieur. When subsequently reminded of her mistake by her companion, Madame Dorval, she merrily excused it, saying that she was so accustomed to converse with the most illustrious monarchs, she had neglected to learn how to speak to those of lesser rank. On the day after the King's visit to the theatre, a footman in the royal livery brought Mademoiselle Rachel a present of one hundred francs from his master. At the same time her engagement of three years at 6000 francs per annum was voluntarily cancelled by the gratified committee of management, and renewed at the rate of 6000 francs ($1000) per annum." For the years 1841 she made no less a sum than 200,000 francs.

And yet, until 1843, when she came of age, her father, who shrewdly managed her affairs and took all her earnings, allowed her but sixty dollars per month for her dress, theatrical costumes, and pocket-money! This, when her talent was at its greatest and fatiguing exertions had raised the family to a position which, compared with their former life, was viciously bold, was very brilliant; though her younger sisters and her brother were being educated at her expense; and though her money clothed, housed, and fed them all.

"Shortly after she had attained her majority she had gone to Marseilles, where, for one night's performance, she was to receive 3000 francs. On the day after the performance the money was brought to her in a chest. At that time gold was not the common medium of circulation it has since become, and payments, even of large sums, were usually made in silver. Rachel was recently enumerated from the parsimonious trammels; she had never had in her own possession any thing like that amount. At sight of this box, full of five-franc pieces, this quantity of money all in silver, she was delighted, and fastened upon it with an intensity that was almost painful to behold; to see her own name, written of an actress accustomed to a tragedy, to the sight of the coarse joy of an animal that has the long-sought prey within its clutches. She ordered the chest to be placed before her by her bedside, and, plunging her hands into it, kept stirring the silver with delight.

"'Never,' said she to the person to whom she related this, 'never had I an opportunity to see pieces together, and all belonging to me.'"

In her mind there seems to have been a constant struggle between avarice and generosity. "She has frequently been known to ask some of her young friends to dine or sleep with her, and then the guest arrived the hostess was gone out. When reproached with her uncivil conduct, she would plead forgetfulness, or unexpected business, and renew her breach of word. Exceedingly capricious and exacting, if any thing that she longing to her appeared to please her visitor, her first impulse was to offer it, to press it urgently on the acceptance of the person so admiring it. If any hesitation was shown, she threatened to send it to the house of the party. The most extraordinary offered was accepted, Rachel's face never expressed the annoyance. She repeated her prodigal generosity, the humble she had bestowed upon an indispensable necessity, just the thing she could not do without, and she had not the heart to let it be returned."

At times she met with more resistance in this particular. Obstinate people took her at her word and made her give what she had promised, or they left her angry. She had, in fact, a queer way of saying, if any jewel she wore, or article of dress in her room pleased you, "It is yours." Annoying to those who did not like to be thus forced upon the recipients of these generous gifts.

"One day she said to a lady who was admiring a very beautifully carved and embroidered chair, 'I am glad you like it, it is my work, and you shall have it to remember me.'

"You give it to me, then?"

"Certainly, and I shall have it sent to your rooms."

"I am exceedingly obliged to you, and shall not trouble you to send it, but, since you are so good as to give it me, shall take it now."

"Rachel looked at her with a sprite he could put in his pocket. But the friend knew her, and was not to be daunted. She had her carriage called, and was back again in a moment with a consolateur, who bore off the prize.

"Rachel thus travelled she gave a sabre of fine Turkish workmanship. "She can not ask to have it sent to her house, for I have already taken it to it."

"On one occasion she announced to her numerous friends and admirers that she had a perfect passion for emeralds, and intended making a collection of those precious stones. The next morning she had already procured a very fine one, which she complacently showed to her friends. Among the fortune-hunters who followed in the train of the tragic muse as the gift of a competitor in the race for her good graces. The stone was a large one, and corresponded to with a contribution of coarse more valuable than the specimen of the genus. Rachel was in the habit daily as a decoy to draw others, until the collection was as large as it was rich and rare—no one being allowed to see it but her friends. This manœuvre, varied according to the victim played by young, brought into its treasure more brilliant than the precious stones, and finally the lady raised a sapphire ring, which, from the peculiar enormity of her contributors was exhausted, a jeweler was sent for, to whom the valued and valuable ring was submitted. He said that the stone could be obtained—the money was put where it brought in the highest interest, and in its favour more brilliant than less profitable shape."

An incessant craving for admiration kept her constantly in debt. "Her generosity is said by all who knew her; that is, the felt always impelled to bestow, but the mode in which she gratified the praise of the porter at the gate as that of the lord of the chateau. She was one day with her sister Rebecca in the house in the rue Laval, when a memorial while some repairs were being made. As the workmen left the house Rachel remarked how in convenient stiff skirts were.

"Why do you wear them when we are here alone?" said Rachel, quietly.

"Oh dear," cried the trapézistes, "I couldn't think of it—we have no petticoats on—the skin and scrapes as I look without a crinoline!"

"With her keen eye for money, she made up her annual vacations to play on her own account in the French provinces. She lost no time—travelled by day and played almost every evening; and none of her troupe durst complain of fatigue while she herself never knew what it meant. An old, fashioned, lumbering French stage-coach, comprising the usual divisions of coupé, intérieur, rotonde, imperiale, cabriolet, and kibde, was the vehicle provided for the whole journey. In the coupé, which was appropriated to Rachel and her confidante, a bed was placed, in order to facilitate as much repose as was consistent with a life of perpetual motion. Here she spread out for a couch, in the day it was rolled up for a sofa. The princesses, maids of honor, and damsels of her suite occupied the intérieur, and disputed the corner seats. The emperors, kings, and lords of high degree had the rotonde and imperiale was assigned to the confidants and other small fry, who, though not in very enviable seats so far as regarded sleep, had a fine view of the country from their elevated position. Under the kibde were stowed away the trunks, boxes, and packages of every description containing the wardrobe of the stage parsimonia; Barone's dagger, Chapelain's wand, Adrienne's fatal bouquet, and Judith's sabre; with other valuable and poisoned toys, grown old in the hag wigs."

Out of the circle of her own family Rachel was accused of having no consideration for any interest but her own. Some one asking Mademoiselle Judith if she was to receive in her troupe a certain actor, who, after all, was a coreligionist of hers, "Pshaw," was the lofty answer, "I take him as an Israelite! I am a Jewess, but Rachel—Rachel is a Jew!" Yet she always displayed a singular and praiseworthy regard for her relatives. She bore with the selfishness of her father, with the ill-nature of her mother, with the avarice of her brother, and she was always kind and respectful to her mother, as this incident will show:

"We were at this epoch in Berlin, and Mademoiselle Rachel, wishing to present some souvenir of her visit to the Princess Frederick Charles of Prussia, concluded that the most appropriate thing, as the lady had just become a mother, was a shawl. Her mother, who honored her with her patronage, was a very magnificent copy of Emilie Augier's 'Diane,' and was accordingly requested by the ladies attendant to select a shawl. Her choice was quickly made, and costing on the fly-leaf some complimentary stanzas to her child, a note was to accompany the cadeau, and to assist in indicting with due brevity and respect the important epistle I was called into requisition. The present was engaged, Mademoiselle Rachel, requiring the services of a servant, requested her mother to send her Lisette. The old lady was for that purpose, but not as quickly as the impatient daughter thought necessary, and the latter expressed herself peremptorily. 'Mais comme dons mère.' The old lady stopped short, and, altering her cross countenance into a look of pleasing, with the offended dignity of a duchess, 'Sonnez vous meme, ma fille.' Rachel made no reply, but rose and rang the bell, instead of ordering to her mother's room to splodgin, and entreat her for pardons of her unfilial conduct."

During her progress through Germany an old woman, dressed in the Sunday garb of the lower classes, was observed at the hotel where the celebrated actress was stopping, saying that she had been told that Mademoiselle Rachel Felix was there, and she wished to see her. She was referred to Rose, the waiting-maid, who took her to her mistress, and left her from manifesting the annoyance of a parvenu at this claim of relationship not forth by any of the high-born connections, the niece was extremely kind to her peasant aunt, made her stop and dine with her, and invited her to go to the play with the wife in town, with whom she left satisfied upon her a sum which, in that country, was deemed sufficient to make her comfortable for her life.

During her long and severe illness, it is said the first object looking despairingly to life. We have all read the story how, a week before her death, in the no-collection of her surroundings, she replied, "Ah! you do well to ask for it now; it was time let me have it." She then wrote on a piece of paper, "In a week from now I shall begin to be food for worms, and for writers of biographies. Rachel." She then sealed, directed it as minister as anticipation, wished to decline the autograph, but she pushed it toward him, saying, "Take it, take it; it will, perhaps, be the last thing I shall ever write." It was not, in fact, the last. On the 22d of January she wrote, though with great difficulty, a letter to a very distinguished personage, and dated it January 23, 1858, accounting for her so doing in these words: "I post-date this letter. . . . I feel as though the doing so will make me live a day longer. And she did outlive her date, though but for three days.

We will close our extracts from Madame de B——'s volume with the following minute details of Rachel's features and person:

"The head is perfectly shaped, rather small, rather broad, not high, and covered with dark chestnut hair, which is not thick nor thin, but beautifully fine, soft, and silky. The brow, endowed with such extraordinary power of expression, was prominent, and not high nor low; her eyebrows were exquisitely drawn; the eyes, the same color as the hair, were deep-set, and overhung by the brow, and so that they had the appearances of being intensely black; they were fringed with very long silky lashes. The nose was neither large nor small, was filled with teeth all perfect and beautifully white; the under lip was full and thick, and suggestive of sulks, but of storms, and, though so defective in point of beauty, extremely expressive. The chin was prominent, the curve indicating the very very slightly inclining the tip; but it was perfect in its proportions, and, though prominent, very neutrals. The chin was small and pretty.' The delicate little ear was compared by a soft-hearted wit to a sea-shell oyster, and by others to the head. From the tip of the ear to the chin the face was perfectly oval, the skin was fair and wonderfully delicate. In size, Rachel was rather above the middle height; her figure had the litheness, the grace, the flexibility of a reed, and, in repose, gave the impression of a very delicate constitution; but when she was acting an energetic part, the long, slight arms seemed to change to steel, so powerful was the character of inflexibility they presented. The hands, which were rather pretty, were objects of continual care and solicitude with Mademoiselle Rachel; her feet might have served as models to a modern Praxitiles. The limbs were so well formed that the actress, Mademoiselle Dorval, in reference of the figure was hardly noticed. The portrait shape of the chest, however, almost amounted to a deformity. The shoulder was like a fowl's, bony, projecting sharply, ungraceful to the eye. The defect was not at all perceptible either in theatrical costume or ordinary dress: the folds of the peplum and tunic in the first quite concealed it, and the skill of the dress-maker in the latter was no less successful."

WIFE AND QUEEN.

HERE are lilies pale and deep,
Vermil roses lush and rare,
Twine them, sorfet, with fragrant fingers,
In your lustrous bands of hair.

Crowned with auroles of flowers,
Rule me with a royal mien,
For to-day, oh white-armed vestal,
You shall be my jeweled Queen!

But to-morrow, sweet, to-morrow,
I shall weave, with trembling care,
Myrtle leaves and orange blossoms
For your braids of shining hair.

And in silliest flush of passion,
Tingling with the happy smart,
Love and loyalty shall crown you
Wife and Queen of our rich heart.

But as words are ever faithless,
Trust your rosy lips to mine;
Kisses only are sincerest
Kisses are the pledge of thine.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE

—PAT, buy a towel to wash your face with!" said his Yankee companion. "What, sa' ge naked tuth out I wudder?" asked the astonished Milesian.

An Irishman in France was drinking with some company who proposed the toast, "The land we live in!" "Oh, with all my heart," said he; "Here's to it!" "Here's to old Ireland!" cried the rest.

—a rather feline says, that he always looks under the marriage head for the news of the weak.

—"I see the villain in your face," said a Western Judge to a prisoner, "that must be a personal reflection, sure."

Oction says, "I cried, my fathers, where are they? and the echo answered, 'I cried, my fathers, too.'" A fine instruction in her throat that she couldn't finish the answer.

—"Did you know I was here?" said the bellows to the fire. "Yes, I always contrive to get wind of you," was the reply.

A shop-caught-bother of a Boston officer. "Sir, Cap'n, they say there's a bear, and my mother's in there, and then my mother died, and my father married again; and my grandmother's in there, and I'm in there, and we are out at all, not to home, nor to nothing."

A lad, about to be flogged, however approaches then by a direct course. No more does the truth, she friend; but, circumvented by subterfuge and intrigue, and against thy prejudices, it reaches then gently, and then, gradually, it reaches the point.

—"Boy," said a traveler to a disobedient youth whom he encountered, "don't you know your father speaking to you when he calls?" "Yes, sir," replied the boy, "I know my father speaking to me when he calls; and that she and I we've about got the dog so he don't."

A gentleman who has a scolding wife, in answer to an inquiry, "How do you manage to live so happily?" aptly subject at times to a "breaking out in the mouth."

TEMPERANCE ODE.

SAYS Tom to Nick, "Your drink's a shame,
And pray do tell me how you do
To be so jovial for a temperance man?"
Says Nat to Tom, "I never bicker.
I'm not the victim of a sup and liquor!"

"Oh, Mr. Hill," said one of Rev. Rowland Hill's hearers, "how it is that you say such odd-looking things in your sermons?"—"Ah!" said the eccentric divine, "don't you know a gentleman is always remembered by his oddities?"

If you want an economical and comfortable smoke, take a piece of sponge three-quarters of an inch square and cut it down into a small knob at one end for the stem, then steep it in water until it becomes distended, squeeze it out, and repeat the operation until the water runs out of it both cold and hot, and then dry it before the fire until the sponge. Charge the pipe, and fill the sponge with cold water. Such economical smoking will be found that a saving of twenty-five per cent in tobacco is effected, and a cool smoke obtained. Try it.

—"Why do you drive such pitiful looking carcass as that?" "Why don't you put a heavier coat of flesh on your back?" said the driver of the cart. "Who's the coat of flesh? By the powers, the poor creature can hardly carry a little thing like that on his back."

Maid, choosing man, remember this;
Such suit best, best can please his taste.
Ask, too, what his religion is,
For true wife will own the same.

He who feels his own deficiencies will be a charitable man for his own sake.

Riches are the baggage of virtue: they can not be spared nor left behind, but they hinder the march.

A schoolmaster, wishing his pupils to have a clear idea of the meaning of the word "sun," asked them if you see it, and therefore know that it is there; but when it is dark you can not see it, you have faith in it there, though you no longer see it." The lads seemed to understand it, and the master was pleased. He asked them, "What is faith?" they answered with one voice, "Believing what we can't see."

General Lee once found Dr. Cutting, the army surgeon, in a most unenviable humor one morning. "Cutting," said he, "you are always cross when you have had no breakfast." "Why, sir," replied Lee, "because you are the love with sympathy, and you are the love with earth."

"Mamma says you must sustain pay do bill to-day," says a saucy negro to a Chinese shopkeeper. "Why, he isn't afraid I going to run away; is he?" was the reply. "Not a bit," said she, "afraid to run away book, and darlor wants to make a big rake!"

A young lady lately turned Catholic. A day or two ago her little cousin, a naughty boy, who plays all the electric cane running in to his mother, crying: "Oh, aunt Kitty has become a Catholic!" "Indeed, my child! What's a person sent, dear?" "Oh, how green! Don't you know? Why, it is the saint-born runs sick."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, August 16, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compared as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Aug. 14, 1858	$4,856,145	$1,048,223
Corresponding week, 1857	5,740,107	1,911,111
Decrease this year	$883,907	$864,829

The export of specie was small, amounting only to $240,178, all from Boston, and all to the port of San Francisco, California.

Money continues to rule at unprecedentedly low rates. We quote three per cent. as the rate among the brokers, and four to four and a half per cent. on time, short-dated, mercantile paper. Foreign exchange is somewhat lower than it was last week; we quote bankers' bills at sixty days on London, at 109⅜ @ ⅛, on Paris, 5.11¼ @ 5.13. The banks are likely to draw five to six millions from specie this week, in consequence of the payments into the sub-treasury for the duty bonds.

Stocks have been very dull throughout the week, and prices have declined a trifle. It is proved that the difficulties existing between the Erie and the Central will quietly be adjusted, in which case it is expected that railway stocks generally will rise.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, August 16, 1858.

The Wholesale Dry Goods Market has been sparingly supplied with really desirable lots of Flour. The demand for goods has been pretty fair. Prices ranged for $5 10 c. per barrel. Wheat has been actively inserted for at better rates, including White at $1 31 @ $1 36 per bushel. Corn has been freely offered and purchased at reduced figures. Sales of Southern mixed at 72c. per 70 @ 55 c. per bushel. Rye and Oats have been quiet. Provisions have been in fair demand, and prices have declined a fraction. Pork has been in moderate demand: Hog Products closed heavily: other articles steady. Coffee, Teas, and Molasses have been inactive, while Sugars and Rice have been more sought after. The Metal Market has been in fair demand for Iron, Tin, and Spelter. Coals and Steels have been in limited request at previous quotations. Hay and Wool have been in good demand. Other branches of trade are essentially unchanged.

Stocks of several Articles in New York about August 1.

	1857.	1858.
Ashes, barrels	2,595	4,150
Cotton, bales	47,000	67,000
Flour, barrels	29,944	3,310
Hemp, tons	1,311	1,189
Hemp, bales	11,617	18,717
Pork, barrels	54,000	39,139
Beef, tierces and barrels	15,727	9,402
Lard, barrels	10,000	10,000
Rice, tierces	2,046	6,130
Rice, bags		2,000
Tobacco, Crude, hogsheads	6,918	19,310
Tobacco, Manufactured, pkgs.	41,156	39,000

Freights were depressed, and rates forced shippers. To Liverpool—Cotton, ¼ @ ⅝ per pound; Flour, 1s per barrel; Grain, 5d. @ 8d. per bushel; Heavy Goods, 15s. @ 20s. per ton. For other ports prices were nominal. The number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 1,000.

The Dry Goods Market has been somewhat unsettled by Boreen, which were in fair supply and demand. Linens and Linen Goods were quiet. Woolens and Wool Cottons were dull and heavy. Sheep and Lambs were steadily sold, and prices somewhat lower than those offered than they were needed, and prices tended downward.

The Country Produce Markets have exhibited less activity. Produce was more plentiful, and prices lower. Most other articles are abundant, and generally favor buyers.

WHOLESALE PRICES CURRENT BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Blackberries, per bushel	2 25	@ 3 00
Beans, New Rochelle, per quart	0 06	@ 0 08
Huckleberries, per bushel	2 25	@ 2 75
Apples, new, per barrel	2 00	@ 3 00
Pears	1 50	@ 3 00
Peaches, per basket	0 50	@ 1 00
String Beans, per bushel	1 25	@ 37
Potatoes, new, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 00
Onions, new, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 25
Beets, per 100 bunches	3 00	@ 4 00
New Carrots, per 100	2 00	@ 3 00
Cabbage, per 100	1 50	@ 6 00
Squashes, per bushel	25	@ 50
Green Corn, per 100 ears	25	@ 75
Watermelons, per 100	14 00	@ 20 00
Nutmeg Melons, per barrel	2 25	@ 2 50
Tomatoes, per bushel	0 75	@ 1 00
Cucumbers, per 100	25	@ 50
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	11	@ 12
Eggs, Western, per dozen	10	@ —
Chickens, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Fowls, per pound	12	@ 14
Ducks, per pair	1 00	@ 1 50
Ducks, per pound	12	@ 14
Spring Ducks, each	1 00	@ 1 50
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 14
Tigeons, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Woodcock, per dozen	2 00	@ 3 00
Snipe, Dowitcher, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 50
Snipe, Grass, per dozen	50	@ 75
Plover, per dozen	2 00	@ —

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE KNICKERBOCKER FOR SEPTEMBER.
A CONTRIBUTIONS TO HISTORICAL PHILOSOPHY.
LIFE IN VIRGINIA: ILLUSTRATED. By G. P. R. JAMES.
JURAL, THE RINGER. By FITZ-JAMES O'BRIEN.
THE MEDDAH OF HINDOSTAN. By CHARLES MACKAY.
THE NAMING OF THE BABY. By "DIX QUENTIN."
THE CHILDREN OF THE AIR. By H. H. BENNETT.
SEA-BIRDS, QUACKS, AND BUMBUG. By PARK BENJAMIN.
A COMMON WOMAN'S EXPERIENCE.
SOMETHING ABOUT WINE. By H. T. TUCKERMAN.
LIVES: "THANATOS." By EDES SARGENT.
STANDARD: "THE ROSE." By THOMAS BUCHANAN READ.
SONNET. By JOHN G. FOX.
LIVES: "THE BRIDGE." By T. B. ALDRICH.
THE ROMANCE OF REFORM. By F. W. SHELTON.
EDITOR'S DRAWER: Additional Contributions to Natural American Antiquities, and a Splendid Steel-Plate Engraving of SPEED AND ENDURANCE.
EDITOR'S TABLE FOR SEPTEMBER, DISPUTABLE.
The following distinguished Authors are also contributing to the KNICKERBOCKER:
THEODORE HALDEMAN, DR. J. W. FRANCIS,
DR. OLIVER W. HOLMES, GUILIAN C. VERPLANCK,
DR. J. W. PALMER, GEORGE W. CURTIS,
H. T. GOODEN, ALFRED B. STREET,
MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS, PROF. HENRY REED,
MRS. KEY DUTTY, MISS CAROLINE CHESEBRO.
TERMS.—Single copies, one dollar; $4, two copies; $6, three copies; $10, five copies; $18 ten copies.
JOHN A. GRAY, Publisher, 10 and 12 Jacob St., N. Y.

TICKNOR & FIELDS' NEW ANNOUNCEMENTS.
IN PRESS.
I.
THE AGE—A COLLOQUIAL SATIRE—AND OTHER POEMS.—A New Vol.—by the Author of "Festus"—1 vol. 16mo—75 cents. (In a few days.)
II.
THE COURTSHIP OF MILES STANDISH, AND OTHER POEMS.—A New Volume, by H. W. Longfellow—1 vol. 16mo.
III.
THE SCOURING OF THE WHITE HORSE; or The Long Vacation Holiday of a London Clerk—by the Author of "School Days at Rugby"—1 vol. 16mo.
IV.
A SEQUEL TO THE PLANT HUNTERS—by Capt. Mayne Reid—1 vol. 16mo.
V.
THE MISCELLANEOUS WRITINGS OF CHARLES KINGSLEY—edited by himself—1 vol. 12mo.
VI.
LIFE AND LETTERS OF DOUGLAS JERROLD —by his Son—1 vol. 16mo.
VII.
THE COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS OF PERCIVAL.
VIII.
THORNDALE, OR THE CONFLICT OF OPINIONS—1 vol. 16mo.
IX.
A NEW VOLUME OF DE QUINCEY'S WRITINGS—1 vol. 16mo.
X.
THE LIFE AND TIMES OF FREDERICK PERTHES.—1 vol. 16mo.
XI.
THE LIFE AND TIMES OF SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.
XII.
A JOURNEY DUE NORTH—by George Augustus Sala.
XIII.
ERNEST CARROLL, or Real Life in Italy.
XIV.
CHRISTMAS EVE—by the Author of "The Homeward Path," &c.
XV.
AROUND THE SOFA—by Mr. Gaskell.
LATELY PUBLISHED.
ROBERTSON'S SERMONS, 3d series, 1 vol. 16mo—$1.
LIFE OF GEORGE STEPHENSON, Railway Engineer—by Samuel Smiles—1 vol. 12mo—$1 25.
TOM BROWN'S SCHOOL DAYS—1 vol. 16mo—$1.
REMARKABLE REVELATIONS OF MADAME PIERCE AND BYRON—1 vol. 16mo—75 cents.
HAS TO SEA—by Mayne Reid—1 vol. 16mo—75 cents.
WHITE LIES—by Charles Reed—1 vol. 16mo—$1 25.
CHARLES KINGSLEY'S ANDROMEDA AND OTHER POEMS—1 vol. 16mo—69 cents.
PARTHENIA—by Mrs. Lee—1 vol. 16mo, $1.
LOWELL'S FABLE FOR CRITICS—16mo, $1 00.
DOUGLAS JERROLD'S WIT—1 vol. 16mo—$1.
BAXTER'S CHURCH AND CONGREGATION—1 vol. 16mo—$1 00.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, Nos. 48 and 50 EAST 24th Street, near Madison Park, Boarding and Day School will re-open on Sept. 15th next. Classics, Mathematics, French, German, and other languages, besides the French which is the language of the School. A Junior Department has been opened for Children, Preparatory, &c., circulars to be had.
Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY
FOR
FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.
W. H. ROCKWELL, A.M., Principal.
A First Class Seminary, perfectly arranged, beautifully located, and with the corps of Teachers.
Board and Tuition in Common English per Term of Twenty Weeks, $50 paid in advance.
Fall Term opens, August 23d. Winter Term opens, December 14th.
Address the Principal, Fort Plain, N.Y.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
TUBEROSES.
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick, the Soap,
Kiss-me-quick, the Cologne.
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
660 Broadway.

TO ADVERTISERS.
HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION.
Offers unusual inducements to advertisers who bring their business prominently before the community.
1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.
2. The character and difficulty of the circulation are unequaled.
3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.
4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.
5. The Paper has the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.
6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any First Weekly or Daily Paper.
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.
TERMS—Fifty Cents a Line.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—Is celebrated for the cure of Scrofula, Scrofulous Eruptions, and the numerous diseases arising from an impure state of the blood. Price $1 per bottle.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

THE "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT.
ONLY HALF THE USUAL QUANTITY REQUIRED, AND A SUPERIOR BEVERAGE OBTAINED.
The "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT is made on the same principle as the "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT, and is designed for boiling BLACK TEA. ONLY ONE HALF the usual quantity of tea required, and a beverage obtained as much superior to the ordinary decoction of tea as the coffee made in the "Old Dominion" Coffee Pot is superior to coffee made in the common boiler. This is not mere assertion, but FACT, as any housekeeper may prove for herself.
"The Chinese, who, it is presumed, know something about tea, boil it, instead of making, as the English and Americans do, a weak infusion. In the latter case, at least one-half the strength of the tea is lost.
"As a matter of economy, is any method of preparing excellence of the tea which will compare with the 'OLD DOMINION' TEA POT combined?"—Extract from letter to all housekeepers.
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
Nos. 117 and 119 South 10th Street,
Sole Agents for the Trade, Philadelphia.
MANUFACTURERS under the Patent for the United States of the "OLD DOMINION" TEA and COFFEE POTS, and ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED SELF-SEALING AND FRUIT CANS and JARS.
For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles and Hardware throughout the country.
The Trade and Manufacturers' prices by E. P. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street, New York.

THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT.—
The great invention of the day is the "OLD DOMINION" COFFEE POT. In which Coffee can be made without the least loss of aroma. Even ordinary coffee in one of these pots makes a good drink as the best of Java in such as we commonly used. Wherever introduced they have given the most complete satisfaction. They are now found in all parts of the United States in large, and still increasing sales.
The Philadelphia Ledger, in its Journal of Health for July, 1858, says: "We commend the Old Dominion Coffee Pot to all housekeepers. We have ourselves proved that it is one of the 'nice things' offered to the public, in which the invention is practical, and which has the double veniture of science and common sense."
The New York Tribune says: "The Old Dominion announces the 'Old Dominion' new thing. Its management in our house had a child can do it, and a second-fourth of the cost of making it in the old-fashioned way."
The New York Mercury says: "Virginia, and the Old Dominion as well, seems peculiarly adapted to the soil to furnish us the very best kind of a kettle for that we ever invented. We speak by the card."
The New York Times says: "The 'OLD DOMINION' COFFEE POT is decidedly a great institution, and will soon be found in every well-to-do household in the land."
"It prates are in every woman's mouth."—Springfield Republican.
"We will not give up our 'OLD DOMINION' for four times its price, if another could not be obtained."—Boston Telegraph.
The New Yorker says it redeems the OLD DOMINION from the list of worthless enterprises as well as the grateful aroma of the berry and by the simple construction and ease of use, always in order, and forbidden as with good reason by the Board of Health to make the old and unhealthy method of boiling."
"The cheapest as well as the most convenient article that of all time coffee pots."—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.
The Ladies' Book says: "The OLD DOMINION is, indeed, a treasure. Its cool coffee maker ever introduced to the public, and the only one by which all the strength and aroma of the berry is retained in the liquid."
The Sunday Dispatch says: "The Old Dominion is simple, ingenious, and an accurate, economic principle. Housekeepers will find in the Old Kentucky this well-tried institution."
The Evening Post of the New York Day Book says: "The economy of the affair is not its least merit, as it extracts the virtues of the berry so completely that one-quarter of the coffee used generally produces that luxury in a decoction of the finest flavor."—Boston Post.
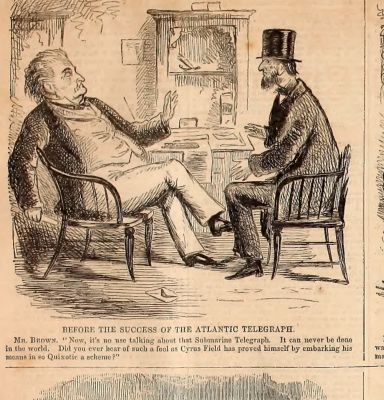
"It is simple in construction, easily used, and will give good satisfaction. It is a decided improvement on the old modes of boiling."—Boston Courier.
"The Old Dominion is a decided novelty, and we never heard any thing said to what we could not justify as our morning meed. It is the perfection of coffee."—Philadelphia Evening Journal.
THE OLD DOMINION COFFEE POT
Is manufactured under the patent of the United States, by
ARTHUR, BURNHAM & GILROY,
Nos. 117 and 119 South 10th Street,
Sole Manufacturers under the Patent in Philadelphia.
Also MANUFACTURERS under the Patent for the United States, of "OLD DOMINION" TEA POT and ARTHUR'S CELEBRATED SELF-SEALING FRUIT CANS and JARS.
For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles and Hardware throughout the country.
The Trade and Manufacturers' prices, by E. P. TORREY, No. 9 Platt Street, New York.

SCHOOL AND HOME JOURNAL.
The Literature, Science, Art, and Education.
Shakespeare, Royal Quarto, Published Monthly, at Ten Dollars per Annum. The first, or September Number, ready Aug. 25th.
A Satisfied Public, for the Family, for the Scholar, and for all Intelligent Readers, supported by the leading Educational Journals of the United States, whose names will be given in the First Number.
The Literature of "Educational" in the broadest sense of the term—embracing Home and Scholastic Education in all their grades and departments.
It will be a popular New Journal of Literature, Science, Art, and Education.
All the Great Educational News of the day:
All the important News of general interest:
All Important Educational Movements:
Also such Essays, Reviews, Criticisms, Hints, and Suggestions as will be interesting and instructive to Parents, Teachers, and Pupils in their various relations to the Home of Education.
MARCUS WILLSON, Publisher and Proprietor, 251 Broadway, New York.

EDUCATIONAL ROOM, and Teachers' Exchange, at the office of the School and Home Journal.
1st. Every variety of School and College Text-Books kept for examination.
2d. Philosophical and Chemical Apparatus, and Chemicals, Maps, Charts, Globes, &c., supplied at Manufacturers' prices.
3d. Books of all kinds sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of Publishers' advertised prices. School and Private Libraries furnished.
4th. School Books, of all kinds, and in any quantities.
5th. School Books at Publishers' wholesale prices.
For each, and all of the above, address,
MARCUS WILLSON,
251 Broadway, New York.

TO THE BOOK TRADE.
Special Notice.
HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully invite the attention of Booksellers to their
SPECIAL TRADE-LIST FOR THE FALL,
in which their Books are offered at
TRADE-SALE PRICES,
from the 10th of August to the 30th of September, after which their prices will positively be as heretofore.
For Terms, see Special Circular, which may be obtained on application to the Publishers.
FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y., Aug. 19th, 1858.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS.
CONDUCTED BY CHARLES DICKENS.
New Series, Volume I. No. 1 (whole Number 47), Republished Monthly by the Subscriber.
Decidedly the best Literary Periodical in the English language.
TERMS: $3 00 a year.
Address
FREDERIC A. BRADY,
176 Nassau Street, N. Y.



"THE BALMORAL BOUQUET."
Ladies are particularly recommended to try the beautiful new Perfume. Imported by F. C. WELLS & CO., 118 Franklin Street.
"The most perfect Biography of an Artist ever written."
MEMOIRS OF RACHEL. By MADAME E. DE LA TOUR. Illustrated. 2 vols. 12mo.
"A volume full of spicy gossip and secrets of the French theatre."—Commercial Advertiser. "Contains but few subject minutely, through the many eventful phases of her career; contains a great deal of interesting gossip and spirit all these accidents and incidents which make up Rachel's heritage and constitute her history."—Evening Gazette. "A most interesting account of the French theatrical world, and the great actress who has been the star of its boards for the green curtain in France."
"Full of interest, and will attract public attention, and well merit it."—Globe.
A most able and interesting work.—Chronicle.
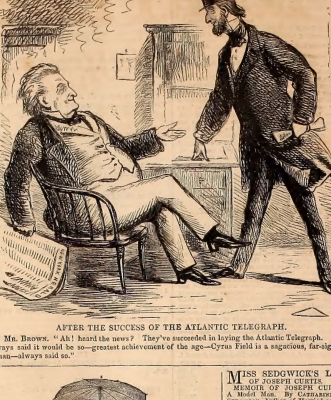
"The deep interest in the life of this great dramatic genius will ensure for it a large and cultivated circle of readers."—Sun.
A work which will be read with avidity.—Advertiser.
The authoress has had the best materials, and in the memoirs of the illustrious actress has accomplished a work of the highest order.—Mail. "Any one who has already read it, claims for it the high merit of being a most interesting work."—Courier and Inquirer.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.
Sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price, $2 00.

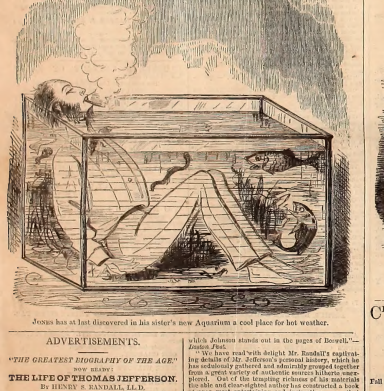
"LADIES' HAIR."
GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.
The greatest and only true Hair Restorative in the world. Eradicates dandruff, promotes the growth, and imparts a beautiful luster to the hair. Thousands of ladies have used it, and the testimonials unsought to remove.
CAUTION.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.
NURSING.—It is a valuable lotion for any thing, assisting every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and fair, and nursing it in sunshine for the races.
FAMILY LICENSE.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers" is the only article recommended by physicians and can be approved.
EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
660 Broadway, N. Y.

TO NERVOUS SUFFERERS.—A retired gentleman having been restored to health in a few days, after many years of great nervous suffering, is willing to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means employed (which cost only a trifle). Any person addressing him, in confidence, by inclosed envelope, will receive a copy of the prescription used. Direct the Rev. JOHN B. MARCH, Box 922, Fulton P. O., New York City.



A SPLENDID NUMBER.
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER.
CONTENTS.
THE FINISHING STROKE. Illustrated by Twelve Engravings.
THE TOMB OF THE THIRTY-FIFTH PARALLEL. Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.
THE DEATH OF LOUIS XVI. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.
CUBA. Illustrated by Eight Engravings.
OUR CHARLES.
THE MOUNTAIN SYLPH. Illustrated by Nine Engravings.
MARK WILTON'S WIFE.
A DIDA QUIXOTE'S WEDDING.
IN THE AUTUMN.
LOCH LOMOND.
THE LOST ROOM.
MEMOIRS OF GENERALS LEE, GATES, STEPHEN, AND DARKE.
THE INSURRECTION.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
LITERARY NOTICES. By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.
Fashion Fit.—Four Hand Pictures.
LITERATURE AND ART. Various Matchless articles.
CHAPTER XXXVII. Sampson and the Philistines.
CHAPTER XXXIX. Harry to the Rescue.
CHAPTER XL. In which Every page of an old Debt, and incurs some new ones.
EDITOR'S LITERARY GOSSIP.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERATURE AND ART. Books of the Month.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
A HIGH FINISHED MUSICAL NOTATION.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—A STAVE.—A Bar.—A Double Bar.—A High Finished Bar.—A Treble Clef.—A Bass Clef.—A Sharp.—A Flat.—A Natural Consequence.—Andante.—Allegro.
FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Equestrian Costume.—Riding Habit.—Hood Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.
One Copy for One Year . . . $3 00
Two Copies for One Year . . . 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.
The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a Year.
HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.



BEFORE THE SUCCESS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

MR. BROWN. "Now, it's no use talking about that Submarine Telegraph. It can never be done in the world. Did you ever hear of such a fool as Cyrus Field has proved himself by embarking his means in so Quixotic a scheme?"

AFTER THE SUCCESS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

MR. BROWN. "Ah! heard the news? They've succeeded in laying the Atlantic Telegraph. I always said it would be so—greatest achievement of the age—Cyrus Field is a sagacious, far-sighted man—always said so."

Jessus has at last discovered in his sister's new Aquarium a cool place for hot weather.

CURIOUS OPTICAL PHENOMENON.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

"THE GREATEST BIOGRAPHY OF THE AGE."
NOW READY.

THE LIFE OF THOMAS JEFFERSON.
By HENRY S. RANDALL, LL.D.
In Three Volumes, 8vo.

THIS WORK CONTAINS UPWARD OF 1000 pages, is printed on fine paper, and handsomely bound in various styles. It is illustrated by several engravings on steel, and numerous fac similes among the former are two fine portraits of JEFFERSON. The fac similes embrace, among others, the original draft of the Declaration of Independence, in JEFFERSON'S own handwriting.

"This is, in every sense, AN AUTHORIZED work. It was undertaken under the approbation of the family, and with an unreserved access to all the private papers of JEFFERSON in their possession; and has received the benefit of their recollections and opinions at every step.

The work contains the expression of JEFFERSON on every great public question which arose, from his advent to public life to his death—a period of about sixty years, and covering the whole formative period of the Republic.

In common JEFFERSON'S heretofore unpublished family correspondence, selections from his finest published letters, state papers, etc., etc.

"No other LIFE OF JEFFERSON ever published—probably none that ever will be published—can bear any comparison to this in thoroughness, fullness of incident, and conscientious fidelity.

"The author has evidently been a laborer of love, and has evidently been a labor of love, and the interest of patient, assiduous toil it has cost, have been given with unsparing, untiring enthusiasm."—New York Tribune.

"At length the public have a Life of Thomas Jefferson that is not only fascinating, and therefore sure to be popular, but one that will stand the essential kindest test of a biography—historical evidence. It is now that the ground-work of the whole is authentic, contemporary material, and of the highest order, and has been the work of years. We would not compare this book with that inimitable and incomparable biography of Boswell, and yet so faithful to the character that Jefferson is made to draw of himself, that his nature—his very soul—is fashioned with a distinctness not unlike that in which Johnson stands out in the pages of Boswell."—London Post.

"It has been read with delight Mr. Randall's egotistical, by details of Mr. Jefferson's personal history, which is less sedulously gathered and admirably grouped together from a great variety of authentic sources hitherto unexplored. Out of the tempting richness of his materials he has able and close-sighted author has constructed a book at once most entertaining and instructive—one that should be studied by every patriot of the land."—Richmond Enquirer.

"It will take place among the choicest classics of American literature, and be consulted by every future historian of this country."—Philadelphia Evening Bulletin.

"We like it because it neither conceals, palliates, exaggerates, nor distorts, but approaches, in every instance, and in every particular, the career of the noble character whose opinions have done so much to shape the domestic and foreign policy of the nation he contributed so greatly to call into existence."—N. O. True Delta.

☞ This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY SUBSCRIPTION, at the low price of $2 50—handsomely bound in cloth.

Experienced CANVASSING Agents wanted in all parts of the country to obtain Subscribers for this work. Applications should state what counties they would like to canvass.

Specimen copies will be sent by mail, pre-paid, to any address, on receipt of the price.

For full particulars address
DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers,
No. 119 Nassau Street, New York.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES,
505 BROADWAY, NEW YORK,
Received the highest Premiums awarded, 1857, by the American Institute, N. Y.; Maryland Institute, Baltimore; and at the Maine, Connecticut, Illinois, and Michigan State Fairs.
Send for a Circular, containing Editorial and Scientific opinions, Testimonials from persons of the highest character, etc.

"VROOM & FOWLER'S"
WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
JOHN D. VROOM, SOLE MAKER, 72 Cherry St., N. Y.

CLOAKS, MANTILLAS, ETC.
TO
Wholesale buyers.
The subscriber will be prepared to exhibit, on Monday, August 16,
at his
New and spacious saleroome,
No. 69 Franklin Street,
Full lines of the most desirable styles of Fall and Winter Cloaks,
Mantillas,
Reglans,
Wrappers, &c.
To which he would especially invite the attention of buyers from all parts of the Union.
GEORGE BULPIN.
Observe the number,
69 Franklin Street,
A few doors east of Broadway.
Near Tayler's saloon.

A TWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $20 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 403 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send for descriptive Circular.
H. C. HURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agent for the United States.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK
WORTH FROM 10 CENTS TO $100 00.
Our new descriptive catalogue of 60 octavo pages embraces a larger collection and better variety of Standard, Historical, Biographical, and Miscellaneous Books than that of any other book selling establishment in the country; also, contains greater inducements than can be otherwise offered, mailed free to any address. Send for a Catalogue.
S. W. EVANS, } EVANS & CO., Publishers,
F. F. FREEMAN, } 627 Broadway, N. Y. City.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—No other sewing machine for family use has ever yet appeared to compare favorably with the machines or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine.
I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINES for manufacturing purposes.—To ascertain the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, it is only necessary to inquire of any manufacturer of mechanic who uses one. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S GAZETTE, which will be supplied gratis. It gives full information on the subject.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

A QUARIUM.—This day is published in 1 volume 12mo, beautifully illustrated, $1 50.
Sent free by mail on receipt of the price.
LIFE AND HABITS OF ANIMALS; OR, THE AQUARIUM IN AMERICA.
By AUBREY M. EDWARDS.
H. BAILLIERE, 290 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Prize for Pamphlet 25 per week.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FAIR
will open at
CRYSTAL PALACE
Sept. 15th.
Goods received on and after Sept. 7th.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER! $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	10 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

MISS SEDGWICK'S LIFE OF JOSEPH CURTIS.
MEMOIR OF JOSEPH CURTIS. A Model Man. By CATHARINE M. SEDGWICK, Author of "Married or Single?" "Means and Ends," "The Linwoods," "Hope Leslie," "Live and Let Live," &c., &c. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents.
Joseph Curtis was a merchant and a philanthropist. In the course of an unobtrusive and laborious business life of over fifty years, he proved how very much practical good can be accomplished in any society by a man of small means, but large and active faith. As the leader of the Mennonism movement in New York, the originator and first superintendent of the Juvenile House of Refuge, and as a most active and practical member of the School Board, he exhibited the true relations of the citizens of New York. As a social, kind, and loving father, his life is a model for all. Miss Sedgwick's memoir is a plain statement of facts, without eulogy other than that established in the facts themselves. Mr. Curtis's career is a model for the youth of our land.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of Fifty Cents.

DR. THORNE. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Barchester Towers," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 87.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, AUGUST 28, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE BURNING OF THE CITY HALL, NEW YORK, AUGUST 18, 1858.

THE FIRE AT THE CITY HALL.

On Tuesday night, a little after midnight, the people of this city were aroused by the cry that the City Hall was on fire. The fire caught from some remains of fire-works which had been discharged from the top of the building. Shortly after midnight, the fire was detected by the bell-ringer, who tried to ring the bell, but was baffled by the smoke and heat. The reporter of the Times, the nearest newspaper office, thus describes the scene:

"In a few minutes the east face of the clock cracked, and with a considerable explosion the flames burst out. Five minutes after, the front face of the clock fell out, and from appearances it was too hot for the bell-ringer to stay near the bell, which, it will be remembered, hung in a cupola in the rear of the large tower, and at some distance from it. Up to this time scarcely a dozen firemen had ascended the roof of the building, and a single engine only was on the ground. Not a bell was ringing—the central alarm failing, there was only the telegraph to communicate the news to the distant or even the nearest stations.

"At ten minutes to one, the first stroke of an engine's brakes were heard, by which time the flames were bursting out of all sides of the tower and from the central window of the upper story of the main building. The stream was directed into this window, but it was a small one.

"As the flames climbed up to the top of the cupola, it was curious to observe birds flitting around it, and past our windows, circling nearer to the fire, then darting off again affrighted. The red-hot hands of the clock, and a long bolt that helped to support it, fell about this time, shying through the air. One of them struck the Hall roof close by a fireman's feet, but did not hurt him. At one o'clock the statue of Justice stood surrounded and wrapt like a martyr in the flames. The balances a minute after whirled around and fell. Then she glowed as if made of iron, and at 1:15 fell with a crash through the tower. The falling of the clock was not noticed in the confusion. By this time a rope had been hitched to the bell-clapper, and a general alarm was sounded, which in a few minutes was responded to by the arrival of several engines.

"The illumination at this time paled all that the preceding evening had seen. The ornamental heads that surmounted the columns around the tower scowled in the light; and nothing but the skeleton of the whole structure remained. There were no clouds in the sky, but from our window not a star was to be seen. At 1:40 a rocket from the roof of the City Hall shot up aways, but twisting, turned off and exploded. Several Roman candles went off at a still later hour, giving evidence that fire-works had been left around carelessly after the illumination. At 1:35 the greater part of the tower fell in.

"As it was falling, seven birds flew almost within the burning skeleton. The gilded eagle on the pole in front, and a corner of the bell-tower, were now all that remained on fire above the roof. It was after the fall that one engine managed to throw a full stream almost up to the eagle, and the centre of the flames, seeming for a while to put them out."

About three o'clock the flames were finally subdued by the persevering efforts of the firemen. When daylight broke it was discovered that the cupola and part of the roof adjoining were destroyed, but that the flames had done comparatively no damage to the interior of the building. The whole injury, it is expected, will be covered by an outlay of $30,000. No lives were lost.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Saturday, August 28, 1858.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

In order to satisfy the universal demand for information on the subject of the Atlantic Telegraph, we shall publish with next number of the Weekly an

ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH SUPPLEMENT,

of sixteen pages—price Five Cents—which will contain all the information that any one can desire on the subject, together with the following, among other illustrations:

I. An admirable Portrait of Cyrus W. Field, with a Biographical Sketch.
II. A Portrait of Professor Morse, with Sketch, and Plans of his Instrument.
III. A Picture of the Hughes Telegraph Instrument by which the Cable will probably be worked, with Description; also Pictures of Bains', House's, and the English Instruments.
IV. Several Pictures Illustrating the Laying of the Newfoundland Cable.
V. The Telegraph Plateau, and how the Cable was laid on it, with a full and clear Account.
VI. Plan showing a Section of the Bottom of the Atlantic, and explaining why the Cable was laid where it is.
VII. Illustration of Brooke's Deep-Sea-Sounding Apparatus, with which alone the Deep Sea can be Sounded, with Explanation.
VIII. The Atlantic Telegraph Cable, with Description; the Newfoundland Cable; the Cable between Orfordness and the Hague; the Cable across the Mississippi; the Cable between Dover and Ostend, etc., etc.
IX. Pictures of the Voyage of the "Agamemnon" and "Niagara" to the Rendezvous, and the Storm on the Way.
X. Splicing the Cable in Mid-ocean.
XI. Picture of the "Agamemnon" in the fearful Storm.
XII. Portrait of Mr. Everett, and Plans of his Paying-out Instrument.
XIII. A Portrait of the Governor of Newfoundland, with a Biographical Sketch.
XIV. Picture of the Reception of the "Niagara" at St. Johns, with an Account of the same.
XV. A View of Valentia Bay, Ireland, with Description.
XVI. A View of Trinity Bay, Newfoundland, with Description.
XVII. Portrait of Captain Hudson of the "Niagara."
XVIII. Picture of the Illumination at New York in Commemoration of the Success of the Cable.
XIX. Allegory of the Atlantic Cable.
XX. Caricatures of the Man who wouldn't believe in the Cable—of Mr. Brown, Before and After, etc.

Together with Mr. Field's Journal, and a copious and accurate history of the whole enterprise, down to the present moment.

The whole for Five Cents.

THE FIRST TRANSATLANTIC MESSAGES.

Perhaps it was foolish to expect that the messages which were to pass between the Queen and the President would be any wiser or more brilliant than other people's messages. But this was certainly the general belief. Every body felt satisfied that two such potentates, on such an occasion, would transmit sentences worthy of being preserved in letters of gold. And every body now admits that the messages which were sent were not worth the labor they cost the telegraphists in sending them over the transatlantic wire.

There is this to be said in favor of her Majesty's. If it is not brilliant, or original, or even strictly grammatical, it is not impertinent or absolutely silly. It tells us nothing that we did not know before; but it does not tell us any thing that we can dispute or deny. If it rouses no enthusiasm, it excites no derision. It being generally understood here and elsewhere that the Queen is a sane woman, people are not thrown into paroxysms of any kind on being told that she felt a deep interest in the success of the telegraph enterprise, or that the wire will prove a new bond of union between two kindred nations. If she had not felt an interest, or had not seen that the wire would prove a bond of union, she would have been a simple idiot. Still, under the circumstances, considering the staid formalities which characterize royal courts, and the novelty of her Majesty's position, it may be as safe, as well as charitable, to conclude that she might have found it difficult to indite a message that would have been proper without being commonplace.

The President occupied very different ground. He was untrammeled by courtly etiquette. He was trained to the use of the diplomatic pen. The experience of a lifetime had developed his faculties to the highest degree. If there lives a man who might be expected to say the right thing in the right place, that man is James Buchanan. Yet we are bound to say that his reply to the Queen's message is not only as commonplace and dull as the royal letter itself, but is—what that performance is not—actually silly and impertinent.

The congratulations on the success of the cable, and the hopes that it will prove an ally to civilization, religion, and commerce, were matters of course. The gist of the President's message is in the concluding lines, in which he expresses the wish that all nations would unite in a declaration that the cable shall be kept neutral in the event of future wars. It is using mild language to say that this sentence is as offensive to reason as to good taste. The future governance of the cable, in an international point of view and in the contingency of war, is clearly a matter of international law, to be adjusted by statesmen and settled in treaties. To seize the present moment to force the subject on the Queen's notice, and to try to extort from her some political pledge or order on the subject, is like asking your host to lend you money when you are drinking his claret over his mahogany. The President might as well have slipped into his reply an artful question about Central America or the annexation of Vancouver's Island. There is a time and a place for all things; and the moment of hearty enthusiasm which marked the success of the cable was certainly not the time to attempt to entrap the Queen into diplomatic concessions.

But the taste which prompted the remark is even less singular than the fallacy which underlies it. Where are the nations which are to concur in a declaration that the cable shall be neutral? One end of the cable rests in Ireland—British territory; the other in Newfoundland—British territory; the middle in two thousand fathoms water. Whereabouts are the "nations" to exercise authority over it? Suppose France and Russia agree to Mr. Buchanan's proposal; what will a bushel of their declarations be worth? They might as well declare that, in the event of war, the New York and Washington line should be neutral; or that, in the like contingency, the New York Central Railway should be free to all belligerents. Mr. Buchanan might as well issue a declaration in reference to the neutrality of a high road in Germany as any foreign nation, save only Great Britain, in regard to this ocean telegraph.

We hope and trust that no occasion will ever arise in which the exclusively British control of the wire can prove inconvenient to this country. We should be glad to hear that England had formally pledged herself never to monopolize the line, or to take advantage of it to our prejudice. But we are sorry that the subject should have been opened in the inaugural message, and more sorry still that it should have been opened in a manner that can hardly fail to provoke the ridicule of the keen-witted publicists of Europe.

BUSINESS PROSPECTS.

The season is now far enough advanced to warrant calculations with regard to the fall crops and the fall trade. The prospects of neither are very cheering.

It seems pretty certain that the fall crop of breadstuffs will fall short by about 25 per cent. of the crop of last year, and this though a considerably increased area of land has been this year laid under cultivation. In many parts of the West, as in Iowa and the vicinity, the crops have suffered severely from excessive rains and inundations. Nor is this the worst. Europe having full crops, the price of grain is low, and the gain to the farmer will be reduced more than 25 per cent. Had the loss occurred after a series of prosperous years it might have been borne more cheerfully than it can be now—succeeding as it does the disastrous fall of 1857. The only point from which any comfort for the farmer can be derived is the cheapness of transportation, which flows from the intense competition among the railways and canals. Produce can be sent from the West to the sea-board more cheaply at present than at any former time.

It is understood that a couple of weeks ago the Government at Washington anticipated a revival in trade this fall, and fondly hoped to see such an increase in the customs revenue as would enable the Treasury to dispense with the second half of the twenty million loan. It is now clear enough that these hopes will not be realized. Though the city is full of Western merchants, caution on both sides is operating seriously against business. The shortness of the crops warns the country dealer to restrict his purchases; the revulsion has shaken the faith of the city merchant in all country customers. It is probable that between the two the sales of merchandise in this city will be smaller this fall than they have been for years.

We must wait a little longer for the revival. Next year, if all goes right, trade will be restored to its old channels, and the country will be all the better for having waited.

AN EXCEPTION TO A GENERAL RULE.

We are assured by a correspondent that in the censure lately passed in these columns on the United States Consuls in the East we did injury to M. de Leon, United States Consul at Jerusalem. We are told that M. de Leon is an active, energetic man, and a conscientious official. We are very happy to hear it. He will shine the brighter by contrast with his fellow-consuls. That the United States Consuls throughout the East, and in many parts of Europe as well, are, as a rule, neither fitted by their character nor adapted by their education or habits to render useful service to American commerce or American citizens traveling abroad; that many of them owe to the American flag impunity from due punishment for grievous offenses; that many are notoriously vicious, dishonest, cowardly, and worthless; finally, that they are, as a rule, as sore a disgrace to the American name as even the attachés to our foreign embassies, every honest and intelligent traveler will bear witness. If M. de Leon be an exception, so much the better for him and for us.

BRADY'S PORTRAITS.

We have to acknowledge the receipt of an excellent photograph of Senator Seward from Mr. Brady, the famous photographer of New York and Washington. Mr. Brady's photographs of celebrated men will soon hang in every drawing-room. They are fine works of art, and wonderful likenesses.

A PEEP AT SARATOGA.

Saratoga, August 18, 1858.

Surely the Journal of Civilization should inform its numerous readers as to the state and progress of our civilization in this the most famous and fashionable watering-place of the New World. I have been here for a brief space, and have jotted down a few things for your columns.

"The United States" holds on to its prestige of fashion. Many of the Upper Ten are there, and many who rise to the surface of society, as does the froth to the top of the fermenting vat. French cooks go there as counts, and pretty milliners pass for daughters of millionaires; and bushy-lipped barbers have been known to pass for Southern barristers. A walk through its parlors and around its porticoes, about eight o'clock in the evening, give you some charming views of fashions and attitudes! Oh! if the God of Nature had only formed some of those men and women as they have deformed themselves, they would brave all the rigors of Arctic seas even with the faint hope of getting rid of the humps behind, and of the protuberances before, and of the peculiar bend and leer of a dandy, fresh from the barber, when addressing a fair lady! And if a common-sense bachelor could only see, as I saw, a young widow of New York dressed for a fancy ball so as to represent Madame Pompadour, and standing for exhibition for half an hour in the parlor, like the wax women in Broadway windows, his astonishment would be used up! There would be at least one woman in the world he would not want for a wife! The lumbering Madame R——, with her train of artists in the singing and dancing professions, is sadly missed from the front portico. She was an institution of Saratoga in the month of August; and who now rules "Queen of the May" I could not discover, unless it was a certain widow, most intelligent, agreeable, and natural, of Washington Square. If she was not queen she ought to be.

Union and Congress Halls are now, as they have always been, the resorts of the more sober and substantial visitors, whose good sense and manners, like their cash, are always current. In the parlors and porticoes of these Halls you meet with ministers, lawyers, judges, governors, and men of sense and wealth, with their wives and daughters, who need neither gay plumage nor liveried servants to get them into good society. They are in it already, and neither pretense nor gilding would be of any use to them. It would be like gilding the gold or plating the silver. And it is quite refreshing to see the wives and daughters of such as simple as possible, while Mrs. Parvenu and her daughters, from the Fifth Avenue, are swelled to the dimensions of the famous umbrella of Daniel Lambert, minus Daniel himself. Their bodies are to their skirts what the handle was to the said umbrella.

There is one sight quite painful to witness in these saloons of Saratoga, to which I can only allude. Some years since I inquired who certain ladies were who were seen promenading on all occasions with any variety of gentlemen, sometimes with one on either hand, with whom they kept up a most voluble and apparently exciting conversation. I was told they were widows, and young ladies of a certain age, in search of partners. I have seen these same ladies going the same rounds within a few days, and apparently as young and as singular as ever. I regretted their want of success; but they may yet hope, as their blushes are as fresh, and their hair as black, and their teeth as white, and their forms even more graceful than they were on the first day I saw them. It would really seem as if the fabled fountain whose waters rejuvinated had been discovered, as gray-headed men and women have almost entirely disappeared. The time has come when age plows no wrinkles, and lets the hair alone; when it is simply a prejudice, not to be regarded, save when it becomes so violent as to affect the eyes and the knees. None die now of age—they only die when the stream of life, like the Taunton waters, becomes so feeble that it can not even run down hill. You may be certain the progress of civilization is wonderful in our day!

A word as to another side of things in Saratoga. Many ministers I have seen there, the very ornaments of the Church and of the land. And several discourses have I heard to crowded audiences, most decidedly of the right ring. And Saratoga is the place of all others for ministers to preach the simple Gospel. Metaphysical disquisitions are out of place there, when people are half filled with Congress. And so are sermons an hour long when the house is crowded and the thermometer at 90°. The people that hear these once never desire to hear them again. But there are some ministers of the "Fancy Stock" order who go there who leave traditions behind them. One of these, small in stature, but of towering pretensions, who carries about copies of his own portrait, and hangs them from "Tip Top House" to Saratoga, we were informed, sent a request to one of the pastors that he might be permitted to preach in the morning, as he had a sermon which he wished to preach and many of the people wished to hear!! The sermon was a splendid failure—a much ado about nothing—and is yet laughed at as "the Spread Eagle Sermon," as a puerile exhibition of vanity. The fewer such "swelled heads," as they call them in Kentucky, preach in Saratoga the better. They use the pulpit as certain venders of quack remedies do the rocks along our railways—to advertise themselves! They are ministers to their own vanity.

I saw another cleric there whose picture, if truly drawn, might be a means of grace to the younger clergy. He was quite tall, quite thin, narrow between the temples, rather low in the forehead, weak in the knees, buttoned to his chin, with a cross dangling on his breast, which might be seen through an aperture left for the purpose in the buttoning of the coat. He had, besides, a good nose of his own, which was surmounted by almost invisible spectacles. He had a quick step, a most patronizing air, and a way which seemed to say, "I am more holy than thou!" I thought I could guess his tribe; but to be certain I asked, "Who is that?" "Oh!" said one who knew, with a smile, "he is a Puseyite priest, recently come home, who thinks you are all wrong unless found in the path of which Dr. Pusey is chief keeper, and to the door of which he holds one of the keys." I thought as much from his appearance and regimentals. Such men are all cast in the same mould. I have never seen one with a finely-formed head, with a broad, expansive forehead. They seem all to have been originally designed for milliners, but were spoiled in the process of making. What a pity they were!

A word as to another side of things in Saratoga. I mean the prayer-meetings at nine in the morning. They formed the most delightful services of the kind that I ever attended. They continue but for one hour. There all Protestants meet to sing, to exhort one another to love and good works, to narrate the goodness of God to the various branches of the Church all over the land, and to pray. In these services may be heard the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopalian, Lutheran—governors, judges, lawyers, ministers, merchants, mechanics—all speaking the same language and uniting in the same supplications before the same God. Never did we see on earth a more delightful type of the Church in heaven. It is worth a visit to Saratoga to attend one of those meetings of prayer.

There are two classes of people that may well afford to go to Saratoga. First, invalids—the waters are fine, purifying, and invigorating. Congress is the most wonderful spring known; and it is only one of many of varying qualities, all of which would be wonderful in the absence of the Congress. Secondly, sensible people—fools and pretenders are soon discovered. The people there seem to find out every thing about every body; and they love to reveal the weak points of those who think they may pretend to be sensible because they keep a servant in livery. Were I a rich dunce, I would sport my trappings on the east end of Long Island, or down toward the mouth of the Delaware, where I would be admired by the ignorant; but I would never go to Saratoga. "Why not?" you ask. I will reply by narrating an incident: "Who," said I, pointing to a large lady dressed in richest style, her arms, breast, fingers, and head splendid with gold and diamonds, "who is that lady?" "She is the wife of a master in mechanic," was the reply, "who made money by speculation. Like some trees, she is only valuable for bark and leaves, and the tan-pay she is fat." "How have you found out her ignorance?" I asked. "Why, I heard her say a little time ago to her husband, 'John, why hain't ye told Dick he have found the carriage, the children an sick for a ride.'" I was satisfied. I would not go there, however numerous may be their dollars, to keep away from Saratoga, unless they desire their fame spread over the country. VIATOR.

THE LOUNGER.

THE JUBILEE.

NEVER has typography been so excited. Never have foremen been as put to their wits' ends to devise temperate language for the public ear. Never have the newspapers so seemed to shout and emit jubilant war-whoops in print as during the last few days. The state of things must carry off the news-boys by hundreds. It is a kind of perpetual extra—at which the freshest and the fastest run. Never, certainly, since the newspaper has been the important institution into which a free city have developed itself, has it been the expression of such universal and profound joy as at the triumph of the Telegraph.

But vainly the largest, and longest, and blackest, and most Old English and German Text type italic after that thing is alive to-day. Vainly Queen and Presidents exchange messages, and all the orators in all the States and cities of the continent unchain their most ungovernable rhetoric. Vainly editors vent loaded leaders, and people sing, and shout, and fire, and fling their spectre and sweet chimes peal out at noon. The thought of the mystic victory over time and space achieved in the realm of darkness and silence and death—in the green vaults of oblivion—is no more to be expressed than the mind's ability to think of thought—than the soul's joy in the consciousness of its immortality.

This triumph is another bead told upon the rosary of human power—another proud assertion of the supremacy of mind over the inanimate—another suggestion of its divine origin. Man is the Prince Fortunatus of the fairy tale—Old Father Time and the lamp—the athlete whose feet are shod with swiftness to outrun the winds. Steam made half of fairy lore a part of daily experience; electricity completes the work, and makes the Arabian Nights historical progress. What are the enchantments among the saintly George Herbert, of whom Mr. George Daykinck has lately given us so admirable a biography?

"For us the winds do blow,
The earth doth rest, heaven move, and fountains flow.
Nothing we see, but means our good,
As our delight or as our treasure;
The whole is either our cupboard of food
Or cabinet of pleasure."

GEORGETOWN, D. C., August, 1858.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER,—Permit me to send you the following for your quarrel or to disapprove. Yours lovingly, AGRICOLA RADDO."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

"Our dear friends on many a land we hold,
Long years ago, to conquer independence
From Mother England, and retrieve her gold.
Though threatened often with her direst vengeance,
Say now our Cyrus holds the golden key.
By one small rope which nothing can dissever;
Another Field, at last, with mutual cheer
Unites us to our Mother—let us hope forever!"

THE MESSAGES.

FOR two people to make a bow, shake hands, and say "How d'ye do?" with the whole world looking on, is breathlessly expectant of some august burst of eloquence, is a trying situation for a modest man or woman. Nothing but an possible reply will in the slightest degree satisfy the natural expectation of the spectators. The anticipation is akin to that with which storm-stayed people watch rays. They look to see an ocean pouring in upon people in the profitable messages of the two heads of nations. When the most unexpected response is received it required all the jubilant good-nuisance inspired to prevent a phenomenon akin to general feeling that the good fraternal results of the telegraph had been partially paralyzed by the formal and frigid courtesy of the speeches. But when the day brought the completion of the greeting, it was so dignified and hearty and appropriate that all hard feeling immediately vanished.

The response of the President is not so happy. Especially the last clause, which alludes to hostilities, is unfortunate. The occasion is one of peculiar unity. The two nations, linked by blood and tongue and civilization, grasp hands under the sea. It is an act of brotherhood, and an embrace in which every thought of possible offence is smothered. Why, then, speak of fighting?

Why, in the very moment of congratulation, recognize the possibility of incurring enemies?

Besides, the request is one hardly ready to be heeded. As long as "all nations of Christendom" occasionally go to war, they will tax their ingenuity to injure their foes to the utmost—for what is war but the attempt of one nation to cause another or by means of damage inflicted upon persons and property? If, then, England is at war with the United States, she will "hit her" wherever she can. If the telegraph is useful to America during a war, it would be equally useful to her in case of international feeling implied by a respect of the neutrality of the telegraph in war would prevent it. Why, then, has the President's request been made?

However, under the circumstances we ought to be grateful that the messages were so simple and grammatical; and let us hope that the Telegraph itself will help hasten the day when nations will learn war no more.

THE TELEGRAPH IN ENGLAND.

THE London journals received the news of the success of the laying of the cable with less display of imposing than ours. In fact they said some very excellent things upon the occasion, and as though the London Times gave a more striking heading to the account of the first exchanges than to the story of the wire, yet its leader very appropriately considered the significance of the two events, the military splendor at Cronstadt and the solemn promise of international peace made by the cable and the sea.

The civic jubilee, however, seems to have been the chief event in the old city. The Lord Mayor's doors have turned down Westminster Abbey in honor of the glorious triumph, nor given the Manhattan Club a more splendid banquet than he has just given privately:

"News of the laying of the Atlantic cable arrived here yesterday morning; and some of the morning papers say there is great excitement on the subject. We can tell some of the mornings in life. There is no illumination, no jollification, no hurrah. Nothing of the kind. Nothing disgusting fact that, although moving about in the best of health, for the thirty hours since the reception of the dispatch here, not a soul has seen the man speak of this matter, and that man was a Yankee!"

UNKNOWN CELEBRITIES.

IT appears that we are to have another of the famous singers whose name is entirely new. The announcement is made that the distinguished prima donna unites genius with skill; and, as we have never before been introduced to a prima in advance by managers, of course we are all willing and eager to believe. The advent of world-renowned artists without having to be puffed is becoming very frequent in our annals. Who is Blumenthal? Who is Carl Formes? Who is Ole Bull? If she be really a great singer why has she not made her mark in London, Paris, or St. Petersburg? Those are the cities which make the fame for us. They have their deputed ears and eyes in all the operahouses of Europe. They are the judges, whose talent appears it is seized and appropriated for those cities.

Vestvali, Garcia, Alboni, Persiani, Tiltens, Cruvelli, Grisi, Piccolomini—the last a pretty actress but not a great singer—have been seen by a great press clause of the day. Besides these there are a company sweet and charming vocalists. When they come to us we first hear their names, let a great them generously, and bestow the laurel. But who is Miss Adelaide Phillips? Has her name ever been on all, a theatrical advertisement? Let us remember poor Maretzek, and be wise.

Musical prejudged (regularly) of aggravated puffing. Now, advertising is good—but only for good wares. Puffing, blank, unmeaning, and famous succeeded by advertising; but it was by advertising something worth the pains and the expense. Suppose there had been no puffing at all—could any conceivable quantity of skillful puffery have helped the memory of Kean? Could he ever have prepared with Mussel before he appeared? How we were shut at from windows—how all the papers flung him in the face! How the managers swore at the front door—how he came hidden in envelopes—how he was smuggled into the pit and private pens on opera programmes! Alas, and alas! he is pictured on a desk well now, in good trait; and the lately Kemble actor, Mr. Fechter, and Lucy Cullen, of Ullman's actions lied against Mussel. He was actually taken up by the "best of the land and lovliest" ink.

And now the cheerful impresari—as managers are politely called—are making fresh engagements for next year. We wish them sincerely—and for our own interest—the best luck in the world. We hope they may persuade some great singer to come over and charm us. We hope they will spare their pockets and our patience in the matter of advertising; and we trust the Directors of the Academy will write up their walls, as a sole of written upon walls in London—"No rubbish shed here!"

DICKENS'S LAST LETTER.

THERE was never a book published so promptly suppressed—at least at a distance—by a word from one of the persons most interested, as in the recent case of the publication of the correspondence of Dickens and his wife. His card about it in the Household Words was worthy of the best English gentleman. Every body knew there must be a great deal that was not said. Parents do not part after more than twenty married years together without a deepth of tragical history that is not to be easily sounded.

But it is evident that the little whispers of busy tongues in London have been stinging Dickens to the quick. He has written a book that has authorized the publication of a private letter which treats the subject more in detail. It is a very great mistake and misfortune. The first card was called for, and it was a generous shield of his wife as well as a conclusive defense of their conduct. But the last letter is a kind of justification of himself and consequent implication of his wife, which, however properly he might have breathed to a friend, is almost an outrage when published to the world.

It is melancholy to think of the seething current of letter feeling which flows through the veins of London literary society, and which is betrayed by the late quarrel of Thackeray and Yates, the circumstances that have produced this letter of Dickens, and the Bulwer scandal. It seems not at all improbable that the second Lytton-Bulwer will take the view of the case which is indicated in his novel, and which is looking at the matter in real life? If he preaches in a stolen coat, how can we care for his family against stealing?

A LETTER FROM THE WEST.

ALTON, ILLINOIS, 1858.

"To the Lounger.

"I observe in the Number for the 10th instant that a proposition to build a telling-glass is occupying the care of the Siamese Twins, to wit, Esa, who, having performed the feat of walking on a tight rope Across a line from Parkopolis to his sister hall, Chang, in which time the Legislatures of Western lodges and doings was transferred.

"Your Mr. Esq is a ready and racy describer, and could, were he thus minded, treat the myriads of Harper's Weekly readers with a sketches of all our land; and his running notes would be among them first sought when the contents were scanned. I refer to your issue of Harper at each of the thousands of news depôts.

"I am induced to the task of enjoining upon I hum that your correspondent returned to his own home, and, after a short visit, passed half a dozen cool nights of undisturbed rest, because again called in to mend some differ of thankfulness. As the period of the writing the sketch, at Lexington, the Siamese twins of the engraph were plungly nonsilent; further, they were engrossed.

"Your correspondent, as I have said, forgot himself, and dreaded the disease to such degree that visual and vocal organs were alike unable to perform.

"I wish to call attention to our paragraph, and certainly to the subject matter, and would respectfully beg to occupy the minds of readers, and especially as the Siamese Twins are now in the city, and probably have not be led astray, even in matters of minor interest.

"Yours, &c. After long for hours we were taken before by the fresh engine, and brought to that dreary lit. by Illinois town, which has not one single thing to like—by the want system of Lovejoy.

"Now it is reported that the rails tie upon the lowest land, through a valley, as to most easily to approach the river, and give travelers the advantage of the shortest route to the ferry-boat that they have the cars. No important portion of the town can be seen from the cars. The town is built upon the bluffs, which lie to the right, annoyed by his late delay, and distrustfully distributed. Such a combination of facts, together with the draw publicly announced conclusions touching the matter.

"Again, is it a fault of a multitude of terms that they are not sufficiently definite? Some would say so, and we feed out support the Manhattan Club!

"Your correspondent, Mr. Esq, whom merchants accept a most excitable mercantile reputation in Golconda Newcome and Clive. Proceeded by for:

"The magnificis in Alton's history,' as announced in the Esq, is to be a grand affair, and will be.

"True; that fort was as useless to the prosperity of the place for years, as it has suffered with the unjust.

"The Association of Alton was then some three thousand; and in those days twenty-one years ago! Although the Alton and religious liberty, and for the conference of institutions for the promotion of truth and righteousness, and Alton is the best city in the world with wealth in the United States. Both in the fact.

"The second and last resolutions of one of the twelve dreary little congregations average fifty six thousand dollars, and the average of the whole of the city equal amount are made. We would Gotham's sandy pupils to.

"Nearly all the persons who were recognized as being sisters or sisters of the crime of the night of the 15th of November, 1857, in this place are a long time after.

"Possibly some cities of elevated pretensions could be found which have suffered crimes have been more and almost forgotten.

"Our young people last spring the annual Unitarian General Convention assembled in this city, and among the delegates were many of the most distinguished men, not on this and on the other side of the Atlantic, and who appreciated the value of our city presented views that exposing in beauty any ever before or elsewhere witnessed. Many of the delegates were strangers to us, and were gratified to judge and to institute comparisons. Mr. Eng has promised to write us on the occasion of his next trip to the dreary little Illinois town, and a voluntary subscription will be made for the purpose that the views afforded him, that Nature was lavish of land scape beauties when she fitted up our locality.

"Our city is also remarkable commercially. Alton contains a population of twelve thousand; eight or ten steamboats are owned or fit city presented views built, and a half miles along the river, and more than a mile and a half back from the bluffs. Commercial importance being Hoe's improved—two daily papers, five weekly, and one monthly. Religious, which has carried the finest and best specimens of work yet exhibited in the States. The population is cosmopolitan, and the school is not confined in appointments anywhere; eleven public schools and the Academy; twelve churches, one of which is the cathedral of this bishopric, five of the churches contain organs, and the one of the Catholic Cathedral instrument yet erected in this country out the largest; three merchant shipping vessels, and the Alton packet, one hundred barrels of flour per diem, one of which mills cost over one hundred thousand dollars; one brick and one stone manufactory of various degrees of excellence, besides a quantity of quite small city; large lumber yards, and large and small manufactories.

"Some sixty houses contain piano-fortes; we have three dealers in pianofortes, organs, and melodeons, and or twelve teachers of these instruments; our streets and public grounds are well shaded, and several others will be commenced. Three completed railroads point to this place, and a fourth is in course of construction.

"We have five or six importing houses, and companies statistics have been compiled, showing that a larger amount of business was done in this city than in any city in the population of which statistics could be gained.

"Seven miles distant is situated Upper Alton, with three thousand people, and which is the site of Shurtleff College.

"Monticello Female Seminary, four miles distant by both railroad and steamboat, is a close structure of four stories, having out in its erection some seventy-five thousand dollars. The seminary has a full corps of instructors, the most complete appointments and accommodations, and enjoys a prolific record to boot.

"Within a radius of twenty miles is the fruit-garden of the world. Here, and nowhere else, is produced the luscious, melting peach, weighing twenty-four ounces. We have eaten peaches, from the tree, on the 4th July and on the last of August.

"If Mr. Eng will attend one of our prestigical exhibitions, we opine the sense of dreariness would for the hour vanish. Will he come?

ALTON."

[Our correspondent friend Esq, who, happy dog! is doubtless playing the part of Tom Dyer with the lovely and queenly Cleopatra who writes in the purest style of her experience of life as Alton, can not but be pleased by the letter of "Alton." His generousness is. "Alton" to process the splendid occasion of Esq's somewhat hurried, perhaps flippant, eminence upon the Illinois city. The fine situation of Alton, the fact of letter and learning and valuable, but its great value and moral are that they are the practical travelers who see the outsides of towns at midnight, and reproduce their impressions in print, that they should take care that the first impression when they appear is not a flourishing little town upon the point of a paradise.

At the same time, no one will acknowledge more readily than "Alton" that the size of the town is not always a valid upon the children that, for instance, the emotions of a thoughtful traveler upon the Seine will always be favored a little by the remembrance of Servetus.

The Lounger, however, does not mean, in silence or deny, that he considers his correspondent of the letter and its kind interpretation of motives, which a generous nature suggests with like facility to find out, he hopes, destroy. As for that luxurious fellow—who was so unconscionable as to quarrel with a beautiful and one deserving of his friendship—may the queenly Cleopatra set spurs him! Meanwhile, let him, drive, ride, and row him in the softest moonlights, in the brightest mornings—upon the hardest beaches, upon the loneliest pleasure grounds, and with him to be found sharing music, until he shall humbly repent of ever having written anything but the most agreeable phrase or unhappy circumstances in the world.

"Alton," and the Lounger, and Chang himself, will be happy to forgive.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

"WELL, you, dear Mr. Lounger, commiserating my poor head, have you chosen to inform me that the letter you purpose doing with 'what will be do with it.' I have several times begun to write you a letter before this until it was completed; but considering that it was not worth your while to have an opportunity of reading any part of it if I abided by the resolution; and being deterred by a sort of modesty (for I sometimes think myself one) that appeared in the Weekly for July 17th, but this time I have made up and decided to write you, and then a 'stocking of the pairs' at a time, I commenced to write you a letter, and then I thought you would think of 'What will be do with it?' and was half a dozen days in an interesting description of some of the most beautiful 'gold dignas' before I discovered that Sir Edward had already described them.

"I am confident, Mr. Lounger, that the story runs, that you are one of the 'go-aheadistics.' I would, as an intense admirer of yours, like to have my query answered. What will they do with it?

"Respectfully and truly yours, S. H. R."

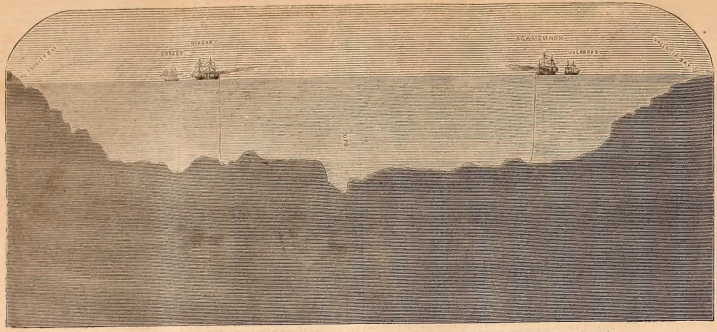
[Mr. S. H. R. Sawyer, of course, knows how he told us—that the story is twisted and in the hands of blackwood. Does he not also see that, by dividing it into weekly parts, the pleasure is provided weekly for the reader? Suppose that the Weekly should print the whole of a monthly number of the novel in one paper, does not S. H. S. think there would be a loud outcry from the readers? "What do they do with it?" hours really long until portions remarkably well. But the patience of the lovers of literature will be rewarded when the tale is relieved, and then he may swear off from all serials, if he thinks he can.

"A nameless friend sends a letter describing the delights of the country life, which she is now enjoying with "Cousin Frank, and Tom, and pretty Mollie Clark," and begging the Lounger to send her a story to read. She looks into the country to enjoy one ought to know what a world of beauty he lives in. Can he not find it in the city? Can he not up in dirty, dingy New York?" Poor New Yorks! Yet no city in the world, of equal size, is more happily situated for health, or more pleasant for living.



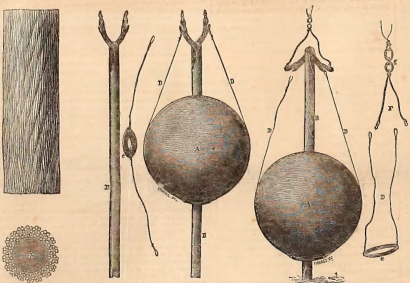
"A CONSTANT READER" writes, from Friendship, in Maryland, a eulogy of the Lounger, and of the Weekly and Monthly, and closes by offering to subscribe. Yet it is very pleasant to hear, for it is very doubtful if there were ever a child who did not like to hear praise. The Lounger's treatment is much too concentrated in it. It is natural that such a friend as this correspondent will be glad to find it not receiving the paper and Magazine regularly; but the Lounger begs to present his particular compliments, and he will see that they are regularly mailed, and that our common Uncle Samuel must be the delinquent in this case.

"A. J. C." sends a little poem, "A Sad Picture." Alas! it is a fallen woman's case who has died, and left him with a child to care for. The subject is one that should make the sacred, and Thackeray has touched it exquisitely in his Colonel Newcome and Clive. The intention of "A. J. G." is better than his poetry.

"L. E. K." does better. But does she not see that the measure required alternate rhymes?

"I would not wake them from thy dream of pleasure,
I ask not for thy love while here we stray;
I know thou art mine own, when time no longer
Shall rule in the measure in this world away.
And in that better land to which we're hastening,
Where years and days of time will not bear sway,
Then thou will know me, as I know thee even,
And we will speak, beloved, face to face."

THE TELEGRAPH PLATEAU.



SECTION, EAST AND WEST, OF THE BED OF THE ATLANTIC—LAYING THE CABLE ON THE TELEGRAPH PLATEAU.

THE first of the two illustrations on this page presents a view of the surface of the great oceanic plateau, or table-land, along which the telegraph wires have just been successfully laid. The last is a sectional view of the bed of the Atlantic (north and south), showing the relation of the elevated ridge to the remainder of the ocean bed.

The soundings across the Atlantic between England and America, first begun by the United States Government, and since verified by a British expedition, demonstrated satisfactorily two most important facts bearing upon the possibility of successfully laying the oceanic wire. These were, first, the existence of the elevated level we here illustrate, which at once took the name of "Telegraphic Plateau;" and, second, the remarkable fact that in the ocean depths there is an absolute absence of current or motion of any kind—so that the wire, however small, being once laid, there is no danger of its destruction by abrasion or chafe against the bottom surface. From the series of soundings obtained by Lieutenant Berryman, in the United States Steamer Arctic, stretching from the coast of Newfoundland to Valentia Bay, in Ireland, it appears that the depth of water on the plateau nowhere exceeds two miles; and that there is, from a point a little to the eastward of the middle, a gradual slope toward each terminus, with but few irregularities. Along this ridge, so providentially arranged to facilitate the greatest achievement of modern science and energy, there appear to be no rocks or jagged points to endanger the safety of a cable; nothing, in fact, but a deposit of soft mud, which under the microscope proves to be composed of myriads upon myriads of minute shells, each separate and entire—thus proving that there is not, in these depths, even sufficient current or motion to destroy, by abrasion, these fragile structures.

Not least remarkable, in connection with this subject, is the ingenious contrivance invented by passed midshipman (now Lieutenant) John M. Brooke, by means of which it first became possible to obtain samples of bottom from any depth of water at which the lead could reach bottom. The accompanying illustrations will sufficiently explain the operation of this machine, which is known as "Brooke's Deep Sea Sounding Apparatus." Hitherto it had been possible to obtain depths or soundings, but impossible, owing to the necessary slightness of the line and heaviness of the shot, to bring up specimens of the bottom, the shot being always detached.

B, in our illustration, is the stuff "armed" at its lower end, where there is a small cavity, C, for the purpose, with soap or tallow, to which armature a sample of the bottom clings. A is a common cannon-ball, which has a hole pierced through its centre. It is held in its place on the rod by the slings D D, which slings detach themselves when the machine strikes bottom—

THE CABLE.

BROOKE'S DEEP SEA SOUNDING INSTRUMENT.

SECTION, NORTH AND SOUTH, OF THE BED OF THE ATLANTIC, FROM THE CAPE DE VERDS THROUGH THE AZORES AND THE TELEGRAPH PLATEAU.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—THE "AGAMEMNON" ON HER BEAM ENDS.

and not without; dues leaving nothing to be hauled up but the light rod, at whose extreme the armature holds a sample of the bottom. With this contrivance specimens of bottom have been obtained from a depth of more than two miles. The ocean is nowhere on the plateau deeper than 12,000 feet, which at its side soundings have been obtained of 24,000 feet. The surface of the plateau is now thoroughly and faithfully mapped out, from Lieutenant Berryman's survey.

It will be noticed that the sketches of the plateau and ocean bed are not mathematically correct; that the depth of the water, in both, is out of proportion to the length of the scene represented; that the water-line is represented as straight, whereas it is a curve, etc. It was impossible to avoid these inaccuracies. To be mathematically correct, a plan representing a section of the telegraphic plateau, in which the water-depth at the deepest part was given as half an inch, would have required to be at least 33 feet long: on the scale on which the water-depth is depicted above, the picture, to be correct, ought to be over 100 feet long. We trust that this inaccuracy will not prove more deceptive to our youthful reader than more equally inaccurate but delightful scientific toys called arrerics.

THE "AGAMEMNON" LAYING THE CABLE.

THE illustration given above depicts the Agamemnon in the terrible storm she encountered in laying the cable. How severe the gale was may be inferred from the following telegram from Valentia to the London Times:

"From the time the Agamemnon left Queenstown, on the 18th of July, until she joined the rest of the squadron at the rendezvous in mid ocean on the 29th, she experienced a continued succession of heavy winds. The splice was successfully made on the afternoon of the 29th, and the ships started toward their several stations. On the evening of the same day a breach of continuity occurred in the cable which lasted one hour and a half.

"The ship was stopped and the machinery repaired, though not till hopes of holding on the cable had been abandoned. During Friday it blew a head gale of wind, against which the ship, under her full steam, could hardly make way, even with yards and topmasts struck. On Saturday, the 31st, the wind shifted round to the southwest, and during that day, Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday, it continued to blow hard, with frequent violent squalls, the sea running tremendously high the whole time, and no one expected the cable to hold on from one minute to the other. On Wednesday the weather moderated, but the swell was still high. About four A.M. the change from the lower to the upper cable was successfully made, and during the afternoon shallow water was gained. The second change from the upper to the orlop deck coil was made about nine o'clock in the evening; after which all went well until the ship anchored at six A.M. in Doulas Bay."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH—FIRE-WORKS AT THE CITY HALL IN COMMEMORATION OF THE LAYING OF THE CABLE.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ILLUMINATION AT THE CITY HALL.

We engrave on the preceding page the illumination of the City Hall, New York, on Tuesday, 17th inst., in honor of the success of the Telegraph enterprise. The following account of the scene is from the Herald:

"At a quarter to eight o'clock a handsome balloon was sent off from the roof of the Hall, which announced to the impatient mass that 'the fire-works' would, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather during the afternoon, be 'let off.' A cheer announced its flight to the aerial regions, and rocket after rocket succeeded. From the roof of the Hall showers of rockets, which attained an incredible altitude, succeeded, when the City Hall, like the transformation of a fairy castle, became a 'palace of light.' All the windows were simultaneously illuminated, and, with the aid of three thousand seven hundred candles, the Hall of 'the City Fathers' shone resplendent in the surrounding gloom. A shout of admiration followed, and cheers for the 'cable' succeeded. Dodworth's Band, which were stationed on a commodious stand near the east gate, then struck up 'Hail Columbia,' which was followed by 'God Save the Queen,' and they continued during the night to play popular and enlivening airs. At each gate crimson, green, and other fires were ignited, and until the close of the evening continued to burn brilliantly. Rockets, shells, balloons of candles, shells with colored stars, colored bengaloes, and flights were then fired from the roof of the Hall, until it presented the appearance of a roaring crater, subduing its outpourings occasionally, and presenting the appearance of a smoking Vesuvius. Some idea of the roaring fire may be conveyed when we state that upward of four thousand rockets were fired together, with a large quantity of shells, carrying five colored fires each, and an innumerable quantity of sky rockets and serpents, the latter frequently dispersing a number of the gentler sex who had assembled on the balconies. During the pyrotechnic display from the roof numerous fire balloons ascended from the front of the Hall, causing the utmost excitement among the youngsters."

LITERARY.

One of those rarely delightful books, that mark days in the memory of readers, is the Memoir and Letters of the late Thomas Seddon, Artist, published in England by Nisbet & Co. Seddon was a young painter, belonging to the Pre-Raphaelite school in England, the intimate friend and companion of Hunt. He had never achieved fame, but he had a warm heart and the noblest aspirations. He visited the East, painted in Cairo and Jerusalem, returned to England, married the lady of his love, went abroad again, and died suddenly in Cairo a little more than a year ago.

The book is by no means an ordinary biography. The author, or editor, with commendable judgment, has suffered Seddon's letters to tell his brief, sad story. They relate it most eloquently. He wrote many letters home from the East, many to the lady who is now his widow. They are the letters of a poet-artist. Nowhere can be found more perfect sketches of Eastern life than he gives. With his pen as with his pencil a touch sufficed to place an image on the paper. Eastern travelers especially will enjoy these notes.

We have not the space to outline that life whose beauty and perfectness shine on these pages. He was a man of rare mould. Gentle to a fault, kind and loving, trusting every man, winning kindness wherever he went by his own irresistible kindness to all, and just as his name began to be known in his own country, he died on the bank of the Nile, alone, among strangers, but lamented by them with the sincerity of earnest admiration and affection.

A few extracts from the letters of Mr. Seddon must suffice for the present:

"I heard," he says, "a capital story on Friday evening, at Mr. B——'s, of a dandified attaché at Constantinople, who traveled into Koordistan, intending to copy Layard, and write a book. He was what he called roughing it, with six or seven horses carrying his necessaries, i.e., a few things he could not possibly do without. Among them were the wooden frames for cleaning his boots and shoes, and a case of bottles, of a peculiarly fine varnish, for his polished leathers. He was attacked by the Arabs, who overhauled his kit. When they came to the bottles they opened them, and the varnish being made with Maderia, and scented with all sorts of good things, it smelt so nice that the thieves thought it must be something to drink. In vain did he explain that it was paint for his boots. They were sure that it was too delicious for that, and, in order to try, he should drink some. So they took out one of his own cut-glass tumblers, and made him drink a glass of his own boot varnish!"

Here is not a bad Chinese story, which he picked up in Cairo:

"Mr. B—— related an anecdote to show the contempt of the Chinese for death. When he was in China three robbers had been arrested and were put into a cell in the guard-house; and in the morning the keepers came to say that they had all three hanged themselves, and wished him to come and see them. He went and found the cells occupying the sides of a large room and opening into a corridor, where a policeman walked up and down all night. The only thing in the cell was a pail, and they were constantly visited by the policeman, who looked in at the door. The window was a small round hole, seven or eight feet from the ground, with an iron bar across it. They had turned the pail over and tied a noose around the bar. One then got up and hanged himself. The others then took him down and laid him on the floor. The second did the same, and the third, after taking him down, got up and put his head in the noose, merely slipped his feet off the pail, and died without a single movement, for his legs were hanging on each side of the pail, which was not kicked over. This they had done so noiselessly that neither the prisoners in the next cell nor the keepers had heard any movement."

Just outside the walls of Cairo, on the broad road to Fostat, or old Cairo, is a little cemetery inclosed in high walls, where a few English and American dead sleep in peace, the peace that attends death in all countries. Poor Seddon helped bury a friend there but a little while before he was carried there himself. His grave is marked by a marble slab. The spot is one an artist might choose for a resting-place. To the east, the crumbling mosques which stand on the desert under the Mohattam hills; to the south, the group of buildings among which rests stout Ibrahim Pasha; to the north, the palm groves of Cairo the Blessed; and on the west, calm and solemn, against the sunset sky, the pyramids of Ghizeh.

Better late than never to call attention to Hugh Miller's Cruise of the "Betsey," published in this country by Gould & Lincoln, Boston. The lamented author left this work among his literary remains. To it are added various sketches and rambles, which have also been published in newspapers, but never collected in a volume, and which are, of course, heretofore wholly unknown in America.

Hugh Miller was a hearty Scotchman—learned, but not pedantic, full of life, and full of love for the good things which life has in abundant store for the cheerful receiver. No man was better fitted to enjoy a yacht voyage or a summer geological ramble. The story of his cruise is the story of a great and good man taking his pleasure, and gaining instruction as he goes along. At the same time there is that magnificent appreciation of the beautiful which we sometimes think no one ever had but Hugh Miller and Wilson, shining on every page. One of the most touching passages that he has ever written is here found, in an account of a visit to a spot where he passed his eighteenth and nineteenth years working as a stone-mason. He recalls his youth; he looks at the stones he hewed; he remembers that, while he was at work on this one, some one came and told him of the death of Napoleon the Great. He finds forests grown up where he had left shrubs; and turning for a while from rock and mountain, the great geologist finds "the fossils of an early formation of mind, produced at a period when the atmosphere of feeling was warmer than now, and the immaturities of the mental kingdom grew rank and large, like the ancient cryptogamiæ." There is more of Hugh Miller himself in the book than in all of his former works together; and who would know the man must read it, and will then re-read it.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

This great enterprise is at length perfectly successful. Both the Queen's and the President's messages have been transmitted, as well as others on the business of the Company. On 1st September it is intended to open the line for general business. The event has been celebrated with more hearty and general enthusiasm than was ever known to pervade this country.

THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

The following was the message of the Queen:

To the President of the United States, Washington:

The Queen desires to congratulate the President upon the successful completion of this great international work, in which the Queen has taken the deepest interest.

The Queen is convinced that the President will join with her in fervently hoping that the Electric Cable which now connects Great Britain with the United States will prove an additional link between the nations whose friendship is founded upon their common interest and reciprocal esteem.

The Queen has much pleasure in thus communicating with the President, and renewing to him her wishes for the prosperity of the United States.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

Washington City, Aug. 16, 1858.

To Her Majesty Victoria, Queen of Great Britain:

The President cordially reciprocates the congratulations of Her Majesty, the Queen, on the success of the great international enterprise accomplished by the science, skill, and indomitable energy of the two countries. It is a triumph more glorious, because far more useful to mankind, than was ever won by conqueror on the field of battle.

May the Atlantic Telegraph, under the blessing of Heaven, prove to be a bond of perpetual peace and friendship between the kindred nations, and an instrument destined by Divine Providence to diffuse religion, civilization, liberty, and law throughout the world. In this view will not all nations of Christendom spontaneously unite in the declaration that it shall be forever neutral, and that its communications shall be held sacred in passing to their places of destination, even in the midst of hostilities. (Signed) James Buchanan.

THE LAST FROM VALENTIA.

Mr. Field sent a dispatch on Wednesday last to England. The following reply was received on Friday from Valentia Bay:

"Valentia, Thursday, Aug. 19, 1858.

"C. W. Field, N. Y.,—The Directors have just met. They heartily congratulate you on your success. The Agamemnon arrived at Valentia at six o'clock, A.M., on Thursday, Aug. 5. We are just on the point of chartering a ship to lay the shore ends. No time will be lost in sending them out. All your letters have been posted to New York. Please write me fully about the tariff and other working arrangements. G. Saward."

The following dispatches from Trinity Bay and Carbonear were received on Saturday by Cyrus W. Field, Esq.:

"Carbonear, Thursday, Aug. 19, 1858.

"The cable is working beautifully to-day. I reach Cyrus Station this evening. A. Mackay."

"Trinity Bay, Thursday, Aug. 19, 1858.

"We sent a very explicit message this morning to Mr. M'Iver, Agent of Cunard steamers, in Liverpool, respecting the disaster to the steamship Europa.

"De Santy."

FUSION CONVENTION IN ULSTER.

A large assemblage of the electors of Ulster County met in Mass Convention last week at Kingston, and inaugurated the movement for the fusion of the American and Republican parties as against the Administration, by adopting a series of resolutions declaratory of the grounds of their hostility to the Democratic party, and affirming a series of principles on which, it is hoped by them, all the Americans and Republicans in the State may, with propriety, unite. The Convention was addressed by Hons. Joel T. Headley, Horace Greeley, and Mr. Westbrook.

MICHIGAN REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

The Republican State Convention assembled in Detroit on 20th, and made the following nominations: For Governor, Moses Wisner, of Oakland County; for Lieutenant-Governor, Edwin B. Fairfield, of Hillsdale; for Secretary of State, Nelson G. Isbell, of Livingston; for State Treasurer, John M'Kinney, of Van Buren; for Auditor, General Daniel L. Case, of Ingham; for Commissioner of Land Office, James W. Sanboen, of St. Clair; for Attorney-General, Jacob M. Howard, of Wayne; for Superintendent of Public Instruction, John M. Gregory, of Washtenaw; for Member of Board of Education, Walter J. Baxter, of Hillsdale. Resolutions were passed re-adopting the Philadelphia platform of 1856, condemning the National Administration, indorsing the present State Administration and our representatives in Congress, and, in view of the late annexation of the Old World to the New, declaring that it is the duty of the Federal Government to adopt measures for the construction of a railroad to the Pacific.

THE PRESIDENT WAITING HIS TURN AT A WASH-BOWL.

The Baltimore Sun contains the following: "On Saturday last President Buchanan arrived at the Relay House, or Washington Junction, as it is more properly called, en route for Washington city. On passing into the bar-room the President threw off his coat and his white neckcloth, carelessly pitching them over a chair, opened his shirt-collar, and tucked up his sleeves for a wash, conveniences for this purpose being in the apartment. At the time, however, both basins were occupied by two young men, neither of whom seemed to be aware that the President was about. He waited patiently some time, when some one spoke and invited him up stairs. He declined, however, quietly remarking that he would 'wait for his turn.' And as soon as the basins were vacated he 'took his turn' in a jolly good wash in the public bar-room. This done, he seemed rather perplexed about the arrangement of his neckcloth, and seemed likely to tie his nose and mouth up in it. Somebody just then offered assistance, and the President was briefly equipped. At about this time a person who had come into the room sung out pretty near to him, 'Look here, I thought the old Pres. was to be here to-day—' The speech was cut short by a nudge, while a momentary comical expression passed across the face of that same 'old Pres.' A cigar was handed to him by a friend; he took a good, satisfying drink of—not 'old rye,' but ice-water, and barely fired up the cigar, when the bell rung, and 'all aboard!' summoned the Chief Magistrate of the United States to his seat in the cars, and away they went to Washington."

COST OF KISSING.

The Boston Courier says: "Mr. Barrows, principal of the High School in Palmer, Massachusetts, recently bestowed a kiss upon a handsome female assistant—a fact not very remarkable, nor apparently involving any great wickedness. But somebody saw it done and told the School Committee. It is fair to infer that the individuals composing that body are 'superannuated fogies,' who have long ago forgotten what a kiss is, for they expelled Mr. Barrows from his school. Public sympathy is with the schoolmaster, however; for he has been indorsed by two clergymen, and the people of one section of the town threaten to set up a school on their own account and employ Mr. B., if the School Committee refuse to reinstate him in his former position."

NARROW ESCAPE OF A YOUNG LADY.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer describes a thrilling scene at Atlantic City a few days since, owing to the perilous position of Miss T——, of Senator Slidell's family, who with Mr. Bonneville, from New Orleans, while bathing, got beyond the surf:

"The lady said she was sinking, and Mr. B., who could not swim, found himself helpless in his efforts to rescue her. I was a spectator of the scene. The gentleman struggled and sunk, but the young lady appeared to be floating easily, and rapidly went out with the receding tide. When the peril of these bathers was fully appreciated, the shrieks of females and the cries of men added to the general alarm. The case seemed hopeless, for there was no boat, no cord, no stick, by which it could be deemed safe to approach the suffering parties.

"Still some bold hearts went to work, and by great effort succeeded in catching Mr. B., who was dragged, apparently lifeless, upon the beach. Even after this was done, the lady still floating onward, but by the energy of Mr. Clayton was aroused from a state of syncope, and made to seize a plank, by which she was drawn to the beach. Her preservation was miraculous, for having learned the rules for floating, she threw herself into the proper position before she became insensible, and thus her body kept upon the surface of the wave. Had she clung to her companion, both must have been drowned."

A MOCKING-BIRD IN COURT.

Two years ago, a man named Clinger brought a valuable mocking-bird from New Orleans to a Western city, and gave it in charge to his father. Subsequently, the elder Clinger, falling out with his son, handed over the bird to his son-in-law, named Yager, to cheat the son; and he, after a while, to keep it from the father-in-law, gave it to a man named Walman, on Western row. The bird was passed from one to another, as the various members of the family fell out by the way. The father finally got track of the songster, and went after it, but the daughter-in-law had been too fleet for him, and carried off the prize. Herself and husband then reported that the bird had died, and as an evidence produced a head and some feathers, which were shown to the neighbors as belonging to the "poor, dear, dead and gone." The same night, however, on which the bird was said to have taken its flight to the spiritual bird-kingdom, Yager sold a mocking-bird to a friend, but whether it was the same member of the feathered tribe in dispute, or not, was a question.

The son asserted that it was, and replevined the bird, and the other day the whole family appeared before Justice Harris, and testified. The bird, too, was brought into court, and whistled and sung, and mocked the lawyers, quite in contempt of all rules or legal tribunals. The father contradicted the son, and he in turn the father, in giving their testimony. The son-in-law and his wife both swore that the bird in court was not the bird in controversy, but that the original had actually died while in their possession. The bird sold by them, Yager stated he had purchased for four dollars, of a mysterious individual, whom he happened to meet of a dark night, in Walnut Street. Other witnesses testified that they thought the bird in court was the one brought to this city by Clinger. It had the same peculiar tail, the feathers, head, neck, and general appearance. And all the while the bird kept up a continual chatter, as though endeavoring to harmonize the dispute.

The magistrate was puzzled. It was his first bird case since he assumed the honors, and there were no precedents in the books. As the son-in-law and his wife, however, both swore positively to the death of the original bird, he gave judgment for the bird, and assessed the value at $5 50. So Clinger retained possession under his replevin writ, and paid the judgment and costs, which amounted to $17. As the bird was valued at $50, he expressed himself perfectly satisfied, and carried off his songster in triumph.

MAN EATEN BY A FISH.

The body of a man was picked up near Eastport, Maine, one day last week, with a line around his wrist, to a hook on the end of which a large halibut was attached. As an empty boat had been picked up the day before, it is supposed the man had been hauled overboard from it by the fish.

ENCOUNTER WITH A RATTLESNAKE.

A correspondent of the Salisbury (North Carolina) Watchman, writing from Lenoir, Watauga County, narrates the following incident:

"As Mr. James M. Spainhour, of this place, was riding along near the foot of Blue Ride, on the north side, in Watauga County, and near the river of the same name, on the 20th ult., he had the following very singular and rather dangerous encounter with a rattlesnake:

"As there was a light mist, Mr. S. had his umbrella spread above him. He was riding near a bank on the right hand, higher than his head, occasioned by digging away the earth below, in grading the road.

"Suddenly he heard the ring of the rattlesnake in the direction of the bank, and on looking around saw the snake in the act of springing toward him. It alighted, however, on the top of his umbrella, fastening its fangs in the cloth and tearing out his hold. His weight hove down the umbrella, and he fell off so near the lower edge of the road that in an instant he was over the stone wall supporting the road, and glided out of sight in the thicket below."

PEEPING TOM IN LUCK.

The following is from the Pittsburgh Dispatch: "At Murdocksville some young ladies had selected a shady nook, and were enjoying a river bath, when two young fellows, strolling in the woods, heard an unusual plashing in the water, and, 'following their ears,' were amazed and—shall we say it?—delighted, on turning a sharp bend in the river, to behold the water-nymphs floating in the rippling current, fairer than the naiads, and more enchanting than sirens. Concealing themselves, one of the rascals wagered thirty dollars on the swimming powers of a flaxen-haired divinity against a small dark-eyed beauty—the two being the leaders of the party, and the most expert swimmers. The wager was accepted; the two had struck out for a long swim, a strong swim, and a swim altogether, when the 'fair-haired she' shrieked, 'A turtle! a turtle!' and, terribly frightened, sank under the surface.

"It was a struggle between gallantry and duty with the young men; but the one who had accepted the challenge leaped from his hiding-place into the stream, and striking out boldly, succeeded in seizing the insensible and drowning girl, and dragged her to the shore. Of course the remainder of the party had fled, but soon returned, took charge of the nearly inanimate form, and restored her to consciousness. In consideration of the service performed the young fellows were granted absolution. The heroic rescuer of the young lady, however, claimed the thirty dollars, on the score that his nymph had fairly won the match. If it is not dusted up, the young men propose that the ladies shall try it again."

PINED AWAY.

A Cincinnati paper says: "A few months ago, a gentleman residing in the interior of the State, returned from California, bringing with him a little prattling Indian girl, a sweet interesting creature as ever proved a 'well-spring of pleasure' in a household. It was rumored that the mother of the child was an Indian woman, and the father a white man. How that may be, we know not; such, at least, was the supposition. The gentleman, for some reason, did not care to have the child remain in his family, and brought her to this city and placed her in the Orphan Asylum, and promised to call often to see her. For a few days the life surrounding her seemed to furnish sufficient entertainment, but it was soon apparent that something was lacking to satisfy her mind entirely—a void which could only be filled by the presence of some one whom she had learned to call 'papa.' She became listless and melancholy, and the sports of the children failed to please or interest. Visitors to the Asylum patted the little 'Pocahontas,' as she was called, but their attention scarcely ever rallied her spirits. Constantly upon her tongue was the name of 'papa.' She grew weary and tired, and gradually faded like a flower of her own mountains in autumn. There was no apparent disease, but a perceptible wasting away of the natural energies. The gentleman who left her at the Asylum had never called to see his little charge, and although she was nourished and cared for with all the tenderness possible, she slowly drooped, until a few days since, when she died—with the last fleeting breath still murmuring the name of 'papa,' as she had frequently done in her dreams."

DEATH OF A CHILD FROM HYDROPHOBIA.

The Peoria (Illinois), Transcript gives an account of the death, by hydrophobia, of a very interesting child, the daughter of Mr. Henry S. Wooder, of Mount Hawley, six miles from that city, between eight and nine years of age, on Friday morning last. The following are the particulars:

On Tuesday of last week, Sarah Ellen returned from school, and complained of feeling unwell, so much so, that she did not attend on the following day, although still able to be about the house. Thursday she was no better, and her parents thinking she was threatened with the typhoid fever, sent for Dr. Murphy, of this city. The Doctor arrived there about two o'clock in the afternoon, and found her sitting upon the sofa at the side of her mother, to all appearances in perfect health; her pulse, however, was very irregular, with an occasional wildness in the eyes, and placing her hand upon her throat, exclaimed, "It troubles me to breathe, mother." Minute inquiries were now instituted, when the fact was elicited which had not been previously thought of, that some five weeks since she had been bitten by a domesticated cat on the outside of her foot. A glass of water was ordered to be brought her, when the sight of it at once threw her into terrible convulsions. This was at two o'clock in the afternoon, and was the first intimation had by her distracted parents of the terrible disease with which their daughter was afflicted. Her agony and struggles in the spasms were awful to behold, and in one of them she bit her mother severely in the shoulder, and at another time scratched the father badly in the hand. In her spasmodic efforts, the saliva from her mouth was at times ejected across the room, and the only relief experienced was by the use of chloroform, which in the end seemed to lose all efficacy. She remained all the time in perfect possession of her faculties, and at three o'clock on Friday morning, exactly twelve hours from the attack of the first spasm, her spirit departed to the God who gave it.

And now comes the most remarkable incident connected with this heart-rending affair. Some four hours previous to her death, and soon after one of her most violent spasms, she told her mother that she had been visited by the spirit of her sister (the family are believers in Spiritualism), who left this earth for the better land about one year since, and that this sister had informed her of certain remedies, which, if applied, would relieve her sufferings and smooth her passage to the tomb. The remedies were applied as soon as possible, and, strange to relate, the desired effect was produced. She was freed from her convulsive fits, was enabled to breathe easier, converse freely with her parents and friends, occasionally drinking a little water, and finally falling into her last sleep as gently as an infant reposing in her slumber.

BANK-NOTES AT TEN CENTS A YARD.

The Memphis Avalanche, giving an account of the failure of the Citizens' Bank in that city, mentions the following among the incidents of the day: "When the crowd gathered around, composed mostly of mechanics and working men, with here and there a woman, and at intervals a poor market-man, we observed a little fellow with a wonderfully exaggerated nose, who had a package of the Bowleg's notes in his hands. Some one asked him how much he had; he said, 'these bills, amounting to $300, are the profits of my labor for the last six months—look at my hard hands, and see how I have toiled; I have a wife and children, for whom I must buy bread, and for whom I must provide a shelter and a home; but, gentlemen, it is all gone. They may be houseless wanderers and homeless beggars if I should knuckle to this misfortune. It is all gone.' The little gentleman with the Slaukenbergius nose, which we read about in Tristram Shandy, at this point in his speech 'humped' himself, and began to lay his wild-cat bills in a row down in the centre of the street. When they were thus distributed, he turned to the crowd, saying, 'Gentlemen and ladies, I will sell this —— infernal stuff at ten cents a yard, tape measure.' The crowd roared, and good-humor was thus substituted for the angry feelings for some time manifested, and which, by any accident, might have resulted in the demolition of the bank building."

PERSONAL.

The Tribune says: "The fact that Miss Margaretta Fox, one of the family in which the 'Rochester Rappings,' so called, were first known to have occurred, is united with the Roman Catholic Church in this city, has been blazoned in several journals, in terms which clearly imply an impeachment on her part of the integrity and truthfulness of her mother and sister with regard to these 'Rappings.' There is no possible warrant for this. Miss Fox continues to reside with her mother and younger sister (who were present at her baptism last Sunday into the Church to whose doctrines she has for some time been a convert), and has never dreamed of saying or implying that any of her family were guilty of fraud or deception in the matter of the 'Rappings.' She has not herself officiated as a 'medium' for many months past; but D.

D. Hume, who has likewise become a Catholic, is still the most famous and powerful 'medium' in Europe if not in the world."

We learn from the Cincinnati Gazette of the 17th inst. that Mrs. Harrison, widow of President Harrison, was very ill at the residence of her son, the Hon. J. Scott Harrison, about twenty miles from Cincinnati. It was feared that she would not survive many hours.

A New York correspondent of the Boston Gazette writes: "You remember the story about 'John Dean and his Mary Ann' (Boker)—poor girl, her romance is turned into a miserable reality. He, as I stated some time since, is a marker in the custom-house, and they now occupy the second floor of a house over a corner grocery store on Second and South Third streets, Williamsburg, surrounded by tumble-down shanties and beggarly-looking tenement houses. The only sign of refinement in the apartment is a piano, which the young lady continually strums upon, to the great annoyance of her neighbors; for, truth to say, she is by no means a Thalberg."

On Monday morning as Mr. Staigg, the artist, and Mr. Henry T. Tuckerman, the author, were bathing at Newport, the latter became disabled. They had been swimming on a race, beyond their depth, and Mr. Staigg's skill and strength, it is probable, alone rescued Mr. Tuckerman from a watery grave. Hearing his companion's cry of distress, he sustained him until assistance was no longer needed, and Mr. Tuckerman was taken home, where he was quite ill for a day or two afterward. The accident is attributed to sun-stroke, or, perhaps, to over-exercise in the water.

General Pierce and lady are now in the south of France, and would arrive in a few days at Paris. The distinguished traveler will be the guest of the American Minister, Mr. Mason.

Among the passengers for Liverpool by the Persia, Wednesday, was Colonel Thomas Alsop, the alleged would-be assassin of Louis Napoleon.

Miss Jane Lloyd, only child of Jones Lloyd, Lord Overstone, the wealthiest of English heiresses, is to be married to Colonel Lindsey, the "hero of the Alma," who was lucky enough to get nine Russian balls fired into the colors which he carried, without receiving one into his own body. The fortune of Miss Lloyd is stated by the London Illustrated News to be from twenty-five to thirty million dollars.

The Richmond Enquirer says: "We learn, with pleasure, that Bishop M'Gill, of Richmond, has received from Archbishop Hughes, of New York, a present of a magnificent pair of carriage horses, as beautiful in action as they are to look upon."

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Parliament has been prorogued.

The Commissioners for signifying the royal assent to various bills and proroguing the two Houses of Parliament were the Lord Chancellor and three other Lords. The commission having been read, the royal assent was given in the usual form to a number of bills. The Lord Chancellor then proceeded to read Her Majesty's Message, which, as usual, is unmeaning and ungrammatical.

SENSATION PRODUCED BY THE SUCCESS OF THE TELEGRAPH.

At latest dates great anxiety was felt in regard to the Atlantic cable. The first regular message from Newfoundland was received at Valentia on the night of the 9th inst. The speed of transmission is said to be greater than was attained at Plymouth, and the currents were apparently as strong. The shares continued to be quoted at £900. The principal papers give long accounts of the voyage of the Agamemnon. The Times asks whether it would not be worthy of the nation to confer rewards upon her officers and crew.

DEATH OF MONSIEUR SOYER.

We (Morning Post) regret to announce the death of M. Soyer, whose name, in connection with the culinary art, has, for some years past, been familiar to the English reader. The immediate cause of the death of M. Soyer was, we are informed, renal apoplexy. He had, for some months past, been suffering from indisposition, and sought quiet and repose at Norwood, whence he returned on Wednesday last, complaining, however, of general weakness and bodily derangement. M. Soyer shortly after became insensible, and continued in that state up to the moment of his death, which took place on Thursday night a little before ten, at 15 Marlborough Road, St. John's Wood.

Without referring to the consideration of M. Soyer's merits in connection with the art with which his name is associated, we may state that his energy and skill exercised a most beneficial influence upon the health of the troops in the Crimea, and that within a very recent period he has been engaged in organizing a system for improving the soldiers' mess in barracks. In addition to a kind heart and lively disposition, which secured him many friends, M. Soyer possessed much general information, which he turned to a profitable account in the various works on the culinary art published by him during his residence in this country. He has passed from the busy world, carrying with him the respect and esteem of a very large and influential circle of acquaintance.

CORPSES THREE HUNDRED YEARS OLD.

A correspondent of the New York Evangelist, now in London, gives the following curious narrative of his visit to the vaults of the Church of St. Sepulchre, in that city:

"A strange sight was recently disclosed to me in St. Sepulchre, one of the oldest, if not the very oldest, church edifice in this city. It stands opposite Old Bailey, the hoary old prison, and not far from St. Paul's Cathedral. This church was partially destroyed by the great fire in London, but early rebuilt. It is an immense edifice, with a very wealthy parish, yet only two or three hundred persons are ever in attendance at their place of worship. Beneath the church are a series of great burial vaults, where interments have been made for many hundred years. The sexton told me it was estimated there were fifteen hundred coffins now entire under the building, and, from an examination, I have no doubt of its truth.

"The atmosphere of the vaults seems to have a remarkable effect in preserving the coffins, if not the bodies, from decay. Descending through an iron door from the church, the other day, we entered a very large apartment, but dimly lighted, where piles of mouldy, black-looking coffins were placed upon each other. These coffins, with their elegant and costly trimmings, had not been decomposed. Climbing up over a heap of them, the sexton opened a large wooden box, and out of it took an entire female figure, in a remarkable state of preservation! The limbs were unbroken, and the body perfect, except the flesh shrunken, yet it was still soft and flexible to the touch. The sexton stated that the officers of the church had recently been examining the vaults, and as burials there had long since ceased, they designed to close the entrance. Before doing so, they had been making a careful survey of the premises, and, under a mass of rubbish in one corner, they found a stone inclosure—a sort of sarcophagus—out of which this female figure was taken. It is believed to be over three centuries old, and evidently, from its position and the stone inclosure, it was a female of rank. It was a strange sight in this subterranean charnel-house, with blackened coffins piled up to the high ceiling all around, to see this entire human figure raised up bodily from its resting-place, and standing erect upon a coffin before you! The fact of its existence is probably known to but few persons; and before this reaches you, the entrance to it will be closed to all further inspection."

JUDAS-HOLES.

A letter lately appeared in the London Times, written by a father of a family, who warned his country-women against becoming the victims of a disgusting practice which is stated to prevail, and, we fear, does unquestionably prevail, in many Continental hotels. There are found men sufficiently degraded, and sufficiently audacious, to bore holes in the door, wainscoting, or ceiling of bedrooms, through which they may look, in order to see the ladies within at their toilet. It is said that these holes, which bear the appropriate name of Trous-Judas, are specially designed to enable the wretches to study the toilets of English women—either because the unconscious subjects of the treachery are in this case fairer, or because their more scrupulous habits of cleanliness make their toilet longer and more unguarded, or because the traitors enjoy the malignant satisfaction of thinking that their insular modesty would be more deeply shocked if they could but know what was going on. However this may be, English women are represented as the favorite victims, and as attention has been drawn to the practice by a vehicle so public and so widely circulated, it is impossible any longer to ignore the existence of these "Judas-Holes." Many English ladies will feel very uncomfortable henceforth, and will cast glances of apprehension around them while they are going through the inevitable process which must begin and end every day of Continental travel.

THE ADVANTAGE OF PADDING ONE'S CHEST.

While Lord Ward was inspecting the troops at the review of the Worcester Yeomanry, lately, one of the horses kicked his lordship on his chest. Fortunately, the costume of the regiment required that there should be some padding in the breast of the gallant commander's coat, and to this circumstance may be attributed his lordship's freedom from serious consequences. Although the kick was sufficient to prostrate Lord Ward, his lordship soon recovered his feet, and did not seriously suffer from the blow.

FRANCE.

THE FÊTES AT CHERBOURG.

On the arrival of her Majesty, in the Victoria and Albert, at Cherbourg, on the 5th, a royal salute was fired by the whole of the French fleet and the forts. Shortly afterward the Emperor visited her Majesty on board the royal yacht. The harbor and roadstead were crowded with steamers and yachts, exhibiting the gayest colors. Great enthusiasm prevailed, and the illuminations at night were most brilliant and extensive. The Queen and Prince Consort were to breakfast at the Prefecture with the Emperor at twelve yesterday, and their Majesties were to dine together on board the Bretagne.

The Paris Moniteur of the 5th contains the following:

"Cherbourg, August 4, 35 minutes past 6 p.m.

"The journey of their Majesties, favored by beautiful weather, continues to be performed under agreeable circumstances. The imperial train, which left Caen at twelve o'clock, arrived at Bayeux at thirty-five minutes after twelve. Their Majesties received the authorities of the town in the saloon of the station. A piece of lace was presented to the Empress by the young ladies of the place. Their Majesties entered a carriage and went to the cathedral, where they were received by the Bishop at the head of his clergy. The line was formed by the firemen and detachments of the rural communes. At Carentan the august travelers were received with enthusiasm. The Emperor examined with great interest the models of the horses of the Cotentin, which were presented to him. The imperial train arrived at Cherbourg at five o'clock. The station presented an admirable coup d'œil. Their Majesties were received with the loudest acclamations. The Mayor of Cherbourg presented the Emperor with the keys of the town. An altar was raised in the middle of the station. The Bishop of Cotances, surrounded with his clergy, intoned the Te Deum, which was followed by the reception of the authorities. Their Majesties entered the town amidst the immense body of people who had collected on their road."

PROGRAMME OF THE FESTIVITIES.

The following was the programme drawn up by the civil and military authorities for the reception of the Emperor and Empress, and the celebration of the several days of their stay in Cherbourg:

August 4. Their Majesties will be received at the railway station by the authorities, civil, naval, and military.

The keys of the town will be presented to his Majesty by the Mayor and the Municipal Council.

The benediction and inauguration of the railway will take place in presence of their Majesties.

All the land and sea forces will be under arms; they will be placed in rank from the railway station to the Hotel of the Prefecture. The arrival of their Majesties will be announced by a salute of artillery.

All the ships of the squadron, as well as the forts of the road, and Forts Ouglet and L'Amiral, will be decorated with flags; all the buildings of the port will also hoist their respective flags.

On the arrival of their Majesties at the Prefecture the Empress will receive the wives of the principal officials, and the young ladies deputed to offer her Majesty a corbeille of flowers and lace.

The public offices, the ships of the squadron, and the breakwater will be illuminated every evening during the stay of their Majesties.

The officers and public functionaries are requested to illuminate their residences and decorate them with flags.

August 5. This day being reserved by the Emperor and Empress for the reception, on board the Bretagne, of her Majesty the Queen of England, a future order will be issued as to the proceedings of the day.

The regatta will take place in the road of Cherbourg, in the presence of the united naval forces and the Royal Yacht Squadron.

August 6. This day their Majesties will visit the ships of the squadron in the road, and land on the breakwater.

August 7. Their Majesties will leave the Hôtel of the Prefecture in the morning, and pass through the town and environs. At noon their Majesties will proceed to the military port to open the grand inner basin of the works.

In the evening a ball will be given to the Emperor and Empress by the town of Cherbourg at the Hôtel de Ville.

August 8. At nine o'clock in the morning the Emperor will inaugurate the equestrian statue of Napoleon.

The departure of their Majesties is fixed for two o'clock p.m.

SPEECHES OF THE SOVEREIGNS.

The Queen and Prince Consort were entertained at dinner by the Emperor of the French, on board the line-of-battle ship Le Bretagne.

The Emperor, in proposing the health of her Majesty and the Royal Family of England, made a speech, in which he said: "I am happy to be enabled to express the sentiments by which I am actuated upon this occasion of the Queen's visit to Cherbourg. The facts do indeed speak for themselves, and prove that the hostile passions which were excited by some unfortunate incidents have never been able to alter the friendship which exists between the two countries, or the desire of the people to remain at peace. I have, therefore, the fond hope that if any attempt were made to revive again the rancors of a former period, such attempt would be foiled with the good sense of the public, as the waves are baffled by yonder breakwater, which at this moment serves to protect the squadrons of both empires against the violence of the sea."

The Prince Consort, on behalf of her Majesty, responded to the toast, in doing which he said:

"The Queen is most sensible of the words we have just heard, which will forever be dear to her. The Queen is doubly happy in having an opportunity by her presence here to join the Emperor in endeavoring to draw together as closely as possible the ties of friendship which exist between the two nations. That friendship has their mutual prosperity for its basis, and the blessings of Heaven will not be wanting to confirm it."

TERMINATION OF THE FÊTES.

Queen Victoria left on the 6th under a triple salute. The fêtes were continued on the 7th by the inauguration of the Napoleon dock and the launch of the man-of-war Ville de Nantes. The consumption of gunpowder during the fêtes was enormous. It was rumored that Napoleon will return Victoria's visit in a private friendly way at Osborne during the autumn. The Emperor had ordered a pyramid of granite to be erected at the head of the new dock to perpetuate the Queen's visit. The fêtes terminated on the 8th with the inauguration of the statues of Napoleon I. The Emperor delivered a pacific speech on the occasion, saying it appeared to be part of his destiny to accomplish by peace the great designs conceived during war. He said the Government would not wage war except in defense of the national honor and the great interests of the people. The Imperial visitors embarked for Brest on the 8th.

AMNESTY FOR THE PRESS.

It is stated positively that the Emperor, on the occasion of his fête, will publish a decree granting a full and free pardon for all offenses of the press previously committed. It is added that several of the restrictions by which the press is trammeled are to be removed, but all future offenses are to be punished with increased severity.

A QUEER STORY ABOUT THE EMPRESS.

The lofty and prominent station attained by that distinguished lady who shares the throne of France with Napoleon III. has attracted (says the Paris correspondent of the Morning Advertiser) public attention of late to some law proceedings which took place some time past at Valladolid and Arevallo—proceedings which throw some doubts upon the paternity of that illustrious lady. There has been a great demand for the Spanish law journals of 1827 and the following year. On searching through the files of that period we find the subjoined curious account of the nullity of a divorce pronounced in 1813 between a Spanish wife and husband:

"Don Joaquim de Montijo, captain of the regiment of Segovia, married, in 1810, Donna Maria de Penansande, belonging to a respectable family of Fontepelayo, near Segovia. Shortly after his marriage he was taken prisoner of war, and was carried off to France, whither he was followed by his wife as soon as she ascertained that he had obtained an appointment as commandant of prisoners of war, which made some addition to his pay. Although Donna Maria went to France in compliance with her husband's request, she does not appear to have lived happily with him. Dissensions soiled the domestic hearth; mutual recriminations, each charging the other with adultery, brought about a separation. Don Joaquim having lost his appointment in consequence of the removal of the prisoners of war from Bourges to Dijon, took service in the French army, being driven thereto by want. His wife, finding again that he had the means of supporting her, went to his regimental quarters, but was repelled by him with disdain, and refused admission. Their divorce was finally pronounced by the French law courts in November, 1813. On the return of Ferdinand VII. to Spain, Donna Maria returned to Fontepelayo with her son, aged two years and a half, and lived there for six years with her family. Her husband remained in France till 1820, when Ferdinand took oath to renew the Constitution of 1812. He then returned to Spain, and resided at his native town of Arevallo, where he had some property; from thence he wrote to his wife to claim his son. She refused to send the child. Don Joaquim went to exercise his paternal right, but Donna Maria refused to give him up. Don Joaquim returned home without his child; but after a few weeks he went back to Fontepelayo, fell in love again with his wife, and proposed that they should live together again and say nothing about the divorce, which was known only to her family and his brothers. She returned with him to Arevallo, and there resided with him until October 30, 1823, when he died from the effects of a fall from his horse.

HER MOTHER'S TROUBLES.

"Her son inherited his father's property under the guardianship of his mother, who continued to reside at Arevallo. We say her son, because, although at the death of Don Joaquim she had a daughter, aged nine months, the child died shortly after the death of its father. In the year 1830 she had also the misfortune to lose her son, and her grief was embittered by the conduct of her late husband's brothers, Don Antonio and Don Brantio de Montijo, who ordered her to leave their late brother's house, she having no right to call herself his widow, having by her infamous conduct necessitated a divorce. She refused to leave her house: proceedings were instituted before the Corregidor of Arevallo, Don Joaquim Beneito, who delivered his sentence on the 16th of June, 1827, that whereas a divorce had been pronounced in France in 1813, it had not been annulled by after cohabitation; consequently, in fault of heirs direct, she must restore the property of Don Joaquim de Montijo to his brothers. Against this sentence Donna Maria went to the Royal Chancery of Valladolid, and after many months' litigation the original judgment was quashed. 'Whereas Donna Maria de Penansande was married on June 8, 1810, to Don Joaquim de Montijo, and whereas the divorce was pronounced in a foreign country, then under the rule of a usurper, under a government as illegal as irreligious, and not recognized in Spain, and whereas such divorce had been annulled by the ultimate remorse of the parties, declares Donna Maria entitled to the life-interest in the property of her late husband, to revert to his brothers at her demise.'"

CHRONOLOGICAL DIFFICULTIES.

Now, dates are troublesome things. The French Moniteur, of the 4th June last, announced that the Empress Eugénie had attained her 32d year on the preceding day, and had received the congratulations of her friends on the occasion. According to the official Moniteur, therefore, the Empress Eugénie was born on the 3d of June, 1826, and according to the undisputed testimony of registers and other documentary evidence, her father died on October 30, 1823, from the effects of a fall from his horse. These things doubtless admit of explanation, but none has yet been given. Indeed, the French Gazette de Tribunaux of September 21, 1831, which contains the verbatum report of the cause célèbre, has been forcibly abstracted by Imperial ukase from the files of that journal which are kept for reference in the reading-room.

EXECUTIONS AT BORDEAUX.

Two executions took place at Bordeaux a few mornings ago, one of Desbat, for the murder of his aged father, and the other of Bonnecarrere, for the murder of a servant girl, to facilitate a robbery. On the evening before the executions the chaplain informed them that there was no chance of their lives being spared, but he did not say on what day they were likely to be executed. Desbat, who, since his condemnation, had paid great attention to his religious duties, manifested profound terror; but the other was calm, and, asking for pens and paper, passed a great part of the night in writing. At four o'clock in the morning the two men were told that their last day had arrived. Desbat exclaimed, "All is over then!" and sank fainting to the ground, while Bonnecarrere displayed no emotion whatever. Both attended Divine service in the chapel, and received the Sacrament. They were then pinioned, and Desbat, as is usual in cases of parricides, had his feet bared, his head covered with a black vail, and a white shirt put over his clothes. At about five o'clock Desbat was conveyed in a cart to the scaffold; he was so overcome with emotion that he had to be supported up the steps. On arriving on the platform he knelt, kissed a crucifix, and received the benediction of the chaplain. The executioners then came forward, and in a few seconds he was dead. The priest then went back to the prison, and presently returned in the cart with Bonnecarrere. This man, who, for some time after his condemnation, had turned religion into contempt, but had latterly manifested repentance, appeared to listen with great attention to what the ecclesiastic said. He ascended the steps of the scaffold firmly, and after kneeling for a few seconds, gave himself up to the executioners. It is calculated that not less than 20,000 persons were present, among whom were many women.

SPAIN.

THE QUEEN'S PROGRESS.

The Madrid journals of the 31st ult. do not yet record the arrival of the Queen at Gijon, but they publish telegraphic dispatches, stating that on the 30th ult. her Majesty, with the King and royal children, was at Mieres, in the Asturias. These dispatches add that in the Asturias the Queen was received with extraordinary enthusiasm, the people having flocked down from the mountains to see her Majesty, and that numerous triumphal arches were erected on the road on which she was to pass. At Pajares, on the way to Mieres, the illustrious personages partook of breakfast. It is related that at Leon the Queen appeared on a balcony to show the little Prince of the Asturias to the people, but that, as it was dusk they could not see him well, and accordingly her Majesty had a lighted candle brought and held up before his face. This little incident increased the popular enthusiasm. At Oviedo, where the Queen was to go after leaving Mieres, a triumphal arch was to be erected in loaves of bread; and after the Queen should have passed through it the bread should have been given to the poor. The palace in that town in which the Queen was to stay had been purchased by the municipality for presentation to the Prince of the Asturias.

GERMANY.

A NEW STYLE OF DUELING.

The Vienna correspondent of the Brussels Independence writes: "The dueling fever here appears to have become epidemic. Some cavalry officers have met in this way during the last few days; but what do you think of the following? Two young men of Lemberg wished to fight; but, in order to escape the disagreeable consequences which the death of one entails upon the other, they resolved to draw lots as to which of the two should kill himself! He whom fate favored was to quit the city, recalling, in a letter to his adversary, the terms of their agreement; and actually the unhappy young man, obedient to the exigencies of mistaken honor, did not fail to blow out his brains on the day and the hour fixed."

A ROMANCE OF THE PRUSSIAN PEERAGE.

We find the following in the Court Journal: "Among other historical obscurities with which Paris is filled at this moment may be quoted Herr Baron G——, who, enriched and ennobled by the King of Prussia, rose from the humblest origin to a position of high consideration in the world. While the present Prince of Prussia, then an infant of some three years of age, was staying at the Palace of Babelsberg, by some negligence of his nurse he was left alone for a few minutes in an apartment on the third floor. With the marvelous instinct of mischief peculiar to children of that age, the little Prince took immediate advantage of the absence of the nurse to accomplish a feat of which he had, doubtless, been for a long time ambitious, and which consisted in an agreeable walk outside the window, upon the narrow ledge of the coping-stone, whence he could conveniently climb up the back of the lion rampant which supports the entablature of the frontispiece which adorns the building. A poor blacksmith's workman, who had been sent for to execute some repairs in the palace, was just coming up the garden, and beheld, with horror, the situation of the child. With true presence of mind he hastened gently to the spot beneath the window, following every movement of the urchin with the keenest anxiety, and extending wide his leather apron as he gazed upward to watch the first symptom of giddiness which should occur to the bold little adventurer. As the child drew nearer to the lion the ledge no longer afforded such firm footing, and presently, with a loud cry, he pitched over, from that terrific height, right into—the leather apron of the blacksmith, which sustained the shock without falling, and in another moment the little Prince was restored, safe and well, to his parents, who, in token of their gratitude, took immediate charge of the fortune of the brave young workman, and bestowed upon him a handsome pension, with the title of Baron, to both of which he has done honor during a well-spent, useful life."

ITALY.

HOW TO PUNISH A BAD WIFE.

The Corriere Mercantile of Genoa relates the following curious mode of taking revenge on an unfaithful wife: "A wealthy inhabitant of the Vico del Vecchietti (a street in Genoa) had obtained unequivocal proof of his wife's bad conduct. Without getting into a passion or proceeding to violence, as most people would do in such a case, he simply turned his wife out of doors with her paramour, and then sent for a carpenter, whom he directed to set up a catafalque, such as is used in Roman Catholic churches for the funeral service. This done, he sent invitations to all his friends for the following evening, when they found the room lit up with burning tapers. Their host made them stand round the catafalque, and requested them to chant the service for the dead, he himself acting as conductor, thus intimating that his wife was thenceforward dead to him. He then conducted them to a well-provided table, where he entertained them until late hour."

RUSSIA.

PROGRESS OF EMANCIPATION.

The St. Petersburg Gazette contains two ukases, one of which relates to the peasants of the appanages assigned to the princes of the reigning family, the management of which is confided in Russia to a special Ministry. By this ukase these peasants receive several prerogatives which render them almost free men. They can now purchase and sell landed property on their own account, while hitherto they have only been able to buy and sell in the name and through the agency of the administration of appanages. These peasants can, moreover, henceforth carry on civil prosecutions without the assistance of the Procureur of the appanages, whose interference will for the future be at the will of the plaintiffs. Lastly, by this ukase the peasants will have the power of disposing of their property by will, and have the facility of entering into the classes of traders and burgesses, in consequence of the suppression of the dues hitherto paid to the administration of the appanages, which amounted to from 6000 to 1500 rubles, and which are now replaced by a payment of from 15 to 40 rubles to the fund for discharged soldiers belonging to the class of peasants. By another ukase the Emperor suppresses the committee of military censorship, and transfers its attributions to the civil one. There will be henceforth a person appointed by the Minister of War to whom the civil censors will communicate the manuscripts of military works. A report will be made on the merits of each, and the final decision on them will come from the Minister of Public Instruction.

CHINA.

THE LATEST FROM CHINA.

Hong Kong dates are to June 23, and Pei-ho June —. The gun-boats had advanced to Tien-Sin without opposition, and commanded both the river and great canal. The English and French Embassadors were located ashore near Tien-Sin. The American and Russian fleet had followed the allies up the river. A Mandarin of high rank, the second officer in the empire, had arrived from Pekin as special Commissioner to negotiate. Reinforcements continued to be dispatched from Hong Kong. Canton continued much disturbed—several Europeans and Sepoys are reported as having been murdered.

OCEANICA.

DISCOVERY OF A CHRISTIAN ISLAND.

We see it stated upon what may be considered reliable authority that 30,000 Christians have recently been found upon an island north of Celebes. It has been rumored for a time that there was there a Christian people forgotten and forsaken, which, however, yet possessed three Bibles, and continued steadfast in the faith. When missionaries first landed on the island they met with a school teacher and his pupils, who repeated in the Malayan tongue, "As the heart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O Lord." No Bibles were found, but its most precious promises were written upon the bark of trees. They knew the Apostles' Creed, and the Heidelberg Catechism, and the Christian customs. Twenty-seven churches and schools yet existed. Through the instrumentality of Pastor Heldring, founder of the Magdalen Asylum at Steinbeck, and chief patron of Inner Missions in Holland, four missionaries, who had been educated under the venerable Goesner, were sent out, and three thousand persons baptized. This is certainly an interesting discovery. The island on which these Christians were found belongs to the East India Archipelago. The Dutch have for years had political rule in this region. This may account for the original introduction of Christianity among this people, and for the fact that the Heidelberg Catechism was still found in their possession. But still, the particular time and circumstances in which this introduction took place may well challenge special attention, and elicit investigation from those who have the leisure and facilities for prosecuting it.

BELLE-LIFE AT NAHANT.

"Of the bells—
Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells—"

THE late Mr. Edgar Allan Poe sang very sweetly about the bells. He told of the "Silver bells!

What a world of merriment their melody foretells!"

and every body who has been in society for ten years, or five, or even one, knows all about the merry silver bells. If they do not, I beg to introduce them to my cousin Lilian—"airy, fairy Lilian," as one of her admirers aptly called her: for a silver little bell she is, and her mingled laugh and talk ring out like a peal of silver chimes.

Ah! and then the poet, with exquisite instinct and knowledge of the world, after telling us of the melody of the merry silver bells—up to the age, say, of seventeen, implores us to "Hear the mellow wedding bells,

Golden bells!
What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!"

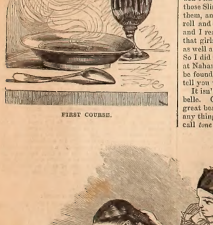
To be sure it does! It is only your genuine golden bell that makes a truly mellow wedding bell. There was Charibel Coyne, my old schoolmate—old Bullion's grand-daughter, who used to have fifty dollars a week for pocket-money, and never less than twelve men wanting to dance with her at the same time. She was what I call a golden bell; irregular, perhaps—a little capricious, I have heard; there were even gleams of ill temper. But it is ridiculous to associate ill temper with a girl named Charibel, with fifty dollars a week pin-money. When she became a mellow wedding bell, and we had the cards, "Mrs. Persimmon Fitzalore, née Coyne," ill-natured young men whom I snubbed when they rude love to me, because I knew that they had been suitors of Charibel's, used to say, "Old Coyne gave her Fitz to get rid of her!"

People who are not on easy terms with Coyne are very apt to disparage him and his whole family. But their real character is most amiable, as I happen to know from Tom Dyce, who told me confidentially (and I tell it to you in the same way) that he had a poor opinion of the Coyne connection—he thought them distant, hard to be intimate with—until one day the aunt, with whom he lived, married into the family, who instantly came to see her in large parties; "in fact," said Tom, "there was no end of Coyne for months, and I was immensely pleased."

Mr. Poe tells of one other kind:

AFTER BREAKFAST.

"Hear the loud alarum bells!
Brazen bells!
What a tale of terror, now, their turbulency tells!"



I rather believe that my aunt, Miss Catawba Green, aged forty-seven, who will giggle and talk loud, and flirt her fan, and speak of "an girls" as she used to nearly thirty years ago, when she was really young and pretty, knows all about the "brazen bells." If she doesn't, who on earth does?

Only, why did Mr. Poe always spell them without the e?

Here at Nahant we always put the e to it, and I have heard Mrs. Quincy Granite say that Mr. Willis used to use the e when he wrote those pretty stories about Nahant life thirty years ago. I don't know any thing pleasanter to read now than those Slangsby stories of Willis. When I first read them, and became acquainted with Blanche Carroll and the rest, I was a very small school-girl, and I read them on the sly; but I said to myself that girls were girls, and that I might be a belle as well as any body else, if I only resolved to do it. So I did resolve, and you may ask any body now at Nahant—yes, and I think there are witnesses to be found also at Newport and Saratoga, who will tell you whether I have succeeded.

It isn't enough to be pretty and modest to be a belle. Good manners are not the secret, neither is great beauty alone, though that comes nearer than any thing else. But don't you know what people call love in pictures? It isn't the color nor the drawing only, it is a sort of something not to be described; at least, I have asked a great many of the long-haired, bonhatted gentry who paint pictures, and they never agreed what it was. It is a sort of mellow complexion over the whole thing, and is as different from mere color as the bloom upon a ripe grape or plum is from the crude positive hue of the unripe fruit. Or didn't you ever notice the difference? No? Well then come to Nahant, and you can study every variety of bloom and bloom upon ripening fruit in Mr. Tudor's gardens behind those thick-paled fences, that strain them every sea-winds into soft zephyrs before they touch his trees, very much as a fine-tooth comb would transform the rumpy breath of any old sailor on the coast into a kind of music before it polluted a lady's lungs.

All this means feet. To be a belle, it is necessary to be handsome, well made, of great good manners, and of consummate tact. Now every girl can have almost every thing but the chief thing. If you are not positively squint-eyed or deformed, resolution and Madame—will, the freshest French woman—will make you handsome and of good figure. Manners you must manage for yourself. I have found the best rule perfect kindness—I mean, of course, kindness of manner. Most men are a little bashful with women. Young men get over it by bravado—older men with a kind of silent, superior, condescending air. Now, if you study never to take advantage of this shyness, which makes men doubly sensitive—so that many a clever man is conscious of being a perfect fool with women—if you never wound them by look, or word, or insinuation, or implication, and never seem in league with any one man against any other—why, a little judicious flattery of manner only, not of words, does the whole business—the man is yours.

FIRST COURSE.

Have you never noticed that very "smart" women are never belles? There are, of course, what may be called "loud" young ladies from some Western cities, and from New York sometimes, who smoke, and drink sherry cobblers at night, and call the gentlemen by their Christian names, and who are always very conspicuous; but there is the same difference between such people and belles that there is between notoriety and fame.

The difficulty is that tact is not to be taught; it is the subtlest sympathy constantly on the alert. Its aim is to please—positively, by saying and doing what is agreeable; and negatively, by omitting all allusions that are not so. "Never speak of hemp to a man whose father was hanged," is the negative way of stating tact. — "All things to all men," is the positive way. — There is no need of asking one about the morality of this. I am treating of belles and manners, not of saints and moral philosophers.

One thing, however, I am free to say to you in strict confidence; and that is, that good manners are not always indicative of good morals. I mean, of course, using the word manners in the usual sense. If you see a man or woman every day, you would naturally presently discover their sympathies and hates. They would literally stress involuntarily. For instance, if a man cared nothing for children—if he were impatient or ill-tempered—he could control it for some time, but not for a long time, unless he had some very desirable end to serve by playing a huge and difficult game.

But for all that, if the great Dr.—should ever come to Nahant, or Newport, or Saratoga, which of course he never does—for where could he stay, and what could he do?—and, entering his name upon the book as the Rev. Mr. Lamb, should mingle in the charming groups that swarm along the piazza or sit so amiably in the parlor, I think the manners of the reverend gentleman would be so winning and entertaining, that the young men would view him without jealousy, and the old without cynicism. The young women would consider disparity of years nothing, where hearts were truly united; and the old ladies would seriously ponder how much they might reduce the necessary figure for their daughters, in consideration of certain personal advantages in the husband. Old and young would go to bed charmed with the manners of their new acquaintance; nor, among the other dreams of the night, would the fancy disturb itself that, when the Rev. Mr. Lamb went off, he disappeared in smoke, and that the gentlemanly companion of an evening could such an awful tale unfold.

On the other hand, I suppose Dr. Johnson's manners were good, but his manners were certainly offensive.

You are surprised that I speak of Dr. Johnson? You have seen me whirling in the polka with Tom Dyce at the hotel, or racing over the beach with him in his wagon? Very well: it is true. I am that young lady. I wear two bracelets and earrings, and those very heavy shirts. I bowl, bathe, dance, dine, flirt, drive, sigh, smile, pick up manners, and wander over the rocks in a broad-brimmed hat and a very becoming morning dress, which the girls here will call peignoir, apparently not knowing that peignoir is the dressing-gown—mine is a short gown—in which we sit when the hair is being brushed. I am that same young lady—aged somewhere between seventeen and twenty-three, and I have spoken of Dr. Johnson. I know about him and about a good many others, and you are surprised. That is always the way with men. You profess to honor us—your mouths froth with compliments. Suddenly we show that we are not fools, and you never forgive us. You say you want something "feminine." Especially men who drink brandy and water soon after breakfast, smoke all the morning, talk horses and drive horses all the afternoon, and gamble all night—especially these men want what they call "the feminine element" in women.

Don't their whole lives show they do? Don't every set of their lives cry aloud, and proclaim upon the house-tops their sympathy with what is womanly? Are they not an alluring style of cat for the shrinking and clinging vines to climb upon?

AFTER THE BATH.

DESSERT.

AN APPETIZER BEFORE DINNER.

DRIVE TO LYNN BEACH.

There is something feminine — so there is something ignorant, and weak, and silly. Now are ignorance, and weakness, and affectation the constituent parts of "the feminine element?"

You ask what Tom Dyce thinks of it, with whom I dine and dance.

Mercí, not so sarcastic as you suppose. I like to drive in an open wagon, with a fleet, handsome horse and a good-natured driver. Voilà, my driver. I like sweets dearly, and can't help dancing on a good floor to a fascinating band; I need only an easy, firm partner, of good height, of gentlemanly address. Voilà, Mons. Tom Dyce! Behold the philosophy of my dance!

Do you think I never eat mutton - chops because I think a saddle of venison the best meat in the world? How many days in the year ought I to expect to have deer to my dinner? I had rather dance and drive at Nahant this summer with Tom Dyce than with all the seven wise men of Greece put together. Do you suppose I think Tom as wise as Solon? He is a good-humoured dance, who wears well-setting clothes, and drives and rides and dances well, and he likes to be with girls, and particularly likes to be thought fascinating to them.

"And his merry bosom swells
With the pean of the bells,
And he dances and he yells;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Runic rhyme,
To the pean of the bells!"
(Always with the s understood.)

I came here this summer to enjoy myself, and Tom helps me do it. If he be a dance, as I think, I am sorry for him. But what is to dance, but the sensible, intelligent, accomplished men won't bowl, and drive, and dance, and sip the foam from the tip of the wave—what then? Do they suppose that a girl who means to be a belle, and comes to Nahant or Newport for pleasure, and not for philosophy, is going to sit quietly in a corner and talk wise nonsense? If they think it is such a dreadful thing to dance, and frolic, and flirt, why don't they stay where away? I come here to bowl, and Tom Dyce bowls; to ride, and Tom Dyce rides; to drive, and Tom Dyce drives; to dance, and Tom Dyce dances; to lounge about and skip stones into the water, and Tom Dyce dances, and laughs, and skips, and doesn't bother his head about my being frivolous; and doesn't think it "a great pity that sensible girls should be so taken up with dancing;" and isn't all the time moralizing upon the vanity of "society."

Do I expect to marry him?

Why, have I said that I came to Nahant to be married? I think you kindly, but I am in no hurry. I am just a girl, you see, and I believe, rather a belle. I am young, well, and gay; I have done my share, a very fair share, of studying, and accomplishing; I don't believe my heart is hid; I know that I am not a bad, or a

THE BELLE OF THE EVENING.

RESULTS OF THE CAMPAIGN.
[From a Female Point of View.]

wicked woman, of course, but I am not a particular bored who sends me the bouquets, and hires ten men to test under my window at one o'clock in the morning, and wastes the precious moments and the next little English dog-collar, and the heavy shoes with pepper-box toes—I don't want to be a particular specimen, but any of them? Yes, to be sure, now and then one. But they only marry wisely and when they are old fools.

A time comes, I suppose, when Tom suddenly feels that there are other young men in the world, and younger men. An awful moment comes when, in leaving the ball-room, mamma says to Laura, about whom Eustace is hovering with hungry eyes and eager arms—just as Tom did about her mamma twenty years ago—"Laura, my dear, take Mr. Dyce's arm and go on." That easy maternal confidence utterly annihilates Tom's felicity. It reminds him that he is considered "perfectly safe." It has come to mean nothing that a young girl should take his arm and go off home. He has grown into the avuncular and paternal condition. From that moment he is a fool, and a jealous; his coming, his going, his attentions excite no kind of apprehension. The girls say, "Only Mr. Dyce," and "Mr. Dyce was there, of course." Mr. Tom Dyce has reached the period when he love fun, and that here is plenty of it, I don't deny. But I never know Tom Dyce to marry? I answer, of course, the particular biped who sends me the bouquets, and hires ten men to test under my window at one o'clock in the morning, and wastes the precious moments and the next little English dog-collar, and the heavy shoes with pepper-box toes—I don't want to be a particular specimen, but any of them? Yes, to be sure, now and then one. But they only marry wisely and when they are old fools.

A time comes, I suppose, when Tom suddenly feels that there are other young men in the world, and younger men. An awful moment comes when, in leaving the ball-room, mamma says to Laura, about whom Eustace is hovering with hungry eyes and eager arms—just as Tom did about her mamma twenty years ago—"Laura, my dear, take Mr. Dyce's arm and go on." That easy maternal confidence utterly annihilates Tom's felicity. It reminds him that he is considered "perfectly safe." It has come to mean nothing that a young girl should take his arm and go off home. He has grown into the avuncular and paternal condition. From that moment he is a fool, and a jealous; his coming, his going, his attentions excite no kind of apprehension. The girls say, "Only Mr. Dyce," and "Mr. Dyce was there, of course." Mr. Tom Dyce has reached the period when he wight as well marry and neglect his dress a little.

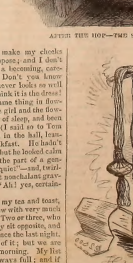
Eustace is travelling the same road. Mr. Dyce is only thinking and feeling a little before him.

I don't mean to say that Tom is any more agreeable for being a dance. I confess I should rather have Ajax or Hector drive me on the beach than Thersites. But if Achilles chooses to mope in his chamber, or sit and smoke over Baron's Essays or Buckle's History of Civilization (I haven't read it, but I know there is such a book, which is more than Tom does), do you think I am not going to chase the winds over the glittering sunset pavement of the beach, if Tom will offer me his chariot, and himself to urge the flying steeds? Wouldn't you eat an apple from the Hesperidian orchard because a booby handed it to you over the wall?

It isn't always Tom who plucks me the apples; that is, not always the same Tom. There are many kinds of them: the Boston Tom; the Baltimore Tom; the New York Tom; and Philadelphia and Charleston Toms. I find the study of comparative Tom Dyces very diverting. Any belle would in very foolish who didn't get the greatest possible entertainment out of her beaux. (Tom always pronounces that word beaus.)

Thus in the morning I come down to breakfast about nine o'clock. Sound sleep and sea-air, and nothing on my mind, make my cheeks fresh and my eyes bright, I suppose, and I don't deny that I wear what I think a becoming, carefully-careless morning dress. Don't you know men always say that a woman never looks so well as in a morning dress? They think it is the dress? But have they never seen the same thing in flowers? They forget that both the girl and the flower have been steeped in the dew of sleep, and been colored by the rouge of rest! I call it so Tom yesterday morning as we stood in the hall, leaning against the wall, after breakfast. He hadn't the remotest idea what I meant, but he looked calm —for he is continually playing the part of a gentleman, which he says is "being quiet"—and, twirling his glasses, replied, with that nonchalant gravity which betrays every thing, "Ah! yes, certainly, of course."

I go in to breakfast, and take my tea and toast, with several of the youth, who bow with very much more ceremony than courtesy. Two or three, who have already breakfasted, usually sit opposite, and I hear whatever is new or good since the last night. There isn't always a great deal of it; but we are all merry, and lay plans for the morning. My list of drives, rides, and dances is always full; and if any girl will only take the trouble to drive very slow, and drum incessantly (not ricket—men don't care for diamonds in a dancing partner), and be generally gracious and sweet, and hide both the intention and its accomplishment, why, she will have as many dances as she likes, and drives too.



I like that morning hour after breakfast when we wake afresh to the sweet consciousness of the pleasant, lazy life we are leading. Tom holds his hat in hand, and says a good many amiable stupidities. But he is well bred and well dressed, and few people talk well. To be sure, we part by-and-by, and I prepare for the bath. It isn't so good at Nahant as it is at Cape May, or even Newport, where, however, the beach is at the end of a cove—a cage in which the sea is caught and tamed down a little for the use of city people.

But any where, how splendid it is! Half the globe in your bathing-tub. You sit on one edge of it, and paddle your feet in the water, which on the other side is peopled by people you will never see, and couldn't understand if they spoke. The great waves that dash over you, and would reflect a pine if they could get near enough, are substance of the same waters that sweep—as the posts say—under the palms. I go down to the beach to bathe, and foreign countries seem to be close to me. I touch the water, and by the liquid chain I hold the Spice Islands in my hand. Good Heavens, what monsters we are in the water! I think that the baggy bathing-gowns, and the caps and hats, are the most hideous insults to the ocean. Why not put on Indian rubber dresses and take umbrellas?

But what coolness, and freshness, and lightness,

AFTER THE HOP—THE SERENADE.

RESULTS OF THE CAMPAIGN.
[From a Male Point of View.]

when you come out! I always feel sinuous, like a snake; not as if I had hard bones, but only flexible, massive muscle. Bathing makes people graceful, I think, by the sense of suppleness it induces. How natural the story of the mermaid is! As children, we used to say that hairs left in the water became water-snakes; and I am sure if I were left in the water alive long enough I should taper off into a fish. As long as the brine is in my skin I perfectly understand the smooth sinuosity of piscatory motion.

I think these things, and laugh while Marie brushes my hair after the bath. I have a novel in my hand, to be sure; but I think of the novel in which I am living, and of which I am one of the characters. Then I take a little nap—yes, a morning nap in the sea-air after a bath is the very balm of roses. Just try it. When I wake, Marie, who has brushed my hair already, takes it from under the cap and dresses it. There are girls here who positively have it dressed immediately after brushing, and without the nap; and at dinner they wonder where I got my color and spirit!

Do they think it comes from the bouquet I carry in to dinner, and which was brought to me at one o'clock with a note? I hope they do, for poor Tom's sake. Of course, it is the (guess which) Tom who sends up the boot-black's boy with a great bouquet and a card, on which I see something is written. Poor Tom! where did he learn to write?

"Mr. Dyce presents his compliments. Will Miss Cleopaytra accept the flours that accompany this, and will you go to ride with me this afternoon in my wagon? He will call at five.

"Yours truly, Thomas Dyce."

Miss Cleopaytra will accept his flours, and ride with him in his wagon. They are the choicest specimens of green-house blossoms, and, my dear, one must keep up one's prestige. I have had at least one bouquet every day since I have been at Nahant. Did you ever hear of toad-eating? Do you understand its philosophy? It isn't only the gross desire of flattery for flattery's sake that makes toad-eating possible—for it is made possible only by the sufferance of the person in whose honor the reptiles are devoured. No, it isn't only that. But a person who has long been admired and flattered at last comes to require the tonic of applause before he can do any thing worthy of praise. It is like dram-drinking. A toper crawls out for his early rum (have you ever seen them, in the gray morning, shambling through the silent streets? Sometimes they are the only citizens who welcome you at that hour to great cities). Now he wants his rum, not only to appease the appetite, but to give him the power of working. So I am sure toads must be eaten, and are hired by certain people to be eaten, in order that they may be kept in good conceit of themselves.

Always? Of course not. Flunkeys eat toads for the pure love of them; and the Gods in whose honor they are consumed despise the toad and the eater. I have seen a great deal of that not ten hundred thousand million miles from a certain place I know.

I confess I accept Tom's bouquet and drive in something of this spirit. I like to keep up my state. Queen Elizabeth used to expect gifts from all her court on fète days. Why shouldn't Miss Cleopaytra expect the same from hers? So at dinner I put the flowers in my glass, and the steam of my hot soup rises around them like incense! Tom sees from afar. He thinks it is the first course in his successful race for my favor. I know it is only the first course in the bouquet of enjoyment which he is going to furnish me. Do you think that heartless? Still it doesn't choke me. I swallow my soup, my fish, with equanimity. Tom Dyce isn't going to break his heart for me. It is a little game we are playing, and it is nobody's business but ours. People flirt at their own risk. If we choose to stake our hearts, is that your affair? Do you mean to say that Tom stakes his, and that I don't play fair because I put up nothing? Thou fool! Because a pauper stakes his note for a thousand dollars, art thou therefore playing for a thousand dollars?

My first course may be upon Charleston Tom; my dessert may be Boston Tom. Shall we say just a little too late? Just after, instead of just before dinner, may make a wonderful difference. Boston Tom Dyce is handsome, and of gentlemanly demeanor. There is closer supervision of conduct in a small than in a large place. A man or woman may bury themselves in the crowd in New York or Philadelphia; I defy them to do it in Boston. You are always in view. Plant yourself on the Common, and all Boston will come round to you. This is a charming fact for friends, but for enemies not so pleasant; for debtors, disagreeable; for youth who wish to be fast, not at all exhilarating. Boston State House always seems to me like a great fat grandma in a clean cap, sitting up very straight and keeping school. What a demure school it is! What a well-behaved Beacon Street, and Park Street, and Mount Vernon Street—all with clean front doors on, and shining window faces! I think the Bostonians behave so well and dress so nicely because they are afraid of the State House.

Tom's note comes as a chasse café, just as I am leaving the table:

"Dear Miss Cleopatra,—Will you let me drive you over to Lynn this afternoon, to meet the Buzzards who are coming down? It will be a pleasant drive home in the moonlight. Thomas Dyce."

There's the correct thing for you! I would swear the State House had looked over that note, with spectacles rubbed up for the occasion. Look at the safe conclusion. No abrupt and hard "Yours truly"—no affected "Tout à vous"—no affectionate "Faithfully yours"—no stiff "Your obedient servant"—no dangerous "Your friend"—but the uncommitting "Thomas Dyce."

Too late, Thomas. I am going to drive with Charleston Tom. You will meet us scouring over Lynn beach in his dog-cart, with the natty groom behind. We shall all bow, and smile, and chat. We shall all say, "How pleasant!" "What a lovely day!" Many Toms will be clattering along upon fine horses—sitting the trot, which is now the unhappy theory of riding. Lovers and flirters, and young married pairs in wagons, on horses, in carriages; papas and mammas, aunts and uncles, rolling by in closer carriages, beholding us upon the same beach, in the same sunset—laughing, loving, chattering—gay ghosts of their departed selves—brisk and beautiful spectacle of an hour, while the sea is down, and before it comes up lazily and wipes all our traces away.

Boston Tom drives another girl. Charleston Tom drives me, and talks at intervals. Happily "flours" and "flowers" do not betray their difference in pronunciation, and I am content to breathe the salt air, and to nod and smile. Belinda Mudgeon, driving slowly with her deaf aunt, looks scornfully at me as I whirl by with Thomas D. of Charleston. "By-by, Belinda dear!" I have only time to shake my hand lightly at her, and make my face positively sticky with the excessive honey of my smile. What a pity Belinda dear should waste her scorn upon me. I will make Tom ask her to drive to-morrow, and I will say to her, "Belinda, dear, do you think it Christian to sneer at a young gentleman because Heaven has not endowed him with as much wit as you?"

But the drive over—tea drank—the moon rising, and behold us at the ball. The belle at the ball! Well, I confess it is pleasant. I do like to have a dozen men round me, of all ages and countries, and each waiting for a word—each getting, at least, a smile. Youth, health, beauty, cheerfulness; grace, flowers, music, moonlight, sea-air—admiration, flattery, applause—I find them good things. I drink a great, brimming, beaming beaker of them every evening I go into the ball. The youth, old and young, cluster around me; the Queen of Sheba had not a more obsequious court. They have all their handsomest bosoms, and pearl, and opal, and diamond shirt-buttons, and delicate waistcoats. I skim with them through the Polka, the Mazourka, the Lancers—yes, and the Balmoral. They are my regiment of the dance. All the Toms are there. We float in music.

People talk a great deal of nonsense about dancing. Belinda Mudgeon says it's only absurdly ridiculous and trivial. Well now, Belinda dear, if dancing be all that, how elevating and refining it must be to stand against the wall looking on, and saying such comfortable things and thinking such sweet thoughts, while a thousand good spirits are whispering to me in the music whose airy arms fold me and lead me on.

I know it's tiresome; but what pleasant fatigue! Here at the hotel we can walk a little on the piazza when the ball is over, and look at the moon on the sea, and grow cool and get ready to sleep.

To sleep? Yes; but scarcely are my eyes closed in the earliest morning hours than

"I arise from dreams * * *
In the first sweet sleep of night," and hear the softest, saddest strains of mingling and mellowing harmony, as if the moonlight were chanting as it rocked upon the sea, or the mermaids were singing while mortals slept. Oh hopes! oh memories! oh longing dreams! All beautiful things that have been—all things too dear to be; they touch my heart—they whisper in my ear—they smile, they beckon, in the exquisite measures of the serenade. It is too sad to bear—it is too sweet to disturb. I lie entranced in melancholy bliss. Then I spring up and peep downward from my window.

I know it is only Tom Dyce, and ten men he has hired for fifty dollars to blow and fiddle on brass and wood. What then? Was not my splendid namesake—Antony's glorious "Egypt"—bones, and flesh, and blood? Do you think it is the skeleton of the music—Tom and the trombones—that touch me, or the divine soul that marries mine while I listen, and transfigures the world to my eyes while I am in its embrace?

Well, well, suppose it does make me think of going away, of coming again, and of years coming and going from me. Suppose it does make me ask myself whether the golden age of bellehood does not dwindle away into silver, and brass, and iron. There's Tom going away at the end of the season, after he has asked me to marry him, and received a gracious refusal—terribly empty. Empty in head, of course, because he came so. Empty in heart, because he has had no chance of installing any body in my place. Empty in pocket, because he has been filling the pockets of host, musicians, boatmen, hostlers, billiard saloons, bowling-alleys, and the bar-keeper, from his own. That is the net result of Tom's summer campaign—a long, lank purse, and a longer bill in the most plethoric condition. Do you suppose his going away makes me sad?

I shall go too, but not empty. No; I shall tell the summer upon a rosary—every bead a heart. And so I shall next summer—and next. But how about the twentieth next summer?

"Hear the tolling of the bells—
Iron bells!
What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
In the silence of the night,
How we shiver with affright
At the melancholy menace of their tone!"

However, mes amis, I am not yet an iron belle, and I shall lay away this pretty little string of hearts and come again to capture more. You think I shall be caught? I hope so. I only await my Antony. Yes, even I; for do you know the sweetest music of the bell, after all? It is the merry marriage peal.

MY LOVE STORY.

CHAPTER I.

Fields, meadows, green plains, are wide. In what obscure nook amidst them transpired the scenes of my story wots not; but a swallow winging from your city walls might reach it in a summer morning's flight.

Half hid in a vale nestled my lowly roof. Here, for years, I led a lonely life, and followed the vagaries of a Bohemian humor. My pursuits I dignified with the name of science, but they were idle and dreamy reveries over plants and rocks. I went about with a hammer breaking stones; I peered into forest ways after the delicate and rarer blossoms which hide themselves in modest places; I gathered in formal rows spread grasshoppers and impaled beetles.

For a long time my days were lonely and quiet; but once a little girl, rambling in the woods, joined me by chance, and, being kindly encouraged, in a little while came almost every day to carry my basket for me. She took intense delight in my pursuits, watched with staring eyes my researches among the rocks, and soon esteemed it a grand privilege to gain admittance to that apartment where all my specimens and curiosities were gathered.

This little girl is the heroine of my story. Her name was Viola; but by her father, by me, and by others who knew her well, she was called "Vio." She was the daughter of a very retiring, studious gentleman, who recently came up from New York to reside in our neighborhood. Mr. Ashway was a thin, pale gentleman, very nervous and melancholy in manner, and excessively tender of Vio. He spent all his days close shut in his library. He appeared to know no one; and during the several years he resided in the valley I was the only person, with the exception of one other, ever admitted into his society.

Viola was not more than twelve years of age when I first knew her—a Saxon beauty, with light-brown curls, and a bright, fairy-like manner peculiarly charming. It was pleasant in our long woodland walks to have her running before and hovering around me like a sprite; to watch her spring up rocks, and clap her hands, and laugh in the abundance of girlish glee; and, above all, to see her eager soul look upward through her eyes.

But Vio did not remain a little girl of twelve years. Before I knew it, she got bigger and prettier; and one day, quite suddenly, without any preparation for the idea, it flashed upon me that she was a woman—almost. Her dresses now touched the tops of her gaiters, her locks were gathered up, there was a steadier manner about her. When she sprang to catch the pendant bough, the white arms so revealed were fuller, and a rounding bust gave new fascination to her form.

I went home after this discovery thoughtful and sad. Very soon now, I saw, she would be a woman, and have lovers, and then ever after I should walk through the forests alone, and break my rocks in solitude. In my lonely home, where only cold service tended me—where no affection flourished, no tender love shed beauty and glory—I lay heart-heavy upon my pillow, looking down the wastes of my future, where no promises or hopes hung out their banners.

And, I confess it, I thought of love; I pictured possibilities of future happiness. At moments I saw myself walking down the roads which lead to eternity with one by my side whose face was upturned, whose heart beat warm and quickly next to mine, whose smile fell on me alone. Then came reason, dissipating dreams. I was too old for love; I was bent, my hands were browned and coarse, my locks were ragged and turning from their youthful blackness; I was a sad, lone fellow, given over to dry science, worn, seamed, dull; as little suited for fresh and dewy youth as a mummy from the Pyramids. A very different lover from this Vio would have—one with dark locks, eagle eyes, elastic figure, high heart, quick young blood!

But still I dreamed—still wild hopes flashed upon me with dazzling brightness, and went out in sudden clouds of gloom.

When we went together, the next morning, Vio exclaimed,

"What is the matter, Sir? You are sad."

"Yes; but it will not last. It will float away like the mist yonder. Tell me, Vio, how old are you?"

"Sixteen."

"So very near a woman!"

"In two years, I think, I shall be quite grown."

"Yes; and more beautiful, perhaps, than now."

"You must not flatter, Sir."

"That's true, and I will not flatter. But still to me you are very fair."

"Do you really like me, Mr. Vail?" exclaimed she, looking up into my eyes with simple frankness. "I hope you do. I delight so much in these long rambles; and I want to learn a great deal more about botany and geology. I hope you will always like me, for I do you."

A thrill of emotion shot through me. This was utter childish simplicity and frankness. Love, the passion, could never bloom in that soil for me.

For me! How monstrous the thought! Was I not mad to think of linking her young life to my old and world-worn heart? "Drown the thought!" I muttered; "bury it! seal it up forever!"

"Yes, Vio," said I, while my hand smoothed her brow and played with a stray curl, "we must be friends always. But you will marry some day; you will have a husband and children. You will forget then the old stone-breaker."

"Oh never, never forget you; never marry—so I think now. For, Sir, I could not leave my father. Alas! he grows paler and sadder every day. He sits for hours with his brow upon his hand; he starts so nervously when one comes near him unexpectedly. Oh if my father should die!"

"I do not think he will die," said I, "but we must persuade him to abandon his books. We must urge him to come with us into the forest sometimes. But let us sit here, Vio, and talk."

It was under an elm, on a smooth rock, and Vio sat close to my side and looked into my face. Here we talked, and by the gravitation of that of which the heart was full, we talked of love, and I, with that delight in self-torture which one at times strangely feels, depicted to her pleased imagination an ideal husband; and I told her a long, tender love-story, which moistened her eyes with tears; and we talked of Hero, Andromeda, and other heroines of classic love-stories; and she, in childish romance, wished that some splendid hero might come and win her too.

So day by day we continued our rambles; and silently spread the foundations, higher grew the structure of a passion I was too weak to crush, unwilling to escape.

CHAPTER II.

At last Vio found a lover. Walter Richmond was a member of one of the few wealthy families in the county. He had just graduated at Yale. His expectations were brilliant, his destined fortune large, his family ambitious. But he fell in love with the pure white spirit of Viola Ashway, as better, higher, grander men might have done. His spirits were high, his manner brilliant, his face and figure attractive; and so the tender, delicate, up-looking Vio, whose whole atmosphere was love, flew to his magnetism intensely.

With how many secret pangs, great agonies, sharp arrows for me! For the unconscious lovers, perceiving in me only a tender friend, made love in my very presence—lavished their affections upon each other before my eyes, and never knew or dreamed how each warm look sent sharp stings into the uncouth heart beside them.

With less self-control, less balance, I should have hated Walter; my passion would have broken out, and I should have ruined Vio's peace. But with what difficulty none can know I held down the struggling passion; I smiled, and smiled even while my heart sank down, down like a rock. And now, too, so many of my walks were alone. I missed daily the sweet presence which so long had flung sunlight on my path. Already I felt the coming shadow which would leave me bleak, barren, forsaken—a life with a clouded path.

Oh that wisdom came with age! that with the passing away of youth passed away also the power to feel, to love, to dream! that the heart could dry and wither with the flesh, and that the dust of time might clog its beating and dull its sense!

"Then you love Walter," said I to Vio one day.

"Oh yes, Sir. I think I do. He is very noble and good. You like him—at least I hope you do. You are my best and oldest friend. Next to my father, I must have you to like Walter of all men."

"Does your father wish you to marry?"

"He is very anxious; he urges it too much I think," and Vio blushed.

"And Walter?"

"Is anxious too; but he has not yet the consent of all his family. His father wanted him to marry a lady in New York, some one rich and high; but his father will consent, Walter says, in a little while. Time will bring it about. And we are so young, you know, we can wait a long while."

"And when you are married we shall hunt for no more plants together; you will forget all about our curious rocks."

"Oh no, for I shall have a collection of my own; we two shall gather it."

CHAPTER III.

A few weeks after the above conversation with Vio I was aroused from a heavy sleep at midnight.

"Mr. Vail! Mr. Vail!" thundered a voice below, and some pebbles came rattling against the panes to awaken me. I sprang up and rushed to the window.

"Please, Sir, come at once to Mr. Ashway's," exclaimed Ashway's servant from below, as I thrust my head from the window; "something strange has happened!"

"To Miss Viola?" I cried out, in great alarm.

"No, Sir—to Mr. Ashway. Miss Viola sent me to you. She is in great distress. I can not explain, and must hurry back. Please come at once, Sir, I beseech you"—and with these words he turned and hurried off.

In a very few minutes I was dressed and walking rapidly along the road in the direction of Mr. Ashway's residence. It was only two miles. In less than half an hour I reached it.

As I entered the gate to the lawn in front of the house a horse galloped rapidly along the road, and Walter, who also had been sent for, it seemed, sprang from the saddle and hurried toward me. Almost at the same moment Vio came running from the door, half clad, her bare white feet glistening upon the moon-lighted path, her locks disheveled and floating tangled and wild, a shawl hastily wound around her shoulders. She could not speak. Her eyes looked startled and wild. Her whole frame shook with some extraordinary grief and terror.

"For Heaven's sake, Vio!" exclaimed Walter, seizing her hand, "what is it? Are you ill? Is your father dying?"

But, strange enough, she shrunk from him, and convulsively clung to me, hiding her face, sobbing, shivering, and utterly overcome by the intensity of her grief. Walter, in great excitement himself, stunned her with questions and importunities.

"Calm yourself, Walter," said I, assuming as cool a manner as possible, though sorely puzzled and perplexed. "Your excitement increases hers. Let us go in. Let me carry you, Vio. Your feet are bleeding now, cut by the sharp pebbles."

She lay in my arms still and resigned, and I bore her into the house. We entered Mr. Ashway's study. He was not there. The light was burning. A few books and papers lay upon the table in confusion. I motioned Walter to restrain his excitement, and to seat himself. I took a chair, and tried to seat Vio in one beside me, but she sunk down upon the floor with a wild sob, and buried her face upon my knee. Walter ran toward her, but she shrunk and clung to me.

"What is this, Vio?" he asked, with some impatience. "Where is your father?"

"Gone! gone!" she sobbed out, violently.

"This is very strange!" I said; "but we can only soothe the poor child's agitation by being calm ourselves. What is this?" I observed, for the first time, a letter upon the table, conspicuously placed, and addressed to me. I seized and read it hastily. It contained these words:

"Sir,—To-night a blow has fallen I have long dreaded and long expected. Henceforth to my poor child I am as one dead. Be you, I implore you, her guardian, her protector, her friend. What has befallen me I will not explain; it is a retribution. Farewell forever.

"William Ashway."

I read and silently handed the note to Walter. Bewildered by the dreadful mystery of this disappearance, I still repressed my curiosity and excitement, and thought only of Vio. Gradually she grew more subdued and calm, although still sobbing and weeping on my knee. I now, for the first time, observed that she, too, had a letter clasped, crushed and broken, to her bosom. Walter, whose impatience for the particulars of this extraordinary disappearance could brook no delay, again pressed her with urgent inquiries; and in broken sentences she told the story.

"I was awakened suddenly," she said, "by the tramping of feet and strange voices upon the lawn. I sprang up and ran to the window. Three men, strangers, were below; and among them was my father. I was so surprised that, for a minute, I could only watch them in silence—I could not speak. They walked away, my father among them. A terrible thought flashed upon me, and, throwing up the window, I called after him very loudly. They all paused. He turned toward me. He stood in the moonlight, and I could see him so well, looking so pale and mournful; he kissed his hand to me many times, then suddenly dropped his face upon his breast and walked rapidly away. I flew down stairs and out upon the road after him. But they had all entered a carriage, and I heard it dash away. I screamed, and called upon him, and ran till I was out of breath, but still the carriage rolled on, rolled on until it was out of hearing. Then, with my heart beating so wildly, I hurried back to the house. There was his study as he had left it, and upon the table a little note for me and one for Mr. Vail. Then I knew that he was gone forever; that he would not be dead, but worse, and I could never see him more! never! never!"

In a fresh outburst of grief at the completion of her story, she sunk again down at my feet, while the shawl dropped from her white shoulders, exposing them too much. I picked it up, shrouded her form with it, lifted her to her feet, and whispered that she must go to her chamber.

"You are with your lover, Vio, and are not clad. Go and cover yourself properly, then come back to us."

But she had not strength to go, and I led her to her room, by the way summoning a servant to aid her. I paused at the door and said:

"Bathe your face, gather up your tresses, then join us."

She caught my hand as I turned to go.

"I can not marry Walter now," exclaimed she, very wildly. "I know that—tell him that I know it; that now his father will never consent; that he is free—I release him—his family is too proud—he can not marry an outcast—the daughter of—of—"

I checked her with an authoritative "Hush!"—for her manner grew wilder with every word—and, giving her in charge of a maid, went back to the library, musing upon her words, for they appeared to indicate some perception of Walter's character not known to me. When I entered the room I found Walter impetuously and absently scribbling upon a sheet of paper. I walked up to him and found it written over in every way, in large and small letters, erased, blotted out, then re-written, all with one word—crime!

I put my finger upon the sheet and looked him significantly in the eyes.

"Do you believe so?"

He started and looked surprised when he saw the word written upon the sheet; he had unconsciously revealed his secret fear.

"It is almost certain," was his reply.

"Too probable, I fear. Poor Vio! She loved him, looked up to him, worshiped him almost. A terrible blow to her."

"Terrible!" and he dashed his pen down upon the paper in an irritable manner. I looked at him surprised and a little startled.

"If it prove so, we must protect her from its consequences every way. She is innocent."

"Yes," replied he, evasively. His words, his manner almost terrified me. Could it be that he would abandon her? I felt a hot choler rising in my throat.

"Walter, you are cool and evasive. I am quick to suspect—quick to fear. What does your manner, your looks, your words, mean?"

"He is dishonored, and she is dishonored too," said he, slowly and doggedly.

For a moment I felt a blinding rush of rage, then the sudden flash of a thought which held my breath suspended, which shot through my frame a thrill of such condensed rapture that I lived an age in a single pulse of time. If he discarded, might I not win! For a few brief seconds I was in a tempest. I felt my veins swell, my heart tremble, my brain beat; I swayed before the fierce temptation, and almost yielded. But duty, faith to Vio, fidelity to Ashway, brought me back again; I spoke faithfully for Vio's cause.

"Walter, can you speak so harshly? She is your betrothed."

"I did not then know of Ashway's crime," replied he.

"Crime! The word was echoed at the door. Viola had entered, and heard Walter's remark. It harped both her fears aright. She ran and caught my arm.

"Is it so, Sir? can it be? I feared, but can not believe."

"We know nothing, Vio, of the reason for your father's departure. We will not consume ourselves with vain fears; we must be patient, and think as favorably as we can of the mystery."

She clutched my arm nervously, and turned to Walter.

"And do you believe, Walter, that he has been guilty? Can you apply a harsh word to him?"

"No, Vio, I do not wish to use harsh words; but it is all so strange."

"I know that, Walter. It is strange and suspicious too. How can I conceal from my heart that it is both of these? Yet, Walter, I do believe my father to be innocent; he may be wronged, or have been unwise, or be under some terrible conspiracy. But if you do not share that belief, then—for I know how proud you are, how high you look, what great things your friends expect of you—then, Walter, then—"

The poor child broke into a passionate burst of tears, and, weak from prolonged excitement, sank down upon the floor.

And Walter did not raise her! did not speak to her! I could have struck him down, but again there rushed over me that same wild hope.

"I'll give you back all your tokens, Walter," she resumed; "I'll keep not one. You can be free—you need not marry one whose name you think dishonored—whose father you so harshly judge a felon. I release you—I forget all—all—"

A sudden gasp, and she fell back upon the floor white and still. Walter, alarmed, ran toward her. But I would not permit him to touch her; I lifted her up, and laying her cold cheek upon my shoulder, bore her away to her chamber, with a warmth and strange joy about my heart.

CHAPTER IV.

The next day I went to New York. Upon my arrival I hastened to an old friend, an attorney, and laid the circumstances before him. He promised to inquire, went out to do so, and returned with the information that William Ashway had been arrested for frauds committed while cashier of a bank, which had only been recently discovered in the winding up of its affairs; that many thought he was more sinned against than sinning.

I then went to the proper authorities and obtained admittance into Ashway's presence. He shrunk at first from speaking to me, but at last took my hand and held it for a long time. I asked if he had counsel, and promised to obtain the best.

"It will not be needed," said he; "I shall not live to undergo the trial. I can not. Oh, Vail, honor was my god. I cherished my reputation more scrupulously than a virgin does her chastity. I fell, I know not how, maddened, intoxicated, in a frenzy of speculation. I shall not live; death will obliterate the crime before it becomes blazoned abroad by a public trial."

Indeed, so white, so short of breath had he become, that his apprehensions seemed more than likely.

"Let me fetch your daughter to you."

"No, I can not bear it. My pure, white flower! my unspotted, cherished blossom! Oh, if she could always believe me innocent!"

"She does."

"She must, Vail. Be that your task."

I soon went away, and set to work immediately to examine the circumstances of the crime. It proved to be one of those cases of which Wall Street is rife. There were others more guilty than he, upon whose promises, bonds, pledges, he had proceeded; he was only the scape-goat. There had been large operations upon no foundation; huge transactions on paper represented by sums purely fictitious; promises to pay never paid; indorsements upheld by counter-indorsements; checks drawn on fictitious balances and properly classified as "kite-flyers." In fact, an absolute maze of transactions and figures, utterly bewildering and incapable of clew, by which it appeared principally that Mr. Ashway extensively "operating" or "financiering," as it is respectively called, had been drawn into complications with dishonorable people, some of whom suddenly failing to meet his "accommodation" with their "accommodation" had unexpectedly forced him to the wall, and to the necessity of finding immediate means. A loan from his bank bridged the matter for a while, but the sharpers in the end filched from him comfortable "substantialities," leaving in his hand a mass of worthless securities. Alarmed, he had covered up the matter in the bank by false entries, then flying to the interior hid himself away, a prey to intense remorse and daily dread.

It took some days to ferret out all this. Unfortunately he was guilty in the eye of the law; to friendly charity he was innocent and wronged. But he was now sinking rapidly. I sent for his daughter, for he at last consented, and his dying hours were consoled by her tender presence, and by the solicitude of friends who came forward and befriended him. He died in two weeks—long before the time appointed for his trial. A brief paragraph appeared in the papers chronicling the fact, and he and his offense were speedily forgotten.

We carried his remains to the place of his recent home, and buried him in a pleasant corner of the village church-yard.

CHAPTER V.

Two days after our return a package came for Vio. It was from Walter, and was a return of her letters and tokens. Among them was a letter from him. It was a plea for his conduct. He dwelt upon his father's reluctance to the match before, his utter refusal to consent to it now; it told how much his future depended upon his father's aid; it asserted his belief that a marriage unsanctioned by parents would not be blessed. It was a well-worded, elaborate defense.

This much it showed me—Walter had begun to tire of Vio before the event which so precipitated the rupture. His nature was changeable; his fancy quickly captivated, quickly cooled.

With the familiar hammer and the customary basket I now resumed my pursuits. I went alone at first, but one day Vio saw me and came running after. The ramble was like those of old. Vio's spirits rose with the air and the exercise—a flush came to her cheek, she even smiled. With the spring of youth she was rebounding from the sorrows that had pressed her down.

And I walked forth with something secretly gathering in my heart. Could it be? Were my wild, rich dreams within the bounds of possibility? Could I win her now? Should I attempt, still so old, so sere, so far below her grand ideals? But a wounded, bleeding spirit she had flown to my bosom. Forsaken, alone, tempted with sorrow, would she nestle there?

Ah, the might and wealth of such a hope! But then, poor dreamer, look at the incongruous union! A healthful vine upon a riven trunk! great joy and youth upon a heart weather-beaten in storms!

I led her forth a new way, up a mountain-side, amidst wild, broken, chaotic masses, with chasms riven into the centre, and high peaks scaling the sky. I paused upon a wide plateau where the valley stretched down before us.

"Sit here, Vio. Let us talk."

We talked once more of love, and Vio laughed at her old ideal Leanders and Perseus.

"If one should come now on a cloud, hero-worshiper, what would you?"

"I want no hero, mortal or immortal. I will live with you always, dear Sir; and be as learned as you, if I can."

"Tell me, Vio, am I Leander?"

"No, Sir;" and she laughed.

"Not young enough. Even if I swam the Hellespont, you could not fancy me a hero?"

"You are not old, I think."

"Nor handsome enough?"

"I never thought of that."

"Still, answer me. Not old, nor ugly, but uncouth, huge, clumsy, brown, bent—I am no Leander, as you say, and can not hope to win a Hero?"

"I did not say that, Sir," and she looked at me in a puzzled way.

"But true hearts can lodge in clumsy frames, Vio. Look at me again; tell me what I am?"

"My best friend; my father now." She looked confused a little, blushed, and said, "The one I love best, too."

"Love in a respectful way—like a parent?"

"Like a friend."

"What is that like, Vio? I can not stop at that cold word. Friendship is a border-land—it lies next to love. I, Vio, in a dream, once wandered beyond the boundaries."

A look quick, eager, startled; a cheek paling and flushing! I saw them, and felt the old wild thrill, the huge passion rising like the sea, resistless and mighty. I started to my feet.

"Look, Vio! The old can love the young—the uncouth have vast springs of tenderness! In my heart is great yearning, love, devotion for one it loves! Long has it hidden its passion; it would hide it forever did it not dream, perhaps too fondly, that it now can find response."

Vio trembled, and made a movement as if toward me.

"Can it be, Vio?" I stretched my arms out wide. "Here I would have you live forever."

One cry and quick bound, and she was nestling and clinging there, while I folded my arms down over her head, her shoulders—and she was mine!

No ribbons, flowers, show, clamor, at our wedding. A quiet, solemn union in church, before witnesses only; then a rapid close carriage-drive home. That was all. I entered my house leading Vio by the hand, thrusting the door wide open before me, exclaiming,

"Viola, mistress! Vio, my own!"

Then tears and light laughter; then her small, peach cheek upon my breast, with eyes peering upward; then again my arms were folded down over lips, and heart, and timid young bosom!

MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW.

Two hundred and eighty years ago, on the 24th of August, Christendom was disgraced by the massacre of St. Bartholomew, which is illustrated on the following page. Every one has heard of the massacre; there may be many among our readers to whom the circumstances have become unfamiliar.

France was at that time divided, perhaps nearly equally, between the Roman Catholic and the Protestant sects. The strongholds of the latter were in the south and west, where Protestantism was but another term for freedom of conscience, thought, and speech. In many of the southern and western provinces the absolute power of the throne was steadily advancing toward the destruction of the popular franchises. In these the people ranged themselves under the banner of the "reformed religion"—less with a view of accepting new religious doctrines as in order to contend squarely against the encroachments of royalty. It may be said positively that the court cared nothing for either religion. Catherine of Medicis, who was the real Sovereign, and her son, Charles the Ninth, a mere boy, were so lukewarm in their attachment to Catholicity that they had frequently been accused of secret Calvinism, and had more than once provoked outbreaks among the Catholics by the favor they showed to the Protestants. Among the people—such was the ignorance and wrong-headedness of the times!—sectarian animosities boiled over. The mutual hatreds of Protestants and Catholics had frequently broken out into open warfare. Each party had foreign allies—the Protestants England, the Catholics Spain. Each had its armies and its military leaders. Each was convinced that the only available weapons of conversion were the sword, the arquebuse, and the pique. Catherine was, in her heart, satisfied that the triumph of either religion was of comparatively minor consequence if the dissensions which distracted the kingdom could only be healed. The question which troubled her was how to heal them. She tried to conciliate the Protestants; this drove the Catholics to arms. She made common cause with the Catholics; the Protestants raised the standard of revolt. She attempted a compromise; she married the King's sister, Marguerite of Valois, to the King of Navarre. The ceremony was performed on the steps of Nôtre Dame, in order that the Protestant friends of the bridegroom might not violate their scruples against entering a Catholic church; but the device only enraged both parties; the Protestants spat on the church steps, and two days after the wedding the Admiral Coligny, the most prominent of the Huguenot chiefs, was shot by an assassin concealed in a house belonging to the Duke of Guise. Every thing had failed.

A year or so before the Queen-Mother had met, in secret conference, the Duke of Alva, the Minister of the King of Spain, and the ablest and most implacable enemy of Protestantism in the world. To him she had confided her intention of trying every method to calm the reciprocal hatred between Huguenots and Catholics; and, all failing, to pursue a cautious policy of oppressing the Protestants so as to drive from their fold the rank and file of the people. Alva bluntly told her that her plans would not succeed. "If you want peace," said he, "you must have but one religion in your kingdom. The Huguenots can not be crushed by temporizing measures; you must have a fresh edition of the Sicilian vespers. For ten thousand frogs are not worth one salmon."

These counsels recurred to the Queen's memory with singular force when the news was brought her that, after all her pains, the old feud had been revived by the assassination of the Admiral Coligny. "Shall we never have peace?" she exclaimed, bitterly.

The boy, her son Charles, who had just before the murder been a strong partisan of the Huguenots, was so imbecile, fickle, and passionate a youth, that a single hint from his mother brought him violently round to the Catholic side. She told him that Coligny had sent for twenty thousand German Protestants.

"Would to God," said the wretched boy, "that not only Coligny, but all the Protestants in France beside, were dead, to plague me no more!"

This was what the Queen desired. She had come round to Alva's way of thinking. Orders were given directly. The Duke of Guise, who had been out of favor at court in consequence of his undisguised disapproval of the tolerance of the Huguenots, was sent for and taken into secret council at the Louvre. Word was also dispatched to the provosts of several city companies who were known to be intolerant in their hatred of Protestants. Time was precious. Coligny was shot on 21st August; it was decided that the massacre should take place on the night of 23d-24th.

On that terrible night Paris presented the appearance of a camp. All the civic militia—intense Catholics—were under arms. Chains were stretched across the streets. Reliable troops bivouacked opposite the Louvre. Toward midnight the Duke of Guise reviewed the assassins.

"It is the King's will that the Huguenot rebels be exterminated," said he, "when the bell sounds."

The time fixed by the Council for the commencement of the massacre was the break of day. But Charles, who, to subdue his emotions, spent the early part of the night in working at an amateur forge he had in the cellar of the palace, could not endure the delay. At half past one he ordered the bell to be rung. All the churches had been warned of what was about to happen; it is painful to read that the priests eagerly welcomed the signal, and directed the tocsin to be sounded in every belfry in Paris with savage alacrity.

The massacre began. The Huguenots, roused from their beds by the alarm, were slaughtered as they appeared in the streets. The venerable Coligny, lying helpless in his bed crippled by his wound, was assailed by a band of assassins, to whose leader he calmly said,

"Young man, have you no respect for my gray hairs?"

He was instantly massacred; his body was thrown out of window; his savage foe, the Duke of Guise, actually wiped the blood and dirt from his face in order to make sure that the corpse was that of his enemy. All that night, all next day, and all the day after, the slaughter continued. Bloodshed intoxicated the murderers. Men were seen running through the streets with blood-red piques and garments dripping with gore, shouting for more victims. Neither age nor sex were spared. Young girls, infants, aged men and mothers were slaughtered promiscuously with the soldiers of the Huguenot army. The boy King himself, roused by the sight of blood, had an arquebuse brought to him in the balcony of the Louvre and amused himself by firing long shots at the crowds which were seeking a refuge in the Pré-aux-Clercs on the opposite side of the river. After a time absolute frenzy seized the assassins. They ceased to confine their butchery to Protestants. Numbers of Catholics were killed, and houses were plundered without regard to the religious views of their inhabitants. The miscreants who were doing the King's bidding found the gold of true believers as valuable as that of heretics, nor did they let loose their lust exclusively in Protestant pastures. Paris became, in short, the scene of a perfect saturnalia.

It is not unpleasing to read that the first who complained loudly of the disorder and anarchy were the civic companies, who had tendered their services to the Duke of Guise, but who objected to seeing their houses robbed or their wives and daughters insulted. They prayed for an edict to restrain the riots. The King granted it, but warned all persons against molesting believers in the true faith. The proviso nullified the command. Though the street massacre only lasted three days for twenty-four there was no security for life or property at Paris; and murder ran its race through the kingdom for six weeks. There was not a day in the September of that year in which some massacre did not take place in some part of France. How many Protestants perished no one can tell; but several thousand were murdered in Paris and the vicinity alone.

So St. Bartholomew's Day became infamous. By no writers is it mentioned with more horror and shame than by the modern Catholic writers in France. Its story is a perpetual warning and beacon against the consequences of insensate religious rivalry and prejudice.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW, AUGUST 24, 1572.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER XXI.

In Life, as in Art, the Beautiful moves in curves.

They have dined. George Morley takes the oars, and the boat cuts through the dance of waves flushed by the golden sunset. Beautiful river! which might furnish the English tale-teller with legends wild as those culled on shores licked by Hydaspes, and sweet as those which Cephisus ever blended with the songs of nightingales and the breath of violets! But what true English poet ever names thee, O Father Thames! without a melodious tribute? And what child ever whiled away summer noons along thy grassy banks, nor hallowed thy remembrance among the fairy days of life?

Silently Lionel bent over the side of the gliding boat, his mind carried back to the same soft stream five years ago. How vast a space in his short existence those five years seemed to fill! And how far, how immeasurably far from the young man, rich in the attributes of wealth, armed with each weapon of distinction, seemed the hour when the boy had groaned aloud, "Fortune is so far, Fame so impossible!" Farther and farther yet than his present worldly station from his past, seemed the image that had first called forth in his breast the dreamy sentiment, which the sternest of us in after-life never utterly forget. Passions rage and vanish, and when all their storms are gone, yea, it may be, at the verge of the very grave, we look back and see like a star the female face, even though it be a child's, that first set us vaguely wondering at the charm in a human presence, at the void in a smile withdrawn! How many of us could recall a Beatrice through the gaps of ruined hope, seen, as by the Florentine, on the earth a guileless infant, in the heavens a spirit glorified! Yes—Laura was an affectation—Beatrice a reality!

George's voice broke somewhat distastefully on Lionel's reverie. "We near our destination, and you have not asked me even the name of the lady to whom you are to render homage. It is Lady Montfort, widow to the last Marquis. You have no doubt heard Mr. Darrell speak of her?"

"Never Mr. Darrell—Colonel Morley often. And in the world I have heard her cited as perhaps the handsomest, and certainly the haughtiest, woman in England."

"Never heard Mr. Darrell mention her! that is strange, indeed," said George Morley, catching at Lionel's first words, and unnoticing his after comment. "She was much in his house as a child, shared in his daughter's education."

"Perhaps for that very reason he shuns her name. Never but once did I hear him allude to his daughter; nor can I wonder at that, if it be true, as I have been told by people who seem to know very little of the particulars, that, while yet scarcely out of the nursery, she fled from his house with some low adventurer—a Mr. Hammond—died abroad the first year of that unhappy marriage."

"Yes, that is the correct outline of the story; and as you guess, it explains why Mr. Darrell avoids mention of one whom he associates with his daughter's name, though, if you desire a theme dear to Lady Montfort, you can select none that more interests her grateful heart than praise of the man who saved her mother from penury, and secured to herself the accomplishments and instruction which have been her chief solace."

"Chief solace! Was she not happy with Lord Montfort? What sort of man was he?"

"I owe to Lord Montfort the living I hold, and I can remember the good qualities alone of a benefactor. If Lady Montfort was not happy with him, it is just to both to say that she never complained. But there is much in Lady Montfort's character which the Marquis apparently failed to appreciate; at all events, they had little in common, and what was called Lady Montfort's haughtiness was perhaps but the dignity with which a woman of grand nature checks the pity that would debase her—the admiration that would sully—guards her own beauty, and protects her husband's name. Here we are. Will you stay for a few minutes in the boat while I go to prepare Lady Montfort for your visit?"

George leaped ashore, and Lionel remained under the covert of mighty willows that dipped their leaves into the wave. Looking through the green interstices of the foliage, he saw at the far end of the lawn, on a curving bank by which the glittering tide shot oblique, a simple arbor—an arbor like that from which he had looked upon summer stars five years ago—not so densely covered with the honey-suckle; still the honey-suckle, recently trained there, was fast creeping up the sides; and through the trellis of the wood-work and the leaves of the flowering shrub he just caught a glimpse of some form within—the white robe of a female form in a slow gentle movement—tending, perhaps, the flowers that wreathed the arbor. Now it was still, now it stirred again; now it was suddenly lost to view. Had the inmate left the arbor? Was the inmate Lady Montfort? George Morley's step had not passed in that direction.

CHAPTER XXII.

A quiet scene—an unquiet heart.

Meanwhile, not far from the willow-bank which sheltered Lionel, but far enough to be out of her sight, and beyond her hearing, George Morley found Lady Montfort seated alone. It was a spot on which Milton might have placed the Lady in "Comus"—a circle of the smoothest sward, ringed every where (except at one opening which left the glassy river in full view) with thick bosks of dark evergreens, and shrubs of livelier verdure; oak and chestnut backing and overhanging all. Flowers, too, raised on rustic tiers and stages; a tiny fountain, shooting up from a basin starred with the water-lily; a rustic table, on which lay books and the implements of woman's graceful work; so that the place had the home-look of a chamber, and spoke that intense love of the out-door life which abounds in our old poets, from Chaucer down to the day when minstrels, polished into wits, took to Wills's Coffee-house, and the lark came no more to bid bards

"Good-morrow
From his watch-tower in the skies."

But long since, thank Heaven, we have again got back the English poetry which chimes to the babble of the waters and the riot of the birds; and just as that poetry is the freshest which the out-door life has the most nourished, so I believe that there is no surer sign of the rich vitality which finds its raciest joys in sources the most innocent, than the childlike taste for that same out-door life. Whether you take from fortune the palace or the cottage, add to your chambers a hall in the courts of Nature. Let the earth but give you room to stand on; well, look up. Is it nothing to have for your roof-tree—heaven?

Caroline Montfort (be her titles dropped) is changed since we last saw her. The beauty is not less in degree, but it has gained in one attribute, lost in another; it commands less, it touches more. Still in deep mourning, the sombre dress throws a paler shade over the cheek. The eyes, more sunken beneath the brow, appear larger, softer. There is that expression of fatigue which either accompanies impaired health or succeeds to mental struggle and disquietude. But the coldness or pride of mien which was peculiar to Caroline, as a wife, is gone—as if in widowhood it was no longer needed. A something like humility prevailed over the look and the bearing which had been so tranquilly majestic. As at the approach of her cousin she started from her seat, there was a nervous tremor in her eagerness; a rush of color to the cheeks; an anxious quivering of the lip; a flutter in the tones of the sweet, low voice. "Well, George."

"Mr. Darrell is not in London; he went to Fawley three days ago; at least he is there now. I have this from my uncle, to whom he wrote; and whom his departure has vexed and saddened."

"Three days ago! It must have been he, then! I was not deceived," murmured Caroline, and her eyes wandered round.

"There is no truth in the report you heard that he was to marry Honoria Vipont. My uncle thinks he will never marry again, and implies that he has resumed his solitary life at Fawley with a resolve to quit it no more."

Lady Montfort listened silently, bending her face over the fountain, and dropping amidst its playful spray the leaves of a rose which she had abstractedly plucked as George was speaking.

"I have, therefore, fulfilled your commission so far," renewed George Morley. "I have ascertained that Mr. Darrell is alive, and doubtless well; so that it could not have been his ghost that startled you amidst yonder thicket. But I have done more: I have forestalled the wish you expressed to become acquainted with young Haughton; and your object in postponing the accomplishment of that wish while Mr. Darrell himself was in town having ceased with Mr. Darrell's departure, I have ventured to bring the young man with me. He is in the boat yonder. Will you receive him? Or—but, my dear cousin, are you not too unwell to-day? What is the matter? Oh, I can easily make an excuse for you to Haughton. I will run and do so."

"No, George, no. I am as well as usual. I will see Mr. Haughton. All that you have heard of him, and have told me, interests me so much in his favor; and besides—" She did not finish the sentence; but, led away by some other thought, asked, "Have you no news of our missing friend?"

"None as yet; but in a few days I shall renew my search. Now, then, I will go for Haughton."

"Do so; and, George, when you have presented him to me, will you kindly join that dear, anxious child yonder? She is in the new arbor, or near it—her favorite spot. You must sustain her spirits and give her hope. You can not guess how eagerly she looks forward to your visits, and how gratefully she relies on your exertions."

George shook his head half-despondently, and saying, briefly, "My exertions have established no claim to her gratitude as yet," went quickly back for Lionel.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Something, on an old subject, which has never been said before.

Although Lionel was prepared to see a very handsome woman in Lady Montfort, the beauty of her countenance took him by surprise. No preparation by the eulogies of description can lessen the effect which the first sight of a beautiful object produces upon a mind to which refinement of idea gives an accurate and quick comprehension of beauty. Be it a work of art, a scene in nature, or, rarest of all, a human face divine, a beauty never before beheld strikes us with hidden pleasure, like a burst of light; and it is a pleasure that elevates. The imagination feels itself richer by a new idea of excellence; for not only is real beauty wholly original, having no prototype, but its immediate influence is spiritual. It may seem strange—I appeal to every observant artist if the assertion be not true—but the first sight of the most perfect order of female beauty, rather than courting, rebukes and strikes back every grosser instinct that would alloy admiration. There must be some meanness and blemish in the beauty which the sensualist no sooner beholds than he covets. In the higher incarnation of the abstract idea which runs through all our notions of moral good and celestial purity—even if the moment the eye sees the heart loves the image—the love has in it something of the reverence which it was said the charms of Virtue would produce could her form be made visible; nor could mere human love obtrude itself till the sweet awe of the first effect had been familiarized away. And I apprehend that it is this exalting or etherealizing attribute of beauty to which all poets, all writers who would poetize the realities of life, have unconsciously rendered homage, in the rank to which they elevate what, stripped of such attribute, would be but a gaudy idol of painted clay. If from the loftiest epic to the tritest novel a heroine is often little more than a name to which we are called upon to bow, as to a symbol representing beauty; and if we ourselves (be we ever so indifferent in our common life to fair faces) feel that in art, at least, imagination needs an image of the Beautiful—if, in a word, both poet and reader here would not be left excuseless, it is because in our inmost hearts there is a sentiment which links the ideal of beauty with the Supersensual. Wouldst thou, for instance, form some vague conception of the shape worn by a pure soul released? wouldst thou give to it the likeness of an ugly hag? or wouldst thou not ransack all thy remembrances, all thy conceptions of forms most beauteous, to clothe the holy image? Do so: now bring it thus robed with the richest graces before thy mind's eye. Well, seest thou now the excuse for poets in the rank they give to Beauty? Seest thou now how high from the realm of the senses soars the mysterious Archetype? Without the idea of beauty couldst thou conceive a form in which to clothe a soul that has entered heaven?

CHAPTER XXIV.

Agreeable surprises are the perquisites of youth.

If the beauty of Lady Montfort's countenance took Lionel by surprise, still more might he wonder at the winning kindness of her address—a kindness of look, manner, voice, which seemed to welcome him not as a chance acquaintance but as a new-found relation. The first few sentences, in giving them a subject of common interest, introduced into their converse a sort of confiding household familiarity. For Lionel, ascribing Lady Montfort's gracious reception to her early recollections of his kinsman, began at once to speak of Guy Darrell; and in a little time they were walking over the turf, or through the winding alleys of the garden, linking talk to the same theme, she by question, he by answer—he, charmed to expatiate—she, pleased to listen—and liking each other more and more, as she recognized in all he said a bright young heart, overflowing with grateful and proud affection, and as he felt instinctively that he was with one who sympathized in his enthusiasm—one who had known the great man in his busy day, ere the rush of his career had paused, whose childhood had lent a smile to the great man's home before childhood and smile had left it.

As they thus conversed, Lionel now and then, in the turns of their walk, caught a glimpse of George Morley in the distance, walking also side by side with some young companion, and ever as he caught that glimpse a strange restless curiosity shot across his mind, and distracted it even from praise of Guy Darrell. Who could that be with George? Was it a relation of Lady Montfort's? The figure was not in mourning; its shape seemed slight and youthful—now it passes by that acacia-tree—standing for a moment apart and distinct from George's shadow, but its own outline dim in the deepening twilight—now it has passed on, lost among the laurels.

Lionel and Lady Montfort now came before the windows of the house, which was not large for the rank of the owner, but commodious, with no pretense to architectural beauty—dark-red brick, a century and a half old—irregular; jutting forth here, receding there, so as to produce that depth of light and shadow which lends a certain picturesque charm even to the least ornate buildings—a charm to which the Gothic architecture owes half its beauty. Jessamine, roses, woodbine, ivy, trained up the angles and between the windows. Altogether the house had that air of home which had been wanting to the regal formality of Montfort Court. One of the windows, raised above the ground by a short winding stair, stood open. Lights had seemingly just been brought into the room within, and Lionel's eye was caught by the gleam.

Lady Montfort turned up the stair, and Lionel followed her into the apartment. A harp stood at one corner—not far from it the piano and music-stand. On one of the tables there were the implements of drawing—a sketch in water-colors half finished.

"Our work-room," said Lady Montfort, with a warm cheerful smile, and yet Lionel could see that tears were in her eyes—"mine and my dear pupil's. Yes, that harp is hers. Is he still fond of music—I mean Mr. Darrell?"

"Yes, though he does not care for it in crowds; but he can listen for hours to Fairthorn's lute. You remember Mr. Fairthorn?"

"Yes, I remember him," answered Lady Montfort, softly. "Mr. Darrell, then, likes his music still?"

Lionel here uttered an exclamation of more than surprise. He had turned to examine the water-color sketch—a rustic inn, a honey-suckle arbor, a river in front, a boat yonder—just begun.

"I know the spot!" he cried. "Did you make the sketch of it?"

"I? no; it is hers—my pupil's—my adopted child's."

Lionel's dark eyes turned to Lady Montfort's wistfully, inquiringly; they asked what his lips could not presume to ask. "Your adopted child—what is she?—who?"

As if answering to the eyes, Lady Montfort said—

"Wait here a moment; I will go for her."

She left him, descended the stairs into the garden, joined George Morley and his companion; took aside the former, whispered him, then drawing the arm of the latter within her own, led her back into the room, while George Morley remained in the garden, throwing himself on a bench, and gazing on the stars as they now came forth, fast and frequent, though one by one.

CHAPTER XXV.

"Quem Fors dierum cunque dabit Lucro appone."—Horat.

Lionel stood, expectant, in the centre of the room, and as the two female forms entered the lights were full upon their faces. That younger face—it is she—it is she, the unforgotten—the long lost. Instinctively, as if no years had rolled between—as if she were still the little child, he the boy who had coveted such a sister—he sprang forward and opened his arms, and as suddenly halted, dropped the arms to his side, blushing, confused, abashed. She! that vagrant child!—she! that form so elegant—that great peeress's pupil—adopted daughter, she! the poor wandering Sophy! She!—impossible!

But her eyes, at first downcast, are now fixed on him. She, too, starts—not forward, but in recoil; she, too, raises her arms, not to open, but to press them to her breast; and she, too, as suddenly checks an impulse, and stands, like him, blushing, confused, abashed.

"Yes," said Caroline Montfort, drawing Sophy nearer to her breast—"yes, you will both forgive me for the surprise. Yes, you do see before you, grown up to become the pride of those who cherish her, that Sophy who—"

"Sophy!" cried Lionel, advancing; "it is so, then! I knew you were no stroller's grandchild."

Sophy drew up—"I am, I am his grandchild, and as proud to be so as I was then."

"Pardon me, pardon me; I meant to say that he too was not what he seemed. You forgive me," extending his hand, and Sophy's soft hand fell into his forgivingly.

"But he lives? is well? is here? is—" Sophy burst into tears, and Lady Montfort made a sign to Lionel to go into the garden and leave them. Reluctantly and dizzily, as one in a dream, he obeyed, leaving the vagrant's grandchild to be soothed in the fostering arms of her whom, an hour or two ago, he knew but by the titles of her rank and the reputation of her pride.

It was not many minutes before Lady Montfort rejoined him.

"You touched unawares," said she, "upon the poor child's most anxious cause of sorrow. Her grandfather, for whom her affection is so sensitively keen, has disappeared. I will speak of that later; and if you wish, you shall be taken into our consultations. But—" she paused, looked into his face—open, loyal face, face of gentleman—with heart of man in its eyes, soul of man on its brow;—face formed to look up to the stars which now lighted it—and laying her hand lightly on his shoulder, resumed with hesitating voice—"But I feel like a culprit in asking you what, nevertheless, I must ask, as an imperative condition, if your visits here are to be renewed—if your intimacy here is to be established. And unless you comply with that condition, come no more; we can not confide in each other."

"Oh, Lady Montfort, impose any condition. I promise beforehand."

"Not beforehand. The condition is this: inviolable secrecy. You will not mention to any one your visits here; your introduction to me; your discovery of the stroller's grandchild in my adopted daughter."

"Not to Mr. Darrell?"

"To him least of all; but this I add, it is for Mr. Darrell's sake that I insist on such concealment; and I trust the concealment will not be long protracted."

"For Mr. Darrell's sake!"

"For the sake of his happiness," cried Lady Montfort, clasping her hands. "My debt to him is larger far than yours; and in thus appealing to you, I scheme to pay back a part of it. Do you trust me?"

"I do, I do."

And from that evening Lionel Haughton became the constant visitor in that house.

Two or three days afterward Colonel Morley, quitting England for a German Spa at which he annually recruited himself for a few weeks, relieved Lionel from the embarrassment of any questions which that shrewd observer might otherwise have addressed to him. London itself was now empty. Lionel found a quiet lodging in the vicinity of Twickenham. And when his foot passed along the shady lane through yon wicket gate into that region of turf and flowers, he felt as might have felt that famous Minstrel of Ercildoun, when, blessed with the privilege to enter Fairyland at will, the Rhymer stole to the grassy hill-side, and murmured the spell that unlocks the gates of Oberon.

BOOK VIII.—CHAPTER I.

"A little fire burns up a great deal of corn."
Old Proverb.

Guy Darrell resumed the thread of solitary life at Fawley with a calm which was deeper in its gloom than it had been before. The experiment of return to the social world had failed. The resolutions which had induced the experiment were finally pronounced. Five years nearer to death, and the last hope that had flitted across the narrowing despondling passage to the grave, fallen like a faithless torch from his own hand, and trodden out by his own foot.

It was peculiarly in the nature of Darrell to connect his objects with posterity—to regard eminence in the future as but a brighter height from which he pass on to the Future the name he had taken from the Past. All his early ambitions, including pleasure to rich, had directed its gust at a distance, remote from the bourne of by-standers; and his failure had been a belief and despairing. Children, his line would perish with himself—himself, who find so vanated in restoration in his land! Like many wise childless also—it would leave behind it no offspring of his mind. He felt he had commenced ample wealth; he talent he had achieved a splendid reputation. But the reputation was as perishable as the wealth. Let a half century pass over his tomb, and nothing would be left to speak of the successful lawyer, the splendid orator, save traditional anecdotes, a laudatory notice in contemporaneous memoirs—perhaps, at most, quotations of eloquent sentences here lished on forgotten cases and obsolete debates—shreds and fragments of a great intellect which another half century would sink without a bubble into the depths of Time.* He had cenoted no known had admired no work that could live into the future to-day. Like the figure on a clock, which alarms the ear and is not remembered with the movement, he, so prominent an ornament to Time, had no part in its works. Removed, the eye would miss him for a day; but a nation's literature or history was the same, whether with him or without. Nothing in his life or his abilities have the luck to fasten their names to things that endure; they have been responsible for measures they did not originate, and which, for good or evil, influence long generations. They have written nothing—not even which a couplet of verse, a period in prose, may cling to the rock of ages as a shell that survives a deluge. But the orator, whether active or immediate—who enthralls his audience in proportion as his eloquence is rare—who, even in speaking like Burke what, apart from the subject-matter, closet students would praise, must, like Burke, this his eloquence, and circulate present oratorical success for ultimate intellectual renown—man, in short, whose power is so emphatically that of the DEBATER, is, like an actor, rewarded with a loud applause and a complete oblivion. Write the village pathetic and you win applause no less loud, followed by oblivion not more complete.

Darrell was not blind to the brevity of his fame. In his previous seclusion he had been resigned to that conviction—had felt it good him. Then, unconfessed by himself, the idea that he might yet appear in literature as the do something which the world would not willingly let die, had softened the face of that tranquil Nature from which at most men part not even of reach and sight. On the tree of Time he was a dead aspect upon the bough—not an inscription graven into the rind.

Ever slow to yield to weak regrets—ever seeking to combat his own enemies within—Darrell said to himself one night, while Fairthorn's flute was breathing an air of unconquerable melancholy wails, "It is too late yet to employ this still busy brain upon works that will live when I am dust, and make Posterity sing to the hair that falls to my bones?"

He shut himself up with immortal authors—he meditated on the choice of a theme; his knowledge was wide, his taste refined—words! —he could want words! Well, but what could he not write? Alas! why indeed?—He who has never been a writer he has youth, even when he is a writer in his age than he can be a painter —musician. What! not write a book? Oh yes—it be many mighty pieces on a song. But a writer, in the emphatic sense of the word —writer, that is, Darrell was an author no more. And, least of all, will be be a writer if he has been an orator by impulse and habit—an orator too happily gifted to require, and too impatiently occupied to resort to, the tedious aids of written preparation—an orator not inferior to the former orators—not, of course, an orator like those of the classic world, who elaborated sentences before delivery, and, when they delivered, published each extemporaneous incendite into rhetorical exactitude and musical perfection, but with narrow the range of compositions to a man bredened already by a great reputation! He can not have the self-abandonment—can not cultivate the healing chapter—with which Youth flings the reins to genius, and Time rules the frame of Fame. Ere and austere his themes—fastidious and hesitating his taste. Restricted are the movements of him who writes for the first time into the Forum of Letters with the purple born on his unaetrial toga. Guy Darrell, at his age, entering among authors as a novice!—he, the great lawyer, to whom attorneys would have sent the brief he had been suspected of coquetting with a muse—he, the great orator, who had electrified audiences with the sparkle of the sudden effects which distinguish oral inspiration from written eloquence—he achieve now, in an art which his whole life had neglected, any success commensurate to his contemporaneous repute!—how unlikely! But a success which should outlive that repute, win the "everlasting inheritance" which could alone have nerved him to adequate effort—how impossible! He could not himself comprehend why, never at a loss for language felicitously apposite or richly ornate when it had but to flow from his thoughts to his tongue, nor wanting ease, even eloquence, in spontaneous correspondence confidentially by miller—he should find words fail him, and ideas fail words, the moment his pen became a wand that conjured up the shades of the dread Public! The more copious his thoughts, the more embarrassing their selection; the more commanding his command of excellence, the more timidly frigid his efforts at facilities of style. It was the same with him the most skilful author, if the Ghost of the Public had not long since ceased to haunt him. While he lived, the Ghost of the Public is absolute or peopled at his will. But take an audience from the living, compress it into the shadowy, the living Public—the Ghost of the Public awes himself.

"Surely once," sighed Darrell, as he gave his blurred pages to the flames—"surely once I had some pittance of that fame which I could have spent it upon lawsuits."

The author's talent, no doubt, Guy Darrell had; but the author's temperament, never. What is the author's temperament? Too long a task to define. It is enough to say a man may write a clever book, an useful book, a book that may live a year, ten years, fifty years. He will not be a great author, a representative author in the age that rather lived in him than he it. The author differs from the man who makes him an integral, earnest, original unity, distinct from all before and all that may succeed him. He is Orpheus to the Church him and that the consciousness of individual being is the sign of immortality, and which makes all inferior creatures—so it is in this individual temperament one and indivisible; and in the intense conviction of it, more than in all the works it may throw off, that the author becomes immortal.

Guy Darrell was not the author—was not of Orpheus or Pythagoras;* but he himself, in his name, in the footprint of his being, remains, like Orpheus or Pythagoras, indestructible, indestructible.

Resigning literature, the Solitary returned to science. There he was more at home. He had cultivated science, in his dazzling academical career, with a passionate love; he had pursued the study, on his first retirement to Fawley, as a distraction from the memories of a past and undignified passions. He now for the first time regarded the absorbing alstruna occupation as a possible one for life. He was to be the solitary procession of those sons of light who have divided a new world among their lonely lives. Surely a grand ambition, not unbecoming to his years and station, and pleasant in its labors to a man who had been long familiar with research and poetic passion, and had studied her inward mysteries with a love that disdained success. Science needs not the author's art—she rejects its graces —she recoils with a shudder from its fancies. Her Solitary requires in the mind of his discoverer a limpid calm. The lightnings that reveal Dircyne's secrets dwell in serene skies. No clouds store that thunder—

"Quo brutis tellus, et vago flumina,
Quo Styx, et Nimbus atra circumvenit
Semel, Atlantiusque finis
Jacet."

So long as you take science only as a distraction, science will not lead you to discovery. And from nature even to the last Darrell was no more unquiet and perturbed in his present than in his past existence. Science like poetry had risen to distract. In the midst of august meditations—of close experiment—some haunting fancy glimmered from the far void, passed with rude shadow between Intellect and Truth—the heart eclipsed the mind. Or, if it were not, it stiffly preserved its essentially formal car Action. His was the true orator's temperament, with the orator's faculties, and with the orator's affairs —the comprehension of men and states—the constructive, administrative faculties. As such orator, and in such career alone, could he have developed all his powers, and achieved an immortality proportioned to the interest now lost in interest, he retreated from all his former occupations, and would remain long known over the lofty and pathless landscapes round him. As if it were his object to fatigue the body, and in that fatigue to support the mind, he would make his gun the excuse for rambles from sunrise to twilight over the wild moors. He had purchased upon spy, lying many miles off from Fawley. There sometimes when a man who has passed his life in the world comes to think that the more he can make the physical existence predominate, the more he can leave himself to the rude impulses of his savage keeper, or the day laborer—why, the more he can harden his nerves to support the toils of the chase.

In these rambles he was not always alone. Fairthorn delighted in the companionship that now and formerly into his master's habitual companionship. The faithful fellow had missed his master sorely in the first months of absence of five years, that on recovering him, Fairthorn seemed resolved to make up for the loss. But parting from his own habits, he would, therefore, lie in wait for Guy Darrell—creeping out like a brownie or hush, like a familiar spirit; and was no longer to be awed away by a curt syllable or a contracted brow. And Darrell, at first submitting reluctantly, and out of compassionate kindness, to the flute-player's obtrusive society, gradually began to welcome and relax in it. Fairthorn knew the great secrets of his life. To

* It had scarcely be said that the works ascribed to Orpheus or Pythagoras are generally allowed not to be genuine.

Fairthorn alone on all earth could he speak without reserve of one name and of one sorrow. Speaking to Fairthorn he was like talking to himself, or to his pointers, or to his favorite dog, upon which last he bestowed a new collar, with an inscription that implied more of the true cause that had driven him a second time to the shades of Fawley than he would have let out to Alban Morley or even to Lionel Haughton. Alban was too old for that confidence—Lionel much too young. But the Musician, like Alban itself, was of no age; and if ever the gloomy master softened into a momentary mood and even spleen in any approach to gayety, it was in a sort of autumn playfulness to this grotesque, grown-up child. They cheered each other, and they teased each other. Stalking side by side over the wild heath, Darrell would sometimes pour forth his whole soul, as a poet does to his muse; and at Fairthorn's abrupt interruption or criticism, turn round on him with fierce objurgation or withering sarcasm, or when the fute-player's sensitive pride took offence, a truculent quotation from Horace, which drove Fairthorn away into some vanishing covert on hollow, and which Darrell had at once to find, sure that, in return, Fairthorn would take a long occasion to steal into his side a coaxing prickle. But as the two came home in the starlight, the dogs dead beat and poor Fairthorn took to carry them, what the musician was leaning all his weight on his master's servant arm, and Darrell, touched with tender kindness in the face of the same coy left to lean upon him still.

One evening as they were sitting together in the library, the two hermits, each in his corner, the after a long silence, the flute-player said abruptly—

"I have been thinking—"

"Thinking, Fairthorn?" quoth Darrell, with his mechanical irony; "I am sorry for you. Try not to do so again."

"Thinks. "Your poor dear father—"

Darrell, wincing, startled, and expectant of a prickle—"Well, Fairthorn?"

FAIRTHORN. "Was a great antiquary. How it would have pleased him could he have left a fine collection of antiquities as an heir-loom to the nation!—his name thus preserved for ages, and connected with the history of the land. There are the Elgin Marbles. The person was talking to me yesterday at New Yerom Lecture; why not the British Museum as a repository; Darrell Room?" Plenty to stock it wonderfully cheap. Is the Athenians will you will never finish."

"My dear Dick," cried Darrell, starting up, "give me your hand. What a brilliant thought! I could do nothing else to preserve my dear father's name. Fairthorn, you are right. Set the carpenters at work to-morrow. Remove the boards; open the chambers; we will inspect their contents. Collect what would worthily furnish 'A Darrell Room.' Perish Guy Darrell, the lawyer! Long live Guy Darrell, antiquary at least shall live!"

It is marvellous with what charm Fairthorn's lucky idea seized upon Darrell's mind. The whole of the next day he spent in the forlorn chambers of which the heaviness alone kept the carving beside his small and homely dwelling. The pictures, many of which were the rarest originals in early Flemish and Italian art, were dusted with tender care, and hung from hasty nails upon the walls of the library. Ancient ivory carvings, wrought by the matchless hand of Cellini—early Florentine bronzes—priceless specimens of Limoges and Venetian glass—the precious trifles, in short, which the collector of ancient curiosities amasses for his heirs to disperse among the palaces of kings and the cabinets of nations—were dragged again to existence by light. The invaded mediæval building seemed a very Pompeii of the Dawn Ages, as, with renewed zest and method, select for national purposes, such mucilaginous treasures, would be the work of weeks. Before the week Darrell caused a slight bridge passage to be thrown over the gap between the two edifices. It ran from the room midway into the gables of the old house, which, originally lifted up for scientific studies, now became his museum—a museum, into the largest of the uncompleted chambers which had been designed for the principal library, he had set the building. Into the pompous gallery thus made contiguous to his mock-like cell, he gradually gathered the choicest books on the old collection. The damps were expelled by fires on gratelets earth-closet; a sunbeam admitted from windows now for the first time exchanging boards for glass; rough iron sconces, made at the nearest forge, were fixed into the walls, and sometimes lighted at night—Darrell and Fairthorn walking to and fro in a sort of mimic state, keeping company with Holbein's Nobles, Perugino's Virgins. Some of that high-bred company displeased and banished from the place they occupied inspection made the taste more rigidly exclusive. Darrell had found object, amusement, occupation—frivolous if compared with those leaves, and glasses, and algebraical crawls which had once had found object, amusement, occupation—but not frivolous even to the judgment of the sternest moralist, if that type of man be reasoned away his heart. For here it was not Darrell's taste that was delighted; it was Darrell's heart that was filled, that had found food. His head was connecting those long-neglected memorials of an ambition baffled and relinquished—here with a nation, there with his father's grave! How his eyes sparkled! how his lip smiled! Nobody would have guessed it—none of us know each other; least of all do we know the secret sources of that which we become to the public repute; but what a world of simple, fond affection, lay coiled and wasted in that proud man's solitary breast!

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A PETSLER calling out an old lady to dispose of some goods, inquired of her if she could tell him of any road to which no pedlar had travelled. "Yes," replied she, "I know of one, and that's the road to heaven."

"Sambo, you block-head, how came your betsy dat secret I told you de other day?" "I betsy de secret? I secrets de 'pistle, I betsy. I couldn't keep um, so I told um to somebody dat could."

An Irishman went to confession, and while relating his sins, he came to the telling of tobacco stealing, and one of the pockets of his father confessor's pants. The parties interested in the case of the former, and the latter burned instantly by the sight; so, heedless of time and place, he put his hand into the "hacky" into his own pocket, and after encountering a long series of tails, he pulled out a handful of tobacco, and presented it to the priest, with—"Father, I almost forgot—I stealed." "You must restore either it or its value to the owner," said the priest. "Then," said the penitent, and Pat, producing the stolen article, "I don't want it," said the priest. "I give it to the owner." "Then I am," said Pat, "and so am I, for I stealed it from myself." "Then," said the priest, "you are absolved." "Thanks to your reverence," said Pat, "I'll be after stealing his wife in the first absolution."

The Queen of M——. Lewis County, resided, several years ago, a worthy old gentleman, with his son and daughter-in-law. The latter, being of a gossiping disposition, was always complaining of her hard lot, and expressing her determination to commit suicide at the earliest favorable opportunity. One day, when the husband and wife were "out-doors," she called her father-in-law to her commit the act of self-destruction. The old gentleman, glad to get rid of her, accompanied her to the river's bank, and coolly waited for her to "jump in." This was rather a damper to the lady; but at last, she told him "good-by," and was apparently about to plunge in, when the old gentleman exclaimed, "Why don't you jump? Is it dirty deep enough?" "Yes," replied she, "it is deep enough, but I don't like the reminder of the thing out of the daughter's mind; so you may go home, and return to her home and her duties quite reformed.

A RECIPE FOR A WIFE.

As much of beauty as preserves affection,
And not much more, lest pride should dwell at the cost.
Of modest deference as claims protection,
Yet stout enough to resent not affection.
And every passion held in due subjection.
And faults enough to temper love to perfection:
Find this, my friend, and then make your selection.

"HILL, Mother Postmaster! and is there ever a letter from Jack since he left Liberty?"

"I believe there is," said the postmaster, stepping back and producing the letter.

"And will you be so kind as to rule it to me, acris? and the mistress of the house took out her pocket-book.

"To be sure," said the accommodating postmaster, "and I'll count the words for you, too." And he was from the "old soldier" of ascertaining the number, viz. When he had finished, Dennis observed,

"And why would ye be axin for the postage on that letter?"

"Fifty cents."

"And it's cheap enough, yer honor; but, as I niver think of such a thing as to insult any gentleman to pay; and say, Misther, if I'd call in one of these days, would I get the answer in it?"

"My boy, what does your mother do for a living?" was asked of a little bare-footed urchin. "She eats cold victuals."

"I would do any thing to gratify you, I would go to the ends of the earth for you," said a lover to his mistress to the object of his affections. "Well, sir, go there, and stay, and I shall be pleased."

A gentleman was one day arranging music for a young lady to whom he was paying his addresses. "Pray, Miss Ford, will you have the goodness to turn over?" she replied, carelessly, "any time will do; but the quicker the better."

CROSS-PURPOSES.—It may be said of Punyism that, with reference to it as well as with Popery, it is always playing at Cross-purposes.

THE FIRST JOCULAR ATTEMPT OF SOYER.

"EVERY INCH A SOYER" (flower).—Adam and Eve. Oh, M. Soyer! M. Soyer!!

To a friend who had married a lady who was on the shady side of forty, Jerrold said, "Ah! like yesterday thought you better than now?"

VERY CONSIDERATE.—An Irishman, being recently on the trial for stealing a blanket "not guilty" and the jury being in the box, the State Solicitor proceeded to call the witnesses, when Pat, with a look of deep concern, called Patrick turned his face to the court, and said, "Be aisy, counsellor, be aisy; don't be after calling them to be a witness against me, for I'll plead guilty."

"It is not necessary," said the lawyer, "I am guilty, for I'm as innocent as yer honor's sucking babe, but just call them to prove that my Mother Finkerton's a good woman."

"That's a flame of mine," as the bellows said to the fire.

The strongest-minded woman shrinks from being left-handed.

Some one speaking of a celebrated bare-singer, said, "He had a voice that absolutely fell on you, repeal Sealey, "the whole force of his life has been bore."

Miller, who shot at Judge Fitch, of Toledo, is now in the Lucas County Jail, Ohio. Apparently he was the following verses, and sent them to a friend in Toledo, who had them set up in type. Read:

Gods, philosophers, and kings,
Divide, mortals, among things,
Material and spirit things;
What from mind and matter springs
Confusion in profusion,
Laughing and weeping men,
Lotharios and dying men,
Preaching, teaching, praying, crying,
Shouting, singing, swinging, buying,
Selling, stealing, lying, too
For our individuals.

Lords of castles in the air,
Builders in hydrogen rare,
Rash, physicians that hair,
Draws well here as any where;
Bar, bar-keepers, bar-rooms,
Our neighbors' wives,
All customary rights,
Men of intellect and weight,
Knaves accessories—people's rights,
Men of culture, Dorcas Fitch,
Drinking, thinking, hazy wights,
Hallucinations.

Inmate Hotel, hotel!
Counties of North Ohio,
Sandusky, Cleveland, Toledo,
Send your Quixotes; here, you knew,
Lodging's cheap, the grub so so—
Bring 'em on and try 'em,
Let them fancy what they will,
Gull us fools and shoot at them,
He we make, mend, cure, or kill,
Bottle, bill, physic, Doctor Fitch
Looks to the State to foot the bill
Of our inmate Asylum.

A CONVERSE IN INDIA.—"And who," says I, "is that pretty young lady to whom Dora proposes to introduce me?" "Oh," is Miss T——, giving leave to her tirtuous grief for a moment, "that is Miss Jones, a young lady whose reputation she would have been to the Czar or the Sophy of Persia." But she has not yet numbered twenty summers; yet observe with what a delicate poise she preserves the balance of power. To one of her admirers she had given her fan, to another her scarf, the third was "in disgrace." What was to be done? Fortunately the pillow of her scandal was loose, she held the bargaining cue to tie it. He did so, recovered the scarf, and the universal equilibrium was the consequence.

YANKEE.—A gentleman, remarkable for delicacy of touch, has a shooting under "a slight mistake" in paying his bond to a second-hand clothier in the purchase of a hunting Green, and playing a thousand extra beneath the polar windows. The unfortunate tailor at last discovered that she lived at the back part of the house. Fears has favored us with the subjoined lines on this nice mishap:

M——— fell in love with a maid,
Each night 'neath the window he stood,
And there, with his soft mandolin,
He awakened the whole neighborhood;
But waking the maid
Was the thing
Her sleep, with his strains so bewitching:
While he played he forgot his fair one
She slept in the little back kitchen.

A correspondent of a local paper, says he, "said a certain barrister noted for prolixity in the Court of King's Bench, "he gives notice of a motion;" "your rizzing is always noted him by saying, 'Mr. ——, your rizzing is always a notice of motion, for every one runs that can run."

PLEASURES OF WINE.—Lord Eldon was celebrated as a hon student. "How many bottles," said his late Majesty to Sweby, "can you drink before you are drunk?" "Why, I really can't say, but I should think, your Majesty, any given quantity."

A Judge was trying a prisoner accused of forgery. While delivering his charge, and minutely recapitulating the evidence, he observed, "Gentlemen of the jury, you've all felt forgery." The effect was electric; the countenance of the prisoner, being soon after seen to nod—a confession appeared to be awake, and the unfortunate culprit, at eight escape, suddenly exclaimed, "Wake the sheriffs!" "Never mind," said the Judge, "let them sleep on for the present;" the sheriffs may have their nap out—for the prisoner is fast asleep also!"

Now and then we meet with curious letters. Here is one taken from the London Times of January, 1858. It is literally copied from a bank note in circulation at present:

"Cir, your oblege ma of yale lum un ce me. I hey a Bod kneed ain Hill in my Bow Hills and hev lost my Happy Valley."

A YOUNG MARIED'S LOGIC.—A particular preacher was one day struck with surprise on finding a beggar sitting full out of cattle on the head of a lovely maid, a member of his church, whom he had long courted and married. "Ah! Eliza," said he, "you should not waste your precious time in settling your hair; for God knows, if it is curled, he would have curled it for you." "Indeed," said the wifely maid, "I never thought of that you. Thank I was an infant he curled it for me, but now that I am grown up, he thinks that I am able to do it myself."

A witness being called into court to testify in a certain case then pending, on being asked what he knew of the matter, gave in the following lucid statement: "I have known the plaintiff a convenient between himself and the defendant."

"Pat!" said a master to his servant, "I've told you a hundred times not to say 'Where?' said I; 'I'll tell you.' 'Where?' said he: 'Faith it is!' said I; 'Now, then?' said he: 'Ay!' said I; 'Then?' said he: 'Whoy!' exclaimed, said I; "And that's all he told me upon the subject."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, August 23, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Aug. 21, 1858	$2,918,110	$3,048,110
Corresponding week, 1857	4,057,208	937,519
Decrease	$1,139,098
Increase		$2,110,591

The export of specie was $244,711, and a further sum of $1 million and a quarter was due by the last steamer on account of the new loan. It is therefore probable that the Bank Averages to be made up to-morrow will show a specie reserve of over twenty-eight millions.

Money has been easy during the week, and is now. Four is now nearer the market rate for loans on call than three. Exchange in consequence has become unsettled. We quote Banker's Bills on London at 109½ @ 8, on Paris, 5.17½ @ 5.15.

Stocks have slightly improved within the past day or two, partly on the strength of peace rumors between the Erie and Central, and partly in consequence of more cautious selling by operators. The following table will show the movement for the week:

	August 14.	August 21.
Missouri 6's	90	90
La Crosse 6's	70	70
Delaware and Hudson	99	98½
Pacific Mail	95	95½
Panama	119	114
New York Central	77½	78
Erie	16½	17
Reading	46	46
Hudson	10	11
Michigan Southern	21	23
Michigan Central	70½	73
Galena	74	75½
Rock Island	74	75½
Toledo	33	33
Illinois Central	75	76½
Cumberland	4	4
Milwaukie and Mississippi	15	15

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, August 23, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have improved materially, especially Cotton, which has risen a full half cent. Breadstuffs, though not active, have in every instance a decidedly less of Friday. Wholesale Trade is very dull. Sales are small. The reported break in the Canal has had the effect of strengthening the market. Cotton has been pretty sought after, and prices have favored sellers. Provisions have been in moderate request. Hop Trade has been limited downward. Other kinds have not varied much. Groceries have been quiet, yet steady. Coffee has been abundant. Naval Stores, Rice, and Tobacco have been inquired for at, in the main, advanced quotations. Coal has been in large supply, and has not been increased in value. Hay has been in fair demand at unfavorable rates. Freights to Liverpool have been lightly dealt in. Cotton was the only good request at full prices. The trade to London is steady. Many Dry Goods is steadily selling. Southern and Southwestern buyers are purchasing most liberally, especially of Domestic fabrics. The Dry Goods importations during the week amounted to $1,200,420, against $1,139,098 the preceding week, and $4,057,208 in the corresponding week of 1857, thus January 1 reached $37,644,519, against $72,553,010 to the same date in 1857. Political movements in other communities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations. We append a revised list of the closing quotations of the following articles:

Rejected and New State Flour, per bbl.	$4 10	@ 4 30
Superfine	4 35	@ 4 55
Superfine extra State, per barrel	4 60	@ 4 75
Superfine to fancy Western, per barrel	4 65	@ 5 00
Fancy Western, per barrel	5 05	@ 5 10
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 10	@ 5 15
Mixed to fancy Southern, per barrel	4 90	@ 5 10
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	5 00	@ 5 30
Superfine to fancy Western, per bbl.	4 75	@ 4 90
Extra Western, per barrel	4 95	@ 5 05
White Wheat, per bushel	1 30	@ 1 35
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 25	@ 1 30
Corn, per bushel	0 70	@ 0 72
Rye, per bushel	0 80	@ 0 85
Barley, per bushel	0 60	@ 0 65
Western Oats, per bushel	0 40	@ 0 42
State Oats, per bushel	0 42	@ 0 43
Canada West Oats, per bushel	0 42	@ 0 43
Southern Oats, per bushel	0 42	@ 0 43
Prime, middling Cotton, per lb.	12 00	@ 12 00
Mess Pork, per barrel	17 00	@ 17 19
Prime Mess Pork, per barrel	15 00	@ 15 00
Country Mess Pork, per barrel	11 50	@ 12 00
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	11 50	@ 12 00
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	9 00	@ 9 50
Cut Meats, per pound	10	@ 10
Lard, per pound	10½	@ 11
State Butter, per pound	18	@ 24
Western Butter, per pound	15	@ 20
Cheese, per pound	8	@ 8
Hay, per 100 pounds	2 87½	@ 3 00
Rio Coffee, per pound	11	@ 11½
Java Coffee, per pound	13	@ 14
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	29	@ 35
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	35	@ 40
Crushed Sugar, per pound	8	@ 8
Hyson Teas, per pound	30	@ 50
Young Hyson Teas, per pound	30	@ 50
Domestic Whiskey, per gallon	24½	@ 27
Hops, per pound	20	@ 25
Hay, per 100 pounds	40	@ 70
Straw, per 100 pounds	30	@ 40
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	3 62½	@ 3 62½
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	47	@ 47
Tar, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 00
Linseed Linen, per 110 pounds	1 06	@ 1 06
Linseed Oil, per gallon	71	@ 72
Sperm Candles, per pound	18	@ 19
Adel Leaf Tobacco	6	@ 25
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	6	@ 25
Domestic Felted Wool	45	@ 45

Freights continued depressed. For Liverpool—Cotton, 3-32d. per pound; Flour, 10d. @ 1s. per barrel; Wheat, 5d. @ 5½d. per bushel; Corn, 4½d. @ 5d. per bushel. For other ports proportionate rates. The number of vessels in port yesterday was 1,000, against 1,000 on the 14th inst. and 1,000 on the 7th inst. Yesterday was Court for Decrees, which were less plenty than usual. The following is a comparative view of the number of vessels in former rates:—Veal Calves were in moderate request at rather high prices. Sheep were in fair request at good full and heavy. Swine were more abundant, and were depressed. The reported sales at Forty-fourth Street during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Monday, Aug. 16.	Monday, Aug. 23.
Beeves	1,319	1,400
Milch Cows	104	135
Veal Calves	1,200	1,300
Sheep and Lambs	13,000	13,734
Swine	8,139	8,661

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were reported:

Illinois	1122	Indiana 121
Ohio	1000	Pennsylvania 57
New York	425	Kentucky 34
Michigan	160	Canada 61

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets during the week was as follows:

Common to extra Beeves, per pound	$ 6¼ @ $ 9¼
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00 @ 65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	5 @ 7½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	1 00 @ 5 50
" per pound	5½ @ 6
Live Swine, per pound	4½ @ 5½
" per head	4 50 @ 5 50
Roasting Pigs, each	1 00 @ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets have exhibited little activity. Potatoes continue plenty and cheap. Onions are in good supply and demand, and prices tend downward.

Wholesale Prices obtained by Producers at Washington Market.

Grapes, green, per pound	$ 3	@ $ 5
Blackberries, per bushel	3 50	@ 3 50
" per quart	0 06	@ 0 06
Huckleberries, per bushel	2 00	@ 2 50
Apples, new, per barrel	1 75	@ 2 00
Pears,	1 50	@ 2 50
Peaches, per basket	1 50	@ 2 00
Plums, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 00
Quinces, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Potatoes, new, per barrel	1 25	@ 2 25
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions, new, per bunch	0 06	@ 0 06
" per 100 strings	5 00	@ 6 00
Cucumbers, per 100	0 75	@ 1 00
Beets, per 100 bunches	1 50	@ 1 75
Eggs, Western, per dozen	0 12	@ 0 12
Chickens, per pair	37	@ 75
Fowls, per pound	0 06	@ 0 08
Cheese, per pair	50	@ 1 00
" per pound	0 08	@ 0 10
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@ 1 50
Turkeys, per pound	0 08	@ 0 10
Pigeons, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Woodcocks, per dozen	2 00	@ 3 00
Snipe, Dowicher, per dozen	0 75	@ 1 00
Snipe, Grayes, per dozen	0 50	@ 0 75
Plover, per dozen	1 75	@ 2 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINE for all manufacturing purposes.—To secure a perfect machine, examine the stitch. It is the only one in use which will not ravel when cut. SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, which will be supplied gratis. It gives full information on the subject.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

TO NERVOUS SUFFERERS.—A retired gentleman having been restored to health in a few days, after years of intense suffering, considers it a duty to assist others by sending (free) on receiving a post-paid envelope bearing the address) a copy of the prescription used. Direct the Rev. JOHN M. DAGNALL, 169 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

UNIVERSITY OF LOUISVILLE, KY.
MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

THE seventeenth annual course of Lectures will commence in this School on the first Monday in November and close the last of February, under the following arrangement:

J. LAWRENCE SMITH, M.D., Professor of Physiology and Pathological Anatomy.

BENJAMIN W. DUDLEY, M.D., Professor of the Principles and Practice of Surgery.

J. LAWRENCE SMITH, M.D., Professor of Medical Chemistry and Toxicology.

THOMAS D. GRISCOM, M.D., Professor of Materia Medica and Therapeutics.

LUCIEN P. BROWN, M.D., Professor of Clinical Surgery.

THEODORE S. BELL, M.D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine.

LUCIEN L. DUDLEY, M.D., Professor of Obstetrics and Diseases of Women.

J. W. BENSON, M.D., Professor of Descriptive and Special Anatomy.

S. M. BEMISS, M.D., Professor of Clinical Medicine.

THOMAS H. HUNT, M.D., Demonstrator of Anatomy.

Fees for the entire course $150. Matriculation and Library together $5. Practical Anatomy and Hospitals $15. Graduation fee $25.

A full preliminary course of Lectures will be given by the Faculty, commencing on the first Monday in October, and will close on the Dissecting Room with the opening.

Clinical instruction will be given twice a week at the Louisville Marine Hospital from the 1st of October till the close of the session.

Quizzing Classes are also established in connection with the University, at which operations are performed and instruction given in the practical course in presence of the class.

For further information, apply to

L. P. YANDELL, M.D.,
Secretary of the Faculty.

A LIST OF NEW BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their Works by Mail, postage paid, to any distance in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

MEMOIRS OF RACHEL. By Madame De B——. Illus. Muslin, $1 00.

DR. THORNE. A Novel. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "Doctor Thorne," &c. Illus. Muslin, $1 00.

MEMOIR OF JOSEPH CURTIS. A Model Man. By CATHARINE M. SEDGWICK, Author of "Married or Single?" "Home," "Live and Learn," "The Linwoods," "Hope Leslie," "Live and Let Live," &c., &c. 18mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

SQUIER'S CENTRAL AMERICA. The States of Central America; their Geography, Topography, Climate, Population, Resources, Productions, Commerce, Political Condition, Prospects, Railroads, Canals, Projected Ship Canals, Steamboat Navigation, and the Proposed Interoceanic Railway. Illustrated by numerous Maps, Plans of Cities, Portraits of Distinguished Citizens, Scenery, Costumes, Monuments, Ancient Temples, Idols, Coins, Vases, Implements, and Other Relics of Aboriginal Art. By E. GEORGE SQUIER, Author of "Nicaragua," &c. Complete in 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00.

FRED MARRYAT IN RUSSIA; or, The Boy Travellers in the Land of the Czar. By W. H. G. KINGSTON, Esq., Author of "Salt Water," "Peter the Whaler," "Ned Allen," "Mark Seaworth," "Manco," "Hendy and Gaudy Illustrated. Small 4to, Muslin gilt, 75 cents.

HISTORY OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND, OF ENGLAND. By JACOB ABBOTT. With an Illuminated Title-page and numerous Engravings. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

HISTORY OF KING RICHARD THE THIRD, OF ENGLAND. By JACOB ABBOTT. With an Illuminated Title-page and numerous Engravings. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

THE HAPPY HOME. By EDWAR. Author of "Letters to Sidney Hughes," "Mountain at Home," "Men's Minds," &c. 18mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

ISAAC TAYLOR'S WORLD OF MIND. The World of Mind. An Elementary Book. By ISAAC TAYLOR. Author of "Natural History of Enthusiasm," &c. 18mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

ATKINSON'S SIBERIA. Oriental and Western Siberia: a Narrative of Seven Year's Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirgisi Steppes, the Chinese Frontier, and part Overland from China. By WILLIAM ATKINSON. With a Map and numerous spirited Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50.

GIESELER'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. A Text-Book of Church History. By Dr. JOHN C. L. GIESELER, Professor of Divinity in the Fourth Revised London Edition. By SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL.D., and Rev. JOHN PATON. Vol. III. A. D. 1517 to the Present Time. Revised and Edited by Rev. HENRY B. SMITH, D.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. A Novel. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton.—Mr. GILFIL'S Love Story.—Janet's Repentance. By GEORGE ELIOT. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LOTUS-EATING. A Summer-Book. By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Kensett. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $2 00.

THE PRINCIPLES FILLED AND FULFILLED AND BY RELIABLE, especially adapted for the cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Asthma, Rheumatism, Pains in the head, heartburn, and that dull, wearisome pain, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Biliousness, Jaundice, spasm in the stomach and bowels; and in all cases of nervous affections, counteract their evils in a speedy manner. Purely vegetable in their composition, they do not contain mercury, minerals, or any other substance from the usual diet. Their operation is mild and pleasant. The effect produced by their use is that the whole system is vitalized, and even then the slight inconvenience is immediately forgotten in the amazing liveliness and energy which they impart. The Bracelets give power, purify the blood, remove all causes of irregularity in the digestive organs, and are thus a treasure of health to both sexes. Their virtues surpass all eulogy, and are only to be known by experience. They are sold by all druggists, and by Dr. HOLLOWAY, 244 Strand, London, and 80 Maiden Lane, New York.

DR. H. JAMES, THE RETIRED PHYSICIAN, discovered, while in the East Indies, a certain cure for consumption, asthma, bronchitis, coughs, colds, and general debility. The remedy was discovered by him after many years of study, a daughter of his own die. His child was cured, and restored to perfect health by the use of this remedy. Actuated by motives of humanity, he will send (free of charge) to those who wish it, the receipt, with full directions, at No. 54 Hudson Street, North Beverly, near Mt. Holly, N. J. Dr. BRANDRETH, 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building, New York. Sold also by Dr. Lloyd Street. The above pills, registered, 12 cents a box.

DR. H. JAMES, THE RETIRED PHYSICIAN, discovered, while in the East Indies, a certain cure for consumption, asthma, bronchitis, coughs, colds, and general debility. The remedy was discovered by him after many years of study, a daughter of his own die. His child was cured, and restored to perfect health by the use of this remedy. Actuated by motives of humanity, he will send (free of charge) to those who wish it, the receipt, with full directions, at No. 54 Hudson Street, North Beverly, near Mt. Holly, N. J. Dr. BRANDRETH, 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building, New York. Sold also by Dr. Lloyd Street, Jersey City, N. J.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and affluence of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are carefully selected, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

Advertisers in the Literary Columns will be dealt with to Advertise for Three Months, or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

KISS-ME-QUICK,
THE FAVORITE PERFUME,
Distilled from Fragrant
TUFTS,
Kiss-me-quick, the Perfume,
Kiss-me-quick Soap,
EUGENE DUPUY, Chemist and Family Druggist,
699 Broadway.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINE.—Nothing can be other and more beautiful than any new experiment this, either as respects the beauty of the work, or the simplicity and variety of the work. Call and examine it.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

THE NORTHWEST COAST.

THE NORTHWEST COAST; or, Three Years' Residence in Washington Territory. By JAMES G. SWAN. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, gilt, 25.

This work, which is now turned toward the Pacific, Mr. Swan's book will be received as a valuable contribution to the general stock of information concerning the new things on the Western shores of our country. He narrates his adventures in a graceful and agreeable manner, and by legends and anecdotes illustrative of character and manners, he adds to the variety of his work.—Cincinnati Gazette.

It is this book we find the most satisfactory account yet published of the Northwest Coast. Its descriptions are accurate and incidents are often full of life, and the character of its scenery is depicted with a graphic enthusiasm that vouches for its fidelity.—Boston Herald.

Mr. Swan has evidently been a close observer, encouraged by the explorer and described. Mr. Swan has given us many a realistic picture of life in Indian, and he does a vast variety of topics connected with Indian life. His descriptions are full of personal incidents, and abound in interest.—Providence Journal.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—Is recommended for the cure of Scrofula, Syphilis, Eruptions, and the numerous diseases arising from an impure or vitiated state of the blood.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

GODFREY'S EXTRACT OF ELDER FLOWERS.

The greatest and the most perfect ever offered to the public. Extract of Elder Flowers is a very fragrant as a perfume, and for the Skin, Arms, from the earliest ages, has been celebrated as the most perfect beautifier of the Skin. The Sun-burn, Freckles, Pimples, &c., it will quickly and completely remove.

TOILET LUXURY

GODFREY.—It is singularly beneficial and perfectly innocuous even to the youngest infant.

Ladies who have used this delightful beautifier say that, after using every pimple and all roughness, rendering the skin soft and fine, preparing it to completely for the coarse.

FAMILY LUXURY.—Godfrey's Extract of Elder Flowers is used by all the principal families of the world every day, a vital to be appreciated.

EUGENE DUPUY, Family Chemist,
699 Broadway, N. Y.

A SPLENDID NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR SEPTEMBER.

CONTENTS.

THE FINISHING OF THE DOME.
Illustrated by Device Engravings.

THE STORY OF THE LATE THIRTY-FIFTH PARALLEL.
Illustrated by Fifteen Engravings.

THE DEATH OF LOUIS XVI. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT.
Illustrated by Three Engravings.

OUR CHARLEY.

HISTORY OF THE EGYPTIANS.

MARK WILTON'S WIFE.

CECIL DACRE'S WEDDING.
IN THE AUTUMN.
WITH THE STARS.
THE LOST ROOM.
THE FAMILIES OF DISTINGUISHED LEE, GATES, STEPHEN, AND DARKE.
THE CHRISTIAN CONSTELLATION.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. THACKERAY.
Illustrated by Engravings from Designs by Eytinge.—A Fainting Fit.—Four Head-Pieces.

EDITOR'S TABLE. Which various Matches are fought.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. Sampson and the Philistines.

CHAPTER XXXIX. Harry to the Rescue.

CHAPTER XL. Which concerns their sorts is spread pay of an old Debt, and incurs some new ones.

EDITORIAL MISCELLANY.

MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.

LITERARY NOTICES. Books of the Month.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

LIST OF NEW AND MUSICAL NOTATION.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—A Shave.—A Bar.—A Double Bar.—A Hint.—A Sharp.—Low Bar.—Low Sharp.—Low Sharp.—A Flat.—A Natural Consequence.—Andante.—Allegro.

FASHIONS FOR SEPTEMBER.

ILLUSTRATIONS.—Equestrian Costume.—Riding Hats.—Hood Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

Postage on Harper's Magazine, five cents per annum.

Subscriptions to HARPER'S MAGAZINE must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents per annum.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE ON THE TELEGRAPH CABLE.

BEFORE THE CABLE WAS LAID.

It is demonstrated abroad to a certainty that the paying out machinery and the cable itself are inadequate to obtain the result wished for. A few days more, and the news of a new failure will make it plainer still that the operations have been conducted by men unqualified to overcome the difficulties they had to contend with.—N. Y. Tribune, Aug. 3.

BEFORE THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

We can not quite suppress a painful suspicion that the cable has not been stretched fully across the Atlantic as all—but there has been no communication whatever with Valentia, and will be none till another wire shall have been laid, and more successfully than this one. In short, we have a shuddering suspicion that our electricians have been deceived by the return to them on the cable of their own messages, after the manner of an echo.—N. Y. Tribune, Aug. 12.

AFTER THE MESSAGE.

When the Niagara arrived and the gallant officers were received with an electric enthusiasm such as ought to greet those who assisted at the nuptials of the Old World and the New. We shower benedictions upon Mr. Field and Captain Hudson. * * Let the ditcher throw down his spade and the workman his axe, let the poor forget their sufferings and the rich their cares, while we raise one mere general and hearty cheer for the success of the trans-Atlantic Telegraph.—N. Y. Tribune, Aug. 18.

FASHIONABLE YOUNG MAN TO BEAUTY IN DISTRESS. "Aw, can I do any thing for you?"
BEAUTY. "Oh, do! please sit on my lorns's head!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK.

BY PIERRE EGAN, Esq.

Modern fiction has no pages that surpass the "Flower of the Flock" in all the qualities that go to make a great romance. In plot, characters, language, it is all "one pure and perfect chrysolite."—Eminence.

Now ready, price 50 cents.

FREDERIC A. BRADY,
116 Nassau Street, N. Y.

Send for Brady's Mammoth Catalogue of all the latest and best Publications, mailed free on addressing as above.

"THE BOUDOIR SEWING MACHINE," Lerris Patent, are now in general use, and during the past season, their superiority over, with a view of rendering them special reference unnecessary. These combine utility or value, have four patterns to select from at 464 Broadway, near Grand street, N. Y.

P. S.—Circulars and Specimens of work by mail if desired.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $10 per week.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES.—NEW and VALUABLE IMPROVEMENTS.—A new Tension and a Hemmer that forms hems of our width without previous basting. Office, 343 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

DIAGRAM OF THE LOCK STITCH.

This is the only Stitch that can not be ravelled, and this presents the same appearance upon each side of the seam. It is made with two threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the centre of it. Send for circular.

TO CASH AND SHORT TIME BUYERS.

NEW STOCK OF
RIBBONS AND DRESS TRIMMINGS.

MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,
509 Broadway,
OPPOSITE METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
ARE NOW PREPARED TO SHOW ONE OF THE most select and desirable stocks of the above goods to be seen in the city.

AGENTS WANTED to sell a Chart of the ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH, with Portrait of CYRUS W. FIELD, and other valuable Works.
S. D. BABCOCK, 265 Broadway, New York.

SODA ASH, NEWCASTLE SAL SODA. } SOAP POWDER, PREPARED POTASH.

BI CARBONATE SODA.
also,
PERFECTLY PURE
CREAM TARTAR,
Prepared under our own supervision.

Sold in papers of 1 oz. to 10 lbs., in boxes of 10 to 100 lbs., or in original packages of our own importation, of the best brands.

"EXCELSIOR DIETETIC," "DOUBLE REFINED FOUR," } "EXTRA REFINED FAMILY," AND "PULVERIZED SODA."

SALERATUS,

Made at our "CHEMICAL WORKS," Jersey City, the only one of the kind in the Union!

Our Saleratus, of their various grades,
Warranted TEN PER CENT better, for the price, than can be obtained elsewhere.

Also,
OUR HIGHLY IMPROVED AND CELEBRATED
EXCELSIOR YEAST POWDER,
PROVED RELIABLE!—Gives the best Satisfaction!

Our Articles are First Class, and are put up expressly for the Wholesale Jobbing Trade.

Buy of us—we are the first hands!

We have the various qualities of coupure Sup. Carb. SODA and CREAM TARTAR, which we sell, when required, as the purchaser may desire by day, do,
"Less than first cost!"
Call on us.

THOMAS ANDREWS & CO.,
Manufacturers and Importers,
138 & 139 Cedar, near West Street, New York.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, Nos. 46 and 48 East 14th street, near Madison Park. Boarding and Day School. Instruction in the French, Latin, Greek, German, English, Spanish, German languages, besides the French, which is the language of the School. A Junior Department has been added. For details, references, &c., circulars to be had.

Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

FORT PLAIN SEMINARY
AND
FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE.
W. H. BANNISTER, A.M., ... Principal.
A FIRST-Class Seminary, perfectly arranged, beautifully located, and with an able corps of Teachers.
Fourth Session will commence in German English per Term of fourteen weeks, $20 00 if paid in advance.
Fall Term opens, August 23d. Winter Term opens, December 14th.
Address the Principal, Fort Plain, N.Y.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE
FAIR will open at * CRYSTAL PALACE,
Sept. 16th.
Goods received on and after Sept. 7th.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE Subscribers.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the HARPER & BROTHERS Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

WILL BE READY,
On the 25th day of August,
The first Number of the
BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING EXPRESS,
A FIRST-CLASS WEEKLY, devoted to Politic Literature, Local and Foreign Intelligence, interesting Correspondence from such Writers as John Brougham, "Belle Britton," and others; Dramatic, Musical, Literary, and Financial matters, &c. In brief, just such a paper as every New England man of intelligence, at home or abroad, will deem indispensable—a perfect weekly compendium of all that is essential to be known of Boston and New England life and incident.
Terms: $3 00 per annum, payable in advance. Single copies for sale at all Periodical Depots and by Newsmen.
Address JONES & FARLEE,
Editors and Proprietors,
No. 3 Water St., Boston, Mass.

"VROOM & FOWLER'S"
WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
Guaranteed to cool the most Fastidious.
JOHN B. VROOM, 207½ BAKER, 75 Liberty St., N. Y.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 and $25 SEWING MACHINE received the First Premium over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.
For Compact and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.
Office, 403 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
Send for descriptive Circular.

H. C. BURTMAN & CO.,
Sole Agents for the United States.

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 88.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. GENERAL JAMES WATSON WEBB, WITH A FINE PORTRAIT.

II. THE OFFICIAL ODE ON THE CABLE.

III. FOUNDLINGS.

IV. OUR WATERING-PLACE CORRESPONDENCE.—LETTER FROM LONG BRANCH.

V. THE LOUNGER.

VI. THE SNAKE.

VII. SALT LAKE CITY, WITH A VIEW OF BRIGHAM YOUNG'S HAREM AND THE DESERET STORE.

VIII. HISTORICAL ODDS AND ENDS. THREE ILLUSTRATIONS.

IX. LITERARY.

X. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

XI. FOREIGN NEWS.

XII. SCENES IN THE COUNTRY, WITH TWO MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATIONS.

XIII. OUR NEW ORLEANS.

XIV. DULWER'S "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT"—CONTINUED.

XV. INTERVIEW BETWEEN MR. REED AND THE CHINESE MANDARIN, WITH A FAC-SIMILE OF A DRAWING BY A CHINESE ARTIST.

XVI. A HAT TALK.

XVII. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

XVIII. MARKETS AND FINANCIAL REPORT.

XIX. CONCEALITIES.

GENERAL JAMES WATSON WEBB.

In the list of American journalists a very prominent and distinguished place is occupied by General James Watson Webb, senior editor and proprietor of the New York Courier and Enquirer, whose portrait we lay before our readers this week. He was among the first to rouse the American newspaper from the slumber of being but a mere vehicle of advertisements to the life of forcible and spirited comment on the great questions of the day. Identified for the last thirty years with the political history of the United States, the name of General Webb has also honorable power in the military annals of the same; while in social life, among those who know him, it is synonymous with all those generous courtesies and amenities, and that sense of honor which form the character of the high-toned gentleman. General Webb comes of good and revolutionary stock. He was born in Claverack, Columbia County, in this State, on the 8th of February, 1802. His father, General Samuel B. Webb, of Wethersfield, Connecticut, was the sixth lineal descendant from Richard Webb, who was admitted freeman in the town of Boston, in 1633, established at Hartford in 1635 in connection with the Rev. Mr. Hooker. At the battle of Bunker Hill, General Samuel B. Webb, then Lieutenant, commanded Captain Chester's Company of Volunteers; was wounded, thanked by General Orders for his gallantry, and appointed aid-de-camp of General Putnam. In June, 1776, he was appointed the aid-de-camp of Washington, and was wounded at the battle of White Plains, and again at Trenton. In 1777 he was promoted to the command of the Third Connecticut Regiment, and after serving some months on the Hudson, he was taken prisoner in crossing over to Long Island under command of General Parsons. He was not exchanged until 1781, when, upon the retirement of Baron Steuben, he succeeded that officer in the command of the Light Infantry of the army. At the close of the Revolution General Webb settled in New York, and in 1787 married the daughter of Judge Hopkins, of Columbia County, the great-grandfather of the original proprietor of the Manor of Claverack, to whom it was granted in 1686. The subject of our present sketch was named John Watson, after Judge Watson of this city, who was in the Third Connecticut Regiment, and subsequently one of our most distinguished merchants and a Senator of the United States.

General Webb received early education at Cooperstown, Otsego County, under the immediate supervision of the Rev. John Smith, of that place, who had the reputation of being one of the best linguists in the State. Immediately thereafter he commenced the trial of a mercantile life with Colonel Magher, of Cherry Valley, not in accordance with his own wishes, but as a sort of compromise with his brother-in-law and guardian, Judge George Morell, who desired that he should study law, and with his own promptings which led him to choose the army or navy, or else medicine for his profession. But the counter and the desk would not do for young Webb, and giving notice to his brother-in-law to that effect, we find him, at the early age of seventeen years, with that self-reliance and independence which has ever since marked his character, starting in the world on his own account, coming to the city of New York, obtaining from Governor Clinton a letter to Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of War, stating his desire to enter the army, and certifying that he was the son of General Samuel B. Webb; and then, with only three dollars in his pocket, but with strong faith and hope to keep it in countenance, we see him boldly introducing himself to Mr. Calhoun, at Washington, delivering his letter, and composedly awaiting the answer. The boldness and frankness of the boy at this interview completely won the heart of Mr. Calhoun, while the kindness of Mr. Calhoun secured, in return, the complete affection and esteem of the boy. For a time intercourse but connected this mutual feeling into a bond of friendship, never, amidst all the changes of party and party politics, to be broken. When Mr. Calhoun had read Dr. Witt Clinton's letter under-scored that it was but a certificate of identity, he frankly admitted the boy's claims to consideration, but, at the same time, said it was absolutely impossible to give him the appointment he solicited, in consequence of the graduating class at West Point being a large one, and more than sufficient to fill all the vacancies, and their claims were paramount. "If there had been no graduating class from West Point, would my claims have been recognized and I appointed?" asked young Webb. "Certainly; but why do you ask?" was Mr. Calhoun's answer. "Because in that case," was the prompt reply, "I wish permission to address you a letter, examining into the justice of the ground upon which you have made a decision which can not fail to have an influence upon my future life." The letter was written, and at the next interview Mr. Calhoun took him kindly by the hand, and said, "I have carefully read your letter, and you have demonstrated your claim to be appointed, while the manner in which you have accompanied your purpose in with me evidence of your fitness for the army." The interview closed with his being appointed a Lieutenant in the Fourth Battalion of Artillery, then commanded by Colonel Hamo, while ordered to report at Governor's Island, in the harbor of New York; thus not only giving him a commission, but also conceding the choice of corps and station.

Lieutenant Webb reported for duty in New York harbor in August, 1817; but fond of active life, and desirous of seeing the great West, he exchanged to Detroit in the autumn of the same year. In the spring following, then eighteen, he was sent with forty men to relieve Captain Fahy, of the 4th Artillery, in the command of Fort Gratiot, situated at the outlet of Lake Huron, and then quite a frontier post. Both of his predecessors had left more than half their commands from desertion, it being only necessary for the deserter to cross the river and take the first steamer settlement in Upper Canada; and General Macomb's last words to him on leaving Detroit, were—"See if you can not bring back more than half of your command, next autumn, when I shall see about relieve you." Thus prompted to extraordinary exertion, he resolved at every hazard to reciprocate the kind part that desirted, and then, if possible, deter others from similar attempts. The opportunity soon presented itself. Three men disappeared, and there was no doubt of their having gone to what was called the "Sedeon settlement," some fifty-five miles in the Interior of Canada. With three trusty men and the Indian who gave the information Lieutenant Webb pursued the fugitives, through the dense and almost impassable forest, to their hiding-place, recaptured them, brought them back to Detroit, where they were punished severely, according to the rules of war, and then dismissed to their duty. The lesson proved effective. At the reduction of the army in 1821, Lieutenant Webb was retained in the Artillery, but his pride being satisfied, he exchanged into the Infantry, and in June, 1821, reported for duty at Chicago, which post was then commanded by Colonel, afterward General, John M'Neil. Lieutenant Webb was immediately appointed Adjutant of the post. On the last of January, 1822, Mr. M'Kinney, the sub-Agent for Indian affairs, reported to the commandant that a friendly Potawatamie chief had brought to him a piece of tobacco sent him by the Sioux Indians, with an invitation to his tribe to participate in the cutting of the 5th Regiment of Infantry, then stationed at St. Peter's, on the Falls of St. Anthony, and occupying only temporary huts, in full reliance upon the friendly feelings of the Sioux. It was well known that Colonel Snelling and his entire command, including the wives and children of the officers and men of the regiment—almost every officer in which was married—were in a very expectant condition, as they had not had time to erect the necessary works for their defense, and of course, as there was no doubt of the accuracy of his intelligence, the greatest anxiety prevailed at Chicago in regard to their fates. The Adjutant was accordingly ordered to find some person willing to carry a letter to the commandant of Fort Armstrong, at Rock Island, on the Mississippi, the information to be thence forwarded up to St. Anthony. But there were no inhabitants within 180 miles of the fort, the nearest being at Fort Wayne, in Indiana, with the exception of a few engagees and hivernes for traders who visited about the garrison. These and the friendly Indians promptly refused to go from fear of the Winnebagoes, then occupying the country between Chicago and the Mississippi. In this dilemma Colonel M'Neil expressed his wistfulness to order any party upon such a duty, as the strength of his command rendered it impossible to detach a force sufficient to protect itself, and yet there existed the most urgent necessity for the information being conveyed to Rock Island, by the hazard what it might. In this emergency Lieutenant Webb volunteered his services, which were gladly accepted, and, having engaged his Adjutancy, he left the fort on the 6th of February, accompanied by a sergeant and an Indian guide, with one horse to ride and break a path through the snow, and one to pack their provisions. It would be interesting to the reader to follow Lieutenant Webb in his adventures during this perilous and difficult undertaking, but the limits assigned to this sketch will not permit us to give the details. Braving alike the wilderness, the freezing cold, the hostile

GENERAL JAMES WATSON WEBB.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY FREDERICKS.]

Indiana, and death itself. Lieutenant Webb push. d forward with his soldier and Indian guides, and after tremendous dangers and hardships reached, safe and unharmed, the banks of the Mississippi, protecting himself the body of hostile Indians by which Fort Armstrong was surrounded, and entered the fort itself. His escape was deemed almost miraculous by Major Larrabee (who commanded) and his brother officers. On the same day an express was sent up the Mississippi on the ice with a communication from Lieutenant Webb, which, in due time, reached Colonel Smith, one of the most active and efficient officers in the service, and most fortunately at a period when the leading officials of the country had set about the garrison. Troops were quickly ordered and confided to the brave and honorable Lieutenant Webb, as the interior inviting all the principal men of the nation to a Grand Council. They consisted of upwards of three hundred, the troops surrounded the Council house, and Colonel Snelling appeared before them in full uniform of their treachery and the very important fact that their principal chiefs were then in confinement as hostages, and that one chief had already received the fatal blow of death, but for the energy and perseverance of Lieutenant Webb, must have resulted in the immediate massacre of the troops and its women and children.

In 1838 Lieutenant Webb was appointed Adjutant of the Third Regiment, and it was universally conceded that he had no superior of rank in the service. In the same year, 1838, General Webb resigned his commission in the army, and entering the most devoted personal attachment to General Jackson, in December, 1837, he became the proprietor and principal editor of the Morning Courier and Enquirer. The paper had been established by previous, but was found being stopped in December for want of funds to carry it on, when General Webb became the proprietor, and made it a most efficient auxiliary in the election of General Jackson, his old friend and military commander. In 1839 he purchased the New York Enquirer from M. M. Noah, and united this paper with the Courier, a newly emerged from the system of colonial dependence which had continued from the period of the Revolution. The Courier, the Enquirer, the Commercial Advertiser were the leading papers of the city, and the united journals of the two establishments gave the old organ a length an ordinary leader of the Courier and Enquirer of the day. It was the terror of the ship news and the newspapers from the pocket-ships as they arrived, and all were compelled to look to its columns for their earliest news as was then possessed by all alike. This did not correspond with the views of General Webb, and the policy of discarding the old paper was conscientious, and he very soon set up a ship-news collecting establishment of his own, which, with the Commercial Advertiser, a fullsome clipper, and a fleet of pilot-boats, distanced the Custom House establishment. The Courier, Daily Advertiser, and several other papers, to combine in a similar establishment, and the result was a long and fierce cruising off the Hook, and small boats from time to time connecting with her. Webb then connected with his late boss Noah, before the latter had established ship-builder, to build him a clipper schooner of six hundred tons, which should outsail every pilot-boat and schooner in the harbor, or he is not compelled to take her. Under this contract the schooner was built and Enquirer was built, and unquestionably she was the strongest and fastest craft that had ever been built at that day. With this schooner cruising from 70 to 100 miles at sea, and the Eclipse at the Hook, and a fleet of smaller boats inside, all experienced seamen and well manned, and in consequence the combined opposition purchased the news from Boursaud's Wall Street office, and the necessary energy having thus been infused into the whole concern against General Webb was made the distinction in procuring early and exclusive intelligence from Washington during the session of Congress. There were no railroads or telegraphs in those days, and the mails from the South were the sole source of news received in New York in the night of the following day. Thus the Congressional proceedings of Monday reached New York on Wednesday night, and appeared in the following papers of Thursday. Webb determined they should appear in the Courier and Enquirer of Wednesday, and with that view made a contract with certain parties to run a daily express from Washington to New York, reaching the entire session of the next Congress, for which he agreed to pay $7500 per annum. He also arranged nightly railroad every six miles from Washington to this city, and many of our merchants still remember how regularly the "Express" gave him the news of the passage of measures of the Courier and Enquirer, twenty-four hours in advance of the rest. Against this system of opposition he drew, enlarging the paper, employing additional editors and reporters, spending enormous sums for telegraphic returns, and devoting whole columns to subjects never before touched upon by the press, the consequence was that press were more than quadrupled, and four of the old morning papers died out. But a new impetus was thus given to the newspaper press of the city, and the public listened to increase to the day; and for that impetus to the consequences upon the public mind and the character of the press, the community are unquestionably indebted to General Webb. But in the first stress of success he owed an old brewer, and from that day all enterprise in collecting news ceased, and the Courier has ever since brought up their arse in anticipation of the news boats. And so with the "Express"—the telegraph and railroad may completely disposed of that once powerful agency, and from that time every pass has had placed within its reach the means of obtaining information which has given any other trouble than the expense of paying for it. The "Associated Press," however, does not deserve this, for it and three units congenitally so field for individual enterprise. In fact "Associated Press," as understood in the country, the Courier and Enquirer maintains its character of a commercial and newspaper of the first rank, distinguished alike for the fullness of its commercial intelligence, the ability of its editorials, the tone of General Webb and his associates in the press, and for its scholarly criticisms on books and art.

In 1840 General Webb was appointed minister to Austria, but in the following session of the Senate that body refused to confirm him—He then declined the office of postilion to him. After eighteen years of personal devotion to Mr. Clay, General Webb accepted the commission of General Taylor for the Presidency in preference to his old friend. Not from any want of confidence in Mr. Clay, but because he had informed both Mr. Clay himself and General Webb that he would not be a candidate; and they, in consequence, had come out for General Taylor.

The political career of General Webb is too well known to require any comment. His earnest political life from the start in utter ignorance of party usm and party assignments, and acting simply from his impulses of right, he soon found himself at war with politicians on his political associates as with his political opponents. In a few months after General Jackson's inauguration he was overcome in his condemnation for attempting to withdraw from the roll of the navy; and being in favor of both a Tariff and a United States Bank when General Jackson advocated them, when the President and his party abandoned those measures and Jackson removed the deposits from the bank of the United States, General Webb openly abandoned his support. He then aided in consolidating and gave the name of Whig to the elements of opposition to the Democracy, and no one man has ever exercised more influence in any party than General Webb can rounded to the councils of the late Whig party of the United States, and was one of the seventy-seven of that so recognized in allegiance to party, except just as far as the advocate of principles he loved. And it is from supporting the old avowed and determined ordinary avowed of always his Democracy, he has frequently been forced in opposition to his party associates, and has incurred the political integrity he doubted. Thus he has time and again opposed the Whig party in Congress, in Legislature, and Mayoralty nominations of his party when he could not support the men or measures, and has invariably received no principle; while he has always cheerfully given his support to the nominees of the party when the party adhered to principle, simply because great principles were involved in success.

In the Mexican war, as earnest an advocate of the Constitutional rights of the South now as he ever was; and on the Texas annexation question, he never stood up more whatever pressure to assail them. But he is equally opposed to the enlargement of slavery since free territory.

The leading characteristics of General Webb are entire independence of character, unbounded energy, untiring perseverance and disregard of consequences—all of which have so clearly marked his editorial career as to render him a conspicuous example of conduct by his political friends as well as his opponents. It is not our present purpose to enter into the political history of parties during the developments of truth, has already proved the inherent error of the principles of the secession party and their ultimate failure. We can only refer to the conduct of the press, under which character, which even his enemies concede, I devoted attachment to those who have done him a kindness. Accordingly, to that kind and generous political course of the press he suffered an unkind word to be published against Mr. Buchanan, his old friend, and the friend of his father, in the exciting topics of the day: while the Courier and Enquirer was under the control of General Webb, it always declared a conviction that he was the very soul of honor, and a gentleman of the greatest purity and sincerity, acting upon a mistaken view of the subjects upon which they differed. This was no mawkish but our honest opinion, and we only now refer to it because of the incitement toward Mr. Colfaxes which was stronger than the political opposition which existed between him and Mr. Buchanan without paying his respects to Mr. Colfax, and we have always been a personal friend.

The habits of General Webb as a writer, and his bearing as a man, are peculiarly characteristic. He has always had by good judges that General Webb will prepare more matter for the press in a given time, and that of a more valuable character, than any three ordinary men of topics, than any three journalist; and this is unquestionably true. He writes rapidly, and very little on correction. No matter how grave the topic, he rarely locks his pen, and his style is clear, terse, and forcible. As an employer, for men enjoy such devoted attachment as no part of the country. His kindness to the sick and serious are often communicated with a prompt brevity indicative of his having once worn the epaulet; but it is only necessary to see him among his children to know his sterling worth. He is considerate and indulgent toward his wife and children, and his home is a happy one. He is a thoughtful regard for the welfare of those in his employ, while the kindness of his heart is manifested in the labours of his distribution.

General Webb has been twice married. His first wife was Helen Lispenard, daughter of Alexander L. Stewart, of this city, and grand-daughter of Anthony Lispenard, Esq., of the Bowery, and Miss Lispenard, granddaughter of this city and State. She died in 1845. General Webb's second wife is Laura Virginia, youngest daughter of Jacob Cram, Esq., of this city. General Webb is a member of the Episcopal Church, a regular attendant of counseling precepts; and we trust that there are many years of usefulness before him. We feel that we continue to exhibit that fearlessness and independence in the cause of right which have ever characterized him, and to maintain the high position which he has won by performing faithfully the duties which he has assumed, and continue to grace that social life of which he is an ornament.

THE OFFICIAL ODE ON THE CABLE.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

AIR—Star Spangled Banner.

Oh, say not the old times were brighter than these,
When bosoms were torn from the warriors that bore them!
Oh, say not the ocean, the storm, or the breeze,
Can force a proud nation to bend to the knee!
For the battle's red light grows pale to the sight,
When the pen wields its power, or thought feels its might.

Now mind reigns triumphant where slaughter has been,
And the wreath of the victor is twined with the queen's!
Let the joy of the world in rich harmony rise,
Let the heart keep its sheath, and the cannon its thunder;
Now industry exhorts from earth to the skies,
And science links nations that war shall not sunder.
Where the mermaids sit weep, and the pearls lie silent,
Thought flashes in fire through the fathomless deep;
Now mind reigns triumphant where slaughter has been,
Oh, God bless our President! God save the Queen!

Let the joy of the world in rich harmony rise,
Let the heart keep its sheath, and the cannon its thunder;
Now industry exhorts from earth to the skies,
And science links nations that war shall not sunder.
Where the mermaids sit weep, and the pearls lie silent,
Thought flashes in fire through the fathomless deep;
Now mind reigns triumphant where slaughter has been,
Oh, God bless our President! God save the Queen!

When the sunset of yesterday flooded the west,
Our old mother country lay on in the distance;
But the lightning has flashed the message to her breast—
That world-full has had that first gave us existence!
We feel, with a start, the quick pulse of her heart—
And the mother and child are no longer apart!
For mind reigns triumphant where slaughter has been,
Oh, God bless our President! God save the Queen!

The blood that was kindred throbs greatly once more,
And the glow of our joy fills the depths of the ocean;
It thrills through the waves, and it sings on the shore,
Till the globe, to its poles, feels the holy emotion.
We join in one song, for the cannon is dumb,
Where the Saxon blood burns, but it stirs for the right!
For mind reigns triumphant where slaughter has been,
Oh, God bless our President! God save the Queen!

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1858.

OUR SUPPLEMENT.

With this Number we issue an

ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH SUPPLEMENT,

of eighty pages, containing a complete History of the Telegraph from the first idea to its successful working by the transmission of the first message over the Atlantic Cable. This work has been carefully compiled from the most authentic sources, and will be found to contain an account of all the various telegraph enterprises and methods, a narrative of the laying of all the submarine cables, a copious report including Mr. Field's journal of the recent operations on the Atlantic Telegraph Fleet, together with biographical sketches of Messrs. Field, Brett, Halliday, Bright, the Governor of Newfoundland, etc. It is illustrated by forty large and elaborate woodcuts, among which we may mention portraits of Field, Brett, Halliday, Everett, etc; the Morse, Hughes, Bain, Wheatstone, and Hughes instruments; the Atlantic, Newfoundland, Deer and Cable Cutters and Engine, and Mississippi submarine cables; the famous Everett paying-out machine; Trinity Bay, Valentia Bay, St. John's, Newfoundland, Gape Ray; the bottom of the Atlantic, showing the Telegraph Plateau and the depths north and south of it; together with several beautiful illustrations of the Niagara and Agamemnon on their way westward, at the act of laying the cable, etc., etc. The whole for FIVE CENTS.

THE OPENING OF CHINA TO THE WORLD.

THE practical business of the Atlantic Telegraph has been fully inaugurated by the announcement of the most important events that has been concluded since the dynasties overthrew the spirit of revolution in 1815. China, comprising within its bulk half of the human species and producing population of the globe, retarding Europe in territory, and the United States in the variety of its products, surpassing all other nations in the extent of its capacities and resources, has at length been admitted into the family of civilized nations. The allied armies—the powers of Europe have extorted from the Chinese Government all the rights which the family of nations grant to each other: free ingress and egress, diplomatic representation at the capital, and unrestricted trade, subject, of course, to fair local laws and wages. Glorious as is the roll of conquests of which took the powers captured, this last, they never won so splendid a victory as this.

China is the only one of all existing nations which still unconquered, remained in barbarism as the dark ages. Whatever objections may be made to Chinese chronology, there can be no doubt that its institutions which date from Confucius at the present day were in full vigor at a time when the most venerable of the modern nations of Europe were growing in nature and historic. And though bodily political revolutions have been numerous in Chinese history—dynasties, in short, as they have been in Europe entirely in France—they have never changed the national progress of the Chinese, or the sustaining interests of their population, or the growth of their trade and wealth. They have never permitted any radical change in the national institutions. And precisely imbued with the characteristics which they share with the Anglo-Saxon ordinary spirit in trading spirit—the people of China have steadily advanced in the development of property for a thousand years at least. In the controversies that, at the present day, the Chinese cities are the largest, the Chinese capitalists are the richest, the Chinese merchants are the most extensive in the world. Even in Canton, which, as we learn from Monsieur Huc, is regarded as a mere sea-port—a place where Newfoundland and Liverpool trade merchants live in a style of splendor almost unknown to the royal houses of Europe. Extreme civilization has produced in China, as it has in the highest pitch of development; in various important manufactures the Chinese outstrip the world. Labor is cheaper there; hence almost the only kind of machinery which the Chinese do not possess is that which saves or economizes labor. In the silk and porcelain manufactures as far as any single nation can hope to do, when it has no foreign competition to stimulate enterprise and improvement.

That single thing lacking—foreign competition—is now about to be bestowed on China. By the same power which forces foreign nations may compete with the Chinese in their own markets. Let us not hasten to congratulate ourselves on the new market that is opened for us at others' expense. All reliable travelers concur in stating that, at present, there is no demand for foreign products in China. And, in fact, because have all that we can send them, and in all the fabrics and wares which they consume their own manufacturers can undersell the foreign world. This, however, is, of course, a mere temporary condition. Foreign wares will make for themselves a market. It is reasonable to suppose that in these manufactures to which our national energy has been specially directed, and in which our workers have had the accumulated of the experience of centuries and the rivalry of the world, we shall soon outstrip China. So soon as we have a fair field for competition, the intelligence of the Chinese will create a demand for every article which we can make better and cheaper than our Chinese rivals. We could not desire more.

It will take but a few years for a regular trade to be established between this country—and especially our Pacific States—and China, on fair and legitimate principles of exchange. We shall cease to send to China millions of silver in payment of our trade with it. What we take from the Chinese will be paid for in the long pointed in our labor—software, staffs, machinery, and so forth. Thus we shall not only gain a new market more profitable than any which we now supply, but we shall relieve the severe drain of specie which our commercial dealings in China in the Chinese will be paid for in the long pointed in our labor—software, staffs, machinery, and so forth. Thus we shall not only gain a new market more profitable than any which we now supply, but we shall relieve the severe drain of specie which our commercial dealings in China produces now involves. So long as peace is maintained, such peace has seldom been chronicled in our history.

OUR WATERING-PLACE CORRESPONDENCE.

LONG BRANCH, August 25, 1858.

EVERY week, dear Civilizer, hundreds of copies of your papers are bought, read, canned over and discussed at Long Branch. Every week, I daresay a rumor arises that "this week's Harper will have a letter from Long Branch." Nothing, however, has literary tendencies and is known to have written Greek verses in childhood, is bearer to remark mysteriously that the manuscript of "Ion" or "The Branch" were "shown up" in the next Weekly. The keeper of a famous house knew that he could not have offered free board and Champagne daily to an industrious journalist, on conviction that he should write one letter or two, descriptive of the universal merits of Long Branch in general, and the Paradise Inn in particular.

I am not that individual. God help me, I am a lazy legger. And nobody ever thought enough of me to offer me free board, much less free Champagne. But I will, nevertheless, of my own free will and mere motion, write you a remark anent concerning Long Branch.

Some time since, I mean prior to the siege of Troy, or about the date of the Lisbon earthquake or King Ahab, or may-be thousands of years before, I am confident that I was in a state of the Ante-Diluvian and exposed to the eastern gales. [There's no use discussing the point: I am fixed in my opinion, and if Lieutenant Maury or Professor Agassiz, whose relative is new at the Branch, are hereby notified that I will send reply to any thing they may advance in regard to my statement.] In these days the winds blew and the waves arose, and by reason of the strong drifted up the shore the old Jersey shore, a wave of sand. Still the winds blew and the waves rose in vain and the sand went licking up, as it went, a few insignificant sandgrains, and the blowing and the rolling, and the mighty gathering-up continued through many year, and century after century, and thousands of years after thousands of years, there arose a hill and a bed, over against the Jersey shore, a sandy breakwater, many miles in length, and of various breadth, from a mile or two to a few rods, and this sandy breakwater and the main shore there rises an inlet of a few clear yards in breadth, through which as he noticed the crevice which invariably intervenes between a new-drift and a fence, will at once declare the cause of the phenomenon. The philosophers of the locality call the inlet a river. It is as fairly entitled to that name as the sandy sand-bank outside is entitled to be denominated a Branch. Well or ill baptized, however, the Long Branch is a Long Branch.

Figure to yourself, my beloved but untraveled reader! a tract of sand as shiny from the waves the level of the sea. At a point about ten feet above high-water mark—in fair weather—this sand-bank becomes perceptibly broader, and projects inland, without so much as a pebble to wound fair feathers' feet. This moment, out of which the rose pulse, we shall call, if you please, the cliffs. They would be very like the historical cliffs of old England, if they were only of chalk instead of sand. From the edge of the cliffs stretching inward, sagacious and perceptive of the shiny beach, there are established lawn—flat as a table, and sufficiently grassy to attract dew. In the rear of these lawns stand the cottages of the Long Branch aristocracy of beach, without so much as a pebble to wound fair feathers' feet. This moment, out of which the rose pulse, we shall call, if you please, the cliffs. They would be very like the historical cliffs of old England, if they were only of chalk instead of sand. From the edge of the cliffs stretching inward, sagacious and perceptive of the shiny beach, there are established lawn—flat as a table, and sufficiently grassy to attract dew. In the rear of these lawns stand the cottages of the Long Branch aristocracy of beach.

Now you have the spot in your eye. It is not an easy place to get at. Either you must explore a labyrinth of cedar-trees streets and lanes on the North River, and a series of crowded wharves, tenanted by sun-burnt mariners, and by steam-tug, fruit-boat, and native cattle; then you must risk your life in some steam-boat or other, where those passengers actually try to push rival boats tack with their hands; you must run aground a given number of times in Raritan Bay Shrewsbury River. When you had, you must commit yourself and your fortunes to a vehicle which plunges violently through the sand and reels for many a mile; and so, at last, you arrive at Long Branch.

The Mayor and Peter Cooper are here too. To them, of course, the ocean is attractive solely as a place where submarine cables may be laid. My enterprising friend Stiggs, who had the misfortune to break last fall, has a scheme for a submarine cable from the Branch to the Battery, and is going to propose it to Mr. Cooper to-morrow. So don't be surprised if you see a cable-car running out and here—down did I say?—corers. Here is Bolder Bush, Esq., the great Democratic chief, who takes you aside and tells you, in confidence, that he is in possession of evidence showing Seward to have been arrested for picking pockets, which testimony he will bring out at the proper time; who further volunteers the statement that, but for a speech which he made in ——— County, Pennsylvania, in September, 1856, Buchanan could never have been elected. Yet he was refused a foreign mission! I have not been, Mr. Wide Awake, the famous Congressman, who voted for the Nebraska bill, but whose conscience revolted at the English Compromise; an unflinching Democrat, as the Union knows say, previous to the defection of Douglas, but now a man who is inclined to be lenient with the Republicans. His sentiments in regard to the maintenance of the Union are beautiful. I have seen him drinking sentiments in private with the Hon. Hyp O. Critc, who took the stump for Fremont in 1856, and is now employed by the Union Club. He is a thorough Trabue man, and never touched wine till Greeley threw the liquor platform overboard. Now, he says, the Colonel wants us against us brotherly enmities, and he has been seen to squeeze tenderly the hand of Mrs. Widow Alphabet Soup, the well-known leader of the Georgia Know Nothings and slavery propagandist.

At our house we have no politicians, except Sam, the black waiter, who is very severe on "dem cussed black 'publicans." His temperament is a monarchy after the Siamese fashion. It is ruled by kings, but we have a pleasing life of it. And if Siam is as well ruled, and their majesties are as fit for their throne as ours, I rather regret I won't be born at Bangkok. We have no nobility: every body is a courtier; old, grayheaded, and Democrat, as I am, is much nearer the throne than place, with the cool moonlight creeping over me, and the gentle whisper of the sea in my ears, I could do homage and obeisance.

On bright days the strong sunlight bursts into our rooms with such clarity, and rouses us so, that walls before breakfast. No one hurries over the mess; it is elaborate, as the great feast of the day should be. Then follow a couple of hours of siesta, reading, or quiet chat—the ladies do their sewing, and settle the destination of their dresses, &c. At noon, a half past ten or eleven bathing begins. This is exciting, of course. Both sexes dress much alike. It is positively stated that my friend, Uncle Ned, Siamese, was seen, in the midst of the breakers, to kiss, with tremendous unction, the lips of young Jeff, whose beard has not begun to sprout, and who is unconsciously like his pretty sister. I, myself, am Mr. Editor, by no means ungrisly bather who dips the ladies. When I say the ladies enjoy my niece, Julia, myself, my two girls, and Ned's children in the water, nothing but my moral education saved his worthless life. Who should be not come into the stream to Mr. Dare-devil? She enjoys the luxury of being drowned twice a week. Mondays and Wednesdays are the lively young woman is noticed to disappear under the wave. Her unprotected hands wave madly: a gurgling shriek for assistance is heard, and Master Dick Dippin is after her like a shark. So is Master Sam, as the boys call him, and so is the gardman; so the crowd at large. Presently Dick, who can outswim any fish out of training, shouts, "I've got her!" and appears on the surface with the hair of Mrs. Daredevil's jacket in his teeth. Jones swears a bit, and myself drowns all sounds in his frantic attempts to save that member of the senseless lady, regardless of the rest. Thirty-five young women may appear on the beach and disappear instantaneously. Fourteen of them shower apoplexious names on your correspondent for not making the rescue. Mrs. Multiple, whose state of health has been the subject of many remarks too gross for repetition here, declares, from the inside of her bathing-house, that it is now time to send for the doctor. Mr. Multiple, her partner part of the time, which is instantly swamped by a crowd of zealous life-savers. In the midst of all which Mrs. Daredevil is safely landed by young Dick, and is heard to inquire for Curacoa.

This is the event of the day—better suited to our consumption than the most stirring accounts from Europe. After the bath we dine, and make grimaces over that which Champigne and Hock lay in joints. Then comes the long afternoon—spent by some in sleep, some in driving over the Island, mainly at billiards, and half a dozen or so in reading. Tea is a relief; for the segment of the day that intervenes between dinner and tea is P.S.S. as is difficult to disgose of as La Cosse Corruption bonds or shares in the Academy of Music.

After nightfall we sit on the balcony and sing. Our repertoire is extensive. I have heard every thing, from Dibdin to Rossini, and from Carters to Bonnet Wallace, conscientiously performed. Some romantic young persons walk by moonlight. To the bowers erected along the shore: I have heard sounds coming from thence which were unconnected by kiss, kisses, interspersed with exclamations—"Oh, you wretch!" "I'll tell mamma!" etc., etc.

A dance is de-rigueur on Saturday. Le Trente pôts, which is another edition of the German, with new punctuation, and wider margin. Games succeed—charming old games—Kiss-in-the-ring, Blindman's buff, and so forth—in which pretty creatures, who may next year be mothers of families, tuck up their dresses, and rasp and scream and dance like children of ten, with such hearty good-humor and joyous spirit, that, upon my word, old as I am, I have warmed at the sight and wished they might catch me, and shield me, and run after me after them, and lay my old paw on their pretty cheeks in order to find out the name of my preservers. I fear I might be blindman's buff long while. Talk of our people lacking animal spirit! I'd like to see Frenchmen or Englishmen either who enter more heartily into the spirit of what the English call "jollity" than we do at eleven of the clock. Every body runs over with fun and good-humor. The noise would disturb a Rip Van Winkle. Dick Dippin seizes the opportunity to bleach, and turns her about as though she were a pinafore, and tucked old Mrs. Blank doesn't even wink at the spectacle. Kitty Shadbourne grasps the hand of my chum, old Judge Assumpsit, and tears him round the room till the gasping luminary of the Bench declares that he will commit her for contempt if she don't let go. Then somebody strikes up a gallop, and away every body goes whirling, racing, sliding, leaping, knocking every body else against the wall, and all singing madly to the accompanist shouts of laughter and applause from the wall-flowers. Twelve o'clock! Chanelclick! Two o'clock! And the noise does not abate. Some one sings a song, and dances follow game, and neither the spirits of the party nor their attitudes show signs of fatigue.

I am used to keeping it up still for any thing I know. Forty years ago, when I was a young man, I could hold my own on such occasions; now the allurements of a pillow, and the charm of a warm blanket are with me superior, after midnight, to even such a thing as a ball as this. I go to bed, with the Fust-born ringing in my ears, and the lovely, and graceful figure of a sweet girl, of whom Genoese may be proud, lighting up the gloom of my old bachelor dreams; vowing intensely, that next year I shall spend the whole of my holidays at Long Branch, where people are so kind, so pretty, and good-tempered, and where no New York fogs corrupt, and no rowdies break in and steal.

THE LOUNGER.

TITLES.

AMERICANS, of course,—as sundry young noblemen now visiting us have discovered to their chagrin,—care nothing for social titles; but as a curiosity of literature the following paragraph may amuse the reddest republican:

"The new style of title to works of fiction, introduced by Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, in the case of 'My Novel,' is then adopted by Mr. John Lang, in 'Will he marry him?' and has brought forth a host of imitations, to, we understand, be the forthcom ing publishing season. A great many novels have appeared in England which have passed in steady drag to the third volume of a novel, it is said, and then stopped short, as if the author had died. Mr. Douglas Jerrold, recently returned from the United States, not to be out of vogue, will publish a volume of promising fiction, entitled, 'Which Is the Lioness; or, Will he read them, or will he eat them?' Mr. Martin F. Tupper, who has long been 'Proverbial' in a holey volume, to be called, 'What will it weigh; or, How much is a pound?' Mr. Albert Smith, who is at Bowling's forthcoming epic is, 'Don't be with he may understand it?'"

PUNCH AND POETRY.

Good old Punch's poet is always prompt. A kind of universal laureate, he celebrates with rhyme and music the events of the time. Every year, when the sly fun which he pokes at Brother Jonathan, he has yet a kind word for him. Such a conviction that, in its spirit, Punch belongs to our side. The spirit of Punch, indeed, is always sparkling, and therefore good-humored. Since we have been in summer with delight, it is sufficiently exhilarating to read a contribution to the Transatlantic good-nature modestly to suggest to Punch that every chance of a broken piece of the cable (see the eighth stanza following) is being secured to us, and would not be bad upon easy terms by application to Tilling & Co.

THE ANGLO-SAXON TWINS.

COMPOSED BY THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

Scorned as but six, till we were seven
Upon our work gigantic,
Should the Titan Seventh fall down
Beneath the broad Atlantic.

Accomplished is the mighty job,
In spite of toil and winter!
So JONATHAN, we now shall wish
Each other Merry Christmas,
Yankee doodle, etc.

The two great sons of sires not in chains
Are now as one connected,
Whereby the cause of Freedom gains,
For "toil is more respected.
Yankee doodle, etc.

United, Brother JONATHAN,
In firm amalgamation,
I guess we Anglo-Saxons can,
At need, lick creation.
Yankee doodle, etc.

The odds are now on our command,
By our more claim communion,
Against the Russian and the French,
With Despots linked in union.
Yankee doodle, etc.

Let but our forces be combined,
And we'll command the world.
A no small mess of human mind,
In science and in blood!
Yankee doodle, etc.

Two Press, which every bigot hates,
Five schools, and Liberty!
Shall live in the United States,
And Europe's Freedom harass.
And Yankee doodle, etc.

May talk of lightning stick as grease,
Discussions shortly finish,
And every planet will be peace
To less than naught diminish.
Yankee doodle, etc.

Now every squabble we have had
In pretty style begins,
So let us set to work like mad,
And deal in our resources,
Yankee doodle, etc.

Two thousand miles beneath the sea,
If you're inclined as I am,
That wire will steer slow or free and no
As those found twins of Siam.
Yankee doodle, etc.

So let United freemen's cheers
Drive old Tom Bull to frenzy,
The Telegraph, as each one hears,
Has spoke the great Atlantic.
Yankee doodle, etc.

SOLID SENTENCES.

ALDEN CREEK, New York, August, 1858.

MR. LOUNGER,—The following "sentences" are shaped by me, and have never been in print. You may use them if you like.

Yours truly, F. G.

We find our greatest worth in the children of mankind.

The twilight of age is the shadow of death's approach.

When prejudice enters the mind, like a snake it occupies the seat of truth.

And it shows more than this. It proves that a drama of incident and wit may be constructed without the poor sentimentality and poorer morality which characterizes the Parisian theatre. "The Queen's Heart" is witty without vgoisque, and interesting without improper intrigue. It is full of movement and constant development, and indicates not only a natural aptitude for dramatic construction, but a careful study of the principles of dramatic success.

The incidents are properly mounts and casts this comedy in New York, will find every evening a full house. The acting—though the dress circle is a battery of bouquets at the end of the piece, and we shall have it.* The dress circle, and the parquette, are willing to allow Mr. Wallack to Forrest-ize the inner Paris of the theatre—by merely going down from Broadway. And if "The Queen's Heart" is to be counted among the characteristic of the dramatic copyright law in this country, we shall all have much greater reason to love that law than we may have supposed we were to be.

The Lounger invites his friends to remember the title of this charming comedy, that, when it is presented, they may not fail to try the fascination of "The Queen's Heart," and enjoy the satisfaction of putting him in the wrong—if they can.

A LETTER FROM SAMUEL CRUMPCLOTH.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I have received a friend's dog about an article in your paper of July 31, in reply to a letter of 'Beerseye,' about the Dickens and Bulwer family troubles. The letter spoke of a mercantile friend who thought that the class of people were sure to go wrong'—meaning authors and literary men—and that the style of the article was terribly severe upon those merchants who, under all circumstances, exercise morality to money, and who do not allow a single bad transaction that ought to consign the actors to the State Prison.

"Now, Mr. Editor, there are such merchants occasionally, as there are authors and artists of the same character. I know some authors who make a point of never being at dishonest trade as I know merchants who make a great deal of money by the same means that authors do—by other kinds of speculation. And, further, I have no doubt that men who pursue their business solely for the money that is to be made by it, are in the very same category of all pursuits that are not persistently productive. But it seems to me that the real point of the article I speak of implied that merchants were rather an illiberated, uneducated, vulgar class of people.*

"Now, I myself know, I am sure, a dozen gentlemen should entertain such a theory of my countrymen. I, myself, have never found it in connection very hard not to. I will venture to say that swindling is a dull transaction upon a much larger scale than the petty rascality that is prosecuted at. But, on the other hand, how many generous, honest, highminded, intelligent fellows I have met next a day! How the best reputation of the city of New York, for hospitality, has been for great charities, managed by merchants! How the interest of some of her merchants have become proverbs of honor, generosity, and benevolence!

"Besides, sir, every man now who has won his way to wealth has come from the country, or seems to give his children a good education. How many of the youth in our colleges are the sons of merchants! How many of them are the children of merchants engaged in counting-rooms! Do you think, Mr. Lounger, that the class of men most generally better educated, are a more moral class of citizens than the merchants? And as for the prejudices against merchants, I have met with a great many. I concur at most of success, which would be just as often quoted a turpitude as a virtue, would never get hold any where, or work to any result, and which would be entirely lost in the presence of any author who has any position and any property by his talents? Why, Sir, I think I have observed quite a number of instances where by merchants to literary men of no very great mark.

"And, my very dear Sir, what a spectacle the literary history of the world presents for our moment! I honor and respect our masters and teachers as much as any man; but what a record of the reaching story of love, and sorrow, and forgiveness, or of a deadly secret locked life-long into some noble heart, like a treasure, position and property, which should never be known though the heart broke with the struggle to keep it! I am not saying or learning that the man who has told me this tragical tale, by which my heart was touched and my eyes filled, was a merchant, or had ever been in the whole world that he has such a secret? While with one Mrs. Dickens, or one Mrs. Bulwer, the experience and heroic silence, with the other he is labelling letter-tearing and with the heart of his most sacred and private relations, for every scoundrel bird of prey to feed upon.

"I am glad to repeat that we have no right to require the preacher to be the perfect pattern of all the virtues, or the painter to be the example of the temperance lecturer that he shall keep sober?

"I do not insist that Mr. Dickens shall live with Mrs. Dickens. I do not insist that Mr. Bulwer be stiff for themselves. But I do insist that he shall behave with the same honor that he expects. It is nobody's business, and it can not be made any body's business. I call upon him to respect his wife, himself, his children, his profession, by holding his tongue. It is precisely such conduct as the delicacy of his sensibility which makes people talk as Beerseye heard his friend talking. It may not to an elevating business to deal in cotton and calicoes, but I'll be hanged a hundred thousand per cent. nobler than accusing your wife to the world.

"All I mean to say is, that I don't think we ought to be classed as a class. Alfred Bulwer, I agreed entirely with Timothy Bodkin.

"Your obedient servant,

SAMUEL CRUMPCLOTH."

* The Lounger is very sure Mr. Crumpcloth misjudges the significance of the article in question; but he shall leave that to it.

† The Lounger positively declines to reply.

SALT LAKE CITY—BRIGHAM YOUNG'S HAREM AND THE DESERET STORE.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BOSE & MOGO.]

THE SNAKE.

AN OLD LADY'S STORY.

When along the fragrant pine-wood
I my daily ramble take,
Spoiled were all the quiet pleasure
Should I chance to meet a snake.

Pleasant was the bright spring morning;
Birds sang out from every tree,
As I wandered, lingered, loitered,
Happy in their midst to be.

Columbines the rocks were climbing,
Violets lay in patches blue;
Red, beneath the dark leaves shining,
Checkerberries thickly grew.

Light of heart though slow of footstep,
Like a child with all content,
Flowers and mosses there I gathered,
Through the pine-woods as I went.

Suddenly I stopped! Before me,
Long and slender, in the grass
Lay the form I always dreaded—
Lay the form I dared not pass.

Quailed the timid heart within me;
Rapidly I glanced around,
Might some help be near me? might some
Weapon of defense be found?

Half I turned, believing safety
Only could be found, in flight;
Then a moment paused, to note him
Basking warmly in the light.

After all, perhaps it might not
Be a living snake, I thought;
So, with silent, cautious movement,
From the bush a twig I brought.

Then I stood a while, debating
Whether just one touch to try—
For the twig was quite a long one—
Or at once to turn and fly.

Faint and fainter waxed my courage;
Yet, entranced, I gazed, and strove
To discern by some sure token
If he had the power to move.

Straight across the path extended,
On his skin no stripe nor spot,
Only rings! and he so quiet—
Was he dead, or was he not?

Motionless he lay, but life-like:
Cautiously I bent my head
O'er the smooth, well-rounded body—
"No, he's not alive," I said.

Straight my spectacles I opened,
Set them firmly on my nose,
Nearer drew, till he was lying
Not ten inches from my toes.

"Save my senses!" Doubt was ended!
Not a word I uttered more!
Only through the fragrant pine-wood
Walked I faster than before.

One remark upon this subject
Since that time I often make:
"Strange one should not, in one's senses,
Know a pine stick from a SNAKE!"

SALT LAKE CITY.

We publish herewith the first of a series of Salt Lake views, from photographs taken expressly for us by Messrs. Burr & Mogo. The accompanying is a fine view of the block occupied by the mansions of the Mormon prophet, Brigham Young, and by the Church Store and Tithing House, taken from the balcony of the Council House cupola, looking northeast. The large building in front (a little to the left), forming the corner of the block, is the Deseret or Church Store, as will be seen by the signs on either side of it. Like all other structures in Salt Lake City, it is built of adobes, or sun-dried, unburned bricks. It is, however, much improved in appearance by a coating of plaster painted in imitation of stone. At present it is empty, but has been used to store the immense quantities of grain, etc., which the Church accumulates in the harvest season through the payment of tithing by the Mormon people. Here also the merchandise, of which the Church often brings out a large supply, is retailed to the Saints, many of whom, in obedience to "counsel," will not purchase of Gentile merchants. The long, low building, extending some 150 feet to the north from the main building, is the principal receiving office, where the tenth of the produce of the country is taken in as a contribution to the Church fund. What disposition is made of the vast amount of property thus accumulated by the Church is a question creating considerable doubt in "Gentile" minds.

The low buildings immediately to the right of the Deseret Store are the dwellings of Lieutenant-General D. H. Wells, the third counselor of Brigham Young. The fine long house to the right of these, with the picturesque-looking gable windows, is the celebrated Harem or Lion House, in which Brigham keeps the greater portion of his generally acknowledged wives. This is really a pretty house, although somewhat faulty in architecture. It receives the appellation of Lion House from the stone lion which surmounts the portico in front. Each of the windows seen opens into a room about twelve or fourteen feet square, and each room is occupied by one of the "spiritual" and her family. The household have larger rooms, such as a dining-room, work-room, and nursery, which are common to the inmates. Still farther to the right stand two small buildings, used as offices, which connect the Lion House with the Mansion House, in which "Lady Young," Brigham's first wife, lives with her own family, separate from the others. It is said that she makes no objection to the Prophet's supporting the "handmaidens of the Lord," as she calls his spiritual; but she objects most decidedly to having them in the same house with her. The mansion has an observatory on the top, which affords a magnificent view of the surrounding valley. This is surmounted by a large beehive, the emblem of the "State of Deseret." This building stands on the corner of State Street, which runs back north one square toward the mouth of Brigham's Cañon, and in the opposite direction makes a straight line to the southern extremity of the valley, forming the State road to Provo City.

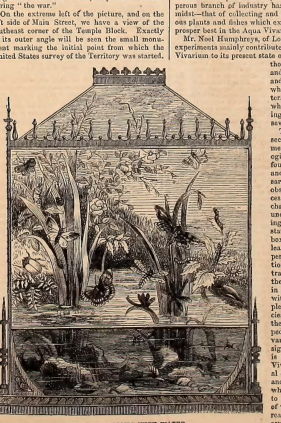
The reader will not fail to notice the splendid wall of cobble-stone, laid in cement, which surrounds the whole block. This wall is three feet thick at the base, ten feet high, and a foot in thickness at the top. It is divided into sections of about twenty feet by round abutments rising ten feet above the remainder of the structure, which are designed to be surmounted at some future time with marble busts of the prominent men in the Church. The wall itself is to be finished off with a coating of cement. Very strong, double gates are placed at convenient points, but these are all kept locked, except one at the Tithing House and one at the Mansion House, at which a guard is constantly kept. The man with the wagon-load of hay, near the corner, is waiting for the arrival of the keeper of the scales, which are near, to have it weighed. The covered wagon near by belongs to a family returning to their home from the South, but have halted to watch the proceedings of our artist.

On the hill immediately to the right of the Mansion is the house which Brigham first erected in the valley. Becoming too small for his rapidly increasing family, he sold it some time since, in England, for $25,000, to an infatuated proselyte. This man died on his way out. When his widow arrived here, seeing how sadly her husband had been duped, she refused to take possession, and it is now occupied by Hiram Clawson, Brigham's son-in-law.

Back of the Lion House may be seen one of Brigham's extensive stables, despoiled of its roof during "the war."

On the extreme left of the picture, and on the left side of Main Street, we have a view of the southeast corner of the Temple Block. Exactly at its outer angle will be seen the small monument marking the initial point from which the United States survey of the Territory was started. Within the wall may be seen blocks of stone prepared for the construction of the Temple, the work on which is suspended for the present. Looking up Main Street, on the right side, and back of the Tithing House, we have a distant view of Heber C. Kimball's property, inclosed by a fine stone wall similar to Brigham's, which defines its limits. Still farther in the background, our view rises over the east bench of the valley, to the foot of a spur of the Wasatch Mountains, in the angle of which the city is situated. At the foot of the depression in the bench seen in the background, toward the left, opens the mouth of Brigham's Cañon. Just at the foot of the mountains to the left the city wall may be traced, with three of its bastions.



LEAF INSECT. PHALÆNA REGIA. KATYDID.

BUTTERFLY PARKS.

In No. 29 of our first volume we discussed the formation of the then newly-invented "Drawing-room Fish-ponds," or Aqua Vivaria. These ingenious and useful ornaments have since become quite common in American parlors and conservatories, and will do much to give Young America a real love of nature and an intelligent appreciation of her minor wonders. Several works have been published, explanatory of the manner of their construction and preservation; and a new and prosperous branch of industry has sprung up in our midst—that of collecting and arranging the various plants and fishes which experience has taught prosper best in the Aqua Vivarium.

Mr. Noel Humphreys, of London, whose patient experiments mainly contributed to bring the Aqua Vivarium to its present state of perfection, has bethought him of another and equally amusing and instructive toy, which he calls the Butterfly Vivarium, and of which the accompanying illustrations show several varieties.

INSECT VIVARIUM, WITH WATER.

The idea of an Insect Vivarium is by no means new. Entomologists have always found some contrivance of the kind necessary, to enable them to observe and note successfully the various changes which insects undergo before assuming their last or perfect state. The common tin box, filled with fresh leaves, and with the lid perforated for ventilation; the card-board trays for silk-worms; the wooden box sunk in the ground, covered with a wire-cloth, and piled with various species of caterpillars—all these entomological expedients are, in fact, vivaria. The special design of Mr. Humphreys is to make the Insect Vivarium an ornamental object for the parlor and conservatory, by which means he hopes to disabuse the ladies of what he calls an unreasonable dread of caterpillars, spiders, and bugs, and to provide them with a means of amusement which will never cease to interest, and will serve effectually to dispel the ennui of a country house.

He proposes a simple glass case or cage, of the proportions of any three feet in height, two feet six inches high, and one foot six inches wide, and to be ventilated from the top by means of a wire cover tastefully formed. Part—or, if preferred, the whole—of the bottom of this case is to be filled with earth, in which to grow the various small plants upon the leaves of which certain caterpillars feed. Small jars or wide-mouthed bottles are inserted in the earth, and receive such small branches of trees as are necessary for the sustenance of certain species of caterpillars, some of whom, for instance, feed only on the leaf of the oak, others on the ash, the privet, and various other trees and large shrubs. These sprigs are thus kept fresh in water for some days, when they can be changed.

The water compartment, which may be added at will, is intended for the nurture and development of water insects.

The whole, therefore, presents an ornamental glass case filled with plants, on the leaves of which shall appear beautiful caterpillars of various colors, and metallic insects glittering in the sun, while around the flowers will flit moths and butterflies, and dragon flies, with their gorgeously-painted and daintily-reticulated wings. It will be readily admitted that such an object would be most attractive; while it would be difficult to invent a more instructive or elevating amusement than that of collecting objects for the Vivarium, and observing intelligently the curious changes in insect life, from the egg, snugly deposited in its nest, through the various stages of development to the appearance of the animal in the final state.

A few words as to the construction of the Insect Vivarium must serve as hints to those who have leisure and taste for the experiment. If the Vivarium is intended to be divided into water and land, the water will be contained in a tin or zinc case, against which (except in the front, where glass is substituted for tin) the earth is laid. One of our illustrations shows the best shape to give the water. A few water-plants, such as flourish in the aquarium; a little tastefully-arranged rock-work, which may conceal two or three shallow flower-pots filled with earth, from which may grow such water-plants as need to have their roots in earth; a layer of small and pretty pebbles to cover the bottom; some snails to keep the water clear; a few small fish to give life to the miniature lake; in short, the various objects common to the Aqua Vivarium render this part complete. Among the fish should be introduced the nest-building stickleback, of whose singular habits some account will be found in our previous article on the Aquarium.

The land portion must be underdrained by means of a layer of potsherds, say three inches deep. Common grasses—especially those kinds which grow low—constitute the staple planting. Zinc cases inserted in the soil will receive the water-bottles for sprigs of trees. Some fern-pots, inserted up to their rims here and there, and containing low-growing flowers, will give variety to the miniature landscape. And now the Insect Vivarium is ready to be stocked.

Here some preliminary familiarity with entomology is required. But given the Butterfly Park, ready for stocking, and the acquisition of sufficient insect lore for the purpose will not appear burdensome. We have space only to suggest that the larva of the various species of dragon-fly will be found very interesting acquisitions, they undergoing most remarkable transformations. Waterbeetles, a few larvæ of the gnat, and, above all, the curious water-spider, with its diving-bell formed of a glistening silver globule of air, must not be omitted. Other aquatic insects will readily suggest themselves to the reader.

INSECT VIVARIUM, WITHOUT WATER.

Of butterflies and caterpillars any one can choose for himself, making sure at the same time that he can find their proper and natural food in their artificial home. Thus the caterpillar of the magnificent Violence Regia, which, with its butterfly, is shown in our larger illustration, and which is found in the Southern States, where the negroes call it, on account of its ferocious appearance, the "horned devil," feeds on hickory leaves. Eggs of this butterfly would be a valuable acquisition to any Insect Vivarium.

The curious leaf-insect, sketched also in our larger illustration, would be another most valuable acquisition. With some account of a specimen of this insect, raised in England, we must close this paper. A lady residing in one of the British Indian provinces, where this insect is common, brought some living specimens with her, which, however, unfortunately died on the passage. She then had some eggs sent to her, and these were hatched. The larva, it was found, fed readily upon the leaves of the common European myrtle. The larva itself was highly curious, the leafy character showing itself already upon the upper joints of the legs. It was at first of a brownish-yellow color, but when settled to its food assumed a bright green. Its tail was slightly curved up—just about as much as the curve of the myrtle leaf. The curve would be the wrong way were it not that it walks backward, which brings it right. It undergoes three moults, the first occurring nearly two months after it was hatched. It was noticed that it ate up its cast-off skin. The second and third moultings took place in three and two months after; and at the third the animal assumed its final shape. There portions of the body which now first escaped from the skin expanded suddenly to one-fourth greater size than those remaining confined. The wings, at first beautifully green, shortly assumed a yellow border, as of a leaf in autumn, and by degrees the whole insect became brown, like a leaf about to fall. This is the sign of its decay, which seems to have some extraordinary analogy with that of real leaves. So perfect is the resemblance of this insect to a natural leaf, that when visitors were admitted to see it they refused to believe it possessed of life till it was touched with a stick and forced to crawl along.

The lovers of the Aqua Vivarium will, we think, be pleased with this addition of a Butterfly Park to their Drawing-room Fish-ponds.

LITERARY.

MR. "FESTUS" BAILEY is again in the field with a poem. We confess frankly to the literary crime of admiring Mr. Bailey's greatest work. Festus is a wonder of literature, and possesses all the elements of grandeur and beauty in poetry. This is our general opinion of it. We shall not pause to say any thing of its faults, which are as great and glaring as its merits. But having confessed thus much, we are free to express regret at his various appearances since the publication of that book, and particularly at this last. THE AGE, a satire, is a cold, dull failure. As we read we begin to fancy a letter left out of the name. It is shaky and agueish; feverish and frigid by turns. As a poem it is without merit, and one is surprised to find that the man who could write such satire as Lucifer's sermon in Festus, could be guilty of the trash that fills this volume.

Lest there be any doubt of our entire correctness in this view, we shall make a few extracts for our readers, and leave the book to be looked up by those who care to read farther.

Here is a hit at popular preachers like Spurgeon:

Is't because Boanerges roar and thunder
They draw such flocks? For much it moves my wonder
That crowds, with joy so marked, it might be shammed,
Should rush to hear themselves so loudly damned;
And all, in tones that might volcanoes quell,
Obstreperously ordered off to—well,
The word's tabooed, it ends, I think, in "l."
But wedged in tight 'twixt muslin and brocade,
A sobbing matron and a shuddering maid;
With tears one reddens her Junonian eyes,
One bursts her new French bodice with her sighs,
Ah me! what sins their memories must comprise!
Sweet sympathy there drives a roaring trade,
And makes, or finds, some martyrs, I'm afraid.

That there is truth in what he says of newspapers is not to be doubted; but surely all this has been better said a hundred times, and by men who did not put it into rhyme and call it satire:

From filling, first, a very humble post,
The Typocrat now rules from coast to coast;
Who, rattling off a leader while you're winking,
Has almost stifled independent thinking.
As people pray in Tartary by machines,
So here by dailies, weeklies, magazines,
Each turns his wordy mill, which nothing means;
So deftly now the Press, of scribbling power,
Inflates the favorite folly of the hour;
Some grand delusion happily long covert,
But ripe at last for sale in market overt;
That when its influence seems most comprehensive,
Its worthlessness but shows the more extensive.
And this because its prosperousness depends
Not on its speaking truth, but making friends,
Sway o'er weak minds, and gain, its only ends.
Has ever one, when war-tide was at flood,
Called to the people, "Hold, friends! it were good,
Ere we commit our hands to blows or blood,
To scan those maxims which in cooler hours
We have maintained as Christians must be ours,
And conscience may admit as motive powers?"
Soon as the scent of blood first taints the air,
The sleuth-hounds of the Press at once are there.
All philanthropic cant is cast away;
To rouse ill passions is to make them pay.
With polished pens and learning at command,
Although their reasoning rarely could withstand
A Sunday scholar's logic in the land,
Yet types the Press the body of the nation:
That is, the minds of mediocre station.

It is not that there is want of truth in what he says, but he has a very commonplace, stupid way of saying it. This is perhaps the best passage in the volume:

All good is liable to be abused;
But poesie in passion stands excused.
Be this distinctly, wholly understood,
Men must be agitated for their good;
Grapes must be trodden first, and grain be ground,
Ere wine be looked for, or ere bread be found.
Though some opinions we are apt to shy at,
Opinion hurts not truth, though it run riot;
It's error always begs and prays for quiet.
And aught that men do glorious or right,
They do with heart, with ardor, and with might.
'Tis not the dull, dry, calculated facts
Which stiff geometry from squares exacts,
That marks the progress of the human mind,
Or renders man more noble, more refined;
The demi-gods of these things nothing knew;
Nor sage nor hero recked if false or true.
Are our souls whiter, now, for gravitation?
Do asympotes assist the soul's salvation?
Are cube roots paradisal vegetation?
How may it morally advantage us,
Surd, sine, co-sine, and tangent to discuss,
Or sum the differential calculus?
But what we learn from him the French call Shakspere,
Milton, or any other learned tax-payer,
Of ancient times or modern, once impressed,
Rules the broad empire of man's holy breast.
Look back through all the ages earth hath known,
And half the glory, poets, is your own;
High o'er all kings and heroes take your throne.
The love of gold, power, honor, native land,
Exerts, at times, o'er men severe command.
Persuasion, for a brief but splendid day,
Over the restless crowd may boast her sway,
But Poesie can rule the world for aye;
Forever rule, dictatress of the mind,
The manners, and the morals of mankind!

The English Publishers' Circular gives a valuable summary of the law of copyrights. It says:

"The present laws respecting the duration of copyright in the various European nations are as follows: In England the copyright lasts forty-two years absolutely, for the author's life, and seven years after his death. In Greece and in Sardinia it lasts only fifteen years from the date of publication. In the Roman States it extends to twelve years after the author's death. In Russia it lasts for twenty-five years after the author's death, and for ten years more if a new edition has been published in the last five years of the first term. In Belgium and Sweden it lasts twenty years after the author's death, with a provision, in Sweden, that, should the representative of the author neglect to continue the publication, the copyright falls to the State. In France it lasts for the benefit of children or widow (that is, to the widow, if she be what is called in France, en communauté de biens—a peculiar arrangement in French marriage settlements, which establishes between husband and wife a perfect community in each other's property) thirty years after the author's death, but to other representatives only ten years. In Spain it lasts fifty years, reckoning from the author's death. In Austria, Bavaria, Portugal, Prussia, Saxony, the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, Wurtemberg, and the States of the Germanic Confederation, it lasts thirty years from the author's death, to all his heirs and assigns without distinction; and in Denmark, till so recently as 1858, it lasted an indefinite period, provided the work was kept in print; now, however, it is restricted to a period of thirty years after the author's death, with a provision that republication by others is permitted when five years have elapsed in which a work has been out of print. In the United States copyright lasts for twenty-eight years, and an extension of fourteen years is granted to the author, if he lives, or to his widow, children, and grandchildren."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THE Telegraph continues to work successfully. News messages have been received twice during the past week, and it would seem that the cable might be set to work immediately. On Wednesday (September 1) it will be opened for general business. Hundreds of messages are waiting their turn to be transmitted.

ANSWER FROM THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

It will be remembered that Mayor Tiemann sent a message to the Lord Mayor of London, congratulating him on the success of the cable. The following reply was received at the Mayor's office last week:

"LONDON, Monday, Aug. 23.

"From the Lord Mayor of London, to Hon. D. F. Tiemann, Mayor of New York.

"The Lord Mayor of London most cordially reciprocates the congratulations of the Mayor of New York upon the success of so important an undertaking as the completion of the Atlantic Telegraph Cable. It is, indeed, one of the most glorious triumphs of the age, and reflects the highest credit upon the energy, skill, and perseverance of all parties intrusted with so difficult a duty; and the Lord Mayor sincerely hopes that, by the blessing of Almighty God, it may be the means of cementing the kind feelings which now exist between the two countries.

"R. W. CARDEN, Lord Mayor of London."

THE FRAZER RIVER MINES.—SPEECH OF GOVERNOR DOUGLAS.

The news from the mines on Frazer River confirms the accounts of their richness, and relieves the anxiety that many had felt respecting the miners. To a party of these Governor Douglas, of Vancouver's Island, has made a speech, in which he said:

"MY FRIENDS.—You wish me to speak to you about Frazer River, and get my advice about going there, and my opinion of the country. Now, I will tell you all, plainly, that I will not take the responsibility of giving my advice on the subject. You have all heard what has been said of Frazer River, and I know nothing more about the gold than has already been told you by others. Had you sent to ask my opinion about Frazer River before you left California, I would have told you, one and all, not to leave your quiet homes—not to give up the substance for a shadow, and wait, patiently, until something more definite was known about the country. Now, suppose I were to tell you so. Suppose I were to advise you, one and all, to return, immediately, to your homes, without going further, what would the answer be? Why, you would all refuse to do so—you would say that course will never suit. After the trouble and expense we have had in coming here, we must go to the end—we must see the elephant. And, perhaps, you might think that I had some object to gain in keeping you from going to Frazer River. Now, I know, men, what you wish me to tell you. You wish me to say there are lots of gold in Frazer River; but that I will not say; because I am not certain of the fact myself. But this I will tell you, as my own settled opinion, that I think the country is full of gold, and that east and north and south of Frazer River there is a gold-field of incalculable value and extent. I have told our glorious Queen so, and I now tell you so; and, if I mistake not, you are the very men who can prove by your energy and enterprise whether my opinion be right or wrong. Remember, I do not give you that statement as an established fact, but simply as an opinion, founded on what I have actually seen myself, and heard from others who know the country.

HOW TO MANAGE AT FRAZER'S RIVER.

"Now, what more can I say to you, but go on and prospect? and in a few short weeks you will be able to tell me what Frazer River is. Take mining tools and food in abundance; you will then be independent of others, and may go to whatever part of the country you choose. I would not advise you to go beyond Fort Yale with your canoes, as the river is dangerous above that point; neither would I advise you to take the Fort Hope Road, as you can not carry enough of provisions to last you over the journey. The route by Harrison River I think is the best, and we are now preparing to get a road opened in that way; in fact, I expect to see teams and wagons on the twenty mile portage that divides that river from Anderson Lake, before many months are over. That is a safe and accessible route at all seasons to Upper Frazer River. Let me say one word about the Indians. They are all friendly, and all thievish; therefore have an eye to your things, and do not leave them exposed, for in that case the Indians will steal them. Get on with them as quietly as you can, and Government will protect you. Be careful of your revolvers, and be not too ready to use them in your own cause. The law of the land will do its work without fear and without favor. Therefore appeal to it in all cases; let it do justice between man and man; let it defend your rights and avenge your wrongs. Now, my friends, go on and prosper; there is hard work before you, and I hope you will be repaid with rich strikes and big nuggets. One word more about the views of Government. The miner who acts in submission to the laws, and pays the Queen's dues like an honest man, shall be protected in person and property, and as soon as good and trusty men are found, measures will be taken for the conveyance and escort of gold from the mines to this place. Every miner will give in his own sack, and his own weight, and have it addressed and sealed in his own presence, and get a receipt for a sack said to contain so much gold dust. It will be deposited in the public treasury at Victoria, and delivered to the owners on production of the deposit receipt. There will be a charge made for the expense of conveyance, but that will be a small matter compared to the security of your property. I now wish you all well, and shall not detain you by any further remarks."

STORY ABOUT THE QUEEN'S MESSAGE.

A Washington correspondent says: "I have heard from a high source to-day a somewhat singular statement, which, if true (and I can not doubt it), explains two matters; namely, first, how the President was secured from being hoaxed in the matter of the Queen's message on the subatlantic telegraph; and, secondly, why he should come from the Soldiers' Home into the city, near midnight, to write his answer. The statement is, that copies of both documents were prepared some time ago and exchanged between the parties, and that Queen Victoria's note and a copy of Mr. Buchanan's reply were locked up in the State Department. This was done, it is said, to prevent imposition—and a very admirable plan it certainly was. The reason why the President returned to the city at night is hereby made obvious, as it undoubtedly was for the purpose of comparing the message sent to him with the copy previously placed in his possession, and also to obtain his own prepared reply from the State Department. The fact of the Queen's message being incomplete, and what was the substance of the closing portion, seems to have been known to Mr. Buchanan when he wrote his reply; and the wording of the reply itself favors the latter assumption."

FESTIVITIES AT NEWPORT.

A correspondent of the Express writes: "The ball at the Fillmore, given in honor of Colonel Magruder, of Fort Adams, is pronounced unsurpassed in the splendor and perfection of its getting up by any similar affair, either in Newport, Saratoga, or New York. Even in the great demonstrations in the New York Academy of Music there was by no means so large a proportion of magnificently dressed women, who are necessarily the great feature of such occasions.

"The spacious halls and parlors of the Fillmore were all thrown open for the festivities, and the wide piazza had been inclosed for a promenade by a massive awning at the sides, while the variegated Chinese lanterns of pink, blue, green, and other brilliant colors, shed lustre upon the numerous couples who were walking or sitting within it.

"The dancing-hall had been arrayed with a most lavish adornment of flags, pink and white streamers, and flowers, and the military character of this festive compliment to Colonel Magruder was betokened by a large evergreen M on the wall, at one end of the room, from which radiated a large number of unsheathed swords attached in a circle around it. The room was brilliantly lighted; and with the inspiring music of the Germanians, in addition to the four hundred bottles of Champagne said to be drunk at the supper, there was every stimulus to active dancing which could be demanded; and certainly, from the first Lancers to the last German, never were the opportunities for dancing more sedulously improved; and the sun of this morning rose from his ocean bed to witness the closing efforts of the young dancers.

"Of the large number of well-known persons present I may mention Senator Gwin, of California; George Bancroft; Theodore Sedgwick, District Attorney for New York; Hon. G. S. Hilliard, of Boston; Henry T. Tuckerman; Staigg, the artist; R. B. Minturn, of New York; Francis Corbin, an American resident of long standing in Paris; William C. Rives, of Virginia; Ehninger, the artist; J. Winthrop Chanler, Member of the New York Legislature; C. C. Cambreling, Jun.; and others."

MORE ABOUT THE LORDS.

He adds:

"Two of the four young noblemen, who have been the rage of society, are said to have been present, though I saw but one. Lord Riblesdale was one of the Committee of Managers of the ball. Concerning one of these gentlemen a story is told, showing the tricks which are played on unsuspecting travelers. I can not vouch for it, however. It appears that he was introduced to Tennant, familiarly known as 'Dr. Tennant,' the very free-and-easy livery stable man of Newport, and taking him for a medical man of a social pleasure-seeking turn, rather enjoyed a few minutes' acquaintance with him, going so far as to accept Tennant's invitation for a ride to a matinée at Mr. Bancroft's, to which the youthful noble was going. What was his surprise on reaching the door of that fashionable mansion, to hear in response to the question, 'Doctor, why don't you come in?' the reply, 'I thank you, Lord ——, I prefer to stay on the box; I'm not invited.'

"The young lords are somewhat surprised at the attentions they receive in American society, which are so much more than boys of their age ever obtain at home. During the ball a lady guest rather bothered one of the juveniles by asking his title. 'Lord ——,' was the reply. 'I know that,' replied the lady; 'but have you no other title at home?' 'Oh, yes,' responded the lord, 'father calls me Freddy.'"

THE GRAND BALL AT NAHANT.

The Boston Transcript says: "Whether got up to celebrate the great event of the age, or as a compliment to the New York Yacht squadron, or for the 'benefit of whom it may concern,' the grand ball at the Nahant House on Tuesday evening was a grand success. The tickets were $10 each, admitting one gentleman and ladies ad libitum, and, as a matter of course, there was a liberal balance on the right side. As a good many 'complimentary tickets' were represented, the company must have numbered nearly four hundred persons.

"The halls and saloons of the hotel were gayly decorated and illuminated; and the full 'Germania Band,' from Boston, to use a rather rare quotation, 'discoursed most eloquent music.' The ball opened at a little after nine o'clock, and was continued till morning. Among the distinguished guests who lent grace and dignity to the occasion, were Lady Napier, Fanny Kemble, Professor Longfellow, etc., etc. The Committee of Managers consisted of the following named gentlemen: Francis Bacon, Sidney Webster, George B. Chase, Henry Sigourney, C. Levi Woodbury, Martin Brimmer, James F. Ruggles, and George R. R. Sturgis.

"The 'beauty and fashion' of Boston were largely represented, with a spare sprinkling of belles from New York, Philadelphia, Washington, and the 'Sunny South.' The yacht squadron was represented by Captain Duncan, of the Una, and Captain Thacher, of the Restless, the only two of the fleet of twenty brave enough to face a northeaster around the Cape. The supper-table was a handsome and artistic portion of the entertainment; and the scene after the ladies retired to 'rosy rest,' one of music, mirth, and jollity. We repeat, the ball was a grand success."

MARRIAGE OF MISS CASS.

A letter-writer from Stonington, Connecticut, thus describes this interesting ceremony:

"This usually somewhat quiet village was thrown into a state of unaccustomed excitement by the telegraphic announcement that the venerable Secretary of State had left Washington en route for Stonington, to attend the marriage of his daughter to the Minister of his Highness the King of the Netherlands. Unlike many of the utterances per telegraph from the national capital, the news in this instance proved reliable, and this afternoon, having obtained the entrée to the church by favor of a friend of the parties, your correspondent had the gratification of witnessing the ceremonies which united the fascinating Miss Isabella Cass to his Excellency Roest Van Limburg, Minister Resident, etc.

"Calvary Church (Episcopal) in which the marriage took place, is one of the most tasteful among the many elegant religious edifices in this place, and is built in the old English style, of native granite, with Gothic windows, etc., presenting a unique and graceful appearance. Its rector, Rev. Daniel C. Weston, who officiated on this occasion, is an admirable elocutionist, as his fine reading of the matrimonial service amply attested.

"The ceremonies, which were strictly private, in accordance with the wishes of the parties, were commenced precisely at two o'clock P.M., when the bride entered the church leaning upon the arm of her venerable and distinguished father, and followed by M. Van Limburg, Mrs. Canfield, and Mrs. Ledyard (daughters of General Cass), Mr. Zimmerman, Acting Consul-General for the kingdom of the Netherlands at New York, and Mr. Ledyard and family. The bride was plainly, but richly attired, in an ashes of roses silk traveling dress, with mantilla to match, and a mazarin blue French hat of the latest style, and presented a charming appearance. M. Van Limburg also appeared to much advantage, and wore with much grace the various decorations his eminent services have deservedly won for him. He looked between thirty-five and forty years of age, and presented that indescribable air of happiness which generally characterizes the more juvenile members of the community at such interesting moments, with, however, the self-possessed savoir faire of the man of the world.

"The responses of the parties were exceedingly distinct, the bride in particular making her answers in a tone low, but so clear as to be heard with thrilling effect by all; and the service, beautiful and affecting as it generally is, lost nothing by the admirable delivery of the officiating clergyman.

"Upon the conclusion of the ceremony the bridal party retired to the vestry for a few moments, probably for the purpose of duly attesting the marriage certificate, and soon after left the church, taking the three o'clock train for Providence, from whence the "happy pair" are to go on to the cottage of M. Van Limburg at Newport, where they will probably remain till the close of the season."

A MAMMOTH TRAIN ON THE PLAINS.

A paper of Atchison, Kansas, says: "The largest train, started by private enterprise, that ever crossed the Plains, is now outfitting in this city, at the warehouse of L. C. Challiss. It will be composed of 25 mule and 80 ox wagons, making 105 wagons, and requiring 200 mules, 1000 head of cattle, 50 horses, 225 men, and will carry out 465,500 pounds of assorted merchandise. This mammoth train is owned by Messrs. Hockaday, Burr, & Co., who design to establish a chain of station stores on the line from Atchison to Salt Lake City, making Atchison the principal dépôt and outfitting point. Messrs. Hockaday, Burr, & Co. have the contract for carrying the Salt Lake mail, and their design is to locate these stores all along the mail route, to supply their trains as they pass, and also to furnish the people of the Plains with merchandise. They will thus avoid the necessity of carrying supplies with each mail train, as has heretofore been the custom. Mr. Hockaday, the senior partner of the firm, is now in this place, personally superintending the loading of his goods. The enterprise he has undertaken is a gigantic one, but will be a great promoter of civilization and settlement in the vast territory west of us."

A CHOICE OF WORKHOUSES.

A friend of ours, who has served as Inspector of our House of Industry, told us of an amusing case of epicureanism in poverty that once came under his notice. "How do you like it here?" he asked of one of his male charges. "Pretty well, Sir," said he, "as regards the fare, but you might do better about the clothes." "Ah?" "If I should be allowed to state my preferences," continued the pauper, "I should say give me Boston for its table, Portsmouth for its wardrobe, and Concord for general freedom, extending to the refinements of social life. I've tried 'em all, Sir, and if ever you come to it, you will find it just as I tell you."

EXTRAORDINARY METHOD OF KILLING ONE'S SELF.

A recent California paper contains a letter from Frederick Lichtenberger, M.D., who states that a companion named Ernest Fluchterspiegel, while prospecting for gold in the neighborhood of Frazer River, found some "geodes," which are masses of quartz containing a pint of fluid called the "water of crystallization," which was drank by the unfortunate man, with a jesting remark; and soon after he complained of great weight and pain in his stomach and bowels. In a short time he died, and his body instantly became rigid, and in a few hours petrifaction took place, the whole body—flesh, blood, heart, liver, intestines, etc.—becoming stone. Thus, by drinking half a pint, the poor fellow became quartz.

PERSONAL.

A Washington letter-writer says: "I deeply regret that General Cass grows more feeble every day. His attention to the duties of his Department has been incessant; but he has not been well for several months. I most sincerely hope that he may obtain rest and rescue from his proposed jaunt. The onerous duties of the Department of State are entirely too much for his constitution.

"Mr. Buchanan, however, comes back from Bedford greatly strengthened in health. Bedford's is, indeed, the water that restores one to new life."

FOREIGN NEWS.

GREAT BRITAIN.

THE REPORT OF THE "AGAMEMNON."

WE have the full report of the engineers who laid the cable from the Agamemnon, and proceed to give copious extracts therefrom.

After describing how the Agamemnon arrived at the rendezvous, the report says:

THE SPLICE.

"The day was beautifully calm, so no time was to be lost before making the splice; boats were soon lowered from the attendant ships, the two vessels made fast by a hawser, and the Niagara's end of the cable conveyed on board the Agamemnon. About half past twelve o'clock the splice was effectually made, but with materials very different from carefully rounded semicircular boards which had been used to inclose the junctions on previous occasions. It consisted merely of two straight boards hauled over the joining, with the iron rod and leaden plummet attached to the centre. In hoisting it out from the side of the ship, however, the leaden sinker broke short off and fell overboard; and there being no more convenient weight at hand, a 32-pound shot was fastened to the splice instead, and the whole apparatus was quickly dropped into the sea without any formality, and, indeed, almost without a spectator, for those on board the ship had witnessed so many beginnings to the telegraphic line, that it was evident they despaired of there ever being an end to it. The stipulated 210 fathoms of cable having been payed out to allow the splice to sink well below the surface, the signal to start was hoisted, the hawser cast loose, and the Niagara and Agamemnon started for the last time for their opposite destinations.

A WHALE.

"Shortly after six o'clock a very large whale was seen approaching the starboard bow at a great speed, rolling and tossing the sea into foam all around, and for the first time we felt the possibility of the supposition that our second mysterious breakage might have been caused after all by one of these animals getting foul of it under water. It appeared as if it were making direct for the cable, and great was the relief of all when the ponderous living mass was seen slowly to pass astern, but fortunately without doing any mischief."

A MOMENT OF TERRIBLE EXCITEMENT.

"Soon after eight o'clock an injured portion of the cable was discovered about a mile or two from the portion paying out; not a moment was lost by Mr. Canning, the engineer on duty, in setting men to work to cobble up the injury as well as time would permit, for the cable was going out at such a rate that the damaged portion would be payed overboard in less than twenty minutes, and former experience had shown us that to check either the speed of the ship or the cable would, in all probability, be attended by the most fatal results. Just before the lapping was finished Professor Thomson reported that the electrical continuity of the wire had ceased, but the insulation was still perfect; attention was naturally directed to the injured piece as the probable source of the stoppage, and not a moment was lost in cutting the cable at that point, with the intention of making a perfect splice. To the consternation of all, the electrical tests applied showed the fault to be overboard, and in all probability some fifty miles from the ship. Not a second was to be lost, for it was evident that the cut portion must be payed overboard in a few minutes, and in the mean time the tedious and difficult operation of making a splice had to be performed. The ship was immediately stopped, and no more cable payed out than was absolutely necessary to prevent it breaking. As the stern of the ship was lifted by the waves a scene of the most intense excitement followed. It seemed impossible, even by using the greatest possible speed, and paying out the least possible amount of cable, that the junction could be finished before the part was taken out of the hands of the workmen. The main hold presented an extraordinary scene; nearly all the officers of the ship and of those connected with the expedition stood in groups about the coil, watching with intense anxiety the cable, as it slowly unwound itself nearer and nearer the joint, while the workmen, directed by Mr. Canning, under whose superintendence the cable was originally manufactured, worked at the splice as only men could work who felt that the life and death of the expedition depended upon their rapidity. But all their speed was to no purpose, as the cable was unwinding within a hundred fathoms, and, as a last and desperate resource, the cable was stopped altogether, and for a few minutes the ship hung on by the end. Fortunately, however, it was only for a few minutes, as the strain was continually rising above two tons, and it would not hold on much longer; when the splice was finished the signal was made to loose the stopper, and it passed overboard safely enough.

DESPAIR, AND HOPE AGAIN.

"When the excitement consequent upon having so narrowly saved the cable had passed away, we awoke to the consciousness that the case was still as hopeless as ever, for the electrical continuity was still entirely wanting. Preparations were consequently made to pay out as little rope as possible, and to hold on for six hours, in the hopes that the fault, whatever it might be, might mend itself before cutting the cable and returning to the rendezvous to make another splice. The magnetic needles on the receiving instruments were watched closely for the returning signals; when in a few minutes the last hope was extinguished by their suddenly indicating dead earth, which tended to show that the cable had broken from the Niagara, or that the insulation had been completely destroyed. In three minutes, however, every one was agreeably surprised by the intelligence that the stoppage had disappeared, and that the signals had again appeared at their regular intervals from the Niagara. It is needless to say what a load of anxiety this news removed from the minds of every one.

GOING TO BURN THEIR MASTS.

"On Friday, 30th, toward the evening, it blew almost a gale of wind from the eastward dead ahead of our course. As the breeze freshened, the speed of the engines was gradually increased; but the wind more than increased in proportion, so before the sun went down the Agamemnon was going full steam against the wind, only making a speed of about four knots an hour. During the evening topmasts were lowered, and spars, yards, sails, and, indeed, every thing aloft that could offer resistance to the wind was sent down on deck; but still the ship made but little way, chiefly in consequence of the heavy sea, though the enormous quantity of fuel consumed showed us that, if the wind lasted, we should be reduced to burning the masts, spars, and even the decks, to bring the ship into Valentia. It seemed to be our particular ill-fortune to meet with head winds whichever way the ship's head was turned. On our journey out we had been delayed and obliged to consume an undue proportion of coal for want of an easterly wind, and now all our fuel was wanted because of one.

THE GALE IN EARNEST.

"During the afternoon of Saturday the wind again freshened up, and before nightfall it again blew nearly a gale of wind, and a tremendous sea ran before it from the southwest, which made the Agamemnon pitch to such an extent that it was thought impossible the cable could hold on through the night; indeed, had it not been for the constant care and watchfulness exercised by Mr. Bright and the two energetic engineers, Mr. Canning and Mr. Clifford, who acted with him, it could not have been done at all. Men were kept at the wheels of the machine to prevent their stopping, as the stern of the ship rose and fell with the sea, for had they done so the cable must undoubtedly have parted. During Sunday the sea and wind increased, and before the evening it blew a smart gale. Now, indeed, were the energy and activity of all engaged in the operation tasked to the utmost. Mr. Hoar and Mr. Moore, the two engineers who had the charge of the relieving wheels of the dynamometer, had to keep watch and watch alternately every four hours, and while on duty durst not let their attention be removed from their occupation for one moment; for on their releasing the brakes every time the stern of the ship fell into the trough of the sea entirely depended the safety of the cable, and the result shows how ably they discharged their duty. Throughout the night there were few who had the least expectation of the cable holding on till morning, and many remained awake listening for the sound that all most dreaded to hear—viz., the gun which should announce the failure of all our hopes. But still the cable, which, in comparison with the ship from which it was payed out and the gigantic waves among which it was delivered, was but a mere thread, continued to hold on, only leaving a silvery phosphorous line upon the stupendous seas as they rolled on toward the ship.

A BRITISH OUTRAGE.

"About three o'clock on Tuesday morning all on board were startled from their beds by the loud booming of a gun. Every one, without waiting for the performance of the most particular toilet, rushed on deck to ascertain the cause of the disturbance. Contrary to all expectation, the cable was safe, but just in the gray light could be seen the Valorous—rounded, too, in the most warlike attitude—firing gun after gun in quick succession toward a large American bark, which, quite unconscious of our proceeding, was standing right across our stern. Such loud and repeated remonstrances from so large a steam frigate were not to be despised, and, evidently without knowing the why or the wherefore, she quickly threw her sails aback and remained hove to. Whether those on board her considered that we were engaged in some filibustering expedition, or regarded our proceedings as another British outrage upon the American flag, it is impossible to say, but certain it is that, apparently in great trepidation, she remained hove to until we had lost sight of her in the distance.

LAND.

"By daylight on the morning of Thursday the bold and rocky mountains which entirely surround the wild and picturesque neighborhood of Valentia rose right before us at a few miles' distance. Never, probably, was the sight of the land more welcome, as it brought to a successful termination one of the greatest, but, at the same time, most difficult schemes which was ever undertaken. Had it been the dullest and most melancholy swamp on the face of the earth that lay before us we should have found it a pleasant prospect; but as the sun rose from the estuary of Dingle Bay, tinging with a deep soft purple the lofty summits of the steep mountains which surround its shores, and illuminating the masses of morning vapor which hung upon them, it was a scene which might vie in beauty with any thing that could be produced by the most florid imagination of an artist. No one on shore was, apparently, conscious of our approach, so the Valorous steamed ahead to the mouth of the harbor and fired a gun. Both ships made straight for Dowlas Bay, and about six o'clock came to anchor at the side of Beginish Island, opposite to Valentia. As soon as the inhabitants became aware of our approach there was a general desertion of the place, and hundreds of boats crowded round us, their passengers in the greatest state of excitement to hear all about our voyage. Soon after our arrival a signal was received from the Niagara that they were preparing to land, having payed out 1030 nautical miles of cable, while the Agamemnon had accomplished her portion of the distance with an expenditure of 1020 miles, making the total length of the wire submerged 2050 geographical miles. Immediately after the ships cast anchor the paddle-box boats of the Valorous were got ready, and two miles of cable coiled away in them, for the purpose of landing the end; but it was late in the afternoon before the procession of boats left the ship, under a salute of three rounds of small arms from the detachment of marines on board the Agamemnon, under the command of Lieutenant Morris. At about three o'clock the end was safely brought on shore at Knightstown, Valentia, by Mr. Bright and Mr. Canning, the chief and second engineers. The end was immediately laid in the trench which had been dug to receive it, while a royal salute, making the neighboring rocks and mountains reverberate, announced that the communication between the Old and the New World had been completed. The end was immediately taken into the electrical room by Mr. Whitehouse, and attached to a galvanometer, and the first message was received through the entire length."

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS JUDGED BY AN AMERICAN.

The editor of the New York Times, Mr. Raymond, is in England, and thus writes concerning the House of Commons: "What strikes an American most, in contrasting or comparing the proceedings of the House of Commons with those of our House of Representatives, is the business-like air and manner of the former. Whenever a question comes up it is debated. The speeches made are upon the subject under discussion, and they are alternately from friends and opponents of the measure in question. One advocates it, and is answered by another, who, in turn, is replied to; and so the discussion proceeds to its close. In our House, as every body knows, such a debate is almost unknown. We have either long speeches, made for constituent and for political effect, or else personal passages, which degenerate into wrangles. These are serious defects in a legislative body, and ought to be remedied. It seems to me that the writing-desks, the hour rule, and the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, have contributed very largely to the existing state of things."

THE LONDON PREACHERS.

He has this to say of the preachers of the day: "I went to hear another English celebrity—Mr. Spurgeon, who continues to preach to enormous congregations, and with undiminished popularity, which it is not easy to explain or understand. He is neither able nor eloquent. He is excessively commonplace in both matter and manner. He has a clear voice, very great fluency in the construction and utterance of sentences, and a certain directness in his style of thought and expression. But he is excessively shallow, and frequently sophistical to a degree absolutely insulting to the understanding of his hearers. There are at least half a dozen clergymen in New York who are not only far abler preachers, but who would seem to have the elements of popularity in a far greater degree. Dr. Cumming, the expounder of prophecy and the Apocalypse, preaches to crowded congregations and with more ability than Mr. S. I suspect something of the popularity of both these men is due to the fact that they speak their sermons, instead of singing them. I heard the celebrated Frederick Denison Maurice preach a very able and interesting discourse at the Chapel of Lincoln's Inn; but it was done with a sing-song tone which differed but little from an unsuccessful attempt at chanting, and which rendered it almost impossible for me to follow him. It must be pleasant for a congregation, in contrast with such preaching, to hear a sermon which they can understand."

WHAT MR. ROEBUCK SAW AT CHERBOURG.

That eccentric personage, Mr. Roebuck, has been to Cherbourg, and thus describes what he saw there:

"I went on shore, and what did I see there? I saw men in peg-top trowsers; they put me very much in mind of Cochin China fowls. I saw priests and women—and very ugly women too. Well, then, I said to myself, is there a man among them who dare say his soul is his own? A man next door said to me, 'Take care, and mind what you are about; the French colonels will be after you. You are not in England now.' 'No,' I said, 'I know that perfectly well, but still I will speak out what I think.' He said, 'You will do it at your own risk;' and I did it at my own risk. But I was not in England, and recollect there is a great difference between being able to say that your soul is your own and not daring to speak above your breath; and I will never believe until I see it, and I don't think I shall see it in this world, that a set of intelligent, free-spoken, free-hearted, strong-armed, and hard-fisted men will succumb to any terror from abroad."

FRANCE.

THE FETES AT CHERBOURG.—HOW QUEEN VICTORIA WAS RECEIVED.

Papers containing the details of the fêtes at Cherbourg have come to hand, and we make a few extracts:

"Any one who has seen and knows any thing of the French fleet knows that they always pride themselves upon the style and imposing effect of their saluting fire, and this salute in particular had been closely rehearsed beforehand. Yet the actual performance as much surpassed expectation as it defies description. As the royal yacht turned round between the marine forts which mark the western entrance, Admiral Hamelin, in the Bretagne, 120, fired a single gun. There was a minute's pause, and then the salute began, not in a close, irregular, dropping cannonade, which so distinguishes a similar honor from the English navy, but gun after gun, running along each tier like a train of fire, till the very frame of the listener seemed shaken as if even the air smote him in its reverberation. Hardly had this great cannonade commenced, when all the ugly forts which dominate every part of the harbor, threatening with a thousand ominous, fearful-looking embrasures each ship that passes, took up the same song, only firing their numerous guns in volleys of eight at once, and as fast as they could be reloaded and discharged. It is but rarely that such a cannonade is ever heard, and seldom if ever that it has been given for purely peaceful welcome. But at all events it showed in an instant the great extent and number of the fortifications that cover every spot of vantage around the town. All toward sea was a mere mass of fire and smoke—but that one looked for, though this was far from being all. The ring of fire seemed not only to embrace the town, but extend far into the country, up among little ravines where none ever dreamed that guns lay lurking, on the top of picturesque eminences where one only fancied villas and rural cottages could exist; amidst thick clumps of trees and flanking yellow corn-fields came the same dreadful uproar, till it seemed as if all France, even from her hills and mountain-tops, was doing honor to the advent of the Queen of England."

THE FIRE-WORKS.

The London Times correspondent says: "At the conclusion of the banquet her Majesty, the Emperor, the Empress, and the Prince Consort proceeded to the stern-gallery of the Bretagne, which had been most tastefully fitted up with crimson drapery, and from thence witnessed one of the grandest and most effective displays of fire-works which has probably ever been seen. The whole of the breakwater in its enormous length was lighted up by fires at short intervals, the French men-of-war were illuminated at their ports, and seemed like enormous transparent chessboards; rockets innumerable went rushing and screaming through the air from the Fort Central of the breakwater; with tourbillons, gerbes, and every conceivable device of the pyrotechnist's skill. The British merchant-ships took up the display, and from the ends of the yards of the Salsette blue lights and Roman candles were burned, producing a most pleasing effect. Then more rockets and more showers of colored and falling stars from the fort, and then a perfect storm of explosive crackers, and then more again, and then a tremendous fall of colored fire, as though the sky were raining huge drops of fire in the harbor. For a moment there was a pause, and the new life-light of Captain Fitzmaurice illuminated the whole of the masts and rigging, and showed up, clear as day, even the ensigns on the tall spars of the royal yacht. While all else was dark, the spars and rigging of the ship stood out in spectral light, so different from every thing else around that one might almost imagine that the Flying Dutchman had really appeared in port. Suddenly there rushed forth on their screaming course hundreds of rockets, and then the whole front of Fort Central stands out in brilliant columns, showing in colossal dimensions and burning outline the royal and imperial arms of the two countries. Another grand 'bouquet' of les feu d'artifice—which, it was said, had cost more than 25,000 francs—and all was silent again. The familiar strains of our National Anthem float over the waters of the bay, and Englishmen know that her Majesty is about to leave the Bretagne."

FATAL CONSEQUENCES OF A DUEL.

The following is among the latest from Paris: Seldom, perhaps, has inadvertent levity and a false sense of honor produced results more disastrous than what is now related as having actually occurred in France. In 1855 Captain C——, an officer recently returned from the Crimea, became attached to a young English lady, who resided in the Rue Rivoli, and, with the consent of her mother, was to have been married to her. A few days previously to the nuptials, he met a gentleman at Verrey's, in the uniform of a marine officer, and more in joke than earnest called the attention of his companions to the fact, saying, "I never like amphibious subordination. No man of spirit should be indebted to a ship's cook for leave to go on shore." No sooner had the words escaped the lips of the officer, than the young marine sprang upon him and insisted upon immediate satisfaction for so gross an insult to the service. Captain C—— assured him that he really meant no offense; but the marine, who was greatly excited, insisted on a meeting then and there in the Bois de Boulogne. Seconds were procured, and the ground measured. The unfortunate challenger was severely wounded. Captain C—— was advised to quit Paris for London, but he would not depart without seeing his intended bride. He entered the well-known mansion in the Rue Rivoli. On a sofa lay the wounded marine, his mother and sisters weeping over him—he was brother to the bride. He had but just arrived from the West Indies, after an absence of four years, and, supposing his mother to be at their family estate in Devonshire, intended to set off to Torquay next day. Poor fellow! he died within a week. He acknowledged before his death that he alone was to blame for the duel, but of course his sister could not bear to connect her destiny with the hand that had deprived her brother of life. She refused to become Captain C——'s wife, and, as she never could surmount the appalling obstacle to their union, died of a broken heart three months afterward. Captain C—— sold his commission and retired into solitude, where a troubled spirit soon terminated his existence.

SPAIN.

ADVENTURES OF THE QUEEN.

The Madrid journals publish several anecdotes connected with the royal visit to the Asturias. One is thus narrated: "A gray-headed old peasant placed himself in the middle of the road, declaring that he would not stir until he had seen the Prince of the Asturias. The Queen, noting the old man's determination, ordered the carriage to be stopped, and the old man's wishes to be satisfied. 'I am eighty-three years of age, madam,' said he, 'and now that my old eyes have seen the young Prince, I have no other wish ungratified.' The Queen burst into tears, while a young girl, stepping forward from out a group of peasant children, offered some modest presents to the royal children. Her Majesty is stated to be exceedingly pleased with her excursion into that part of Spain, and has expressed her determination to return there next summer or the year after. The consequence is, private letters state, that property in the Asturias has suddenly advanced in price.

RUSSIA.

AN EXAMPLE OF IMPERIAL JUSTICE.

It will be recollected that some time ago a rather serious conflict took place between the students of the Moscow University and the police force, with regard to which the former lodged a complaint against the latter. In consequence of a special command of the Emperor, a judicial inquiry was instituted, and the judgments, approved by the Emperor himself, were published on the 30th of July. The sentences are as follows:

District Lieutenant College-Secretary Simonow, for imprudent conduct toward the students, and instigating the lower ranks of the police force and other persons against the students, and, moreover, for false denunciation to his superiors, and concealment of the real facts of the case—condemned to lose his title, rank, and privileges, and to be degraded to the rank of a common soldier.

District Inspector Titular Councillor Morosow, for negligence, wrong acting, and concealing of unlawful deeds of the said Simonow—condemned to be dismissed from the service forever.

Supervisor Court-Councilor Zwitenlew, for negligence in the service—condemned to be dismissed from the service forever.

The Physician Court Councilor Litiejew, for giving an untrue certificate on the state of health of the students and a police-officer—to be dismissed from the service.

Such an example of justice by the Emperor, which fell like a thunder-bolt on the heads of the overbearing caste of police-officers, who, in Russia, belong to the most deeply hated and despised class of all Government employés, has made an excellent impression upon all classes of society; they hope that the days of arbitrary police rule are gone forever, and that the reign of law and justice has begun.

CHINA.

CONCLUSION OF THE TREATY OF PEACE.

By Atlantic telegraph we have the following important news from China:

"A treaty of peace has been concluded with China, by which England and France obtain all their demands, including the establishment of embassies at Pekin and indemnification for the expenses of the war.

"Under the terms of the treaty of peace, the Chinese empire is open to the trade of all foreign powers; the Christian religion is allowed in all parts of the country; and foreign diplomatic agents are admitted."

INDIA.

PROGRESS OF THE WAR.

By Atlantic telegraph we have intelligence to the effect that the Gwalior insurgent army in India has been broken up, and much progress has been made in the establishment of order throughout all the disturbed districts.

The following is the previous bulletin from Gwalior:

"The following has been received from Sir Hugh Rose, dated Gwalior, 22d June: 'On the day of the general action with the Gwalior rebels on the 19th inst., the force under my command took, exclusive of the guns in the fort, 16 guns in the field from the enemy, one of them a brass 24-pounder, a brass 18-pounder, a brass 8-inch mortar, several English 9-pounders, and guns of other calibre, great quantities of ammunition, wagons, and warlike stores of every description, and 70 elephants. When the troops went to occupy the Fort of Gwalior after the capture of the city by storm, Scindia's authorities having reported to me that it was vacated, they found the gate shut, and a detachment of fanatics opened fire on them. Sun having set, I caused the fort to be surrounded, and the next morning a detachment of the gallant 25th Bombay Native Infantry stormed and took it; their brave leader, Lieutenant Rose, was killed. I sent a column of horse-artillery and cavalry, under the Brigadier-General Napier, C.B., in pursuit of the rebels, who fled in great disorder after the defeat of the 19th inst. I also directed another column from Dholepore to cross the Chumbal and pursue the fugitives. Brigadier-General Napier overtook them on the 21st inst. near Jana Allahpoor, defeated them, captured 25 guns, and cut up a considerable number. Brigadier-General Napier, who has displayed the greatest energy and intelligence in the pursuit, continues it to Subbulghur. The day after the capture of Gwalior I conducted Sir R. Hamilton and Major M'Pherson, with a squadron of her Majesty's Hussars and one squadron of her Majesty's 14th Light Dragoons, to the Palace of Gwalior; the streets were lined by immense crowds, who received the Maharajah with every appearance of attachment.'"

THE STORY OF THE LAST SURVIVOR OF CAWNPORE.

The London Times publishes the following account, prefacing it with the following letter, which appears to guarantee its genuineness:

"Sir,—The Friend of India of the 20th of May last contains the following remarks: 'The Indian Empire states that the young lady we mentioned some time since as having escaped from the rebels (at Cawnpore) was taken captive by the same Sowar who carried off Miss Wheeler. For the truth of this we can not vouch, but it is certain that there is one survivor of the massacre of Cawnpore. She has as yet been unable to give a connected narrative of that dreadful occurrence, the recollection is still too overpowering.' The narrative I am enabled to send to you by the kindness of a former pupil of mine, Mr. George W. Stuart, of the Sudder Court, Alipore, Calcutta. The young lady's name, and a few particulars of her family, I inclose for your private satisfaction, not for publication. A duplicate of the narrative, Mr. Stuart informs me, has been sent to Lord Canning, and may possibly by this time have seen the light in India. I am, Sir, yours obediently,

"W. Knighton, LL.D.

"The College, Ewell, Surrey, Aug. 9."

THE YOUNG LADY SEIZED, SEARCHED, AND THROWN OVERBOARD.

"I was sixteen years of age when I accompanied my sister and her husband to Cawnpore, about six months before the mutiny broke out.

"An unfortunate treaty was entered into between General Wheeler and the Nena Sahib on the 24th of June; the latter swore by his gods and upon the Gunga to protect us and see us safely taken to Allahabad in boats. We entered these joyfully, never for a moment expecting treachery, and were taken quite by surprise when we were fired on. The river in many places in the middle had no more than six feet water, so that most of the boats were soon aground. Some of the small ones managed to push on, and even then with difficulty. The firing at first was irregular, but after a while the balls came whizzing past us as thick as hail, sinking many boats. I was on the deck of my boat, seated, stupefied with terror and amazement, when I was further convinced of immediate danger by seeing a party of Sepoys enter the boat I was in. I was seized in an instant by the arm by one of these savages—for savages and ruffians they looked. I was asked to deliver all I possessed; money and jewels to the amount of 400 rupees, the sum I managed to take with me when I proceeded to the barracks, was now snatched from me. On replying in the negative to questions whether I had more money and valuables by me my person was searched rudely. My senses had very nearly forsaken me. I was in a sort of stupor. The search was made on my person while I was standing, but, to speak more exactly, I was made to stand while I was searched. The ruffian, as if to tantalize me, let off his gun over my head and shoulders in the most deliberate and cold-blooded manner. They afterward shot two sweet little girls, sisters, who were between the ages of six and eight. The poor creatures were clinging to each other when they committed this diabolical act. Next, they shot an Eurasian, whose name was Kirkpatrick, a merchant in Cawnpore. How many others were killed by the miscreants I could not know, for I felt dizzy, and sank on the deck. For what time I remained in this state I have no idea. I returned to consciousness by feeling myself suddenly and rudely seized and thrown into the river.

HIDES HERSELF WITH MISS WHEELER IN THE WOODS.

"The next moment I was buffeting with the water. I managed, with some difficulty, to get to land, and scrambled on shore. I crawled on my hands and knees till I reached a tree about half a mile from the banks, and hid myself as well as I could. My thoughts, Oh Heavens! were agonizing. I fell by degrees into a sort of drowsy fit, occasioned, perhaps, from weariness, from which I was aroused by approaching stealthy footsteps. In an instant I sprang to my feet; but instead of the ruffians whom I expected to see, to my great relief the well-known face and form of Miss Wheeler, the General's daughter, were before me. In few words I understood that she had been dealt with in the same way as myself—i. e., thrown into the water by the men, who, perhaps, thought she was not worth a bullet—that, being insensible, she would soon sink to the bottom of the river. Our agitation and fear, however, were so great, that we had not much of consolation to offer each other. We had not been together more than an hour, I should suppose, when a party of the enemy surprised us. We were dragged in different directions, and of Miss Wheeler's fate I knew nothing till very lately.

IS CAUGHT AND HORRIDLY OUTRAGED.

"I was pushed and dragged along, and subjected to every indignity. Occasionally I felt the thrust of a bayonet, and on my protesting against such treatment, with uplifted hands, and appealing to their feelings as men, I was struck on my head, and was made to understand, in language too plain, that I had not long to live; but, before being put to death, that I would be made to feel some portion of the degradation their brethren felt at Meerut when ironed and disgraced before the troops. After a walk of about four hours, I was brought to a place about four miles from Cawnpore, very near Bithoor, where some of the mutineers were encamped. I was almost in a state of nudity, for my clothes had been torn to pieces when I had been dragged along by the men, and I had the mortification of being made a spectacle before these heartless and cruel wretches. Clapping of hands and cries of 'Khoob-Keal' (Well done!) burst upon my stupefied senses. A circle formed round me. I sank on the ground and buried my face in my hands. Oh! the agony of those moments!

SAVED BY AN AFRICAN.

"At length I heard a voice speaking to my persecutors in rather a conciliatory tone—'Spare the poor creature and have compassion on her; let her alone, she seems dead already.' I looked up and saw an African. There was something mild and compassionate in his look. He relieved me in a great measure from the shame I was suffering by throwing a covering or chuddur on me. He asked me to accompany him. I immediately followed, and was ushered into a tent, where I was desired by my benefactor to take rest. He made me understand that he would do all in his power to have my life spared. I thanked him for his kindness. After a while he procured me a suit of native clothes, which he said I should put on. 'You are very unwell,' he said, 'your eyes are bloodshot and face very much flushed.' I knew that I had a strong fever on me, and felt exceedingly weak. I replied that a little sleep would perhaps do me good. I laid my aching head on the mattress and fell fast asleep. On waking I still felt so weak that I could hardly lift my head. I had a chupattie, or handbread, and a little dhall served to me, which I could not eat."

HOW SHE REJOINED HER COUNTRYMEN.

The narrative then relates the alternations of her feelings at the news received in the rebel quarters of Havelock's advances and retreats. She was removed to Lucknow. After a time she put herself under the protection of the rebel Moulvie, Ahmedoolah Shah, who protected her. During her captivity she professed to be a convert to Mohammedanism. After the rebels were driven out of Lucknow she was obliged to join a wandering party of mutineers, who, after a time, began to despair of any success against the British.

"I explained to them that as their only hope was in the clemency of the Company Bahadoor, the best plan would be to send me with a proper escort to Allahabad, where I would explain their case to the Governor-General through the magistrate of Allahabad, who, I said, was my cousin. I said, that if they allowed me to manage their affairs, they would come off with their lives and liberty. I made them understand that, though a Mohammedan now, I had once been a Christian, and, having influential relatives, I would urge their kindness to me as a sufficient ground for their lives being spared. I tried to convince them that the British looked more upon their sparing the life of one female than the slaughter of five hundred men."

By these representations she induced the rebels to send her to the nearest British camp. She thus escaped.

"I shall now draw my hasty sketch to a close by informing the reader that I am very happy in the midst of friends and relatives at Calcutta, whither I came after residing with my uncle for a month.

"The date on which I reached my uncle's factory was the 20th of June, 1858, exactly one year since the Cawnpore massacre. I am now residing with my aunt and receiving 100 rupees a month from the Relief Fund, and I need hardly add, that I am as happy and comfortable as I could wish to be."

THE BATHE AT NEWPORT.

PICNICKING IN THE WOODS.

COUNTRY LIFE IN SUMMER.

The preceding illustrations will at a glance be recognized by the happy people who escape the heat and dust of city life in summer and seek fresh air and health in the country. The fortunate few who have mingled in the gay bathing parties at Newport may seek for their likenesses in the picture which represents the dip in the surf; and the many who have spent a pleasant afternoon in the woods—nominally in search of nuts or berries, will be taught to recall many a sweet recollection by the sight of the page which is devoted to an afternoon in the woods. Such pictures need no text. They tell their own story.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER II.

The learned compute that seven hundred and seven millions of millions of vibrations have penetrated the eye before the eye can distinguish the tints of a violet. What philosophy can calculate the vibrations of the heart before it can distinguish the colors of love?

While Guy Darrell thus passed his hours within the unfinished fragments of a dwelling builded for posterity, and among the still relics of remote generations, Love and Youth were weaving their warm eternal idyll on the sunny lawns by the gliding river.

There they are, Love and Youth, Lionel and Sophy, in the arbor round which her slight hands have twined the honey-suckle, fond imitation of that bower endeared by the memory of her earliest holiday—she seated coyly, he on the ground at her feet, as when Titania had watched his sleep. He has been reading to her, the book has fallen from his hand. What book? That volume of poems so unintelligibly obscure to all but the dreaming young, who are so unintelligibly obscure to themselves. But to the merit of those poems, I doubt if even George did justice. It is not true, I believe, that they are not durable. Some day or other, when all the jargon so feelingly denounced by Colonel Morley, about "æsthetics," and "objective," and "subjective," has gone to its long home, some critic who can write English will probably bring that poor little volume fairly before the public; and, with all its manifold faults, it will take a place in the affections, not of one single generation of the young, but—everlasting, ever-dreaming, ever-growing youth. But you and I, reader, have no other interest in these poems, except this—that they were written by the brother-in-law of that whimsical, miserly Frank Vance, who perhaps, but for such a brother-in-law, would never have gone through the labor by which he has cultivated the genius that achieved his fame; and if he had not cultivated that genius, he might never have known Lionel; and if he had never known Lionel, Lionel might never perhaps have gone to the Surrey village, in which he saw the Phenomenon: And to push farther still that Voltaireian philosophy of ifs—if either Lionel or Frank Vance had not been so intimately associated in the minds of Sophy and Lionel with the golden holiday on the beautiful river, Sophy and Lionel might not have thought so much of those poems; and if they had not thought so much of those poems, there might not have been between them that link of poetry without which the love of two young people is a sentiment, always very pretty, it is true, but much too commonplace to deserve special commemoration in a work so uncommonly long as this is likely to be. And thus it is clear that Frank Vance is not a superfluous and episodical personage among the characters of this history; but, however indirectly, still essentially, one of those beings without whom the author must have given a very different answer to the question, "What will he do with it?"

Return we to Lionel and Sophy. The poems have brought their hearts nearer and nearer together. And when the book fell from Lionel's hand, Sophy knew that his eyes were on her face, and her own eyes looked away. And the silence was so deep and so sweet! Neither had yet said to the other a word of love. And in that silence both felt that they loved and were beloved. Sophy! how childlike she looked still! How little she is changed!—except that the soft blue eyes are far more pensive, and that her merry laugh is now never heard. In that luxurious home, fostered with the tenderest care by its charming owner, the romance of her childhood realized, and Lionel by her side, she misses the old crippled vagrant. And therefore it is that her merry laugh is no longer heard! "Ah!" said Lionel, softly breaking the pause at length, "Do not turn your eyes from me, or I shall think that there are tears in them!" Sophy's breast heaved, but her eyes were averted still. Lionel rose gently, and came to the other side of her quiet form. "Fie! there are tears, and you would hide them from me. Ungrateful!"

Sophy looked at him now with candid, inexpressible, guileless affection in those swimming eyes, and said, with touching sweetness, "Ungrateful! Should I not be so if I were gay and happy?"

And in self-reproach for not being sufficiently unhappy while that young consoler was by her side, she too rose, left the arbor, and looked wistfully along the river. George Morley was expected; he might bring tidings of the absent. And now while Lionel, rejoining her, exerts all his eloquence to allay her anxiety and encourage her hopes, and while they thus, in that divinest stage of love, ere the tongue repeats what the eyes have told, glide along—here in sunlight by lingering flowers—there in shadow under mournful willows, whose leaves are ever the latest to fall, let us explain by what links of circumstance Sophy became the great lady's guest, and Waife once more a homeless wanderer.

CHAPTER III.

Comprising many needful explanations illustrative of wise saws; as, for example, "He that hath an ill name is half hanged." "He that hath been bitten by a serpent is afraid of a rope." "He that looks for a star puts out his candles;" and, "When God wills, all winds bring rain."

The reader has been already made aware how, by an impulse of womanhood and humanity, Arabella Crane had been converted from a persecuting into a tutelary agent in the destinies of Waife and Sophy. That revolution in her moral being dated from the evening on which she had sought the cripple's retreat to warn him of Jasper's designs. We have seen by what stratagem she had made it appear that Waife and his grandchild had sailed beyond the reach of molestation; with what liberality she had advanced the money that freed Sophy from the manager's claim; and how considerately she had empowered her agent to give the reference which secured to Waife the asylum in which we last beheld him. In a few stern sentences she had acquainted Waife with her fearless, inflexible resolve to associate her fate henceforth with the life of his lawless son; and, by rendering abortive all his evil projects of plunder, to compel him at last to depend upon her for an existence neither unsafe nor sordid, provided only that it were not dishonest. The moment that she revealed that design, Waife's trust in her was won. His own heart enabled him to comprehend the effect produced upon a character otherwise unamiable and rugged, by the grandeur of self-immolation and the absorption of one devoted heroic thought. In the strength and bitterness of passion which thus pledged her existence to redeem another's, he obtained the key to her vehement and jealous nature; saw why she had been so cruel to the child of a rival; why she had conceived compassion for that child in proportion as the father's unnatural indifference had quenched the anger of her own self-love; and, above all, why, as the idea of reclaiming and appropriating solely to herself the man who, for good or for evil, had grown into the all-predominant object of her life, gained more and more the mastery over her mind, it expelled the lesser and the baser passions, and the old mean revenge against an infant faded away before the light of that awakening conscience, which is often rekindled from ashes by the sparks of a single better and worthier thought. And, in the resolute design to reclaim Jasper Losely, Arabella came at once to a ground in common with his father, with his child. Oh what, too, would the old man owe to her, what would be his gratitude, his joy, if she not only guarded his spotless Sophy, but saved from the bottomless abyss his guilty son! Thus when Arabella Crane had, nearly five years before, sought Waife's discovered hiding-place, near the old blood-stained tower, mutual interests and sympathies had formed between them a bond of alliance not the less strong because rather tacitly acknowledged and openly expressed. Arabella had written to Waife from the Continent, for the first half year, pretty often, and somewhat sanguinely, as to the chance of Losely's ultimate reformation. Then the intervals of silence became gradually more prolonged, and the letters more brief. But still, whether from the wish not unnecessarily to pain the old man, or, as would be more natural to her character, which, even in its best aspects, was not gentle, from a proud dislike to confess failure, she said nothing of the evil courses which Jasper had renewed. Evidently she was always near him. Evidently, by some means or another, his life, furtive and dark, was ever under the glare of her watchful eyes.

Meanwhile, Sophy had been presented to Caroline Montfort. As Waife had so fondly anticipated, the lone childless lady had taken with kindness and interest to the fair motherless child. Left to herself often for months together in the grand forlorn house, Caroline soon found an object to her pensive walks in the basket-maker's cottage. Sophy's charming face and charming ways stole more and more into affections which were denied all nourishment at home. She entered into Waife's desire to improve, by education, so exquisite a nature; and, familiarity growing by degrees, Sophy was at length coaxed up to the great house; and during the hours which Waife devoted to his rambles (for even in his settled industry he could not conquer his vagrant tastes, but would weave his reeds or osiers as he sauntered through solitudes of turf or wood), became the docile, delighted pupil in the simple chintz room which Lady Montfort had reclaimed from the desert of her surrounding palace. Lady Montfort was not of a curious turn of mind; profoundly indifferent even to the gossip of drawing-rooms, she had no rankling desire to know the secrets of village hearth-stones. Little acquainted even with the great world—scarcely at all with any world below that in which she had her being, save as she approached humble sorrows by delicate charity—the contrast between Waife's calling and his conversation roused in her no vigilant suspicions. A man of some education, and born in a rank that touched upon the order of gentlemen, but of no practical or professional culture—with whimsical tastes—with roving, eccentric habits—had, in the course of life, picked up much harmless wisdom, but, perhaps from want of worldly prudence, failed of fortune. Contented with an obscure retreat and an humble livelihood, he might yet naturally be loth to confide to others the painful history of a descent in life. He might have relations in a higher sphere, whom the confession would shame; he might be silent in the manly pride which shrinks from alms and pity and a tale of fall. Nay, grant the worst—grant that Waife had suffered in repute as well as fortune—grant that his character had been tarnished by some plausible circumstantial evidences which he could not explain away to the satisfaction of friends or the acquittal of a short-sighted world—had there not been, were there not always, many innocent men similarly afflicted? And who could hear Waife talk, or look on his arch smile, and not feel that he was innocent? So, at least, thought Caroline Montfort. Naturally; for if in her essentially womanlike character there was one all-pervading and all-predominant attribute, it was Pity. If Fate had placed her under circumstances fitted to ripen into genial development all her exquisite forces of soul, her true post in this life would have been that of the Soother. What a child to some grief-worn father! What a wife to some toiling, aspiring, sensitive man of genius! What a mother to some suffering child! It seemed as if it were necessary to her to have something to compassionate and foster. She was sad when there was no one to comfort; but her smile was like a sunbeam from Eden when it chanced on a sorrow it could brighten away. Out of this very sympathy came her faults—faults of reasoning and judgment. Prudent in her own chilling path through what the world calls temptations, because so ineffably pure—because, to Fashion's light tempters, her very thought was as closed, as was the ear of Sabrina to the comrades of Comus—yet place before her some gentle scheme that seemed fraught with a blessing for others, and straightway her fancy embraced it, prudence faded—she saw not the obstacles, weighed not the chances against it. Charity to her did not come alone, but with its sister twins, Hope and Faith.

> "Under the glassy, cool, translucent wave,"

Thus, benignly for the old man and the fair child, years rolled on till Lord Montfort's sudden death, and his widow was called upon to exchange Montfort Court (which passed to the new heir) for the distant jointure House of Twickenham. By this time she had grown so attached to Sophy, and Sophy so gratefully fond of her, that she proposed to Waife to take his sweet grandchild as her permanent companion, complete her education, and assure her future. This had been the old man's cherished day-dream; but he had not contemplated its realization until he himself were in the grave. He turned pale, he staggered, when the proposal which would separate him from his grandchild was first brought before him. But he recovered ere Lady Montfort could be aware of the acuteness of the pang she inflicted, and accepted the generous offer with warm protestations of joy and gratitude. But Sophy! Sophy consent to leave her grandfather afar and aged in his solitary cottage! Little did either of them know Sophy, with her soft heart and determined soul, if they supposed such egotism possible in her. Waife insisted—Waife was angry—Waife was authoritative—Waife was imploring—Waife was pathetic—all in vain! But to close every argument, the girl went boldly to Lady Montfort, and said, "If I left him, his heart would break—never ask it." Lady Montfort kissed Sophy tenderly as mother ever kissed a child for some sweet loving trait of a noble nature, and said simply, "But he shall not be left—he shall come too."

She offered Waife rooms in her Twickenham house—she wished to collect books—he should be librarian. The old man shivered and refused—refused firmly. He had made a vow not to be a guest in any house. Finally, the matter was compromised; Waife would remove to the neighborhood of Twickenham; there hire a cottage; there ply his art; and Sophy, living with him, should spend a part of each day with Lady Montfort as now.

So it was resolved. Waife consented to occupy a small house on the verge of the grounds belonging to the jointure villa, on the condition of paying rent for it. And George Morley insisted on the privilege of preparing that house for his old teacher's reception, leaving it simple and rustic to outward appearance, but fitting its pleasant chambers with all that his knowledge of the old man's tastes and habits suggested for comfort or humble luxury; a room for Sophy, hung with the prettiest paper, all butterflies and flowers, commanding a view of the river. Waife, despite his proud scruples, could not refuse such gifts from a man whose fortune and career had been secured by his artful lessons. Indeed, he had already permitted George to assist, though not largely, his own efforts to repay the £100 advanced by Mrs. Crane. The years he had devoted to a craft which his ingenuity made lucrative, had just enabled the basket-maker, with his pupil's aid, to clear off that debt by installments. He had the satisfaction of thinking that it was his industry which had replaced the sum to which his grandchild owed her release from the execrable Rugge.

Lady Montfort's departure (which preceded Waife's by some weeks) was more mourned by the poor in her immediate neighborhood than by the wealthier families who composed what a province calls its society; and the gloom which that event cast over the little village round the kingly mansion, was increased when Waife and his grandchild left.

For the last three years, emboldened by Lady Montfort's protection, and the conviction that he was no longer pursued or spied, the old man had relaxed his earlier reserved and secluded habits. Constitutionally sociable, he had made acquaintance with his humbler neighbors; lounged by their cottage palings in his rambles down the lanes; diverted their children with Sir Isaac's tricks, or regaled them with nuts and apples from his little orchard; given to the more diligent laborers many a valuable hint how to eke out the daily wage with garden produce, or bees, or poultry; doctored farmers' cows; and even won the heart of the stud groom by a mysterious sedative ball, which had reduced to serene docility a highly nervous and hitherto unmanageable four-year-old. Sophy had been no less popular. No one grudged her the favor of Lady Montfort—no one wondered at it. They were loved and honored. Perhaps the happiest years Waife had known since his young wife left the earth were passed in the hamlet which he fancied her shade haunted; for was it not there—there, in that cottage—there, in sight of those green osiers, that her first modest virgin replies to his letters of love and hope had soothed his confinement and animated him—till then little fond of sedentary toils—to the very industry which, learned in sport, now gave subsistence, and secured a home. To that home persecution had not come—gossip had not pryed into its calm seclusion—even chance, when threatening disclosure, had seemed to pass by innocuous. For once—a year or so before he left—an incident had occurred which alarmed him at the time, but led to no annoying results. The banks of the great sheet of water in Montfort Park were occasionally made the scene of rural picnics by the families of neighboring farmers and tradesmen. One day Waife, while carelessly fashioning his baskets on his favorite spot, was recognized by a party on the opposite margin to whom he himself had paid no attention. He was told the next day by the landlady of the village inn, the main chimney of which he had undertaken to cure of smoking, that a "lady" in the picnic symposium of the day before had asked many questions about him and his grandchild, and had seemed pleased to hear they were both so comfortably settled. The "lady" had been accompanied by another "lady," and by two or three young gentlemen. They had arrived in a "buss," which they had hired for the occasion. They had come from Humberston the day after those famous races which annually filled Humberston with strangers—the time of year in which Rugge's grand theatrical exhibition delighted that ancient town. From the description of the two ladies, Waife suspected that they belonged to Rugge's company. But they had not claimed Waife as a cidevant comrade; they had not spoken of Sophy as the Phenomenon or the Fugitive. No molestation followed this event; and, after all, the Remorseless Baron had no longer any claim to the Persecuted Bandit or to Juliet Araminta.

But the ex-comedian is gone from the osiers—the hamlet. He is in his new retreat by the lordly river—within an hour of the smoke and roar of tumultuous London. He tries to look cheerful and happy, but his repose is troubled—his heart is anxious. Ever since Sophy, on his account, refused the offer which would have transferred her, not for a few daily hours, but for habitual life, from a basket-maker's roof to all the elegances and refinements of a sphere in which, if freed from him, her charms and virtues might win her some such alliance as seemed impossible while he was thus dragging her down to his own level—ever since that day the old man had said to himself, "I live too long." While Sophy was by his side he appeared busy at his work, and merry in his humor; the moment she left him for Lady Montfort's house the work dropped from his hands, and he sank into moody thought.

Waife had written to Mrs. Crane (her address then was at Paris) on removing to Twickenham, and begged her to warn him, should Jasper meditate a return to England, by a letter directed to him at the General Post-office, London. Despite his later trust in Mrs. Crane, he did not deem it safe to confide to her Lady Montfort's offer to Sophy, or the affectionate nature of that lady's intimacy with the girl now grown into womanhood. With that insight into the human heart, which was in him not so habitually clear and steadfast as to be always useful, but at times singularly if erratically lucid, he could not feel assured that Arabella Crane's ancient hate to Sophy (which, lessening in proportion to the girl's destitution, had only ceased when the stern woman felt, with a sentiment bordering on revenge, that it was to her that Sophy owed an asylum obscure and humble) might not revive, if she learned that the child of a detested rival was raised above the necessity of her protection, and brought within view of that station so much loftier than her own, from which she had once rejoiced to know that the offspring of a marriage which had darkened her life was excluded. For indeed it had been only on Waife's promise that he would not repeat the attempt that had proved so abortive, to enforce Sophy's claim on Guy Darrell, that Arabella Crane had in the first instance resigned the child to his care. His care—his—an attainted outcast! As long as Arabella Crane could see in Sophy but an object of compassion she might haughtily protect her; but could Sophy become an object of envy, would that protection last? No, he did not venture to confide in Mrs. Crane further than to say that he and Sophy had removed from Montfort village to the vicinity of London. Time enough to say more when Mrs. Crane returned to England; and then, not by letter, but in personal interview.

Once a month the old man went to London to inquire at the General Post-office for any communications his correspondent might there address to him. Only once, however, had he heard from Mrs. Crane since the announcement of his migration, and her note of reply was extremely brief, until in the fatal month of June, when Guy Darrell and Jasper Losely had alike returned, and on the same day, to the metropolis; and then the old man received from her a letter which occasioned him profound alarm. It apprised him not only that his terrible son was in England—in London; but that Jasper had discovered that the person embraced for America were not the worthless Wolfs, and that the real names they had assumed. Mrs. Crane ended with these ominous words: "It is right to say now that he has descended deeper and deeper. Could you see him, you would wonder that I neither abandon him nor my resolve. He hates me worse than the gibbet. To me and not to the gibbet he shall pass—defying punishment to the end. I am in London, not in my old house, but near him. His confidence is my herding. His fate and his progress are close to me—as close as if he dwelt in glass. Sophy is now of an age when the sex open the eyes to love to some person whose respectability could not be impugned, she could not be legally forced away against her will. But if under your roof, those whom Jasper has induced to institute a search, that he has no means to communicate with him himself, might make statements which (as you are already aware) might persuade others, through well-intention, to take an interest against me from you. He might publicly face even a police court if he else hoped to make me fall headlong into buying off an intolerable scandal. He might, in the first instance, and more probably, decoy her into his power through the hope that what might become of her before she was recovered? Separate yourself from her for a day, and it is you, notwithstanding your acts of disguise, that can be the more easily tracked. She, now almost a woman, is in no degree apt to dissimulation. Place her in some secure asylum until at least after the trial."

Wolfe read and re-read this epistle (to which there was no direction that enabled him to reply) in the privacy of a hall bedroom, to which he had retired from the gaze and pressure of the outside world. Sophy was not the long brooded over woe begun to take shape—to be hurried on to prompt decision. On recovering his first shock, he learned only the general plan. That same evening he saw Lady Montfort. He felt that, in the absence of Sophy's sake, he must lift the veil from the eyebrow on his own name. To guard against the same confession by Jasper which Lucretia had betrayed her at Gatesboro', it was necessary that he should explain the mystery of his birth, parentage and position to Lady Montfort, and go through the anguish of denouncing his own son as the man whose hands alone those papers be consigned. He approached this subject not only with a sense of unconquerable shame, but with no unreasonable fear lest Lady Montfort might at once declare a charge which would possibly subject her relative to the severest imprisonment. But, to his surprise as well as relief, no sooner had he mentioned Sophy's name than Lady Montfort evinced emotions of a joy which cut into the shade all more painful or discreditable associations. "Henceforth, my dear friend," she said, "your Sophy shall be my own child, my new heiress-apparent to my whole property—my equal as well as my change. Fear not that any one shall tear her from me. You are right in thinking that she should be with me home—that she should have the nursing and the station which she is entitled to as one of my orders. But you must not part from her. I have learned to your tale; my experience of you supplies the deficiencies you suppose between the judgment which has aspersed you. And, more and more, I feel that I owe you such a refuge in the Home that will shelter your grandchild. Noble-hearted woman! and sacrifice for her ignorance of the profession! Would the proposal which would have blistered with scorching blusher the cheeks of that Spartan, the tuition of all "Solemn Plausibilities," the House of Virgins! Gentleman Wolfe was not enough though to profit by the ignominious desertion from generous virtue. But, repressing all sagacious, and appearing to implicate only the probability of such an arrangement, he left her benevolent delight unaudenced—and before the morning he was gone. Going without delay to the straight, as he had gone years ago from the belief's carriage—gone, for Sophy's sake, to find, as she had found before, farewell lines, that commended hope and forbade grief. "It was," he wrote, "for both their sakes that he had set out on a tour of pleasant adventure. He needed it for his health, and change of diet late in so humdrum and settled a life. And there was danger abroad—danger that his brief absence would remove. He had entrusted to his secrets to Lady Montfort: she must look on that kind lady as her sole guardian. She—not aid—as return he surely would; and then they would live happy ever afterward as in fairy tales. He should never pray for her if one hair only enough to fret for him. He should not be alone; Sir Isaac would be with him. He had left him without plenty of money—savings of several months; if he wanted more, he would apply to George Morley. He could write to her occasionally; but she must not expect frequent letters; he might be away for months—what did that signify? He was old enough to take care of himself; she was no longer a child to cry her eyes out if she lost a scrambling toy or broke an old cripple. She was a young lady, and he expected to find her a charming woman when he returned." And so, with all flourish and bravado, and suppressing every attempt at pathos, the old man went his way, and, being heavy-hearted, Lady Montfort's, weeping, distracted, imploring her to send in all directions to discover and bring back the fugitive, was there detained a captive guest. But Wolfe left a letter also for Lady Montfort, cautioning her and adjuring her, as she valued Sophy's safety from the scandal of Jasper's claim, not to make any imprudent enquiry concerning him. Such attempt would only create the very publicity from the chance of which he was seeking to escape. The necessity of this caution was so obvious, that Lady Montfort could only send her most confidential servant to inquire guardedly in the neighborhood, until she had summoned George Morley from Bournemouth, and taken him into council. Wolfe had permitted her to confide to him, and that promise of secrecy, the sale he had confided to her. George went with the deepest sympathy into Sophy's disappearance; but he made few inquiries in the direction and peril of any nosey researches. He remembered that he himself would have no means to ascertain the old man's hiding-place, and gave, at least, if he could not be persuaded either to return to Bournemouth or to go to Sir Isaac, the left destitute and comfortless. Nor was this an idle promise. Lucretia's letters, however, were unceasing, crippled by the restraint imposed upon them, was so acute in drawing, and so active in following up each slow clue to the mysterious Mr. Hoddings, that more than once he had actually come upon the trail of Wolfe's lair, and found where Wolfe or Sir Isaac had been seen a few days before. Still, up to the day on which Morley had himself reported progress, he remained inactor, fertile in all processes of strategem and bewilderment, to baffle pursuit. But, then, however, Wolfe had greatly relieved the minds of these anxious friends, and cheered even Sophy's hearing, by his brief, but open, descriptive letter. These letters having, by their postmarks, led to his having reached the great city of carnage, that reason for discontinuing them. And for the last six weeks no line from him had been received. In fact, he had declined writing to consummate his self-abnegation, strove command more than ever to withdraw himself from his image. He deemed it so essential to her whole future, that, now she had found a home in so many hearts, and appeared to have a should gradually accustom herself to a new rank of life, from which he was to be entirely removed, should lose all trace of his very being; efface a connection that, exacting to protect, could henceforth only degrade and endanger her. And, much as it were, to blot himself out of the world which never emptied of him, he did not cease to grieve grief in its first freshness: he knew that, could she learn where he was, all else would be forgotten—once would be to see him. But he, both continually murmured to himself, "Youth is never prepared for death." The thought was more poignant, but not enduring; now the wounds are already scarring over—they will not reopen if they are left to heal.

He had, at first, thought of hiding somewhere as at a village on the coast, or in a seaport a mouth, he might have stolen into the grounds, looked at the house that held her—left, perhaps, in her wake some token of affection. But, on reflection, he felt that the luxury would be dangerous, and that the pain would be in proportion as he reasoned himself into the stern wisdom of avoiding all that could revive her grief for him. At the unsuspecting age of her table, in the outline given of that grand melodrama in which the fate of Sophy was the central part of the Bandit's child, her efforts to decoy parrott from the lair of the persecuted Blime were likened to those of a bird to entice the viper and hunt from the nest of its young. More appropriate than the old story, was the fable of the bird than then to the fledgling. Farther and farther from the nest in which all his love was centered did the old man go. But, if he did not discover him now; that very discovery would unleash his passions to the fury. Was it impossible that Lesely would ever guess that they could become separated; still more improbable, unless Wolfe, by accident, should fall into the hands guided conjecture, that Lesely should dream of seeking under the roof of her life's person the child that had fled from Mr. Rugg.

Poor old man! his heart was breaking; all the soul were so tightly constricted, that sleep, where many, many long miles off, I see him standing desolately in the middle of a room in his own crowded market-place, holding Sir Isaac by slackened string, with listless hand—Sir Isaac unshorn, travel-stained, dreggled, with drooping head and melancholy eyes—yes, as I see him now, pausing, and for a moment, now and then, pointing to that huge pannier on his arm, filled with some homely peddler-wares, he mechanically imagines, "Sophy will like." Yes, as I see him this, I can not draw near in pity—I can not shield him from the fierce sunlight of an angel's wing over his gray head; and I stand reverentially aloof, with bated breath and bended knee.

OUR NEW ORGANIST.

THE old man who for upward of thirty years had been organist of Walker's church, died suddenly coming one spring morning: being sought for, he was found dead in his bed.

When at Walker—this was never for very long at a time, though not exactly young, I was still in my early manhood—I had been a regular church-goer; and now, at the bishop's desire, I took upon myself the trouble and responsibility of appointing a new organist.

One sultry mid-summer evening, my thoughts turned naturally to the vacant organ-loft, and my hands, I rose from my organ practice abruptly, and left the cathedral, locking the door of the room of which I always made use. The bishop was absent. I went to avail in the palace-grounds, and, unconsciously, my steps turned in the direction of work of reference, which I knew to be among the ancient volumes in the library above the cloisters. I obtained the key of the library from the bishop's housekeeper. Afterward I sauntered beneath the ancient trees on the close-shaven lawns, the while denouncing the stifling heat, a good time; then I made the visit which is the most pleasant in these grounds from the cathedral precincts. Presently I fancied that I heard the tones of the organ. I had left the door open, the organ was locked, I took open. Rather indignant that any one should intrude into my domain, the organ-loft, I left the palace-grounds immediately. As I passed into the cathedral aisle by the lesser grand way, from which an avenue of glorious old limes leads to the principal entrances, I was startled by a full burst of rich music; it died away as I reached my little door.

Just within it, I paused and listened: I was not disappointed, the organ again sounded. Upon open my desk I had left a collection of impromptu figures; those the unknown musician began to play. I noticed signs of diffidence, and ignorance of the resources of the instrument in the style of the player; but I also noticed signs of genius, of feeling, refinement, enthusiasm.

"This man will do," I thought, as I listened. "He needs confidence and practice, but he has genius. Ah, ye Waldenites, ye shall slumber through your service no longer! The power of music shall stir ye."

Twilight was gathering; the full chords melted into silence; the instrument was not touched again. I proceeded to mount the stairs of the organ-loft. An educated ear knows the way to the door of the library; unfortunately, I dropped it, and the unaccustomed echoing from arch to arch, no doubt alarmed the musician. Having reached the organ, I drew back the curtain, prepared to advance the organist. I found there—no one. Of course, the player had descended one stair as I mounted the organ. I could even hear his feet down into the dimness of the vast building, and listened intently for the sound of a footfall. I heard no sound. I looked at the keys—the dust my fingers had pressed the keys that night. But where was the player? Again, not open where I left it—a spirit-musician would hardly make use of a key.

I peremptorily called upon the unknown to come forth, unless he desired to be locked in for the night: the echoes were my only reply. I called to him. I shook up the clownish boy who had blown the bellows for me, and still slumbered in his niche. He could give no information; had "dropped off" from the time I left off playing till the playing began again, and "naught nor nobody" had passed.

No one was now lingering in the building, I felt convinced; so I departed, locking the door.

Next evening I practiced again, playing with revived enthusiasm, perhaps in unconscious emulation of the unknown player. I left the organ-loft raining. From time to time I peered between the curtains; I saw no one save an old man hobbling about examining the monuments, and a child, the young girl whom I had, as it were, noticed, without remarking, on the second afternoon, occupying a dim corner during the service. Both had disappeared when I next looked.

I left Walker after the Sunday service on the day and departed. I took up my stations behind a tree, and watched the cathedral door from a distance rapidly. I had bidden the boy remain in his niche, ready to blow for any performer. No one passed in at that door. At the appointed hour I again mounted. It drew me on into the building. The darkest quarters of the service were vaguely displayed by more assured fingers than those of yesterday; this was evidently familiar music. When the light struck on the keys, the performer began to extemporize, trying the full power of the instrument, of which I had apparently the mastery. What seemed to me unearthly sweetness, and weird arrangement, rested on to the spot. Sometimes I glanced into the comparatively vivid darkness of the building, sometimes fixed my eyes upon a star shining through the stone lacing of one of the lofty, slim phalanx of ancient trees, so unwaveringly still, so perfectly defined against the delicious, clear tone of the evening sky. Then I looked down at the musician: he could not escape me, unless invisible. But I did not consider myself to be fantastic.

As I leaned against the porch of the cathedral door, I resolved the incident I have recorded all ways, striving to account for it in what we call a rational manner. In vain.

Something passed by me, stirring the air, miking no noise. I started up, stood erect; the last vestiges of sound were dying out. How long had it passed me? Was I thwarted? Had the musician escaped me? I hastened to the door, entered, looking in the unfortunate boy, and hurried after a something that flitted along, close to the wall of the building. Suddenly, it gave into a niche, I drew close to the trees in the avenue, and proceeded very rapidly. I saw—

An oil-lamp flared under the arched way; just there I overtook the form I had pursued. But it was only the old man I had noticed lingering while I practiced. Then my musician was, I fattered myself, safely locked in. I had not seen him leave, nor seen him, as she had lingered over silence the service. The musician must, too, have lingered, no one have passed in and out before I had kept watch.

When I overtook the young girl, I found she was not even a child; she paused, and looked upon me a small, sickly face. I felt foolish before the mild questioning of her eyes and the meek dignity of her manner. I muttered some excuse for frightening her.

"You did not frighten me," she answered.

"You have just left the cathedral—you have heard the playing. Do you know who plays? Is it a lady? I hope you can pass you as you came away?"

"I was were in the porch. I passed you. I have seen no one else."

So she did! Yet you must have been in the cathedral every once service, or I should have seen you later. I want to speak to the person who played. Surely you can help me to find him."

Her eyes fell, and she seemed to me to hold debate within herself. But then an elderly woman slipped under the arch from the street without; she put the girl's arm under her own, and led her away, saluting me for her not having come home earlier.

As I returned to the cathedral my mind misgave me. I reproached myself for having let the girl escape me, feeling convinced that she might have aided to solve the mystery. She had not said she could not help me, but had evidently hesitated. I had now little hope of securing the unknown musician tonight; but I opened the door cautiously, and called the boy. He came whimpering; he had believed himself a prisoner till morning. Regardless of its distress, I demanded if he had seen the organist.

"She give me this (showing a shilling), and went away the very minute she'd a done playing."

"She?" I flushed up.

I had spoken to the musician then! that slight, slim young girl! She would surely come again—I would secure her.

Next evening I set my traps—the open door and attendant—and watched. Service was at the service; I had marched every hiding-place; I had waited in the vestry for the usual succession evenings. Yet I felt sure that it was but a question of time and patience; that the attractions of the cathedral would prove irresistible.

I was very observant of the Sunday congregations, and of those few persons who dropped in only to the afternoon services. Once I believed that I saw the wished for face; but a bedwarved bonnet, that I had noticed yesterday after had been bowed down in devotion, interposed. I gave up lingering about in the vast of an evening, and reasoned myself instead behind the screening jasmine at my own door. Answering came on which my patience was rewarded. I had left open the prayer-book the Order Home of Pergolesi, that Dominichino and music. Still, just after the service, I had called seven, a slight figure flitted through the shaded way, and passed swiftly up the avenue, then took the usual branching of the path and door; here it disappeared within the building.

I sprung up with my hands, crying, "There is no mercy, no hope of escape for you."

I heaped from my window, and crossed the yard hare-headed. I found me a note for Sophy. I hurriedly ascended the organ-loft. I did not mount as slowly as usual at once; I reasoned myself that this was my very wiselest.

The organ-loft door remain: the young girl was eagerly pulling off her gloves—from such slight, childlike hands! She looked at the music before her disconcertedly; she had evidently not known it. She turned the leaves, softly trying one passage and another; her face brightened with intelligence and interest.

The girl-musician was not pretty; till she played, her face seemed a dejected expression. But you did not see her eyes, it was instructed and insignificant. By turning the leaves, I had discovered the passages of the music before her; and as she proceeded, my irradiated her mien; solicitations of delight shot from the dark lashes of the long-veiled eyes; lines of thought and power appeared on the young brow, and a smile of rapture broke the mouth very sweet. She had forgotten all but the music. I could have sworn then that the sickly child was possessed of genius. She was not silver, but a woman with an angel's face. By-and-by she paused, and looked around her timidly.

When she removed the hands and looked up, I stood beside her. She did not start; she was not flushed before me, but deadly pale. Many varying expressions gathering into her; at last she slightly inclined. I had secured my prisoner; there was nothing of pride or triumph in her smile, it was intuitive knowledge with its dependence.

"If you wish, this shall always be your place. Nobody but you and myself (I would not abnegate myself) shall have the organ-loft."

A shy, startled joy came into her face.

"Our organist died in the night. We have been without one since: you must fill his place in this cathedral."

"Are you not the organist?"

"No; I only play for love of it, and when no one else is here to do it."

"Are you the bishop, then?"

"No," I laughed. "But I am a friend of his, against you the organist of Walden Cathedral."

She looked at me to ascertain if I were mocking her, if I were to be trusted; I saw the very bright, but she shook her head.

"I am too young; I should get frightened. I should not play with the music as ought to be played here."

"I am the best judge of that: I will call at your home, and arrange with your relations."

"I have not any relations; I have a friend with whom I board—no more. I will send her to you with her answer to-morrow."

Your answer must be 'Yes:' and I will do all in my power to make your duty easy and pleasant. Will you play no more to-night?"

She shook her head, no, as it was getting dusk. I closed the organ.

"Permit me that, in any case, I shall hear you play again," I said.

"If you wish it."

"You have not asked my name, or where I live." I gave her my card, having followed her into the vast. She paused from me, looked into the building, and then out at the noble limes.

It would be beautiful to live here always. Good-night; you have made me happy: I was afraid you would tell me I might not come here again."

I said "Good-night," but followed her still: it had closed and the night-like little form gliding before me in the twilight, that I felt reluctant to lose sight of it. I lasted as much: but under the shade way she paused to disadvantage. If she were a child in years, she had a woman's dignity. I was impatient for the morrow.

As I sat at breakfast, a boy came upon before me, and my eyes watching the sunlight dancing on the grotesquely carved figures of the façade of the cathedral, the housekeeper, Mrs. Margaret Thompson, informed me that a "middle-aged female" wished to see me. I desired she should be introduced directly, and recognized the woman who had joined the young musician under the gateway the night she had tarried in the cathedral so late.

"I've agreed that the young lady shall play; it's pleasure to her, and we are but poor," was the answer to my eager inquiry.

The business part of the matter was soon arranged. Our good bishop caused the organist of Waldon Cathedral to receive a handsome salary, and the woman became eager that the child's duties should begin at once.

"I have yet to learn the young lady's name," I reminded her.

"Alice Hall. She's an orphan. I was a housekeeper in her mother's family. They're all gone, and left Alice nothing; and her father was only a music-teacher. We're but lately come from Jersey, and know no one in this town."

"Miss Hall has friends in Jersey, then?"

"She has no friend in the world but me."

Mrs. Smith—that was her name, she told me—turned back from the door to inquire of me if I knew of any small house out of the town and near the cathedral likely to suit her young lady. I was glad to be able to point out to her a pretty cottage on a slight elevation in a meadow behind the cathedral, which was at that time to let. I dispatched Margaret with Mrs. Smith to look over the Mead cottage, and to introduce the stranger to its landlord.

I had appointed to meet my little friend in the cathedral at eleven—she was punctual to a minute. Her guardian accompanied her, and settled herself with her knitting on a wooden bench just at the foot of the organ-loft stairs.

This morning I was teacher. I showed Miss Hall all the peculiarities of the instrument, and heard her play through some of the last organist's favorite services, telling her that, by-and-by, when she was at home here, she should play any thing she chose.

"It is a misfortune for a musician to have such hands as yours," I remarked.

"I try all I can to stretch them," was answered, apologetically.

I should have liked to take the tiny, supple things into my own, to feel if they had any bone at all. Of course I did no such thing; their accidental contact affected me strangely. I did not yet feel so very certain that our little organist was made of merely ordinary flesh and blood.

I made her pay me for my trifling assistance by playing for me Scarletti's Requiem. She knew it well, and rendered it exquisitely. Exquisite is the word for her playing; it was so finished and perfect, though not wanting in power and passion.

When her guardian summoned her several hours had elapsed, yet I was reluctant to let her go.

I did not praise her; but she pleased me greatly—she was different from any woman I had ever known—in a high degree grateful and intelligent. Already I wondered that I could ever have thought her plain.

For a few days yet I was to play the services. Each afternoon she sat beside me. One would have thought that I was some great master, and she a simple ignorant, so closely and admiringly she watched me. She had the unconsciousness and modesty of genius in an eminent degree. She always looked pained, as if she thought I mocked her, if I descended from the eminence on which she had placed me, and hinted that my gift was less perfect than hers. She had also, as I soon found, the inexhaustible industry and patience of genius—morning and evening found her practicing in the cathedral.

"You have had a thorough musical education," I observed to her one day.

"My father lived for music, and devoted himself to teaching me. It is two years since he died, and I have been starved for music, and his love, since." There was a thrill of passion in her voice, and the tears started to her eyes. "Here I shall be happy," she added, calmly. "I felt sure of it the first time I entered the cathedral."

"You must have been very young when—"

"When papa died? I was nineteen; now I am twenty-one. I am often taken for a mere child."

"Alice, Alice! It is time to go home," Mrs. Smith cried.

Miss Hall was to officiate first on a Sunday, because I planned it so. On the Saturday evening I found her nervous, tearful, and deadly pale. I repented my tyranny, offered to play for her, that she might, as she had wished, accustom herself to her duty by first playing the afternoon services to a small audience.

"No. You are very kind; but I ought to play to-morrow—it is my duty. Shall you be very vexed if I make some great mistake?" She looked at me wistfully.

"I will take care that you do not do that."

"Will you be near me?"

"Where I am now—ready to turn the pages."

"That makes it all different," said the child. "I thought you would be down among the people, and that I should be quite alone. I do not mind now."

Her words touched me—my eyes grew moist. "God bless thee, dear child," I murmured as I looked after her retreating form that evening.

Next morning I went early to the cathedral to arrange things as I thought Miss Hall would best like. She, too, came early, looking pale, but quite composed.

I watched her throughout the service. She played perfectly. Yes, she was quite to be relied upon, this child; yet how she loved to rely upon others! When all was over—the cathedral empty, and her beautiful voluntary finished—she lifted her eyes to my face as I bent down, removing her books.

"How good you are to me! I could not have borne it all if you had not been by me!" she said.

"I think you could. I think any way you would have managed to do your duty well. Never mind that, however; it is time you went home to rest."

In the evening she was no longer pale; her eyes did not seek courage from mine; she had no thought but for her music, and played with intense fervor. I did not tell her how the congregation lingered in the building after the service, how many glances were upturned to the curtained gallery where she sat; nor did I afterward repeat to her the admiration I heard expressed of her performance. Why not? I hardly knew; certainly not because I feared to make her vain—she was far too pure and simple. I fancy I was jealous that she should hear from others warmer praise than I had ever conceded, and chose to believe her quite content with my content.

Our new organist continued to practice with untiring diligence. I saw her at least once, often twice each day. Each day she looked brighter and happier—music was healing her of inward sorrow, removing the sad sense of desolation. Truly she had been starved: now she could satisfy her soul with music. As for love—was I as a father to her?

There came an evening when I was allowed to walk home with Mrs. Smith and Miss Hall. Before passing through the arched way out of the cathedral yard, Alice looked back lovingly:

"Would it be possible for me ever, any where, to forget this place?" she said, musingly. "It seems so holy. I am so happy. It is like a dream. When I die, aunt (so she called Mrs. Smith), I should like to be buried very near the cathedral."

"No need to speak to me of such things, Alice; please God, you'll live many a year after I am under ground."

"I do not wish to die," she answered.

Pressing her hand, which lay upon my arm, against my heart, I longed to gather her dear self to my bosom—the gifted, heavenly-minded child!

That night I was invited to sup at the Mead cottage. I had opportunity of observing the elegant neatness—sign of dainty household ways—which pervaded Alice's home. I perceived how the same refinement that characterized her as an artist informed the humble details of her daily life. When I went home, many things in the arrangement of my grander house displeased me—there were faults of commission, yet more of omission; evidently a central somewhat was wanting.

The bishop returned to Waldon. I introduced our young organist to him, and he soon began to make a pet of her; fruit and flowers from the palace-gardens frequently found their way to the Mead cottage. Every thing was satisfactory; there was nothing to detain me in Waldon; still I delayed to start upon my long-planned tour.

Charmed weeks flew by. A cathedral quiet and sacredness was over my whole life. A longer stay than usual in Waldon had often before intolerably irritated me; the ceaseless, silent preaching of the solemn cathedral seeming to tempt me, in some way, to desecrate its holiness; its unvarying, unregarding calm making me doubly conscious of the turbulent passionateness so successfully concealed under my old-fashioned aspect. Now all was different. My being seemed in harmony with all things lovely, calm, and pure.

I was invited to spend a musical evening at the palace; our young organist was to be there. On her account, the ancient and handsomely inlaid piano, which had long stood in the mullioned window of the episcopal drawing-room, had given way to a splendid instrument of modern construction. By-the-by, I had long seen that the Waldon young ladies were jealous of Miss Hall. They treated her contemptuously; and it was beautiful to see how to their haughty reserve she opposed a perfectly simple and self-respecting humility. After a primitively early tea—the cathedral chimes told five as we sat down to the table—we all strolled among the brilliant flower-beds upon the close-shaven lawns. The good old bishop kept Alice by his side, because she was friendless—no one else noticing her. I contented myself with looking at her.

Alice had now been three months at Waldon, and by this time I did not doubt her perfect moral and physical loveliness. She certainly had altered since she first came; the sickly hue of her skin had changed to a clear, pure pallor; the look of dejection had given place to one of deep-seated content; her large gray eyes shone lustrous, and seemed to well over with feeling and genius. I was familiar with each subtle charm—each droop and natural wave of her soft, brown hair; the course of each vein meandering beneath the snowy skin on her fair temples; the graceful line of her bending neck; the rarely beautiful outline— But, O Heaven! I must stop myself.

On this evening Alice was dressed as simply as usual; her gown was of lilac muslin, to the hue of which the evening sunlight gave a lovely bloom. She glided along by the bishop's side, now and then lifting glad, artless glances to his kindly face. Sweet child! she was happy; he loved her. She was always happy with those who loved her.

I had lived in a dream so long that it was difficult for me to throw off its influence. I did not join myself to any of the groups around me; by-and-by I stood quite alone on a little mound, a screen of shrubs between me and the strollers. I stood still to watch the sunset light glide up the sculptured cathedral stones—higher and higher, touching face, flower, foliage; up and up till it failed from off the pinnacle.

I heard my own name uttered by a voice behind me—a voice I knew, a hateful, purring, treacherous voice—then I heard these words:

"She is shockingly affected; a dreadful flirt! It is disgusting to see how she has got on the old bishop's blind side. I wonder if the chit fancies she might be a bishop's lady!"

"She flies rather lower than that," said a kindred voice. "She and Mr. —— (never mind my name) go on in a way that is quite shocking—in the cathedral too. Of course they call it practicing—a very pretty kind of practice!"

Of course the tabbies spoke of Alice. My blood tingled.

I pushed through the drooping branches and confronted the creatures.

"A charming time for sweet and charitable discourse, fair ladies," I remarked, then passed on toward the house.

A pair of soft eyes questioned me wistfully when I entered the drawing-room; they met a new expression in my answering look, perhaps; they drooped, and a rosy flush crept up to the vailing lashes.

My cathedral calm was desecrated; her eyes had never before so drooped before mine. When I went home, I found a letter awaiting me. It summoned me north, to the death-bed of the only relative I had in the world. Alice and I were alike in our friendlessness. I immediately went to the coach-office to secure a place by the morning mail. Even now there is no railway within many miles of Waldon. I occupied the night in packing, and in selecting music, and writing most minute directions for the organist. This done, I hesitated. Should I write to Alice any thing beyond these instructions—any thing personal, private? I decided that to do so would be to deprive myself of somewhat of my measure of pure delight; I did not wish to lose one glance, blush, smile, or tear. I did not expect that my absence would be a long one. In the hurry of departure, I forgot to tell Margaret to send the parcel I had prepared for Miss Hall; but as it was addressed to her, she would surely receive it, I thought. My relative lingered. Each day might be his last, they said; yet he lingered a month. Then business detained me; then, perhaps owing to my anxiety to return to Waldon, I was attacked by nervous fever, a complaint I had suffered from before.

It was on a grim December night that I at last re-entered Waldon. Leaving my luggage at the coach-office, I proceeded homeward. I was so cramped by cold, and exhausted by fasting, that I could hardly drag my limbs along, and my brain was in a state of feverish excitement. Alice had been present in most of my sick visions—her face always of deadly pallor and reproachful expression. It haunted me; and, as I had re-entered Waldon, vague apprehension stole over me drearily.

Midnight began to strike as I passed through the arched way into the cathedral yard. The wind became very high, sobbing and soughing about eerily; it parted the clouds, and let through a half gleam of moonlight to make luminous the moving low-hanging mists. At the further end of the lime-avenue I believed that I descried a human figure: it branched off toward my little door of the cathedral. I tried to overtake it: it vanished, passing in at the low porch. The clanging of the clock had ceased, and I imagined that I detected the sound of the organ. I paused. Yes; low wailing notes deepened to a full gush of minor harmony; then melancholy cadences sobbed away into silence. Chilled to the heart—conscious of icy fingers among the roots of my hair—I opened that door, which I found fast locked. I groped my way into the cathedral, believing nothing so little as that it was earthly music to which I had listened. In the building all was now silent. I crept on, with a tremulous voice calling on Alice's name. My open arms embraced a cold form; my senses left me.

When the ghastly wintery dawn crept down upon me, I found myself lying at the foot of a sculptured female form. "Alice is dead!" was my firm conviction. I managed to rise and creep to my house. I did not understand how I came to be in the cathedral.

My aspect frightened Margaret. The first thing my eyes fell upon on entering my room was the packet I had prepared for Alice. "Returned after her death," I inwardly commented. I was too miserable to be fully conscious of my misery. I brooded stupidly over a newly-kindled fire, while Margaret bustled in and out on hospitable thoughts intent.

"When did she die?" I asked stolidly, by-and-by.

"Nigh a month since, Sir."

A long pause.

"Who plays the organ now?"

"Please, Sir, take your hot coffee, and get to bed. Time enough to bother about organs when you look less like a corpse," was added sotto voce.

I repeated my question doggedly.

"Well, she does it all the same," was the weird-sounding reply. I had swallowed one cup of Margaret's hot, strong coffee, and life was rekindling within me.

"Are you mocking me, woman?" I cried.

She stared at me, and then gave some soothing answer. Evidently she feared I was deranged. I made a mighty effort to appear composed.

"Margaret, tell me immediately the name of the person who now plays the cathedral organ."

"Alice Hall, Sir; the same who has played for six months now. She went off sudden, and it made no difference to Miss Hall, as it might have done to some, Sir: she has not missed a service."

Again Margaret appeared to find cause for alarm in my face.

"Do you mean to say that for the last month, since her death, the cathedral organ has been played as it used to be in her life?"

"Yes, Sir; it has, Sir." Margaret backed toward the door as I rose.

"Played by a departed, a disembodied spirit; and you take it all as a matter of course."

"Law! Good gracious, Sir, I never said any thing of the kind. Some say Miss Hall looks like a ghost; but she isn't one yet."

"Margaret! who then died a month since?" I put the question solemnly.

"Mrs. Smith, Sir, who used to live with Miss Hall, went off in a fit, quite sudden, as I told you plainly, Sir."

"Leave the room," I commanded.

I can not say what I did or how I felt when left alone.

By-and-by I rang for Margaret. I explained to her my recent illness, and as much as I could remember of the incidents of the night. Having taken some trouble to convince her of my sanity, I again dismissed her. Poor, poor Alice! dear, desolate child! I reproached myself bitterly for having selfishly thought of my own delight, not of her peace; and I tormented myself by imagining what she could possibly think of me—of my having left her without one word of leave-taking, or one sign of remembrance. The parcel she had not received.

I went to the cathedral early. I found that Alice was already there. Unseen, I watched her a while. She looked faded and worn, and was dressed in mourning; she had lost her only friend—for I had no right to hope she still considered me as such—and must feel herself indeed alone. Yet angelic peace and steadfast faith stole over her weary aspect as she played. Oh, well I remember the sweet upturned face, the droop of the soft hair down the thin cheek. My darling!

By-and-by she paused, and took her hands from the keys to draw her shawl closer, with a pale shudder. I stepped near her. Because I hardly dared speak to her at all, I spoke as if we had parted but yesterday: "You should not be here on such a morning."

"And you are come home at last?" She held out to me the hand I had not offered to take. On seeing me, she had grown paler than ever; but when I spoke, gladness beamed from her eyes, to be soon quenched in tears as she saw me look at her mourning-dress.

There was a silence of some moments.

"You have missed me?" I asked, humbly.

"Yes, yes."

"And can you ever forgive me?"

"Forgive you!" she echoed.

I held her hand firmly, and over mine came trembling her free hand, thrilling me by its voluntary, undeserved caress.

"You have been ill—I fear you have been very ill," she said, gazing at me compassionately.

I was glad to make the worst of my case.

"I have been very ill. I have much to plead in excuse of my silence and neglect; but not enough, not half enough, if it has given you pain. You tremble. I frightened you by my sudden return."

"No, no: you never frighten me—you never pain me. I have been sad and lonely; but I knew you would return if you could—if you ought. You have always been good to me: it would have been wrong of me to think of you unkindly."

"Why did you shudder but now?"

"I remembered a dream, a dreadful dream I had last night."

"Tell it me."

"I had rather not."

"I have a reason for wishing to know it."

"I dreamed that you were dead—that I sat at the organ at midnight and played your requiem."

Again she turned very pale. I think I must have done so too. A queer thrill went through me, as for the first time I fully recalled the events of the past night.

"You must let me take you home," I said. I released her hands, and folded her shawl closely round her.

Looking straight into my face with her dear, innocent eyes, she said:

"You must not spoil me so; if you had not, I should not have found it so hard to do without you."

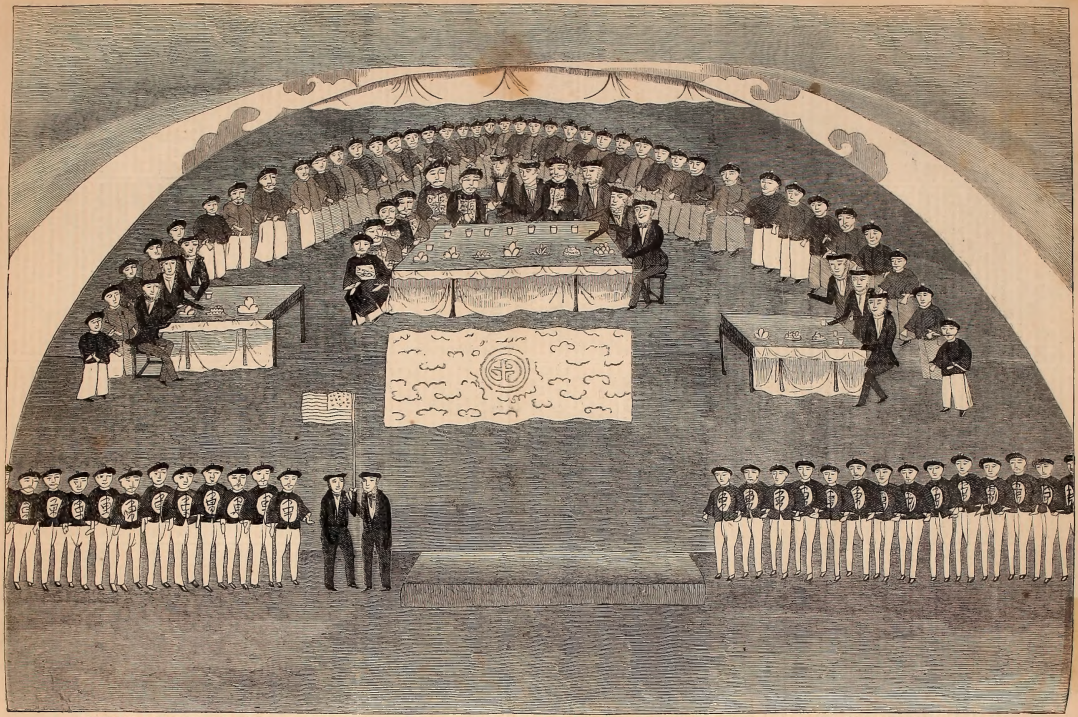
This was just too much for me. I gathered the little thing into my arms, kissed her sweet brow again and again, and cried:

"Alice, you must let me keep you always—you must be my wife!"

She disengaged herself; she drew a little away from me.

"I know that you are very good. Is this because my aunt is dead, and I am alone?" she asked, earnestly.

"It is because I love you."



My eyes confirmed my words; hers drooped, and her face looked as if the sun were faintly shining on it through a ruby pane in the window.

The Mead cottage was so desolate that I soon took Alice —— (not Hall) home to my house in the cathedral yard. It was on New-year's Day that the good old bishop married us; and ever since my happy home has been perfectly ordered, and, so she tells me, my perfect wife has been entirely happy.

New-year's Day—the tenth anniversary of my marriage. To-day I have been looking over my papers, and have read through this, written five years since. Oh, Alice, Alice! my wife, my wife! why couldst thou not visibly tarry with me unto the end?

I never leave Waldon now. No fingers but mine must ever touch those keys hers used lovingly to press. She was to me as child, wife, all of kin, my only darling! I am having built a new organ, a glorious one; it is to be my gift to Waldon Cathedral, on condition that the old one is taken down five-and-twenty hours after my death, and destroyed; and that during those five-and-twenty hours no mortal fingers touch its keys. I say five-and-twenty hours, because on the midnight after my death—and I might die just after midnight—Alice will play my requiem, as I heard her so long ago. The organ must never sound again after that. There is a rumor in Waldon that the organist has been mad since his wife's death. I am not mad, because, for my comfort, I know that my love was selfish, my guardianship careless, my tenderness ungentle, my sympathy imperfect, compared with that my darling experiences in Thy keeping, O Lord, my God and her God.

Such is the paper that lately came into our hands. We have learned that at the cathedral, here called Waldon, the congregation, of about half a dozen persons, assembled one grim December afternoon, were detained after service by the powerful beauty of the voluntary performed by their long-feeble organist. It came to an abrupt conclusion. The organist was found with his arms folded on the keys, his cheek rested on them—dead. His wishes with respect to the old organ had long been known: they were strictly regarded.

MEETING BETWEEN MR. REED, AS COMMISSIONER, AND THE CHINESE MANDARINS, ON MAY 4, 1858.—FROM A DRAWING BY A CHINESE ARTIST.

MR. REED IN CHINA.

WE are indebted to the civility of the New York Herald for the accompanying pictures, which is intended to represent the first really practical diplomatic interview that has taken place between the United States Minister, Mr. Reed, and the representatives of the Emperor of China. It need hardly be remarked that it is a fac-simile of a drawing by a Chinese artist, and serves to illustrate the Chinese notion of art as well as the scene which it purports to depict.

The interview represented took place on 4th May, 1858, in a tent in the fort at the mouth of the Peiho—since taken by the combined British and French forces. At the centre of the table sits Mr. Martin, the interpreter; on his right sits Yen, the Governor of the Province, supported by two Commissioners; on the left of Mr. Martin is Mr. Reed, supported on his left by his Chinese officials, Captain S. L. Dupont, R. E. Shortle, Surgeon J. L. Fox. At the right hand side table sits Mr. G. Bacon, Master of the Minnesota, Mr. Reed's son, and Secretary. At the left hand side table sits Mr. Bradley, American Consul at Ningpo, and other members of the legation. In the foreground there is an orderly sergeant and a private from the Minnesota, bearing the American flag. Behind, and left of the tent the Chinese troops, with out arms, are drawn up in line as a guard of honor. In the rear are seen standing forty-seven Mandarins. On the reverse tables dishes of meats, fruits, wine, etc., have been placed. Mr. Reed and Governor Yen are represented in the act of shaking hands.

The correspondent of the New York Times—who is evidently a personage of note, as he is said to be none other than the interpreter Martin—thus describes the scene scene:

"The tent was hung with crimson, and the ground carpeted with the same color, which I believe is to the Chinese an all festive occasions. The interior was crowded by a long table and two side tables, all covered with fruits and confectionery.

"Mr. Reed was placed to the west of honor, on the left of the High Commissioner, with Mr. Martin, who acted as interpreter, between and a little in the rear of the two high functionaries. The two assistant Commissioners, Dr. Williams, Secretary of Legation, Captain Dupont of the United States steamer Minnesota, the Treasurer of the Province, the Admiral General in command of the station, and a Postal, or circuit judge, completed the company at the long table. On the side tables, Mr. Bradley, and the officers and crew of the navy, were seated to the right hand; while somewhere of blue and white buttoned mandarins, who would have been present on all such occasions, were compelled to stand in the presence of their superiors. I must not omit to remark that each mandarin is indicated by a peculiar dress, of a globular shape, consisting of a button, attached to the top of his cap. The highest are the red, and the blue and white mark to others, in the order of their precedence, the three classes. All who sat at the long table with the Commissioners were mandarins, except Mr. Martin, who, though he wore a blue one, was also dressed out with the plume of a mandarin.

"The interview lasted for two hours, and was wholly employed in arranging the basis for treaties. But little time was spent in exchanging compliments, each sat bent on getting down to the real business, and refreshments spread out before us. Mr. Reed and Commissioner Yen made several interchanges of courtesies in motion their lips with tea. So nice was brought on the table, and it was also the first introduction to me, and I can now give without the pressure of that universal beverage. It was not wanted, however, for there was no need for moist lubricants. Business was transacted the attention of the high diplomatists functionaries. And though the vituperative feeling prevailed, there was not an individual of either nation among them who was not inclined to the interference who was not inclined to the solemnity of the occasion. After agreeing to the proposition of the Imperial Commissioner to exchange the will of their master on an important preliminary, the United States Minister and his envoys took their leave."

In fact, the interview led to nothing. It may be that the Chinese diplomatists, as the Times correspondent suggests, are such very low men that Mr. Reed has not been able to make head against them; or it may be that the method adopted by the maritime powers of Europe, the bombardment with shot and shell, is the only argument to which they are privious. But, whatever the reason may be, there can be no doubt of the fact that our diplomacy has met with little headway. Mr. Reed did every hope, when he left, of doing something to distinguish himself and benefit his country. There were not wanting persons who regretted, and that our attitude of neutrality would enable us to make better terms with the Chinese than the belligerents of Europe could obtain; but, as the facts appear we might as well have had no commerce with China, and Mr. Reed might as well have spared the prosecuting vagaries by getting drunk in the streets and disgusting the constituencies of Boston and the Quakers of Philadelphia. It must be a painful subject of reflection to him; to the mercantile community it must be rather pleasant to know that foreigners are fighting our battles at their own cost.

A RAT TALE.

THE most magnificent rat battues in the world are held, annually, at Montfaucon, near Paris. At Montfaucon is an establishment, under government superintendence, where worn-out horses are slain, stray dogs are made an end of, and other sorts of secret mysteries are accomplished. When Monsieur Bonnet-Thivars had charge of the public salubrity—which gave him the command of Montfaucon as well as of the Parisian sewers—he invited Balzac, the novelist, to a feldeday, which was eagerly accepted by that distinguished writer. Bonnet-Thivars was enthusiastically fond of everything that belonged to his department. He spoke of sewers and drains with perfect fervor. He spoke of the Romans and their chaste manners, with the ambition of surpassing their subterranean architecture; he wanted the pilgrims of the future, when as travelers now descant on the subtleties of Mont Blanc or the Lake of Long Pratz, to speak that the inspector of Salubrity, Balzac, Dr. Gontil, and another gentleman should reach their destination at three in the morning. The party were exact at the rendezvous. But to get to Montfaucon in the dead of the night was no easy task. The rain had fallen in torrents for four-and-twenty hours previously; the roads outside the barriers were impracticable for wheel-carriages; and the pilgrims were absolutely obliged to perform their journey on foot, through pitchy darkness and sloughs of despond. Like an able general, Bonnet-Thivars sought to dissipate the increasing demoralization of his troops by encouraging conversation.

"My dear friends, in a little quarter of an hour we shall be within a half mile of the field of battle of that quarter of an hour to let you know the surprise which I have specially reserved for your entertainment. Balzac, you shall have a treat in addition to the other surprises which await you there."

"What may be that wonderful surprise?" asked Balzac, in a tone which seemed to say, "if I don't like the surprise, I won't eat the dinner."

"Yesterday," continued the bold inspector, "one of Lord Egerton's finest horses was obliged to be killed. I have ordered it to be set aside for your special use, and for yours alone."

"Is it intended that we should eat the horse?" inquired Balzac.

"No; but in the short space of one hour you will enjoy the spectacle—and, I may add, magnificent spectacle—of beholding that gigantic horse entirely devoured by the rats of Montfaucon. Ah, you know not what are the most voracious and the most ferocious creatures on the face of the globe. Every individual rat is as big as a small terrier. And, now, let those who love to follow me!"

His ardent followers set out, with Bonnet-Thivars through the treacherous darkness and the pouring wheel-ruts. They bogged the time by pleasant talk about the prospects of the Chamber of Montfaucon, and the culinary capabilities of the same raw material.

"How would you like a cold horse-flesh eaten?" exclaimed Balzac, to whom hippophagy was a greater novelty than it would be to the rest of the world in the present day. "What a horrible perversion of taste it will be, before to-night, to return home by the way of horse-eating! If they eat the horse to-day, they will eat the horseman to-morrow. There is only a hair-breadth of difference between the two repasts."

Over the grassy, spongy grounds, rendered still more spongy and greasy by the previous rains, the adventurous expedition wended its way, backed by the Guard of Public Salubrity—and that part of the establishment where the spade-is had been prepared. At dawn men employed in the place prepared them with the usual mysterious circumspection, each having a lighted resin torch in his left hand, and a spade with its axe-like left shoulder; four others, having ladders only, followed with the silence of conspirators. The night and the torch-light cast a sullen-like hue on the mute but steadily-stepping band. It suggested Shakspeare's witches' cauldron, and contributed to Montfaucon exactly that, with an escort of flambeaux, by the Duke of Alva to the Escurial. In First, for the good pleasure of his excellent sister, Madame d'Angouleme. By the side of the present party they found a dead horse. The entry of the same color as the closely night, who had their own private property in the rats, and jealously fenced the affection they bore to their masters. They were mastiffs and bull-dogs devoted, by certain cunning, from their earliest puppyhood. Among Saxon and English races, with square angular heads, and with a peculiar feeling protective, with eyes torch of iron, and elephantine feet and legs. If one of them only strayed out of the line, a hare or a fox, or a wandering dog, was sure to be in place; but, speedy as was his obedience, he found time, as he darted past his master, to lick the white row of teeth ready to devour his Master. Indeed, had the dogs been unanimous and so inclined, in the animosity they could have, in a few minutes, eaten, gulden and visitors, to stone, leaving hardly a gravestone standing to tell where the field of battle.

They soon reached the foot of a circular wall, or nearly circular; for nothing here possible is perfect in form or decided in color. The only substance of things differs from ordinary reality. The earth has the appearance of dirty ash; the wall, the fluidity of water; the water, the thickness of mud; the hillocks scattered over the soil are fringed with the outrages of the monster rats workmen are tumble-down heaps of tattering stones. The five principal hillocks are the results of the establishment have the desolate aspect of live inundations; and the only way to breathe is to hold the nose. The ladders were placed against the wall; and, after a difficult ascent, the party and their dogs found themselves on the summit, on the top of the wall. Before and below them was a vast inclosure appropriated to the slaughter of condemned horses. Heaps of carcasses had been and there indicated this funeral destination. It required a few minutes to accustom the eye to the gloomy scene before they could well make out its details. The bottom of this ill-paved trough was traversed by long and irregular ridges, all of which radiated toward the circumscribing wall, at certain distances. Between each lay one dead, consisting of perpendicular bars, so placed as to allow liquid matters to escape, but preventing the escape of solid substances. Each ridge contained one to wait on the top of their wall.

Balzac was evidently palpitated with impatience and anxiety; would his drams succeed or fail? The curtain was now about to rise. Dr. Gontil sat down on the wall, breathing the benevolent smoke of a cigar, as an antidote to the powerful emanations from the interior of action.

One of the iron gates in the wall opened. Four men immediately entered, dragging after them, with ropes, the dead horse, the lure of the Eden, the principal actor who has been so impatiently expected. The rats, as they had been hitherto, remained the poor creature from its last connection with human society; they left it naked on the stones, and retreated hastily, slamming the iron gate behind them. The overture was played; the piece now began. Bonnet-Thivars looked at Balzac; Balzac looked at Bonnet-Thivars; this great dramatic author (Dieux! is meant in the present instance) and this great public were to form their judgment of each other's powers. A moment's doubt, mutual by, whether the one was up to the other's mark.

At all the iron gates at the end of the gutters, and of deadlights from other unseen vent-holes, they instantly appeared several rats, attracted by the mighty feast. They were the scouts of the army in ambuscade. A few individuals, detached from the first platoon, advanced on the tips of their toes to the nearest flank of the carcass; and then they turned by common consent their sharp muzzles and their quivering mouths to seek, and find, by which they had entered, as if to make sure of a retreat in case of need.

The first moment of hostility disappeared when they found themselves joined by other rats, who came in crowds to the banquet. Then the battle-cry gave them mutual encouragement; and the pavement began to be thickened all over with reinforcements of the besieging host of rats. Balzac remarked that, among these rats, there was a progression of size and strength. The last comers to the last, or rather from the first to those that followed, for the last had not yet shown themselves. Rats of twice the size, and weight, and force, were followed by others in better plight, who, in turn, were followed by still more comely and lusty beasts. The first comers were clearly the huntsmen.

Continuing the induction from their mien and gait, Balzac attributed to each rat his profession or his position in society. Here was a rat-catcher, as he jumped on the attorney's office, at twenty francs a month wages. That next fellow is a rat-catcher, at twelve hundred francs a year; he is better fed than the first. There goes another who is a rat-catcher; he has his master's confidence and is growing bald." But the physiological description did not last long.

The rats had almost disappeared under an ever-thickening carpet of rats. There were black rats, brown rats, piebald rats, white rats, agouti rats, rats of orders gray, slate-colored rats, and even white rats. Just before it was completely covered, the dead horse was a combination of rats leader and more adventurous than the rest. The animal was lying on one side, and in the form of a triangle, up to the carcass, of which they took possession. It was a successful military recognition. Then, with a common cry, they encouraged, charged with much greater resolution. The body was entirely covered, and the rats were in clubs from one end to the other, just as a tailor un stitches an old coat to tear it up into rags; and then, with the most frightful appetite, all sorts of robots streamed in at every aperture, crowding thick and confusedly. Their opulence rushing out of the gutters on fire. They scrambled over one another, and their exulting noisiness, their little shrill cries, mingled with the first, produced a kind of multiplication the hum and murmur of a crowd, in which you could distinguish the sound the sound of human voices. Life was boiling in this animated mass. It made you shudder to think of it. Some of the rats were gray as fell into the midst of it from your perch on the wall.

"Is it not fine?" exclaimed Bonnet-Thivars.

"Superb!" replied Balzac, with a salute of the hand. "Splendid! Are your lions there?"

"Not yet," said Gontil. "Do you hear them roar?"

"I do hear them. Well roared Montfaucon!"

"Do you know," continued Bonnet-Thivars pointing to the incalculable legions of fearful devourers, and to the dressing before his eye, "that if, one of these days, from some cause not difficult to imagine, famine or fear of war is to come to a decent on Paris, a whole quarter would either be devoured or be put in terrible jeopardy?"

"Ah!" interrupted Balzac, delighted to hear of the strange and dramatic danger to which Paris was exposed.

"Nothing is more true. A landslip after a tempest might bring about the event."

"Is it not decided by Montfaucon rats! What a spectacle! Can not we try the experiment?" said Balzac, hurried by his own idea. "If, in the next thunder-storm, you could induce a landslip, my dear Inspector—"

"Monsieur," who am charged with the protection of Paris from all eventualities which may arise from Montfaucon! I have no temptation, I do too far, my dear Monsieur de Balzac. Do you not know—"

"I am not joking at all," interrupted Balzac.

"Silence!" said Dr. Gontil. "The grand distraction is your pleasure, I believe."

The Doctor was right. The Montfaucon rats had opened the horse; and they cut it up, bored it, tore it, devoured it through, and dragged it piece by mince-meat—a work of destruction which was hideous to behold. In a few minutes more, the rats, having completely disappeared beneath the hideous brutes, who, hanging on with the voracious pertinacity of a bull-dog to wounded form, soon offered the spectacle of a magnificent horse composed of living rats. Long after the disappearance of the shell-work toys and ornaments that are made to represent men and animals.

"Is it not grand?" The gnashing of their teeth was audible; the sound of the knives and forks of a crowd of guests in a hundred halls of banquets. Among these indefatigable gluttons there were some so large as a full-grown tom-cat. But what would be their encounter with such adversaries as these? He would have been devoured as easily as a partridge by a fox; he would have been swallowed whole before he reached the ground.

"It is time!" shouted Bonnet-Thivars, by way of word of command to one of the men, who, mounted on the wall, lighted up the scene with a pot of burning resin. "It is time!"

At this order from the chief the man designated threw his torch into the arena; it fell a short distance from the nearest of the heaps of dead horse, and even seeing finishing their orgy. There was a shower of fire upon these greedy epicures; nothing else than a downfall of incandescent flakes could have obtained the desired result. There uprose a wail, as if a multitude of infants were being murdered, and little spiral columns of reddish smoke rose in cork-screws in the air. There opened a hole in the moving mass, at the spot where the melted resin had fallen. At the bottom of the hole a dog-skin was visible; it was the skeleton of the horse—a horse no longer. A few swollen, and half-consumed rats in frame-work, groups of satiated rats had taken up their lodging; some had gone to sleep, and their unfortunate companions were falling under a public-house table. They were dead with beer-flesh.

"Now let in the dogs!" was the second word of command given by Bonnet-Thivars to his men.

"Why, you don't mean to let in the dogs!" Balzac, who had not lost a single item of the rare and novel observations of the inspector of Salubrity.

"Finished!" answered the Inspector of Public Salubrity, with ironical pride. "Finished! It is but just beginning!"

This magnificent boast confounded the visitors, for in fact the carnage was only commencing. At that moment such admiration for Bonnet-Thivars that it tore from him the singular eulogy.

"Ah, you would have been made a member of a theatre!"

The compliment went to the heart of the worthy Inspector; his chin buried itself in his grand cravat to hide its delight. Never had Public Salubrity enjoyed a happier moment in office.

The dogs entered the arena, and the carnage began. The dogs were animated by the sight of blood. They were mad with joy. They killed; they gave tongue; they gave tongue, they killed; they leaped on the backs of the first-class rats, and a pair of rats were often entrapped in the same snapping line. And the howling of the dogs and the squeaking of the rats shook them about, as puppies will shake an empty glove. Then they cast them aside, and reconnected the massacre. The rats were furious and in exhaustion. The excitement of the dogs gradually diminished; cruelty gave place to satiety—clemency which was only fatigue in disgust. And yet, if they had scattered death around, it was only to be destroyed themselves in their turn. The first quarter of an hour was all their own, the second was half their own, and the third quarter which sounded much more like accents of pain than shouts of victory. The reaction had begun. The rats were now in full mass and force. Their wave muzzles from which hung bunches of rats who were not to be shaken off, closed in on the dogs. It was in vain to try and shake the assailants off; they held on so firm and tight that the combatants were carried about like mere balloons for life. Others limped along with wounded feet, while others could not move at all. The dogs, having defeated themselves bravely, but still they had to act on the defensive. The original position was completely changed. The rats, although they have turned out unfavorable to the dogs, if their mass had been less dense and their discipline less cross the fete, had not issued from the iron gate with naked arms brandishing clubs, turning the tide of battle, and closing in on the dogs. Then, at last, the fury of the dogs was the sight of this reinforcement! They renewed their fight with energy.

The struggle was renewed. The men were superb. Every blow of the stick sent corpses of rats across their fellows. Bonnet-Thivars, the dogs snapped them up in mid-air, completing the illusion. Balzac, transported with delight, bounded over the backs of the dogs, climbed up the men, ran into their beards and hair, round their necks and shoulders, and, with his pocket-knife, pants, whistled, clung together, and hit the sticks with his fists and feet to make them fall the faster. Many broke their own necks by a rush against the wall, committing suicide rather than yield—like stout sons of antiquity. Numbers, having thrown themselves on the side of the men; but it cost them dear. A dead limb with sixteen rats to their fellow-dead would not have put them into a more pitiable condition.

The fete was ended. Bonnet-Thivars, steaming with enthusiasm, ran to Balzac, who received him in his arms.

"What a drama, is it not?" said the Inspector of Public Salubrity.

"Splendid!" exclaimed Balzac, delighted with his night's amusement. "Say a poem, and you will still be far short of the truth."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

THE ex-president of the Corporation Club perpetrated the following on the occasion of his wife's visit to Scotland, which if any one has he would not part with for untold wealth: Almost a Scotch bull.

"Jane, my Dear Lover, will ever shine in connection who she thinks of saying fine things. To please, and to be pleased, is the happiness of man, and very few. This last rule of the Dean's is rarely violated in society.

MARRIAGE.—A good woman is not thoroughly appreciated until she is dead. A man's estimate of his wife may not she be possessed, of which even her wife value her own existence until she has placed her in his own instinct to be the guardian angel of his home and heart.

"I never complained of my condition," says the Rev. Sydney Smith, "except when I had the gout in both feet at once, and then the pain was intolerable."

Man's riches are to be estimated rather by the forms of his wants than the greatness of his possessions.

"Jones is in your mess! keep after giving it to another? Your word.

Russell observing to Johnson that there was no instance of a beggar dying for want in the streets of London, "I believe, Sir, you are very right," says Johnson, "for the people will give rather than let a man die, but the impossibility of relieving a Londoner."

"Is this horse sound?" asked a Leicestershire man, "you could turn a horse into a field nine-acres, and he would not touch a blade of grass from one end to the other." "Pooh! that's nothing," cried a Yorkshireman, "I've seen a horse turn a field in Yorkshire, and not able to find him next morning."

A PLOWMAN'S APPETITE.—A Scotchman having hired Mundt to a farmer, had a cheese set down before him that as he might help himself. The master said to him, "Sandy, you take a long time to breakfast." "In truth, master," said he, "I am sure the cheese o' this side is as sma' soon eaten as ye may think."

Which five namesakes early Scriptures indicate the commencement of corporal punishment?—Adam, Seth Eve, Cain Abel!

A bachelor was saying, "Next to no wife, a good wife is best." "No doubt," said a fondlewoman, "next to a good wife, no wife is the best."

"ONE OF OUR WESTERN merchants," says St. Louis correspondent, "having sold a will to the amount of an eighth hundred dollars to one of his country brothers, took a silver dollar note for the amount, and drew at 10 per cent. per annum. After waiting some two weeks after the note was due, he came to his correspondent, asking him to send the amount as soon as possible, as he was in want of the money. Answer: 'In a few days he received the following reply:

"'DEAR FRIEND,—I received your note by yesterday's mail. I am sorry you are in a hurry, but it is impossible for me to comply with your request, as it is against my principle to pay the interest, and also to count my specie out to pay the principal. Yours, truly, etc.'"

Little Charley I.—Is in his fourth year. About a year ago an aunt of his was at his father's house, and little Charley was said to be very careful not to make a noise in the room where the baby was sleeping. After he had been still de, Hush, mamma's baby is sleeping him, called him to her to punish him. He wildered to her, "No! Hurr, stop! Please don't wake a noise; you'll strike up Aunt Lucy."

In these days of rapid transit it may be scarcely credited that it is the interchange of the various staples upon railroads it encountered the most violent opposition. When the Pennsylvania Railroad between Philadelphia and Columbia was first projected in, few considered it would ever be anything more than a local road for all the heavy and early transportation was originally almost exclusively. A bill was at length introduced into the Legislature providing for the purchase of the projected road, therefor. Notwithstanding strong opposition it passed both Houses, and was signed by the Governor. Immediately Here, however, it was arrested, and the clamor against the law reached its climax. Intelligent men declared that Masonic districts through which the road passed came to Harrisburg in quick succession, and that the inefficiency in the strongest measure. They represented that the commerce of Harrisburg would be ruined, its markets, and prostrate the best interests of the farmer. Petitions poured in from all parts of the State against the law and the bill (if) passed into force a train was coming up the road, drawn by two horses, with a number of cars. When a short distance below Lancaster the engineer precived a monster ball on the track; he reversed, approaching the animal at a moderate rate, and he quietly left the track, apparently in disgust. The speed was resumed. As the monster of the highway again approach, however, his bellowing wrecked around into the track, lowered his head, and made battle. This was so sudden that nothing could save him. The bean struck him either way he moved, and he fell, gored, and knocked him, dead, down an embankment of twenty feet.

The writer was a guest, soon after these occurrences, at a public dinner given to the engineer of the train. Among the most eminent of the guests was the engineer who had given, and I need not say well received, the toast—"Jethro Bitner, and Colonel Sinker's bull—may they both be long remembered!" In the after contests on the subject that bull played a conspicuous part in the arguments of science and progress.

It might interest me to mention that its author is now the President of these United States.

A clergyman of a locality, neighbor, before a deeply interested audience, the old story of the woman of Jericho, who, when in the midst of a most eloquent appeal, he astonished his hearers by exclaiming: "A young woman in my neighborhood died without religion! I'm afraid, I'm afraid, while I was preaching the Gospel in a state of hostility to Jericho!"

A friend of the wifty and eloquent Samuel Russell of Ohio lately told the following anecdote which illustrated the force of his style. "I was in the court house yesterday for one of the cases, in the trial of the opposite side was reading a manuscript argument. It was very long, carried, and interested it until I found that the speaker had not looked that he was right. The judge, whose attention had been withdrawn for a moment, inquired the exact kind of a dispute going on, turned around, and inquired, 'What's that?' The speaker looked up, and, forgetting, nothing, your honor, only Mr. B——— has catched the sack."

"Puppy, can't I go to the zoological rooms to see the monkeys right with the chimpanzees?" "Jacob, my son—but don't get your trowsers dirty, and don't you go to tell what a mess that boy has got into with a bird's nest!" No longer ago than yesterday, he had eight Thomas sais among by their mothers' side—"Mother, mother!" "No! Bless his little heart, come to his mother!"

The dialect of the West is rather strong, and slightly unorthodox. One farmer, who had recently been traveling in the Occident, as far as Arkansas, says that, "when a man in that region starts out to get a wife, he don't stick, he declares that if he had a gloss of whisky he would have himself out of it, right off the reel."

"Jim," inquired a school-boy of one of his mates, "what is the meaning of relics?" "I don't know," said Jim, "but I can tell you. You know the master licked me in school yesterday?" "Yes." "Well, he licked me awful hard to-day, that he kept me after school and licked me again. This is what I call a re-lick."

MISS STORER the little maiden at No. 16, in Mr. Jones, who has only two children, and they are both boys, the son, Mr. Jones; I'm so sorry you've been kept waiting. No one heard you when you rang the first and second time."

"Do you know who I am?" said a police-officer to a fellow whom he seized by the throat.

"I do not exactly, Sir; but I reckon you are the malignant officer!"

"I say, Pete, is owning roun' de work' truh'ers tell us did you own any 'kole day?"

"Dat am n't nuff's, Sam, whes you can make 'm up agin."

"How you gwoine to make it up?—tell me dat, nigger."

"Why, jis turn roun' and go back agin."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, August 30, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have not been active and less firm for Flour, Wheat, Corn, and Rye. Other dealers have purchased more freely and are less indistinctly required. The export inquiry has been very limited. Oats have been in good request at improved prices. ——Cotton has been moderately dealt in at full rates. Provisions have been more sought after; Pork has advanced; other articles have been held firmly. ——Hay has been in actively inquiry for the supply. Hops have been in request, and Rice have been quiet. Seeds have held above the usual rates of buyers, and have been active. The crop news is very favorable, and it is believed that not less than 200,000,000 bushels will yield in the fall to the big-growing districts. Only moderate sales have been made from the stores for shipment to foreign destinations.——Seeds and Tobacco have been in moderate request at uniform rates.——Wool has attracted considerable attention at full prices.——The Dry Goods trade exhibits considerable animation.——Sales of Sugars and choice fancy Teas are generally held with much firmness. The Dry Goods imports during the week amounted to $2,213,431 against $2,209,976 the corresponding week last year. The value of the imports since January 1 reached $72,000,000 against $71,956,859 the entire week last year.——Groceries have been in moderate request at unchanged rates. Metals have been in moderate request at unaltered rates.——Whiskey has been in fair request at 23½c. for Ohio.

Rejected sup'fine State Flour, per bbl. $9 25 @ $4 00
" extra " 4 30 @ 4 40
Superfine to extra State, per barrel 4 30 @ 4 40
Superfine to extra Western, per bbl 4 30 @ 4 35
Extra Western, per barrel 4 40 @ 4 50
Extra to choice Ohio, per barrel 4 55 @ 4 60
Extra Canadian, per barrel 5 25 @ 6 00
Fancy to choice Canadian, per barrel 5 75 @ 6 00
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl 3 80 @ 4 00
Corn Meal, per barrel 3 10 @ 3 15
Wallla Wheat, per bushel 1 18 @ 1 60
Red Wheat, per bushel 1 18 @ 1 60
White Wheat, per bushel 1 20 @ 1 60
Rye, per bushel 70 @ 75
Barley, per bushel 60 @ 65
Western Oats, per bushel 40 @ 45
Southern Oats, per bushel 40 @ 45
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel 43 @ 46
Southern Corn, per bushel 70 @ 75
Canada Corn, per bushel 72 @ 73
Mixed Corn, per bushel 70 @ 75
Prime Pork, per barrel 13 00 @ 13 50
Mess Pork, per barrel 13 00 @ 13 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel 10 00 @ 10 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel 11 00 @ 12 00
Mess Beef, per barrel 11 00 @ 11 50
Lard, per gallon 0 13 @ 0 13
Lard, per barrel 11 00 @ 12 00
Western Butter, per pound 0 13 @ 0 16
Ohio Butter, per pound 0 13 @ 0 16
Rice, per 100 pounds 2 75 @ 3 87½
Cuba Sugar, per pound 0 6 @ 0 6
Cuba Sugar, per pound 0 6 @ 0 6
Cuba Molasses, per gallon 0 27 @ 0 28
New Orleans Sugar, per pound 0 7 @ 0 8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon 0 37 @ 0 40
Hilton Teas, per pound 0 37 @ 0 60
Southern Teas, per pound 0 37 @ 0 60
Hyson Teas, per pound 0 37 @ 0 60
Hops, per pound 0 — @ 0 34
Hops, per pound 0 — @ 0 34
Tallow, per pound 0 10 @ 0 11
Tallow, per pound 0 10 @ 0 11
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon 0 43 @ 0 43
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon 0 43 @ 0 43
Common Rosin, per 280 pounds 1 62½ @ 1 75
Pale Rosin, per 280 pounds 2 75 @ 2 87½
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound 0 5 @ 0 10
Seed Leaf, per pound 0 10 @ 0 14
American Fleece Wool, per pound 0 37 @ 0 46
" Pulled " 0 — @ 0 —

Freights unversely dull. For Liverpool—Cotton, 5-32d.; Flour, 1s. 6d.; Wheat, 7½d.; Corn, 6½d.; Peas, 6½d.; Oats, 6d. @ 5d. per bushel; Beef, 5s.; Pork, 5s. @ 5s. per barrel; Lard, 5s. per hundred pounds. To London—Wheat, 7½d. per bushel; Flour, 1s. per barrel.

The Live Stock market is not active, and prices are lower. Cattle—Sales for supply and speculation at Mitch Cows were in request at uniform rates.——Veal Calves were in request, and choice were more sought after in price, with a somewhat livelier inquiry.——Sheep and Lambs were in fair demand, and the following are the weeks comparison as follows:

	Week ending	Week ending
	Aug. 16.	Aug. 23.
Beeves	2,600	2,600
Milch Cows	185	191
Veal Calves	1,000	1,000
Sheep and Lambs	17,745	13,554
Swine	4,000	4,000

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves on Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	1493	Texas..... 140
New York	1,000	Kentucky..... 200
Ohio	428	Connecticut..... 31
Pennsylvania	208	New Jersey..... 100

The range of prices according to the actual sales of the Stock at the Forty-fourth Street Market on Wednesday was as follows:

Extra quality oxen Beeves, per pound	$ 6	@ $ 0
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	25 00	@ 65 00
Veal Calves, per pound	6	@ 0
Sheep and Lambs, per head	1 87	@ 5 00
" per pound	0 7	@ 0
Live Swine, per pound	4	@ 0
Dressed Hogs, per pound	6	@ 0
Rousting Pigs, each	1 00	@ 2 00

The Country Produce Markets exhibit no material alterations. Most articles are abundant, and prices rule low. Here are the quotations in detail:

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Grapes, green, per pound	$ 2	@ $ 3
Huckleberries, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 00
" "	New Rochelle, per quart	25 @ 37½
Huckleberries, per quart	12½	@ 25
Apples, new, per barrel	1 50	@ 4 00
Pears	1 50	@ 2 00
Peaches, per basket	1 25	@ 3 00
Peaches, per bushel	1 50	@ 3 00
Lima Beans, per basket	75	@ 87½
Lima Beans, per bushel	2 50	@ 3 00
Onions, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Onions, new, per bunch	4 00	@ 5 00
Turnips, per bushel	1 00	@ 1 50
Cabbage, new, per 100	1 50	@ 2 00
Squashes, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 50
Pumpkins, per dozen	1 25	@ 1 75
Green Corn, per dozen	12½	@ 25
Watermelons, per 100	4 00	@ 12 00
Nutmeg Melons, per dozen	1 25	@ 1 75
Tomatoes, per bushel	50	@ 75
Tomatoes, per basket	12½	@ 25
Eggs, N. J., and N. J., per dozen	13	@ 17
Eggs, Western, per dozen	13	@ 17
Chickens, per pair	50	@ 75
Fowls, per pound	8	@ 12½
Ducks, per pair	50	@ 75
Ducks, per pair	62½	@ 1 00
Spring Geese, each	1 00	@ 1 50
Turkeys, per pound	13	@ 16
Turkeys, per dozen	12 00	@ 15 00
Woodcock, per dozen	3 25	@ 4 00
Snipe, Dowitcher, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Snipe, Gr-eye, per dozen	75	@ 1 00
Plover, per dozen	1 00	@ 1 50

MARRIED.

On the 19th inst., at South Reading, Vt., by Rev. Wm. S. Balch, Mr. Wallace F. Robinson, of Boston, to Miss Sarah M. Hunting, Daughter of Ezra Hosmer Hunting, of South Reading.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

SUGAR-MILLS, KETTLES, and FUR-NACE FIXTURES.—Persons wanting any thing in the above line can be supplied promptly by addressing JAMES LEDLIE, 37 Cliff-street, New York. Also, Portable three-roller Iron Sugar-Mill, sold at $20. Complete outfit for manufacturing Sugar and Molasses, with cylinder Clarifier, 100 and 120 gallon Boiler, Furnace Door, Grate Bars, Ash-pit Doors, Skimmers, Dippers, Sugar-Cast Cup, Proof Glass and Strainer, furnished on receipt of $125. Address as above. Sent C.O.D. with draft. Full terms on sugar-making furnished gratis, on application, or mailed on receipt of a postage stamp.

NATIONAL SERIES OF STANDARD SCHOOL BOOKS.

PUBLISHED BY

A. S. BARNES & BURR,

Several NEW BOOKS have lately been added to this popular series, among which are:

DAVIES' NEW UNIVERSITY ALGEBRA. Price $1 50.

DAVIES' COMPLETE FIRST BOOK OF SCIENCE. Price $1 00.

DAVIES' YOUTH'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES, with Maps and Engravings. Price 38 cents.

FAIRBANK & WATSON'S NEW SERIES OF READING BOOKS.

Teachers will please send for A. S. BARNES & CO'S DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE, which will be forwarded by mail Address to the United States, post-paid, upon application to the Publishers.

CAUTION.

Attention is respectfully invited to the following Letter from

MESSRS. TITUS, Eng.

NEW YORK, August 24, 1858.

MESSRS. TITUSES & CO.—Gentlemen: Your request and in justice to you, I am bound to state that I disposed of the entire interest in the Atlantic Cable on the United States steam frigate Niagara to your time, and that if any other party claims to be interested in the Cable, it must either have been procured from you or from the most unprincipled parties, who have distributed on board before the Cable was laid, to which case the quantity to be small and of no consequence.

There is a peculiar interest attached to the Cable which you have manufactured, and which will be readily appreciated by all, when the specimens have been submitted to the electric strands were being transmitted during the whole time of the operations in laying the Cable.

Of course, any quantity of Cable can be manufactured in England, and many specimens have been submitted in the country; but to this, if any of those attaches the peculiar value which the Cable partook of, which prevents from the fact that it is part and parcel of the Cable which is now in operation.

I remain, Gentlemen, very truly your friend,

CYRUS W. FIELD, Esq.

"THE BOUDOIR SEWING MACHINE," Harris Patent, are now on groun and will be ready for delivery early in September next, when they will prove its utility or value, have become universally adopted. Manufactured and for sale by the Manufacturers, 343 Broadway, corner of Howard Street, N. Y. G. C. MUNSON, Agt.

P. S.—Circulars and Specimens of work by mail if desired.

TO CASH AND SHORT TIME BUYERS.

NEW STOCK OF

RIBBONS AND DRESS TRIMMINGS.

MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,

No. 355 Broadway,

OPPOSITE METROPOLITAN HOTEL,

ARE NOW PREPARED TO SHOW ONE OF THE most extensive double stocks of the above goods to be seen in the city.

A TWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $25 SEWING MACHINES received the First Premium at Saxton's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, September 14th, 1858.

The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.

Office, 463 Broadway, New York.

Send for descriptive Circular.

M. U. TWATEN & CO.,

Sole Agent for the United States.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE for YOUNG LADIES, No. 5, Sea Avenue, Rue 19th Street, near Madison Park, Boarding and Day School. Instruction in every of the French Classics, Mathematics, English, Spanish, German languages, besides the French, Spanish, and German Governesses. The French Department has been added. For details, references, &c., circulars to be had.

Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES.—NEW AND VALUABLE IMPROVEMENTS.—A new Tension and a Hemmer that sews a perfect hem, and other valuable improvements. Office, 343 Broadway, New York.

DIAGRAM OF THE LOCK STITCH.

This is the only Stitch that can not be raveled, and that presents the same appearance upon each side of the fabric. It is produced by two threads, one from each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the centre of it. Send for circulars.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—No other sewing machine for family use has received so many premiums as the machines of the machine or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

TO ADVERTISERS

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A MAGNIFICENT ILLUSTRATED PAPER,

CIRCULATING IN EVERY SECTION OF THE UNION,

Offers utmost inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and are not crowded to the exclusion of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not as large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINES.—The manufacturing proprietors call attention to the immense superiority of SINGER'S machines, in all the requisites which require of any machinery or machine who use one. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, which will be supplied gratis. Address for full information on the subject

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

NO QUININE! NO QUININE!

WOODWARD'S CHARM will cure the Fever and Ague in two hours in three days. It is the only remedy known that will do it. Sold by all Druggists. Price $1 per bottle. Depot of charge, for your property. J. W. WOODWARD, Sole Proprietor.

TO TEACHERS.

WELLS'S NEW SCIENTIFIC SERIES.

I.—WELLS'S SCIENCE OF COMMON THINGS. A popular introduction to the study of Physics. By Dr. J. A. Wells, A.M., Professor of the Annual of Scientific Discovery, &c. Illustrated. 12mo.

II.—WELLS'S NATURAL PHILOSOPHY. 872 Cut. 12mo. Price $1 00.

III.—WELLS'S PRINCIPLES AND APPLICATIONS OF CHEMISTRY. 160 Cuts. $1. (Just Published.)

These works embody the latest discoveries and researches in Physical Science, and exist in their text and illustrations the most numerous and complete Scientific Series—their practical application of Science to the Arts and every-day life, and their tasteful and copious illustrations cause Text to counter.

They have been introduced hundreds of expensive Text-books in academies, practical Educators, and the Press throughout the country, for the schools with very energetic, and exhibitors of the Philosophy, found mainly upon the inconvenience of the apparatus required to illustrate the principles and corrected before the appearance of the reviews.

The Series is now published in a style unrivaled in all respects according to the highest authorities.

A NEW EDITION, STEREOTYPED, of 112 pages, now ready, 18mo, THE EDUCATIONAL SENSE OF HEARING, with a series of extensive examinations of Mental Works, and 14 pages of fresh notices and testimonials, from the most eminent sources.

Teachers and others are invited to call, or address, with a view to introduction of the above.

IVISON & PHINNEY,

No. 321 Broadway, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—Prepared and sold by Dr. Sands, Chemist to the Medical Association, improves the appetite, invigorates the system, purifies the blood, and gives health and purity. celebrated disease.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 101 Fulton Street, New York.

A LIST OF NEW BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of their Works by mail, postage prepaid, to any subscriber in the United States under 3000 miles, on receipt of the Money.

MEMOIR OF HENRY CLAY. By Madame Dr Bonneville. 8vo.

DR. THOMAS. A Novel. By Anthony Trollope, Author of "Barchester Towers," "The Warden," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

MEMOIR OF JOSEPH CURTIS. A Medical Man. By Catharine M. Sedgwick, Author of "Married or Single," "Live and Let Live," "Poor Rich Man," "Rich Poor Man," "Love Tales," "Live and Let Live," &c., &c. 16mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

SQUIER'S CENTRAL AMERICA. The States of Central America: Their Geography, Topography, Climate, Population, Resources, Productions, Commerce, Political Condition, Aboriginal Monuments, Antiquities, Language, Chapters on Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Guatemala, and the Balize, the Mosquito Shore, and the Honduras Inter-Oceanic Railway. By E. G. Squier, late Charge d'Affaires of the United States to the Republics of Central America. With Numerous Maps and Illustrations. Second and Enlarged Edition. 8vo, Muslin, $3; Half Calf, $4.

WYCKOFF'S HISTORICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL INCIDENTS, AND ROMANTIC ADVENTURER. By Rev. Henry Ryan, D.D. Beautifully Illustrated. 18mo, Muslin, 31 25.

FRED MACKRAIN IN RUSSIA; or, The Boy Traveler in the Land of the Czar. By Jacob Abbott, Author of "Rollo Learning to Read," "Peter the Whaler," "Lucy Learning to Talk," &c., &c. Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

HISTORY OF KING RICHARD THE THIRD, OF ENGLAND. By James Gairdner. With Illustrated Title-page and numerous Engravings. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

THE HAPPY HOME. By Kirwan. Author of "Lecture to Bishop Hughes," "Romanism at Home," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin.

ISAAC TAYLOR'S WORD OF MIND. The World of Mind. An Elementary Treatise. By Isaac Taylor, Author of "Wesley and Methodism," "Loyola and Jesuitism," "Natural History of Enthusiasm," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ATKINSON'S SIBERIA. Oriental and Western Siberia: A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghiz Steppes, among the Cossacks and the Manjours. By Thomas Witlam Atkinson. With Map and numerous spirited Illustrations. 8vo, Muslin, $3.

GIESELER'S ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY. A Complete Ecclesiastical History. By John C. L. Gieseler. Translated from the Fourth Revised German Edition. By Henry B. Smith, Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. A New American Edition, Revised and Corrected. In Five Volumes. 8vo. Vol. I., Muslin, $2 50. Vol. II., Muslin, $2 50. Vol. III., Muslin, $2 50. Vol. IV., Muslin, $2 50. Vol. V., Muslin, $2 50. Sold separately. Vol. I. Ready.

SCENES OF CLERICAL LIFE. A Novel. The Sad Fortunes of the Rev. Amos Barton. By George Eliot. Story.—Janet's Repentance. By George Eliot. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

LOTUS-EATING. A Summer Book. By George William Curtis. Beautifully illustrated from Designs by Lossing. 12mo, Muslin, gilt edges, $1 25; $1 61

TO NERVOUS SUFFERERS.—A retired physician, having had placed in his hands by a few years, after many years of great success in curing all forms of Nervous Debility, Premature Decay, and the Errors of Youth, desires to make known to his fellow-sufferers the means of cure. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, he will send (free of charge) to those who desire it this recipe, with full directions for preparing and successfully using the same, which they will find a sure cure for Nervousness, Loss of Memory, Universal Lassitude, Pains in the Back, Dimness of Vision, Premature Old Age, and many other diseases. Those wishing the prescription, and desiring the benefit of this discovery, will please address, JOHN B. DALCHO, 194 Fulton Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $3 00 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	4 00
One Copy for Two Years	6 00
Five Copies for One Year	15 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	30 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be furnished for every Club of TWELVE OR TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

A Postage Stamp must be sent with every Subscription.

Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send a written order to the Publishers, HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

TRAVELING ON THE HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD.

CONDUCTOR. "Passengers will please get their Smelling-bottles ready, as the train is about to enter the city."

Scene as the Train approaches Thirty-first Street.

YOUNG LOBSTER (a Curious Bird.) "Well, I don't know about Marryin'—for, yer see, after the knot was tied, some other Gal might be fallin' in love with one—and that would be so darned awkward!"

NEW AND APPROPRIATE STYLE OF COSTUME—A LA CABLE!

PATENT ANGLESEY LEG and ARTIFICIAL HAND. These materials substitutes for lost Limbs are supplied only by W.M. SELPHO, 616 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

"VROOM & FOWLERS'" WALNUT OIL MILITARY SHAVING SOAP, Patronized to suit the most fastidious. JOHN D. VROOM, ONLY MAKER, 75 CHURCH ST., N. Y.

TIFFANY & CO., No. 550 Broadway, New York,

ANNOUNCE THAT THEY HAVE SECURED THE ENTIRE BALANCE OF THE

ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH SUBMARINE CABLE,

Now on board the

U. S. Steam Frigate Niagara.

In order to place it within the reach of all classes, and that every family in the United States may possess a specimen of this wonderful mechanical curiosity, they propose to cut the Cable into pieces of four inches in length, and mount them neatly with brass ferules.

Each piece will be accompanied with a copyrighted facsimile certificate of

CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.,

that it is cut from the genuine Cable. Twenty miles of it have been actually submerged and taken up from the bottom of the Ocean. This will be first sold in precisely the condition in which the great Cable now lies in the bed of the Atlantic.

Orders will be received from dealers and others for not less than 100 pieces at a time, at $50 per hundred. Retail price 50 cents each.

Each order must be accompanied by the money, in funds current in New York, as it will not be possible to open accounts. A register will be kept of the orders, as they are received, which will be filled in turn without favor or partiality.

A large portion of the specimens will be ready, it is expected, for delivery within a week.

New York, August 31st, 1858.

BRODIE'S TALL AND WINTER STOCK OF CLOAKS AND MANTILLAS, NOW OPEN, FOR WHOLESALE BUYERS.

Just Published:

AN AUTHENTIC HISTORY OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

Large 12mo. Muslin. Price, $1.

ABUNDANTLY AND BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED, with numerous wood-cuts, steel engravings, diagrams, and a superb folding colored map, which presents, in a clear and intelligible manner, a plan of the Submarine Telegraph, together with the relative positions of Europe and America, nearly every telegraph line in both countries, and in, if itself, worth the price of the book.

Containing a complete Record of the Inception, Progress, and Final Success of that noble undertaking. A General History of Land and Ocean Telegraphing. Electrical and Magnetic Explanations, and Geographical Sketches of the Principal Persons connected with the Great Work.

Dedicated to, and embellished with, a magnificent steel portrait of

CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.,

to whose indomitable energy and unflinching perseverance the civilized globe is indebted for the accomplishment of this triumphant enterprise.

This book will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price, $1.

RUDD & CARLETON, Publishers and Booksellers, No. 310 Broadway, New York.

N. B.—Indocements will be offered to TELEGRAPH and all other AGENTS who can procure subscribers.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.

FIFTEEN and FIFTY dollar SEWING MACHINES.

The FIFTEEN DOLLAR Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate upon it. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family sewing machines. We challenge the world to produce its equal. C. W. THOMAS & CO., 450 Broadway, N. Y.

☞ Agents wanted.

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FAIR

will open at

CRYSTAL PALACE Sept. 16th,

Goods received on and after Sept. 7th.

UNIVERSITY OF LOUISVILLE, KY., MEDICAL DEPARTMENT.

THE twenty-second annual course of Lectures will commence in this School on the first Monday in November and close the last of February, under the following arrangement:

LUNSFORD P. YANDELL, M.D., Professor of Physiology and Pathological Anatomy.

BENJAMIN R. PALMER, M.D., Professor of the Principles and Practice of Surgery.

THOMAS S. BELL, M.D., Professor of Medical Chemistry and Toxicology.

ROBERT J. BRECKINRIDGE, M.D., Professor of Materia Medica and Therapeutics.

JOSHUA B. FLINT, M.D., Professor of Clinical Surgery.

THEODOR S. BELL, M.D., Professor of the Theory and Practice of Medicine.

LLEWELLYN POWELL, M.D., Professor of Obstetric Medicine.

J. W. BENSON, M.D., Professor of Descriptive and Surgical Anatomy.

S. M. DEMIS, M.D., Professor of Clinical Medicine.

ARCHIE S. COOK, M.D., Demonstrator of Anatomy.

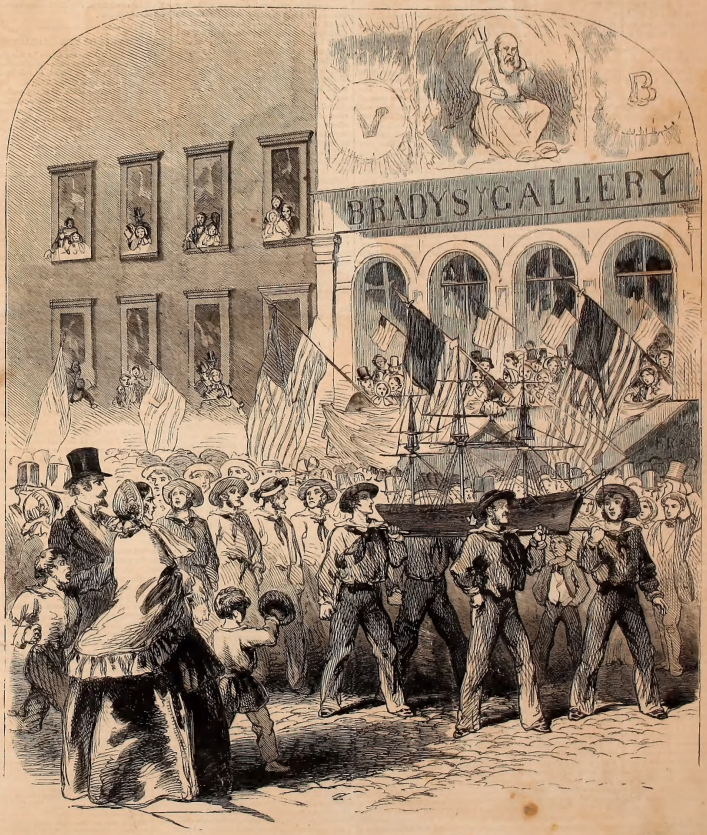
Fees for the entire course $105. Matriculation and Library Ticket $5. Practical Anatomy and Dissection $10. Graduation $25.

A full Preliminary Course of Lectures will be given by the Faculty, commencing on the first Monday in October, at which time the Dissecting Rooms will also be opened.

Clinical instruction will be given twice a week at the Louisville Marine Hospital from the 1st of October till the close of the session.

A Clinique has also been established in connection with the University, at which operations are performed and cases prescribed and lectured upon in presence of the class.

For further information, apply to



L. P. YANDELL, M.D., Dean of the Faculty.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY, for YOUNG LADIES. Horseback Riding and Salt-Water Bathing. Application for Admission or Catalogue to be addressed to the PRINCIPAL, MRS. T. P. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $10 per week.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 89.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE CELEBRATION—THE NIAGARAS IN BROADWAY.—[SEE PAGE 586.]

HOW CYRUS LAID THE CABLE.

A BALLAD.

[Written for Harper's Weekly.]

BY JOHN G. SAXE.

Come listen all ones my song;
It is no silly fable;
'Tis all about the mighty cord
They call the Atlantic Cable.

Bold CYRUS FIELD he said to Jones,
I have a pretty notion
That I can run the telegraph
Across the Atlantic Ocean.

Then all the people laughed, and said,
They'd like to see him do it;
He might get half-seas-over, but
He never could get through it;

To carry out his foolish plan
He never would be able;
He might as well go hang himself
With his Atlantic Cable.

But CYRUS was a valiant man,
A fellow of decision;
And heeded not their mocking words,
Their laughter and derision.

Twice did his bravest efforts fail,
And yet his mind was stable;
He work'd the main for break his heart
Because he broke his cable.

"Once more, my gallant boys!" he cried;
"Three times!—you know the fable—("I'll make it thirty," muttered he,
"But I will lay the cable.")

Once more they tried—hurrah! hurrah!
What means the great commotion?
The Lord be praised! the cable's laid
Across the Atlantic Ocean!

Loud ring the bells—for, flashing through
Six hundred leagues of water,
Old Mother Britain exclaims
Salutes her eldest daughter.

O'er all the land the tidings speed,
And soon in every nation
They'll hear about the cable with Profoundest admiration!

Now long live JAMES, and long live VIC,
And long live gallant CYRUS;
And may his courage, faith, and zeal
With emulation fire us;

And may we honor evermore
The manly, bold, and stable,
And tell our sons to make them brave,
How CYRUS laid the cable.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 11, 1858.

THE CONVENTION.

IT is now just about twelve years since, amidst rejoicings and jubilations of all kinds, the adoption of the Constitution of 1846 was proclaimed. It has been sometimes familiarly called "Mike Hoffman's Constitution;" and, certainly, few men had more to do with bringing it about than the honest old man whom, in the coat of "hidden grey," we all so well remember. Amidst congratulations, and felicitations, and prognostications of good was the child of the sage of Herkimer born. Radical Democrats were in ecstasies at the ease of their decent theories actually incorporated in a "fundamental law." Jubilant Whigs declared that such an unusual dull death-bell never before was known before; and, sure enough, a hecatomb of judges, masters, examiners, inspectors, and functionaries of all names and grades were sacrificed on the altar of the new popular God. The old lawyers rejoiced over the downfall of Walworth, and the young ones danced about the bonfires prepared for Chitty and Graham, like our aboriginal chiefs around the pyre of a foe taken in battle. The Millennium was seen only a little way off. The odious central power was broken down. No more wasteful debts should be contracted by the State. No office should be so plain that he who ran (if he had "sufficient understanding") might read, and Democratic institutions were to be, from start, and open on a new phase of their existence.

Such were the hopes and anticipations that attended the birth of the Constitution of 1846. Only twelve years have rolled away; and when Mr. Stow, last winter, "solitary and alone," had the audacity to introduce a bill for a Convention, with the avowed purpose of openly attacking, if not totally abrogating, this very same Constitution, not a voice was lifted in its favor. No one attempted to defend it. Mr. Stow's bill passed with scarcely a shadow of opposition, and we can now find no one who doubts that the Convention will be held.

If this be so—if we are really on the eve of a reconstruction of the entire fundamental law of our State Governments really be loves us to take the matter into more serious consideration than has as yet been done, and, by discussion and examination, to bring the popular mind up to the great work before us.

It will be well, therefore, briefly to recapitulate the prominent features of the Constitution of 1846, to see how far it has effected any good, and in what respects it has failed to answer the views of its friends and promoters.

And, first, of the Central Power.

In the year 1846 "centralization" was a popular cry. For a long succession of years the power of the State had been controlled by a party obedient to Tammany Hall, represented by whom Van Buren, Wright, and Marcy were, perhaps, the most conspicuous. This state of things had produced in a portion of the Democratic party a strong feeling of rivalry and dissatisfaction; and the Whigs seized with eagerness on the opportunity to hold down the power of their opponents. This, together with the desire of the lawyers for a judicial reform, was the real cause of the agitation, perhaps the real, popular fury of the Constitution of 1846. Half the Democrats, and all the Whigs, were delighted at the overthrow of the greatest political power in the State.

The object in view was completely attained. Not only were all the offices in the gift of the central appointing power (the Governor and Senate) vested at a more popular source, but the power was itself destroyed, and the elective principle resorted to as a sacred cause. The legislative power was also pared; the term of the Senate reduced from four years to two; and the members of both the Senate and Assembly made responsible from single districts instead of counties and Senate Districts, as before.

The result of these measures has been very marked. The power of the State as a whole has been greatly impaired; and the counterpoise intended to be furnished by the check of the State organizations on the Federal Government is almost totally destroyed. And this because the power of all the functionaries of the State is seriously lessened.

The Governor is a mere figure-head. Deprived of the whole power of appointment, deserted by every leader left but that of patron, he is little more than a grandiloquent and sesquipedalian sort of turnkey. He has no influence and no control.

The Senate of the State of New York was formerly an influential body. It represented, as were there, it was impossible to make a ticket of sixteen names which would not contain some individual overpowering the real wishes of the true interests of the metropolis. Not so at all at present. The city is cut up into districts in which, and in each district a mere local popularity is quite sufficient to return a Representative. The consequence is that the character of the members of the Assembly has fallen off most manifestly. They no longer represent great local interests, but are returned by which used to whom they are responsible; they represent the geographies, or the persons, or the interests of counties and towns, and as long as that locality is satisfied the member is safe in his seat.

These causes are fatal to the character of the legislative body. Just so fast as public spirit and large views go out, just so fast do party manœuvring and party intrigue in and we accordingly find in the time, the intelligence, and the morals of the Legislature, a very manifest falling off since the adoption of the Constitution of 1846.

Indeed, no argument is required. It is perfectly clear that a Representative chosen by the city of New York, and responsible to the city of New York, will be a very different person from a Representative chosen by a coal whole or the Eighteenth and a piece of the Nineteenth wards. In the one case, he acts for, speaks for, votes for the whole city; in the other, for the other, he is the Representative of some corner grocery.

But our subject grows apace. At some other time we shall call attention to other branches of the subject.

It is enough for the present to close by saying that there is no subject at present before the people that can be compared in interest to the approaching Convention. Now that Kansas no longer shrieks or howls, and that the star of the Prophet has paled in Utah, there is really nothing before us half so well worth occupying our minds or our pens as the reorganization of our State Constitution.

CHARLES DICKENS AGAIN IN THIS COUNTRY.

We have good reason to believe that Mr. Charles Dickens contemplates, at no distant period, a second visit to the United States. Large as Mr. Dickens's emoluments have been, his expenditure has been so liberal that the pursuit of gain is not indifferent to him. And the handsome reward which Mr. Thackeray reaped from his late visit among us has, it is said, stimulated Mr. Dickens to renew his acquaintance with the people who so highly appreciate his talents. He will not come as a lecturer. Though a man so versatile that he might have commanded an audience for any walk of life, and most certainly in any which depended on the display of eloquence and elocution, Mr. Dickens has mercifully spared us the peculiar field of the popular lecturer. He is a public reader. He reads —not Shakspeare, but Dickens. Some time since the idea of publishing himself in detachments occurred either to him or to some one of his friends. Selections were made from his works—like adapted for consumption at a single meal. They were generally well received, and became popular. Then the further improvement was proposed—that Mr. Dickens should read the selections as he had read his Christmas stories. This, too, was tried, and found to answer. As a reader, competent critics pronounce Dickens to be without an equal. No play, performed by a galaxy of theatrical stars, is cited as entrancing as his reading of select portions of his best works. All England has crowded the rooms where he has read.

And now, we are told, alive to the pecuniary value of an audience of many-five millions of old acquaintances on this side the water, he intends to come to the United States. How will he be received?

If Charles Dickens had never been here, no man living would receive such an ovation. No man in the world is so well known or so generally admired in the United States as he. We have reason to know that, for one reader in England, he has ten here. We will go further, and say, without fear of contradiction, that, for every copy of his works circulated in Great Britain, ten are printed and circulated here. Nor is he any where better appreciated or more thoroughly enjoyed than in the United States. The popularity of his fellow-authors or foreigners—authors, artists, poets, statesmen, philanthropists—sinks into insignificance in comparison with his. Had we never seen him, we should certainly bow the knee to him en masse.

But he has been here. He came long before he had reached the pinnacle of celebrity on which he now stands. Yet so many in this country had derived pleasure and the best kind of instruction from his works that all crowded round him to testify their admiration. He was feted as no man had been before. And he deserved it. He was a man of the people. His spirit of Dickens's reception was uniform—an honest desire to do homage to a great and good writer. The civility was badly required. The sarcasms embodied in the "Notes" and "Martin Chuzzlewit" might have been spared on truth; many of them were so beyond doubt; but coming from a man whose ears were still ringing with hearty cheers for welcome, and where someone was hardly disburdened of American good cheer, they were in bad taste. It may be said that we had no right to expect to purchase Mr. Dickens's pen by offerings to his intellectual and physical palate; but it is still truer that it was hardly decent in him to accept the offerings and then snarl at the giver. He should have made his election: either to eat our cakes or to snarl; he did not unanimously. Nor is it any excuse that he has always been the satirist of the faults of his own people. Those he has at home. He has a right. A true man should his own cook as much as he pleases, but he has no business to growl at the toughness of his neighbor's steak, having previously purged himself therewith. An American who had been received in England as Dickens was here, and who had written of the English as he wrote about the Americans, depicting the rank and file of the nation as coarse, low, dishonest, and lying, ill-bred, and drunk, and throwing in an occasional decent imbecile as a foil, would have been eschewed by good literary society here. He would have been pronounced a foul-mouthed slanderer by the European critics. Does the rule hold in both ways?

Mr. Dickens's reception here will somewhat depend on the degree to which these considerations affect the natural tendency of our people to fête him. Possibly, however, at the present moment, other obstacles may stand in the way of a welcome home. It is known throughout this country, that, after twenty years of married life, he has just separated from his wife, on the ground, as he states, of incompatibility of temper. Separations between husband and wife are but too common here, alas! but when a man and woman have lived together twenty years in this country, they generally make out to spread the brief balance of their life in each other's society. Very often it is a jarring to one or the other, but they bear the cross as manfully as they can, smoothing themselves with the thought that they have set no shameful example of matrimonial disturbance, brought no blush to their children's cheek, preserved inviolate the sacred secret of their family sorrow. Mr. Dickens has pursued a different course. Not satisfied with blazoning his trouble, he has wantonly and cruelly sought to lay the whole blame of the separation on his wife. He has published a letter charging her with the grossest neglect of the duties which should have been dearest to her as a wife and a mother. If the charge was false, it was dastardly to urge it; if it was true, it was even worse. No doubt, in the event Mr. Dickens visits us here, this matter would influence the conduct of many wives and mothers in regard to him.

Still, for all this, as a man whose debtors we all are for rich and rare feasts of amusement, and the best and soundest instruction that mankind enjoys at the present day, Charles Dickens is entitled to a respectful and grateful welcome at our hands. We may not take him to our hearts; but we have it in ourselves to be not unmindful of the debt he has laid on all of us. We must never forget that his sins can not cancel our obligations.

THE BURNING OF THE QUARANTINE.

OUR country readers are aware by this time that, in the middle of last week, the Quarantine establishment on States Island, in the State, was burned down by a mob. They may have heard also that a party of United States Marines, who were sent to the scene of action, declined to interfere between the Hospital authorities and the incendiaries; and that nearly twenty-four hours elapse after the last attack of the Governor John A. King and the Quarantine authorities dispatched a strong force of police to prevent the rioters carrying away of the ruins. But for this last salutary precaution, there is no saying what might have befallen the remaining edifices.

This Quarantine question is one on which very erroneous ideas prevail in some parts of this country. On the face of it, the burning of hospitals full of sick people seems to be an act of outrageous vandalism; but, in this case, there are concomitant circumstances which materially alter the complexion of the deed.

When the State of New York seized, forty years ago, a tract of land on States Island for a Quarantine station, the island was a desert. Since then the growth of the city has compelled settlement on the accessible parts of the island. The Quarantine station is now surrounded by a continuous village, many miles in length. The nearest house-top and the city there is incessant communication. Evidently such a Quarantine is the very reverse of Quarantine. The very essence of Quarantine—isolation—was wanting. The hospitals not only failed in their purpose—they actually served to spread the most pernicious disease. In spite of every precaution, for many years past yellow fever has been systematically introduced every summer from the Quarantine to the adjacent village, and thence to the city. Two years ago the absurdity and the danger of the location on States Island were so obvious that the Legislature passed an act directing the removal of the Quarantine. Unfortunately the execution of the act was intrusted to parties, some of whom were bent on making corrupt gain out of it; so it failed. The people of the island, who were the direct sufferers by the maintenance of the Quarantine, waited patiently two years; then, finding that the wise intentions of the Legislature had been frustrated, and that there was no prospect of removing the Quarantine under the State Act, they proceeded by another method. The town of Castleton, in which the hospitals stood, pronounced them, through the regular authorities, a public nuisance, and authorized their abatement. On which the people deliberately removed them and burned them down.

Arson is an ugly offense, and the destruction of property very blameworthy. But we are not told that the people of Clarkson Providence was doomed to eternal perdition for the burning of the Gospel: nor is it generally understood that the Mohawk who destroyed certain cargoes of tea one day, long ago, in Boston harbor, were weighed down to the grave by remorse for their crime. And what can be dearer to a man than the health of his wife and children and all whom he loves best?

THE LOUNGER.

THE JUBILEE.

THERE have been great festivals within a century. Many men can remember the joy over the peace of 15, and the lights that turned in English windows when the conqueror of the world was conquered at Waterloo. Others can recall the illumination of London when the news came from Nelson at the Nile and at Trafalgar; and a sacred few may still hear and see, in their farthest memories, the fires that blazed and the bells that rang over the great Revolution ended.

Yet there was never a light that burned in a palace window for victory by sea or land that did not suggest those human windows in which the light of life was darkened forever — these temples of the human form that lay in the cold ground of the field. In all scenic of warfare triumph there is a terrible minor, and in the joyous clangor and mercy chime of church bells there is a dirge-like undertone telling a note of death.

But our Jubilee of the Exhibition was unstained by a single tear of regret. The vast city swarmed with eager people—the whole country mouth to mouth—Friendly message met friendly; and as we never to two great centres of human life upon the face of the earth—the Metropolis of the Old and the Metropolis of the New—there could have been no human being nor where in the world who knew what was happening that would not have gladly given a hand to the triumph.

There are times in sigh for other ages; who would have lived in the Athens of Pericles—in the Rome of the Republic—in the Italy of the Medici —or the Holland of William the Silent—but we ought then well—let him master their richest resources of art and skill—like them to have the best and loftiest thought—admire their heroism, burn with their purpose, leap with their excitement—and then, making upon man and the world the development in time, declare whether, upon the purest and noblest, the mark was found to stand on grounds, he would not choose—if the choice were his—to live to-day, and here, when nations say—not as a birthday, as when the Queen of Spain spends in days which so many think more religious, because more ecclesiastical, than the every-day and prayer—Peace on earth, good-will to men!

THE CINCINNATI.

"Sr. Louis, August, 1858.

"FRIEND LONGUM.—Can you inform me through your columns of the history of Cincinnati as well as its future, and what is their insignia, and if descendants of Revolutionary heroes are admitted members? I am an ardent descendant of one of those who crossed the Delaware on the floating ice, and was present at the grateful (?) scenario a pension until the day of his death; and, if I am eligible to membership, should like the privilege of becoming associated, did I know the means to obtain my desire.

"Truly, dear Longuer, yours,

"A NEPHEW."

—Bastion will find the latest account of the origin of the Society of the Cincinnati in the fourth volume of Irving's Life of Washington. That Society is still in existence in some of the States, and the meeting of the Massachusetts Chapter on the last Fourth of July, at which the Oration was delivered for the meeting of the State societies, was interesting and lively.

The Society arose from the natural reluctance of the officers of the Revolutionary army to separate, after eight years common suffering and glory, without some bond of union. General Knox proposed the foundation of a society to perpetuate both these patriotic and humane sympathies, and General Washington cordially approved the suggestion. Baron Steuben was elected the first President-General, and General Knox, Hand, Huntington, and Captain Shaw drafted a plan for the Society. It was organized on the 13th May, 1783, at the old house, now the residence of Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck, on the Hudson River.

The Society was to be hereditary among the oldest male posterity, in the belief of republicanism is the nearest collateral branches. Its objects were the promotion of national honor and union—individual sympathy, and the relief of unfortunate and their families as might need it. The General Society was to be divided into State Societies, and into districts, and distinguished citizens might be made honorary members. It was to have an insignia called "the order of the Cincinnati," to be suspended upon a deep blue ribbon edged with white, in imitation of the national colors of the United States and France.

The emblems of the Cincinnati, which are borne upon the breast of a golden bald eagle, are "Cincinnatus three Senators presenting him with a sword, and other military emblems, in the field, on a back-ground, his wife, standing at the door of their cottage. Near it a plow and other instruments of husbandry. Round the whole, omnia relinquit servare rempublicam. On the reverse, sun rising; a city with open gates in the distance and an olive of nobility. Washington effected the abolition of the hereditary principle, instituting that of election.

The Society has languished of late years; but it has generally a place allotted to it in the Acts of July processions. Unless the ancestor of "Bastion" were a revolutionary officer—or unless he is the nearest male descendant of such an officer, he can probably not be elected into the Cincinnati.

MALE AND FEMALE.

If a man should receive a circular of a school for young misses, the proper answer should announce that a discourse of Mr. Everett's was a splendid specimen of male eloquence; or some impassioned Speaker should be alluded to as a model for male education; they would probably be reminded that education and eloquence have no sex, and that a farmer whose cow had just brought him a fine young bull, or his mare a young horse, might properly send the animals to the school on the ground that they were young males.

When it is necessary to use the word man, dear Bessie, do say man, and not male; for there are plenty of males that are not human. And so, also, when you mean a woman, don't say female. A cow is female.

Still further, Bessie, when you make a delightful little trip with your wife, and, alighting at the Fashionable hotel, proceed to write your name and her name upon the register, don't write "Mrs. Bessie Young," and not "B. Young and lady." What! Will you not be Mrs. Bessie Young somewhere, in traveling with you when young, and written in the book "Mrs. Young and gentleman."

Why, the Moral Reform Society, of Philadelphia, have denounced the hotel as an improper place. Mrs. Donald Bunny, let us hope, is both a female and a lady. But neither of those words, when written with a hyphen, necessarily indicate Mrs. B. B.

Suppose, Mrs. Bunny, you should be found traveling with Miss ——. Might be not have written with the hyphen to both upon the register, "Bessie Bunny and lady?"

MORE MANNERS.

A LATE number of the London Saturday Review, a weekly publication, has recently attracted some attention in this country by the bold and ill-natured article upon Dr. Francis's pleasant gossip about old New York, contains a notice of the North American Review. Of course the Rev. Mr. Toots's opinion is not of the slightest consequence; but he says truthfully of our venerable and respectable Quarterly, the North American, "The Review is the only periodical which represents British Quarterlies, and the English of the writers is very good. Many articles are of the highest order in fiction."

Where shall we find a more comprehensive unkindness than that?

SUMMER INNS.

WHITE ("the world" is rolling about in the hot months, trying to keep cool, it somewhat strikes that our inns—of course the most splendid, spacious, and convenient in the habitable earth—are sometimes a little more comfortable, clean, and picturesque. There are even men to be found who think that a fortnight or month in the more remote parts of the country, because they think of ——, and ——, which have been hard of in certain places.

There is a certain obscure ruralism who writes from England to the Springs, and who declares he has the following in see of his letters, which he will keep at home—that the people are not our own, our native land, may compare with his surroundings.

What on earth does the reverend gentleman mean by "sun-blistered, tasteless puggrary?" Does he suppose for a moment that a Yankee tavern is not a little Pavilion?

"Oh those English inns! how charming they are! The smallest of them is a perfect picture, with its redcurtains, rosy, and antlers, its arbors overhung with ivy and honeysuckle, and its trim garden out as velvet. You take off your pack, after a fatiguing walk, and it is written next to you, and you are refreshed in a clean and quiet around you. Every where through Wales I was charmed with this Saxon, and most painfully did I contrast the cleanliness and that there are with the sun-blistered, tasteless puggrary in which I have resented in my own land. Even in the Highlands, where I got into the wilder scenery, three exquisite garden and neat and tight Celtic maiden formed an exceedingly beautiful offset to the rigor of bleak mountains and savage passes."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"CHATTANOOGA, TENNESSEE, August, 1858.

"In your paper of 14th inst. I see a letter from 'A Spiritualist,' or 'The Perpetual Almanac, or Soldier's Every-Day Book,' or some such thing. Now, I'm a Yankee, etc., you say, 'When I count how many spots in the eyes of a pea-fowl.' Well, I'll count them are in a year.'

"Will you please let us know how and where you get the 365. And oblige MANY SUBSCRIBERS."

—The Lounger is delighted to learn that in Tennessee there are so many subscribers that he not know cards well enough to be able to estimate the collective number of spots in a pack. He longs to number them all. He thinks of Harper's Weekly, says nothing about the number. The estimate is a good one, and will be found correct enough. The Lounger, however, with his most respectful compliments to "many subscribers," begs to say that in a pack of cards there are two hundred and each six consists of thirteen cards, spotted from one to thirteen. Each of the four suits has thirteen cards in each suit, each having one spot. The total number of spots is, therefore, two hundred and seventy-eight, as a little skillfully applied Colburn, Smith, or Dabell will show. When, therefore, the Lounger counts the spots on a hundred and sixty-five, it is a fair presumption that his ready wit and sagacity in the invention of the little resource of the Perpetual Almanac of Almanacs saved him from a severe castigation. If "many subscribers" find this solution of the number of spots of cards, they might, perhaps, find one in some of the neighboring States.

"DAISY, PENNSYLVANIA, August, 1858.

"DEAR LONGUM.—Some years ago I have the pleasure of reading in your individual columns a very moral and very beautiful story entitled 'The Lounger's Wedding. Having received your permission to reply to this, I take the liberty of doing so. The remainder that said Mr. T. R. forgets that the private life of a public man is free from much criticism as the public life. An example: the very part with which we have nothing to do, and of which we have no right to complain, as I say. Bulwer, as well as other great men, is being of two entirely different characters—domestic and public. In it, forgets that the currents in the water in a great measure obscure our sight, and prevent us from telling what is actually going on down below. But to carry to further this brilliant figure, let me remind Mr. Timothy Bolitop that the long and brilliant career of Bulwer have never been carried toward the building up of this philosophy, false morality, or false religion, but have tended in a good degree toward rendering mankind wiser as by the powers which they actually possess for controlling actual passions.

"When Timothy Bolitop, Esq., speaks of Bulwer as Pope and writer, the reader will perhaps allow me to remind him that probably no two men differed more widely as man than the two which he thus places side by side. Byron, through his whole career, was constantly 'slipping his eyes on the public.' Bulwer, on the contrary, has never appeared to me in the subject that has been long before us, and even now, when he would apparently be justified in some degree public comment, his usual reticence prevents his from speaking.

"For me I am utterly in patience with Mr. Timothy Bolitop, the Hunter, and the coarse, and immoral. Where does he see it? Is it in the King Mather flying on the fields, with 'well and valiant upon his tip?' Is it in the story of the Broken Unsworded, which all the critics say was confined to Bulwer? Was it in Tremaine? Is it in the glorious reconciliation between the chained spirit of the high Honorable Asylum Caxton and the aching, longing, breaking heart of Harley L'Estrange? Is it in the Unequal Yoke? Upon what the moral sagacity of extremely civilized society? Is this the glittering, sparkling, world-like Timothy Bolitop and his fellow 'thoughtful readers' have found in his books? And all this from a valley-reader, envious of her lord's success, finds no other revenging than attacking him with bad words, and confronting him in polished meetings? Oh, Mr. Timothy Bolitop, I wish I was a hearing-school pupil again—I would like to give you them to say I do so!

"The profoundest scholar, the most popular dramatist, the most perfect novelist that now lives, or, in the last ages, that ever lived, is to be accused of glittering falsities, because he has not suffered our modern gnostics. Dear Lounger, my feelings have not permitted me to write very readily, as you perceive; but do say a word or two for the cluster of such noble monuments of genius and worth. Does not mean the morality of the Dunciad and the Rattegat!

"Yours, truly, J. B."

—The Lounger is glad that the Boarding-School has found a zealous an ally as "J. B." Probably Mr. Timothy Bolitop will recommend to his attention some views in the letter of Mr. Samuel Warmicloth, published last week. And might not the Lounger suggest to "J. B." what he said last week—"How can we help looking at the preacher's face?" If he can procure a cotton cord, how can we care for his homily against stealing?"

—On the perfumed wings of the most Allumbrated watered and silver-of-rose-lined paper comes Miss Fanny Ann Eliza Bell of the Lounger's male waif from the sea-side:

"Two young ladies, unaccustomed to the ardent embraces of every young man who honored them by an invitation to some ball, have lately been fond assistance of a couple of tips to sustain their lovely forms in the rapid agitation of the exhilarating and fascinating polka, and preferred to support each other. They flew around, and around, to the cozy of all the pretty fishes, who began to imagine some storm in view. Wearied and breathless, they stopped to rest at an open window. One of the gentle young creatures, with a look of thrilling meaning, said, 'It affects me grievously that I can not convey myself into a union with you, 'Helen fair,' and express yourselves after your sweet exertions.' 'Alas! why can you not?' answered the other in a tone of sympathy. 'For then I would strict your hand as the softest seat!'"

—The Lounger has received the note from "A LOVER OF FUN," in "G. G., Canada W." But would it not be fair to publish it? It seems to be genuine. If it be so, what amount of fun could justly its publication?

"PHILADELPHIA, August, 1858.

"DEAR LOUNGER.—The Atlantic cable is indeed laid, and we have received the congratulations of Queen to the President of the United States; but there is much discussion here in Philadelphia as to the grammatical correction of it. I contend that the words used in the message, 'successful completion,' are improper; I think, also in the Lounger's opinion on the subject. Please answer, and oblige a SUBSCRIBER."

—Compliance is not admit of dispute. Could there be an unsuccessful completion? It means accomplishment, and no work can be more than accomplished in respects fulfilment. It may be simply or wholly accomplished or completed, and it may be rendered void to the dissatisfaction of persons interested; but then that dissatisfaction in that the work is done at all. The cable could only be laid and failed. It might have been laid, and then it might not have worked; but the laying would have been successful, and the message incomplete. Until it was all safely laid, it was not completed, and of course was not a success, and until it did work the working is not complete and completed.

The same mistake is frequently made in using the word satisfied. Travelers write enthusiastically in foreign hotel books—" Mr. and Mrs. Tapp have lodged and lived four days; entertained with hospitality, and extremely satisfied with the hotel." Of how can they be satisfied with it? They may be surprised at its excellence, and that their expectations of what a hotel should be are answered, but that is not perfect satisfaction. It is obvious to prepper our sentences with random adverbs, and "A Subscriber's" question is worthy of being carefully considered.

"1220 ERIE.

"MR. LOUNGER.—Now that all the world is going crazy about the Great Eastern, and many would-be orators, who couldn't find a decent excuse before, are now availing themselves of the opportunity to say 'The Message,' we Sing Sing felt have followed suit, and had your editorial of 28th ult. read. The company had a celebration, fired off a salute of thirty-two guns—we have a steam fire-engine named either; in the hurrah that, it's a libel, and my I said no—and in the evening Engine Company had, as one of the indispensable packets and fire-crackers, awakened the echoes of our hills and hollows—not 'sleepy' one that evening. Excuse you. Speeches, and good ones too, we had, of course, from gentlemen of the fire, and of all classes and countries, including one from our respected representative, Mr. Brown, of Brownville, but after all, the great gun of the evening was the following choice sentence, which was handed to me, and which I send to you. Can any of your posts beat it? Eh! Mr. Lounger! If they can I'd eave to. Yours, SCRIPT."

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH!
the tune of Two More.

Come Johns and Brother Jonathan
And Listen to my song
While I relate a story to Nations dear belong
Of the Atlantic telegraph that Comes across the sea, with news from Queen Victoria
We gladly did receive.

CHUS

So Henry Henry for the telegraph and
Three times three shouts from the sea has Cuns
From England across the Atlantic fea.

Now this Atlantic telegraph excitement it does cause
But I hope and trust it will prevent us ever more from Wars
So let us now stand side by side and Join Both hand and hand
No Nation then that is under the sun our power can withstand.

CHUS

So three Cheers for those two Countries united may its be
And Success and Fame for Washington
His County be at free.

I now out Transit's exciter, the union Jack was flying on the Castle, and the Stars and Stripes waving on the Arsenal; and hear our unity keep good and from misfortune free we will thank the Lord that reigns above and Negotiations of the sea.

CHUS

So three Cheers for James Buchanan and may his health long and to this Country of freemen who guided it with wisdom's hand.

—Mr. "IRDAMIE BELLEDOWNE" writes, from Springfield, Ohio, a few lines of justice to Mr. Morse. But however slow this country may be in recognizing the valuable services of her children, when once she acknowledges them it is done without restriction. Mr. Morse is now no less sure of his American glory than of his European tribute. The Lounger wishes sincerely it might be doubled and trebled.

The "four lines" are Thackeray's, in his Song for Christmas:

"Christmas is here,
Winds whistle shrill,
Icy and chill,
Little care we."

"NEW YORK, September, 1858.

"MY DEAR LOUNGER.—In your letter of August 28th, in speaking of the Presidents and Queen Victoria's telegraphic production, you say, 'Here, in your unwinding paragraph,' good and grammatical.'

"I differ with you, and wish to know whether you support my difference. The President, in his speech, says silently in the country of the union, calls for a 'spontaneous' movement of the nations.

"Can there be such a thing, when the nations are summoned by the President himself in his message; and in such an expression 'grammatical,' in that connection, as you have used it?

"Yours, truly, TOM COLLEGE.

—Let me hear through your columns, if any one modestly presents my giving my address."

—Mr. C. GILMAN has kindly permitted any answered in the Lounger's reply to the inquiry of "A Subscriber" writing from Philadelphia. The President-Generalship is filled with the name's English.

—"BERLEDOWN," Portland, Maine, would not be flattered to see his verses in print. The Lounger does not think they are poetry. What does "BERLEDOWN" mean by "Rhyme and Reason?"

"But now thy reign is well nigh o'er,
And soon thou'll cease to be no more!"

He says grammar, but he does not rhyme.

—"IRELUE" communicates some charming albums verses, among which are the following:

"Stranger when are thou, leave you glance
Upon the page for me you love
For this book is held most sacred by the owner
So her it was presented to her brother.

"The vacant pages and the Dust
Are for her kind and generous friends
For them will be the Gratification of their birth
These thoughts to place ere they turn to earth.

"Sophia thy step so light as most thy form
On these pages may thy there stand as a mark of mem
Oh that every plate I'd gaze upon
Would speak as to me from thee."

—No, "JANET," Lenwood, Indiana, it is not poetry.

—"OPIO," from Louisville, asks, tenderly, "What can be did with Snooks?" who has been missing so long.

"—the blushing maiden, fresh from silent scenes of sleep, her cheeks tinted as with light, and hopeful as the opening flowers of spring, with eyes as soft and tearful as regardless of the sun-dad actor, and familiars as well with the bold, free and reckless gambler as with his jaded, sweet sister which, exiled from the rose, the jasmine, and the honey-suckle, is forced to confront an atmosphere which—when made to bear, I repeat, upon the blushing nobility—is intolerable as infernally unlovely she declares the worst object of her dreams, the shadowy ultima thule of her fancies, the most earthly filter of her sweet affections," etc., etc.

"OPIO" thinks it is Transcendentalism. Very likely.

—"DEAR LONGUM.—In behalf of distressed, much-abused young females, I appeal to you (when never appeal was made in vain) to expose the cruelties and heresies your mind upon some strange-minded women seeking to wrest from us a young lady of delicate nerves, globe-looking, and rather unsuitable temper, another for-ever-to-be-lamented Mrs. Caudle, but be at once to say it is that a girl can not laugh and be happy in the presence of any young man but her brother, without being called a coquette? Here is my complaint. A rapped-to-the-nines young gentleman and I lately met, but we thought 'coquetry to be part of a woman's nature.' We've taken the subject for our, dear advocate, and there seems no everlasting friendship. KATE."

—It must be that young men are so jealous of the smiles of pretty girls that, when any one of them sees another basking in that sweet sunshine, he thinks his joy by starting a rumor which he knows will compel the unfortunate girl to retire upon that youth no more. Dear "KATE" think the "herds of creation" in civilized society are less Saltans and Turks because their breeches are less large, and because they wear hats instead of turbans?

FACT, FANCY, AND FUN.

BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER.

PHILL THURMOND'S RESURRECTION.

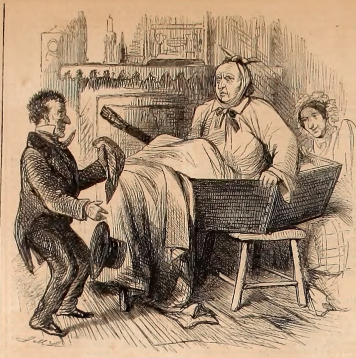
The lowest judicial tribunal in Georgia is the Justice's Court. Limited in its jurisdiction to sums under thirty dollars, it is enacted that parties litigant have the right to establish their demands and offsets by their own oaths.

The policy of this infringement of the rules of evidence is very questionable, as it gives the dishonest and unscrupulous a decided advantage over the upright and conscientious in settling those minor controversies constantly growing out of the transactions of men.

About forty-five or fifty years ago there lived in the middle part of Georgia an individual who was famous for availing himself of the aforesaid statutory provision.

No man could have been fonder of small lawsuits than John Ramsey. A little experience in early life had prejudiced him greatly against the higher courts (where he found the consciences of witnesses not so pliant as his own); so much so, that he determined so to deal and be dealt by that all disputes with his neighbors and the world generally should, to use his own expression, be "connisant" in the Justice's Court. There he could proceed without the expense of counsel, and be always provided with legal evidence.

John became so eminently successful in his own cases that he regularly attended "Jo Durham's" Court of 656, District of Maliba, Georgia, and carried on there a kind of steam law practice to some profit. It was curious to witness his prosecution and defense of suits. If he could not convince Judge Durham by quotations from Clayton's "Georgia Justice," "Prince's Digest," or the 7th volume of "Espinassy" (which latter authority he always left at home), he would deliberately take a swear at the case himself, and, as the marksmen say, "knock out the black." He became quite a terror to the young limbs of the law whose fate brought them in contact with him—so much so, that they would rather have met as opposing counsel Chief-Justice Marshall, then in his judicial prime.



John was always on the look-out for a lawsuit for himself or some one else. It was an invariable practice of his, when one of his neighbors died, to exhibit to the executor or administrator of the estate an account just under thirty dollars, and demand payment; upon the refusal of which, suit was brought as soon as the law permitted, and the money recovered as sure as the Court was holden.

Thus lived John, successfully squabbling with the living and robbing the dead, until Phill Thurmond, about the time of which we write, moved into his neighborhood, and settled within half a mile of him. No man, woman, or child ever lived in that part of the State without personally knowing or hearing of Phill. His facetiousness and love of fun were proverbial. And although he has long since been gathered to his fathers, and there has been no biography of him, yet he still lives in the legendary stories of the county in which he resided to all intents and purposes as if a Washington Irving had chronicled his deeds.

One unacquainted with Phill would, on first sight, mistake him for a plain, homespun-clad clergyman. At the date of the occurrence to which we are about to allude, he was fifty years of age, though his appearance would not indicate more than thirty-five. He was of common size, with a slight disposition to corpulency, exhibiting a remarkably clear, light complexion, with small blue eyes. His countenance, upon the whole, was prepossessing, and would have been strikingly so but for its very serious and almost solemn cast of expression. He seldom smiled, and when he did it was with a motive. It was his invariable practice, whenever he left home, to drink freely, which had no other effect on his intellect or countenance than to sharpen the former and render more serious, if possible, the aspect of the latter. It was really amusing, as well as curious, to witness the consummation of one of his plans or tricks. When the strangest and most ludicrous events (brought about altogether by his contrivance) would occur, and every one present was convulsed with irrepressible laughter—except the object of his attack, who would be boiling with rage or overwhelmed with confusion—there would sit Phill with a countenance that would have lent additional gloom to a funeral procession.

Although he was well known and dreaded by a certain class of the community, yet he was always welcome wherever he went. He had an unconquerable dislike to dandies, loafers, idlers, and persons of suspicious character. It was from among these he selected his victims. So deep, well-laid, and mysterious were his plans, the individual he doomed to public ridicule could never suspect them until escape was impossible.

Phill studied well the character of Ramsey, weighed it in the balances, and found it wanting. He laid his plans to drive him from the county, which succeeded admirably, as we shall soon see. He became exceedingly friendly and intimate with him; made Ramsey his friend as firmly as it was possible for the latter to be. While this neighborly feeling was at the highest, Phill, just at the close of a long spree he had taken at the court-house—where Ramsey knew he had been, and from whence had made several unsuccessful efforts to take him—pretended to die one night, after intimating to his family what he intended, and instructing them in their performance of the solemn farce. Accordingly, a shroud was made, and Phill laid out in real funeral style. He, however, carried into his shroud a good hickory cane with him. One of the negroes was dispatched in great haste to inform Ramsey of the mournful event, and request his immediate attendance. Notwithstanding John's many faults, he was a kind neighbor, and particularly so to Phill's family. Over he came, as soon as he possibly could, at the hour of midnight. With tears streaming down his cheeks, he entered the apartment where lay the corpse of his friend, beside which sat the disconsolate widow with her face buried in her kerchief to conceal her emotions.

RESURRECTION OF THE CORPSE.

"How are you, Mrs. Thurmond?" sobbed John.

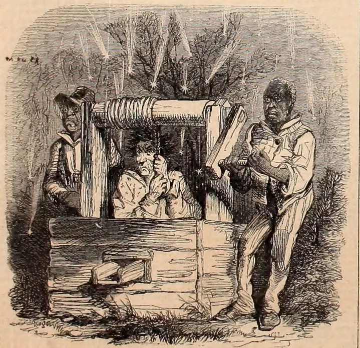
All she could do was to conceal her face more completely, and extend to him her hand—which act and silence John mistook for unaffected grief.

"Poor fellow!" said John; "how suddenly he left me! How slender is the brickly thread of life! 'In the midst of life we are in death,' the good Book says. Let me see once more, for the last time, the face of my best friend!"

Mrs. Thurmond removed the folds of the shroud, when John gazed through his crocodile tears upon Phill's face. Had he not been attempting to sorrow too much on the occasion, he must have seen that the features before him belonged to any other than a dead man. Phill performed his part, with the aid of a white napkin around his jaws, as well as a man of his appearance could possibly have done; his features were as immovable as if they had been carved in marble.

"Oh! oh!" cried John, as if the sight before him gave a new impetus to his grief, "how I shall miss him as a friend! how we shall miss him! He was a friend to every body, and the worst enemy to himself! He owed me just twenty-nine dollars eighty-seven and a half cents; but—"

"That's a lie, Ramsey!" said the corpse; and at that moment the only candle in the room was extinguished.



Mrs. Thurmond shrieked; John stood back aghast, the perfect personification of terror and alarm. His guilty soul trembled at what he heard; he believed it a solemn rebuke from the lips of the dead. But what was his dismay when suddenly up rose the corpse and made toward him! With the wildest energy fear ever inspired, he rushed out of doors and ran for home; but out rushed the corpse after him! The race down Thurmond's lane was run without any jockeying on John's side; for if he had any thoughts on the subject at all, he considered it his last race. About half-way the lane (and it nearly extended to Ramsey's house) John received a blow of no ordinary violence on his naked head—for in his hurry he had left his hat—and then a fourth, fifth, sixth, and divers smaller ones. Either of the six blows first received would have felled John but for his supernatural efforts. Near his own house Phill left him, and, while waiting to get a little breath, heard John rush violently against the door, breaking it open and falling midway the room, to the consternation and surprise of his family.

What account John gave of the night's adventure to his wife and children was never known, as they observed a dogged silence on the subject, and soon after left the neighborhood.

Some few days after the resurrection the parties met. Phill, with the most serious countenance the human face ever assumed, expressed himself to be under lasting obligations to John; for that in fact and in truth he was dead, but John's attempt to swindle his widow had brought him to life; and that he had always said that such rascality would make him "bile" even out of his grave.

John, on the other hand, declared most solemnly that it was a deliberate attempt on his life; that it was Phill's intention to kill him with fear or the stick, or both; and that if such things were only "connisant" in Squire Jo Durham's Court, he would make him smoke for it.

Whither John went no one knew exactly. But after Georgia had enacted a law which prevented Indians or their descendants from testifying against white persons, and had extended her jurisdiction over the Cherokee nation, Phill swore that if John was dead he would come to life and move among the Indians, as he would have such a fine chance in the Justices' Courts there.

"LET ME DOWN, BOYS, INTO THE BOWELS OF THE YETH!"

JIM FRANKLIN AND THE "FALLING STARS."

The meteoric shower that fell on the night of the 13th November, 1833, exhibited a scene long to be remembered by all who witnessed it. To the enlightened and well-informed it was grand, awful, sublime; but to the ignorant and superstitious, overwhelming and terrific.

Such a countless number of meteors never fell from the empyrean in so short a space of time before or since, the theories of Humboldt and Captain Twining to the contrary notwithstanding.

A few weeks after this grand display of fireworks Jim Franklin, or "Uncle Jim," as he was most generally called, was seen hobbling about on crutches, his lower extremities covered with a superabundance of red flannel. Jim's early educational advantages had been very limited. His learning from books and schools was contracted to the acquisitions of a few months, by a mind not at all inclined to study. But he had prospered in the world, and by raising cotton in the flatwoods of Elbert, where he lived, had accumulated a snug fortune. He was a general favorite in his neighborhood, and but for a slight habit of indulging sometimes too much in the "ardent," might be termed an unlearned, shrewd, exemplary man.

Jim was sitting with a number of gentlemen in the Petersburg Inn, his feet nicely adjusted in another chair, with his crutches across his lap, when some one inquired why he was working himself in shafts? Whereupon he explained: "You see we had at our house, the other night, a small sprinkle of what we honestly tuck to be the 'day of judgment!' It turned out we were slightly mistaken; but I assure you, if I'm any judge of small matters, it was a right good counterfeit of that great day, when they say there is to be a general smash-up. Many a one of us, for a while, thought it was the genewine coin, and, as the masons would say, 'conducted ourselves accordingly.' I tuck the wrong shute at the start. Now they say, 'Man purposes, and God exposes;' this may or may not be good Scriptur; at the latter end of my sperience I would call it good sense.

"I was suddenly wakened outin a sound sleep, not by Gabriel's horn, but a noise mighty nigh as loud, if not hearn so fur; wife, children, and niggers were screaming and hollerin' 'the day of judgment was come, the stars wur all falling, the world was burning up!' I sprung up, looked at the heavens; never seed sich procedencies thar before! Thar being no mountains and rocks convenient to call on to hide me, I tuck a bee-line with average ingine speed for the well, which I would say is nainety-two feet deep in the clear. It's the deepest hole in the ground I knowed any thing about. When I got thar I found Bob and Sam, two of my nigger boys, on a quondary which of the two elements to chuse. Bob, a bright molatter, was for water; Sam, an onmixed African, was for turning Sallymandy, and facin' the music. Says I, 'Boys, clear the track, and take hold of that windlass, and let me down into the bowels of the yeth as soon as the natur of the case will admit of; the outside is getting unwholesome, sure!' Then, without hat, coat, vest, pants, stockings, or shoes, I got in the bucket and started; they hadn't turned the windlass twice round when I hollered to 'em to slip the britching and let me slide. No sooner said than done, when I whirled, cur-slosh, nigh onto three foot in the water. No man could have made the trip sooner, ceptin' he had fallen in, and he'd had to tuck a far start at that!

"About the time the water settled round me, and I was kivered all but my head, I felt fire-proof, and calculated they'd have to burn low to git me! Now they say a man in a deep well, in the day time, can see stars. I allow them is fixed stars. The ones I saw from that well that night was travelers, cartain! Besides, if there was any fixed stars that night I never seed 'em. Some said they watched the morning star, and as long as that stuck they had hope.

"I made the boys draw me up several times, to see how things war coming on; but when one of them big blazing meturs would dart toward me, I would whurl down to the length of my cable. I soon foun' I had gone beyant what was comfortable; I got tired of playing bull-frog, left the water, and felt like taking the fire, no matter in what quantity, or whar from! I'll just say, right here, if any man should have hydrofoby agin fire, and will put himself through my pirformances in that well, and ain't cured, his disease is too deep for hydropathy. I put on dry clothes, tuck a stew of whisky and red pepper, but too late—the rumatics had me! So, in bracing agin fire I got busted on water!

"I wa'n't the only man excited on that occasion by a long jump. My neighbor, Sam Stuart, cum over next morning, and axed me how we stood the racket? He looked solemn as a preacher; said his dwelling had never been a house of prayer before, but if they didn't make up for lost time he was no judge o' 'ligous exercises. He said he and his crowd prayed nigh onto four hours; they hearn the clock strike three times while they were on their knees. He said, the fact was, they exhausted the argument, and he got up, and hadn't another word to say if the day of judgment had cum. And I'm thinking I'd cum out better if I'd relied on faith and prayer instead of sich works as I did!"

In this opinion the company concurred, and laughed long and loud at his narrative. When the noise of their mirth had ceased, some one remarked to Jim if he had been as smart and philosophical as one of his ancestors, Benjamin Franklin, he would not have been at all alarmed, and could have explained it. "I have hearn of him before," said Jim: "he war the fellow could go out, when dangersome clouds were surging by, pull lightning out 'em, sample it, bless you! and carry the keenest home, and put it 'way in bottles to speriment with. But he done this in the broad day time, when he were wide awake, which a man should be ydon be handles that article. But wake him up at midnight cotton a deep story, make the racket around him which were turned loose about me, and he kin cut all them stars a-falling. If he will set to cyphering out causes, and forget consequences, Solomon, and the other apostles the Scriptures speak of, war smart in their day; but they would be bowhar with our people and thar fixens! I was at Agusta t'other day, and seed a railroad-engine and train come a dashing in. Suppose old man Solomon had seen the like of that come snorting, tearing, thundering by him, what do you think would be his performances? The way he'd run into his timple, and slam to the door, lay low, and say nothing, would be a caution to his big family. Now Franklin, he must give it thunder, as he dealt in the article; but Solomon, not having the wharman never thought of sich things. The old gentleman Patterson's Island, dreamed of sich, or something like unto them. If Solomon's dreams had tuck that direction, it would have turned his proverbs into revelations, and might have confused the Scripture." Some gentleman here asked Jim where Patterson's Island was? "It's none of my look-out. I kalculate it's a fine place for dreaming; whether good for cotton, I don't know; but I would advise its owners to keep it hid out, lest the Anglo-Saxon specie mout take a liking to it, and claim it, in working up to their clear and manifest destiny!"

ATTACK ON THE QUARANTINE ESTABLISHMENT, ON SEPTEMBER 1, 1858.

Here a voice from without informed Jim his buggy was ready; when, by the aid of his shafts, he worked himself out of the room, amidst the hearty cheers and farewell of his friends.

THE BURNING OF THE QUARANTINE ON STATEN ISLAND.

ABOUT a year ago we gave in this paper a view of the then proposed fever hospital on Seguine's Point, Staten Island, which was burned down by the residents of the locality. We continue the pictorial history of the war between the Quarantine authorities and the people of the Island by giving, herewith, a picture of the ruins of the hospitals at Castleton, which were burned on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, 1st and 2d inst.:

THE RUINS OF THE QUARANTINE ESTABLISHMENT, ON STATEN ISLAND.

and a sketch of the collision between the Staten Island firemen and the Hospital authorities, at the Hospital gate on Wednesday night.

The history of the catastrophe may be briefly told. For years the existence of a quarantine on Staten Island has been a grave injury to the city and to the island; breeding pestilence on the latter, from whence it spread to the former with greater or less intensity; and occasioning every year yellow fever panics which inflicted severe injury on the trade of the port. For some time past the residents of the island, to whom the removal of the Quarantine had come to be a matter of life and death, have threatened to take the law into their own hands. The commission appointed by the Governor to remove the hospital had done nothing. The islanders seem to have felt that the occasion was one on which they were justified in abating the nuisance themselves.

About nine o'clock on Wednesday evening a large party, disguised and armed, assailed the Hospital on two sides at the same time; one squad forced the gate, and the other scaled the wall on the outside. The alarm was given by ringing the bell, and by other means; but before any effective resistance could be offered, the rioters had removed the patients out of the buildings, carrying them bodily up in their mattresses, and depositing them upon the ground some one hundred yards from the wards. The remaining mattresses were then piled up, and the torch applied in the whole row simultaneously; being of light materials, they burned like a pile of shavings. The incendiaries next proceeded to the large building called the St. Nicholas, and set it on fire; another party at the same time went to Dr. Thompson's private residence, where his family are residing. The inmates were hurried out, and in another moment the house was in flames from floor to ceiling. The Small-pox Hospital, situated on the hill, next shared the same fate. A stevedore was shot through the head. The harbor police were sent to town for assistance, but they arrived at so late an hour, and were so much exhausted by the long pull, finding besides that no assistance could reach the place in season to save the buildings, that they determined not to return until daylight. On this occasion all the buildings were burned except the long white building nearest the shore and one or two sheds.

On Thursday evening the incendiaries resumed their work, and destroyed every remaining building within the Quarantine wall. No lives were lost. The scene now is as depicted above.

Our second picture represents the scaling of the wall of the establishment by the firemen and others, in the teeth of the opposition of the resident officials and stevedores. It was a stirring scene.

LITERARY.

A PARAGRAPH has been going the rounds of the papers stating that the Earl of Carlisle has turned his attention to theology in his old age, and published a volume on THE SECOND VISION OF DANIEL. The statement is true, and yet not true. The noble Earl's book is not so much theological as poetical, though it partakes of both characters, and has merits in both lines. The book is a metrical paraphrase of the dream of Daniel. It commences with a fine passage:

"In that still hour, when the declining sun
Gilded the towers of mighty Babylon,
While from Belshazzar's hall upon the breeze
Came fitful strains of festal harmonies,
Apart to Israel's God I watch'd, and wept,
Till peace came o'er my spirit, and I slept.
Rapt in the vision of my mystic dream,
I stood by clear Ulai's royal stream,
Where Susa's glitt'ring palaces record
Th' unnumber'd trophies of the Persian sword."

Various as have been the interpretations of the twenty-third verse of the eighth chapter, none seems more plausible, and certainly none is more finely given, than this of Lord Carlisle, who thus interprets the vision of the king of fierce countenance, who "shall destroy wonderfully," and "shall destroy the mighty and the holy people:"

"The lab'ring centuries in long career
Weave their dark web of wonder and of fear;
The days of Rome's long glories wax and wane,
The vex'd earth moans beneath her guilty reign:
E'en at that hour, in Mecca's rocky cell,
The Warrior-Prophet frames his wizard spell,
Cons the dark sentence, and the mystic lore,
Then bids the nations tremble, and adore.
O'er all the slumb'ring myriads burst afar
The flashes of the Moslem cimeter;
The turban'd hordes of Araby advance,
Urge the fleet barb, and hurl th' unerring lance.
'Mid Egypt's temples, and o'er Barca's sands,
Copt, Moor, and Goth uplift submissive hands:
On Xeres' bank, and Andalusia's plain,
Cowers all the recreant chivalry of Spain:
Wealth sits enthron'd 'mid Cordova's high towers,
And Science dwells in soft Granada's bowers."

From the office of the Springfield Republican come many good things, and none better than the LETTERS OF TIMOTHY TITCOMB TO YOUNG PEOPLE, which are collected in a handsome volume, and published by Scribner. We have heretofore seen and admired some of them. They are gentle, affectionate, frank, and winning. They come from the heart and go to the heart. Listen to the concluding portion of the letters to young men:

"I shall see you some time. We are none of us to live very long; but if we all act the manly part we were sent here to act, and are true to God and ourselves, we shall be gathered into a great kingdom, whose throne will be occupied by the founder of our religion. During some golden hour of that cloudless day, sitting or straying upon some heavenly hill, watching upon the far-stretching plains the tented hosts of God's redeemed, or marking the shadow of an angel's flight across the bright mirror of the River of Life, I shall say something about these letters to you. I shall look you in the face as I say it, to see if you are moved to an emotion of gratitude or of gratification; and if you should happen to tell me that they made you better—that they led you to a higher development—that they directed you to a manly and a godly life—I should press your hand; and if I should keep from weeping, it would be more than I can do now."

Mr. Titcomb can not fail to be loved by his readers. The gentleness which pervades this extract is characteristic of his entire correspondence. The reader wants to see him, to know him, and to grasp his hand.

HUMBLE CREATURES is the title of a volume (published by Van Voorst, London) devoted to the history and description of the earth-worm and the common fly, two of the most common and most frequently neglected inhabitants of the animal world. The learned authors have made a most interesting book, which illustrates, on every page, the wonders of animal organization; and we commend it to all who are interested in such subjects, as a valuable and suggestive treatise. So much attention has of late been directed to natural history, especially to the minuter forms of animal existence, as illustrated by the microscope, that such books possess new value, and open to us new worlds of instruction. The simple and intelligible style of the book is illustrated by this extract:

"The next time you go out on your morning or evening ramble, if you chance to see a worm in your path, do not kick it aside, nor step over it; but take it from the ground, and lay it on the palm of your hand; and as it tries to crawl away, you will experience a slight sensation of roughness on your skin. If you take a pocket lens, and examine carefully the under side of the worm's body, you will perceive several rows of fine sharp hooks, extending from one end to the other, each annulated division (for the worm's body is, as you doubtless know, composed of rings) being furnished with four pairs of these hooks, which are situated upon small protuberances on the creature's skin. These minute hooks cause the rough sensation alluded to; and that portion of the body on which they are placed corresponds to the abdomen of the higher animals, the hooks themselves being nothing more nor less than rudimentary feet to aid the worm in its progress. It has, perhaps, never occurred to you to inquire how it is, when you endeavor to draw a worm forth from the earth, that it can offer such resistance to your efforts as almost to necessitate your tearing it in two before you can extract it; and why, as soon as you relax your hold, it disappears with such rapidity under the soil. These hooks are the cause; they are retractile at the will of the animal, and operate so as not to impede its onward progress; but when a portion of its body is once extended, and has penetrated into the soil, they keep it firmly fixed, while the remaining part is drawn after it by muscular contraction. Now, is not this a simple but interesting feature in the anatomy of the worm, that should be known to every one?—yet how few, even of the best educated, are aware of its existence! How many anglers, do you think, are there who handle their poor victim as frequently as we do our pen, and are yet unacquainted with this fact?"

A tablet of polished Peterhead granite is about to be placed in the wall at the head of Hugh Miller's grave, in the Grange Cemetery, Edinburgh. It is without any elaborate ornamentation, and bears the simple inscription: "Hugh Miller, died 24th December, 1856, aged 54 years." The tablet is somewhat similar to that placed over the grave of Dr. Chalmers in the immediate neighborhood.

The all-accomplished Cardinal Wiseman has made his appearance as one of our dramatic authors. A piece from his pen, and entitled the "Hidden Gem," was performed with éclat on Wednesday, at St. Cuthbert's College, near Durham, where he was educated.

Mr. James's new appointment as Consul at Venice is said to be worth about $3500 a year. It is to be hoped he will find as much to do there as did our friend Mr. Mitchell. We believe one American vessel arrived during his consulate.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

No message has been transmitted through the Atlantic Telegraph since our last, except one to Cyrus Field from the Directors on the other side, stating that they were preparing to open the cable to the public. At the present rate of speed the telegraph could hardly be worked profitably. On Wednesday the success of the cable was celebrated by a grand public festival.

THE PRESS AND THE TELEGRAPH.

At the dinner given by the Common Council in honor of Mr. Field and the naval officers, Mr. J. Brooks of the Express, in reply to the toast of the Press, made a fine speech, from which the following is an extract:

"Three great events, Mr. President, link the Old World and the New. In 1492, the world was only Europe, Asia, and Africa; and what of that world was not on the shores of the Mediterranean, was about all in Castile and Aragon. Then Christopher Columbus left the little port of Palos in his caraval, a coasting craft of some ninety tons, and landing on San Salvador, under the banner of the cross, handed over all America to Ferdinand and Isabella. The wind—the lateen sail, did all this. In 1838, the little British steamer Sirius, Captain Roberts, as bold as Columbus, ventured from the highlands of Britain, and, in spite of the wind, anchored off our Battery, before a multitude as astounded as if, in these dog days, the bright dog-star Sirius had dropped from its constellation of Canis Major upon that Battery. Steam then conquered wind and ocean wave, and old Æolus was hushed up. But time had only been shortened, and there yet existed space. Then started the conception of Field—then Maury and Berryman mapped out the bottom of the sea—then the genius of Morse—then the generous capital of New York and London princely merchants—then the glorious story of the Agamemnon, the Valorous, the Niagara, the Gorgon—not

'Gorgon and chimera dire'

—and time and space were annihilated!

"Now who can see, or foresee, the result of all this? Cotton, which boasts of being 'king,' feels in this extended electricity new pledges of sovereignty. Rice is exultant. Tobacco even is not without joy. Gold, ever glittering, glitters yet more and yet wider in the sparkles of the wire. But I see, or I think I see, it is the Printer who is to win the day, and through him, the universal RESPUBLICA. The Electric Telegraph is but another way of printing. Its business is Letters. It lives on words, thoughts, ideas—and is a pure spirit, in nothing material. Through it, and by it, our American Thoughts, American Principles, American Precedents, are to flash daily into the dusky rooms of St. James's, the glittering halls of the Tuileries, the majestic grandeur of the Escurial, the Austrian Schoenbrun, and the Roman Vatican. The minarets of the mosques of Constantinople, and the towers of the Kremlin are to be lit up by them. No Horse Guards, no Corps Municipal, no fiery Hun, nor wild Cossack, no crack of Minnie Rifle, no crash of Shell or Bomb can fence off this spirit, imponderable, invisible. The Cæsar, the Czar, the Emperor, must use it as they use the air all breathe. Hence then comes a mighty conflict of antagonistic Principles, an Equalization of Thought—the Fraternity of Mankind. Something is to topple over—but whose that something is, no Cassandra at a dinner table like this must predict."

THE YELLOW FEVER AT NEW ORLEANS.

A letter from New Orleans says: "The chief topic of interest here at the present time is the yellow fever, and the business connected with it is the most active. Doctors, grave-diggers, and undertakers are reaping a rich harvest.

"The business-like manner in which they perform their gloomy duties would shock the more delicate sensibilities of those unaccustomed to such scenes. To the credit of our physicians generally, however, be it said, that their attendance upon the sick is marked by the utmost kindness and consideration. It is only among themselves, or outside the sick chamber, that their indifference is manifested. It is only within the last week or two that the M.D.'s have had what they call a 'good run' of fever patients. At first the disease was confined to the lower part of the city—the Third District and the shipping, the patients classing 'low to low middling.' Now, however, it has spread all over the best part of the city, among the 'higher grades,' and begins to pay well.

"The doctor's fee for a yellow fever case is one hundred dollars, more or less, kill or cure. Persons are down with it from five to seven days. If taken in season, the doctor's attention is not required after the fourth day. One, two, and three thousand dollars a week is no uncommon amount of fees for a good yellow-fever physician. Such a physician will cure nine out of ten of his patients, too, and the cured patient pays his hundred dollars joyfully, for he now considers himself safe here, except from the ordinary casualties of life—safe to accumulate his fortune and move North; for comparatively few think of remaining here after having made their fortune, while so many pleasanter and more healthy locations may be selected."

THE AFRICANS AT CHARLESTON.

The editor of the Charleston Mercury has been on board the captured slaver Echo, and thus describes what he saw: "Upon clambering up the side of the brig, a strange and startling sight presented itself—a deck covered with native Africans in a state of complete nudity, with rare instances of a narrow strip of rag an inch wide around the waist. These people were seated, for the most part, with their legs stretched out flat or drawn up in front or doubled up; some squatted on their feet and hands. A few were standing about, and a few lying down; none were tied or fastened in any way. The majority were very young, apparently from eight to sixteen years of age, some younger and some older; scarcely one, however, over twenty-five. Some of them were able-bodied, good-sized, and in good case; but the greater part were half-grown children, only weak and worn. Many were much emaciated, and showed plainly the effects of their long and crowded passage in a confined ship. A few were evidently ill and soon to die. All were pure black in color, except the dropsical, whose skins were tawny from disease. Their hair is very short and crisp. Those who were well appeared curious and pleased, some of them ogling and giggling and chattering, and others smoking tobacco out of short clay pipes with cane stems, just as our own negroes do. Those that were thin and sick looked dull and brutish, but there was nothing wild or ferocious in their aspect. They looked amiable and docile, and readily obeyed the commands of the persons who had charge of them. They are great thieves, however, and appropriate whatever they can on every occasion. There were two hundred and forty-six males and sixty females, who were kept separate on deck and in the holds. The men and boys were kept on the forward deck and in the forward hold, which latter is fifty-five feet long, nineteen feet wide in the broadest part, and narrow at the head, and forty-four inches high, the floor being formed of loose boards, movable at pleasure. The hold for the women and girls is behind this. It is of the same height, twelve feet long and nineteen feet wide. Under this temporary flooring is stored the provisions, consisting of rice, peas, and the water to drink. Their food is boiled like "hoppinjohn," put in buckets twice a day, at ten and four o'clock, and placed in the midst of circles of eight or ten each, and well guarded, to prevent the strong negroes from taking more than their share, although they are liberally allowed. A pint of water is given to each morning and evening. Most of them sleep on deck, being placed in close order, spoon-fashion, on their sides, and not permitted to turn or move during the night. At daylight they are dashed with buckets of water to wash them off. They sing songs, clapping their hands and rocking their bodies in time, and these songs have a great resemblance to some of our negro spirituals. Several of the negro fellows exercise authority very much after the manner of our drivers, with airs of authority and ridiculous gesticulations and grimaces. Others were cooking the 'big pots' like good fellows, and with old breeches on too, obtained from the sailors. The captain of the hold understands their lingo, and says they are very averse to going back to Africa, as the United States law requires. Our coast resembles that they came from, and the group of pines opposite the city on the south looks to them like cocoa-nut trees of their native Africa."

DEATH OF REV. ELEAZER WILLIAMS.

"The Dauphin," alias Rev. Eleazer Williams, is dead—gone to the spirit land, where that mystery in regard to his parentage is made plain. He died at eight o'clock A.M. on the 8th inst., after a protracted illness. His disease was complex, but the chief was dropsy.

During the services at the grave no Indians approached; but, after others retired, about half a dozen squaws came up, looked into the grave, and turned away. No "warrior" paid the least attention to what was transpiring, nor did a squaw manifest the slightest emotion. Why was all this? Had the departed one ceased to be recognized as a "red man?" Was he considered "a pale face" by blood as well as by habit? Had he given mortal offense in matters of religion or civil polity? Or was it simply an exhibit of that stoicism characteristic of their most savage constitution? Let those who can answer.

There is no doubt that he suffered at last from the want of attention and other necessaries.

His habits at home would seem to have been reclusive.

The land and house where he lived are said to belong to a Protestant Episcopal Missionary Association in your city.

Intelligent and trustworthy people in those parts, who have known him long and intimately, with great unanimity believe in the Dauphin claim.

ANOTHER SEDUCER SHOT.

A letter from Fincastle, Virginia, of August 27, says: "Yesterday Mr. H. M. Bowyer, of this vicinity, walked into the Fincastle Farmers' Bank, and shot its president, Mr. James M'Dowell, Sen., inflicting three wounds, two of which are thought to be serious, and may prove fatal. After the shooting Mr. Bowyer walked across the street and calmly surrendered himself and pistol into the custody of a peace officer, who, it is said, permitted him to depart to his home in the custody and keeping of Captain C. Breckenridge. Mr. Bowyer remarked that he would be ready to return whenever called for. But little excitement prevails. The thing seems to be talked of as a matter looked for by many.

"Mr. Bowyer is, in all respects, one of our very best citizens—remarkably gentle, and courteous in his intercourse with his neighbors, and peaceful in all his counsels. These known traits of character in Mr. Bowyer invest the occurrence with an interest entirely different from ordinary shooting affairs."

THE GRAND FETE AT NEWPORT.

A correspondent of the Post, writing on 1st September, thus describes the fête: "The most magnificent entertainment ever given in Newport—always excepting Mr. Wetmore's fête champêtre of last summer—took place at the Ocean House last evening. The ball terminates the festivities for the season at this most attractive of American watering-places. I give its principal features. The first approach to the Ocean House as you arrive in your carriage presented a grand illumination—the piazzas all inclosed in canvas—cavalry from the fort acting as police—a gaping crowd of natives, no Brown—but one endless scene of arrival. You enter from the northern large door-way, and are soon in the long and spacious main hall. This is draped in pink and white muslin, festooned in various ways with greens, and lit by a multitude of wax tapers. Passing from this, you emerge into the grand dancing hall—and here you naturally pause before entering. The effect is perfect—like a scene of fairy-land, according to the most approved style of school-girl imagination. This hall is also hung in white and pink, but the flowers and mirrors are profuse. The chandeliers are loaded with choice flowers and candles. Beautiful decorations of various devices adorn the walls, and above all that mellow, calm, and recherché glow steals over the face as you enter, so highly favorable to the fair sex, and calculated to settle all differences between dress and complexion. By ten o'clock the rooms were literally crowded, and the sweet music of the Germanias soon brought to the floor the nimble-footed. While that delicious "Abby Polka" is being played, let us look around and see who in this vast assemblage merits recording either for beauty, style, dress, or ornaments.

THE LADIES.

"One of the most beautiful women here is a lady from New York, dressed in a plain pink moiré antique silk, with no jewels, no ribbons or flowers, hair closely cut and slightly curled, fine figure, dark eyes, bewitching expression, and yet retiring demeanor; she is really the centre of attraction, although not seen amidst the throng of gay dancers. Mrs. D——n, from Natchez, next claims attention. Very stately and fair, though careworn; and her young and fair sister. New York was represented by Mrs. C——k, Mrs. M——h, Mrs. B——y, Miss S——t, Miss W——p, Miss L——ge, and others equally as well known, and ornaments to society.

"From Philadelphia I noticed Mrs. F——tt, Miss R——n, Miss B——d, and more whose names escape me now. Boston, Baltimore, and New Orleans were well represented, too, in this array of feminine loveliness. Decidedly Miss R——n, from Savannah, must receive the palm for graceful dancing. The display of diamonds was not so profuse as I expected, but there was more simplicity in toilet than is usually seen, and the general effect was, of course, more attractive to the eye. In color, purple and lilac seem to have the sway at present."

WHAT CIGARS ARE MADE OF.

The New York correspondent of the Scoharie Republican, who, it may be presumed, is domiciled in the neighborhood of the Custom-house, gives the following revelation of the component materials of "real Havanas." We copy it for the benefit of those who inhale, or suppose they inhale, the fragrant weed. It shows the doubt which hangs over, not only what we drink, but also what we smoke:

"Talking of cigars, I was told, by a government appraiser, a few days since, the following true story in connection with the cigar trade of this city: A large German importing house had received an invoice of foreign cigars, which were appraised, by the custom officers, at three dollars per thousand. The importers were dissatisfied, and asked for a reappraisement, which was granted; and, under the most positive evidence, supported by the oath of the dealers, the cigars were admitted at a valuation of $1 50 per thousand. Now, the evidence alluded to was this—that not a particle of tobacco entered into the composition of said cigars; but that they were wholly composed of oak and other leaves, soaked in a strong tobacco lye. I understand that large quantities of these 'real Havanas' find their way into the interior; and, from some experience I have had in that line, I am inclined to believe that a few specimens might be found even among the primitive society of 'Old Scoharie.'"

A SAD AFFAIR.

We learn from the Troy Whig that a shocking occurrence took place a few days since at Sandy Hill, Washington County, causing the death of a very estimable lady who formerly resided in this city, where she had many warm friends. A niece of the deceased, a young lady, had been forbidden by her father to speak to a young man residing in the village, or be seen in his company. Disregarding these commands, the young lady, on the evening of the occurrence, took a walk with him, and was met by the indignant father in front of his residence. Angry words ensued, when the young man drew a dirk, although without any intention, as it seemed, to use it. The aunt of the young lady, who witnessed the fracas, was terribly frightened, and was seized with violent, spasmodic coughing, which continued for nearly an hour, defying all remedies that were employed. Her struggles at last grew feeble, until suddenly she fell back in her chair dead, having no doubt ruptured a blood vessel. The affair has created great excitement in the locality where it transpired.

WEDDING AT A PICNIC.

An amusing and romantic event occurred at a German picnic in Westfield, a few days ago. A cigar-maker, says the Republican, had long sought the hand of one of the daughters of Westfield, but met with continuous disappointment. It happened that both were at the picnic, and, amidst the other pleasures, some one suggested, in sport, that "we have a wedding." The lady unsuspectingly turned to her oft-discarded lover with a jocose invitation to join hands, and a magistrate, who also fills the office of town-clerk, performed his duty less in fun than the bride had imagined, as was apparent when the husband came with a properly made out certificate to claim her hand. It is said that there was a brief exhibition of tears, a very modest lingering between maiden and wife, and then a hearty acceptance of the hand that had been so gallantly but unceremoniously won. The bridal pair entertained their friends that night with Champagne and good things, and there was a bridal tour over into the West Parish next day.

PERSONAL.

The Philadelphia Press says: "The Canada mails bring tidings that Ex-President Pierce was, on the 5th inst., with Mrs. Pierce, at Hotel Bryon, in Switzerland, preparing to leave for Northern Italy. The health of Mrs. Pierce, we are sorry to perceive, does not appear to have been substantially improved."

The President has offered, it is said, the Spanish mission to Mr. J. P. Benjamin, United States Senator for Louisiana. Mr. Benjamin is now in the South, and it is not known if he will accept it.

A letter in the Observer, written from Westchester, says: "I regret to say that the venerable William Jay is now in very delicate health, and is probably not far from the confines of life. He has, however, reached a good old age, in the home and estate of his illustrious father, John Jay."

The St. Joseph Journal of August 26 says that Governor Stewart of Missouri was whipped by a German doctor named Erdman, at that place, on the Tuesday evening previous to that date. The Governor received a black eye. The Journal says:

"There can be no doubt about this fight, and we understand the Governor acknowledged it himself, but says the doctor commenced it. The doctor has told us all about it, and says it was on account of the Governor's insolence, and that his Excellency commenced it first. We understand the Governor was not at all in a fighting 'condition,' and the doctor is free to acknowledge that he was not altogether himself. But enough; the doctor says he whipped the Governor, and so say eye-witnesses, and we don't think it would be expedient to dispute, at least, the doctor's word."

Lord Napier returned to Washington on Saturday. He dined on Friday evening with Cyrus W. Field, in company with Captain Dayman, of H. B. Majesty's steamer Gorgon, and such other British officers to the telegraphic fleet as were in the city, together with several select friends of Mr. Field. The dinner was quite private.

William C. Bryant and family were among the passengers who arrived in the Africa.

The South Carolinian says: "We venture to publish the following extract from a letter recently received, dated Paris, August 5, and written to a friend in this city. The writer is, of course, well known in Columbia, and the names mentioned in the letter are too familiarly known over the State, socially and otherwise, for us to be charged with indelicacy in giving them in full.

"'The statements in the American papers in relation to the duel between Ransom Calhoun and young Brev[illegible] were so vague and unsatisfactory that I have been induced, since my arrival in Paris, to make some particular inquiries concerning the whole affair. Mr. Alan I[illegible], Mr. Robert Pringle, and Judge Mason, speak in the highest terms of Calhoun's conduct and bearing. I have [illegible] spoken with Colonel Pickens, Governor Aiken, and others, who seem greatly gratified, that, in a case of extr[illegible] delicacy and difficulty, Mr. Calhoun has borne himself with the manliness becoming his name and State, and the discretion demanded by his position. The immediate case was this: for harsh words spoken, Brevoort struck Calhoun. Calhoun challenged. Brevoort fired after time. Calhoun's second, of course, instantly and peremptorily declined further proceedings. Subsequently, however, the seconds chose to submit the matter to a board of honor. This board decreed that "Mr. Brevoort fired after the expiration of the time agreed on, and therefore the duel was properly stopped." The force and effect of such a decree is fully understood in our latitude. The second who would permit another meeting, under these circumstances, would, with us, be deemed particeps criminis to an assassination,' " etc., etc.

In Kansas, two weeks ago, Miss Irene Baker, a girl of seventeen, married a man of seventy-five, from admiration of one of his political speeches. Thus is a common and an old saying verified—"Politics makes strange bedfellows."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PROGRESS OF THE CABLE.

THE Times contains the following letter from the Secretary of the Atlantic Telegraph Company:

"I have the pleasure to inform you that the line from Valentia to Newfoundland is now working satisfactorily both ways. The following message was dispatched yesterday evening from the directors in England to the directors in America:

" 'Europe and America are united by telegraph. Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good-will toward men.'

"This message, including the addresses of senders and receivers, occupied thirty-five minutes in transmission, and consisted of thirty-one words. Immediately afterward a message from her Majesty the Queen to his Excellency the President of the United States, consisting of ninety-nine words, was received by Newfoundland in sixty-seven minutes. Both messages were repeated back to Valentia to test their accuracy, and were found to have been taken with great exactness. Of course, unless permission were given, the contents of her Majesty's dispatch can not be made public.

"This morning we have a message, the last thirty-eight words of which were received in twenty-two minutes, from Mr. Cyrus W. Field, who is at Newfoundland:

"It will thus be seen that the line is now capable of being worked with perfect accuracy, and the Company will now proceed as rapidly as is consistent with the establishment of a proper system to make the necessary arrangements for opening the communication to the public, in doing which, however, some delay must necessarily occur.—Yours truly,

"GEORGE SAWARD, Secretary and Manager.

"CHIEF OFFICE, 22 OLD BROAD STREET, London."

A SEA-GULL AND THE CABLE.

A very curious incident occurred when the paying out commenced in mid ocean. The splice had been made, and the cable was being lowered over the sterns of the vessels, when, a little before it touched the water, a sea-gull, fatigued, no doubt, after a long flight, perched on it, and his claws getting fast in the tar with which the cable was coated, he was unable to extricate them, so that he was dragged down under the water and drowned. He made desperate efforts to save himself, but to no purpose, as he stuck fast, and when he found himself going down his despairing screams sounded far across the waters. The strangeness of the occurrence, and the terrible agony of the poor bird, caused some sensation on board the vessels.

DEATH OF THE "LAST OF THE STEAKS."

The papers have lately chronicled the decease of Mr. H. F. Stephenson, Deputy Ranger of Hyde Park, and the Illustrated News has embalmed him, for the benefit of posterity, as the "last of the Steaks." Mr. Stephenson was, as this paper has truly observed, an illegitimate son of "Jockey of Norfolk," and was almost the sole wearer extant of Hessians. The reputed father of this contraband Howard deserves a few words of reminiscence. Penn, of Stoke Park, a strong Conservative, on hearing that the graceless Duke had left only a small sum to a very near connection (was this Mr. H. F. Stephenson?), made the following extempore epitaph on the Premier Duke at the challenge of the famous Lord King:

"What Norfolk has been you may learn from this placard;
He lived like a beast, and died like a blackguard."

The Duke, who was dismissed from the Lord-Lieutenancy of the West-Riding, in 1790, for toasting "the Sovereign Majesty of the People" at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, was a vulgar, dirty man, of the most eccentric and scandalous habits. It was said of this illustrious Whig by Dr. Richardson, that "he could swill wine like a Silenus, and gorge beef-steaks like a Buckhorse." "That portion of his existence which was not employed in political agitation and factious uproar was devoted to the debasing gratification of sensual appetites." Wraxhall says that he was so dirty that his servants availed themselves of his fits of drunkenness to wash him! When he complained of rheumatism to Dudley North, and declared he had tried every remedy for its relief, "Pray, my lord," said North, "did you ever try a clean shirt?" He always wore a plain blue coat of peculiar dye, which his confessor was said to have imposed upon him as a penance. Such was the first duke and the greatest Whig nobleman in England.

LORD BROUGHAM WITH A WHEEL-BARROW.

The Carlisle Journal thus describes the workmanlike style in which Lord Brougham went through his duties in cutting the first sod of the Eden Valley Railway a few days ago: "Lord Brougham received from the brawny navvy who stood beside him a neat spade, with which he cut the first sod, and threw it into a handsome mahogany barrow, which had been provided for the occasion. His lordship then, with a vigor as remarkable as it was characteristic, wheeled the barrow along some planks that had been laid for a distance of some ten or a dozen yards, emptied its contents, and then, in a truly navvy-like manner, turned his back, and pulled the barrow to the point whence he started. During the operation the most deafening cheers resounded from every part of the field. His lordship appeared to be much amused with his own performance."

FRANCE.

ROYAL ENDEARMENTS.

A correspondent writes: "I hear that the Emperor has not been so gay for many a day as since his interview with the Queen of England. His Majesty regards it justly not only as a triumph for his policy, which is more than ever an alliance with our country, but as a mark of personal friendship to him; and the personal friendship of the Sovereign of England is of inestimable value to the monarch of revolutionary France, especially when he is, as the Emperor called himself, a parvenu. As to the Empress, she, as I before told you, looks up to the Queen with mingled gratitude, respect, and affection; and her joy at seeing her Majesty again was consequently unbounded. Both the Emperor and Empress kissed the Queen on meeting and on taking leave. The Prince Consort, the Prince of Wales, and the Duke of Cambridge, on those occasions, kissed the hand of the Empress, and, with marked cordiality, grasped that of the Emperor."

THE EMPRESS ON BOARD SHIP.

The Court Circular says: "The fair Eugenie was fain to pause in the course of mounting the steps by which the deck was reached from the imperial barge; and her Majesty grew even paler than usual before she reached the top of the ladder, and was obliged to stop for a few seconds. The Duc de Malakoff, who followed close behind, was of signal service in securing the crinoline, which prevented the Empress's dress from being blown to the four quarters of the compass by the unmannerly wind abroad at that identical minute; and the awkward but gallant and good-natured efforts of the marshal-duke excited the greatest mirth among the members of the procession from the imperial barge, who, arrested in their upward progress by the serious position of the Empress, became witnesses of his great anxiety and its beneficial results. The two soldierly camp-kettle hands of the Marshal were taxed to the utmost by the rebellious spirit displayed by the crinoline, and their owner joined in the hearty laugh to which his unwonted perplexity gave rise. On descending, an accident of the same nature again arrested the vivacious movement with which the Empress—by this time perfectly recovered from her momentary indisposition—was regaining the barge. Her dress caught in one of the hooks of the ladder, and she remained suspended, as it were, until Madame de Lourmel came to her rescue. Both ladies gained much applause for the good-humor with which the accident was borne. All else went on pleasantly enough; and the oldest sailor on board could not but admire the courage and self-control of the Empress, who, evidently the very worst salt-water traveler in the world, managed most adroitly to conceal her uneasiness during the whole time she was an occupant of the state cabin of the Bretagne."

THE EMPRESS AT A BALL.

At the late grand ball at Brest the Emperor danced with the mayor's daughter, Mademoiselle Bezet, the Empress with the mayor himself; and Admiral Hamelin, Ministre de la Marine, was also in the set. The Empress's toilet was coiffure classique, nottes et bouches, diadem of diamonds, in the centre of which was the famous stone called le Regent; a necklace with three rows of large pearls, with a diamond clasp bracelet, diamonds and turquoise. Her dress was of blue tulle, studded with silver, with immense diamond brooches in front of the corsage.

THE IMPERIAL BABY PROMOTED TO BE A CORPORAL.

The Imperial Prince, who, it will be remembered, was enrolled in the 1st regiment of Grenadier Guards a few days after his birth, and who has ever since drawn the pay of a private soldier, has just been promoted to the rank of corporal. The following is the text of the order for his elevation:

"His Imperial Highness the Prince Imperial Napoleon Louis Eugène Jean Joseph, matriculated No. 3463, is appointed to be a corporal in the 1st battalion, 1st company, in which there is a vacancy by reason of the transfer of Corporal Prugnet to the 3d battalion of the 4th company. DE BRETTEVILLE, Colonel.

"VERSAILLES, August 14, 1858."

MISFORTUNES OF A NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENT.

The Morning Post is well known to be a profound admirer of Napoleon III., a stout advocate of his system of government, and a zealous defender of the alliance between France and England. That journal, as in duty bound, dispatched a special reporter to France to chronicle the Cherbourg festivities and to describe the "Imperial progress in France." The reporter executed his task in a way very flattering to France and the French people—in fact, in a way which ought to have entitled him to the special thanks of the French, if not to a cross of the Legion of Honor. But he was destined to receive a cross of quite another character. When he reached Auray, on his way to L'Orient, he was arrested by the gendarme who examined his passport, and taken before the juge de paix, an "obstinate, self-opinionated, pig-headed old gentleman," who insisted that his second Christian name (which appears to be Bernard) was his surname, and therefore imagined that he was the famous Dr. Bernard recently tried in London. In vain did the special reporter produce documents proving himself to be the correspondent of the Morning Post; he was kept in durance vile for four hours, and then, as a special favor, permitted to pay twenty-five francs for a voiture to carry him to L'Orient, and sixteen francs for two gens d'armes to guard him. At the end of a journey of five hours, he was taken before the Procureur Imperiale, "a middle-aged, testy, saucy-looking personage," who would scarcely listen to any explanation, and who locked him up in prison. Even under these disheartening circumstances, however, the Anglo-French reporter was consoled by finding something creditable to the French authorities. He says: "And a prisoner for the night I did remain in the Maison d'Arrêt. Of my treatment there I make no complaint, for I was put into a clean, tidy room, and was served with every thing I required; so that I can say, from my experience both of the police jail at Auray and of the prison at L'Orient, that if all other places of incarceration resemble them, they reflect very great credit on the French authorities." For full twenty-four hours he was kept a close prisoner, was then discharged without any explanation or apology, and without the British Consul, who is a Frenchman, deigning to give him an audience. His passport was returned to him, but the police commissioner refused to visé it, so that he was brought to a stand-still. In this dilemma he sat down and addressed a letter to the Emperor himself, "hoping that it may be permitted to reach him."

DINNER TO PROFESSOR MORSE.

A grand dinner has been given at Paris to Professor Morse. A correspondent says: "Rev. Mr. Seeley, of the American Chapel, asked the blessing. The chair was occupied by Hon. Mr. Preston, of South Carolina, a near relative of the former distinguished Senator by that name. The American Minister, Hon. Judge Mason, was on his left, and Professor Morse on his right. Hon. Hamilton Fish was one of the Vice-Presidents, and Hon. Joseph M. Chandler, of Philadelphia, on his way to Naples, as Minister, was another. Colonel James R. Murray, Mr. Aspinwall, Mr. Thayer, Mr. Rooney, Mr. S. Morse, Mr. Teft, and others from New York, were present. But few Parisians joined in the festival. Among the Americans present, who have long resided in Paris but yet retain their love for home in their hearts, is Mr. Monroe, the banker; Dr. Evans, dentist to the royal family; and Mr. Dale, who has extensive business relations with New York and Philadelphia. Dr. Bigelow, formerly of Boston; Mr. Squiers, who was Minister to Nicaragua; and many others, who are men of position and influence at home, were present, but their names have been forgotten. Nearly four hours were wholly devoted to sentiments and speeches, and at the close so great was the interest, and so delighted were all present that the chairman had to propose an adjournment, as it was then midnight. To be invidious, I might speak of the remarks of Mr. Preston, introducing Professor Morse to his countrymen, touchingly beautiful and eloquent. J. M. Chandler, of Philadelphia, was cordially received, as he is always an attractive speaker. Our Minister, Mr. Mason, brought down vociferous cheers, and Hamilton Fish delighted his countrymen, and J. S. Thayer, of New York, was warmly cheered for his impromptu and beautiful remarks. The applause was earnest, and afterward most emphatic, exciting among the hundreds of Frenchmen in the gardens and cafés of the Palais Royal most intense astonishment. The whole festival was nobly sustained and highly honorable to our countrymen. It was conceded on all hands, however, that had it been any other gathering but Americans they would have at once been silenced, if not dispersed by the police. Frenchmen are compelled to be very quiet at all their social gatherings, and but few of any sort are permitted."

MR. BRISTED FIGHTS A DUEL.

He adds: "For some time reports have been in circulation in regard to a duel growing out of the De Pène affair, between Mr. Charles Astor Bristed, of New York, and the Marquis de Galifet, which were so absurd, that I did not dare before now to speak of the affair. I believe that to-day I can give you the facts. You will recollect that soon after the De Pène duels with the officers of the army, two members of the Jockey Club, well-known men in fashionable society here, the Marquis de Galifet and the Marquis de Pommereaux, quarreled on the subject of the De Pène duels, and that a challenge passed; but the fight did not take place, it is said, on account of an order from the Minister of War—M. de Galifet being a Lieutenant in the Guard. On this subject, and in relation to the De Pène duels, Mr. Bristed made some observations in his correspondence to the New York Spirit of the Times, which was deemed by some friend of M. de Galifet, who saw the article, an insult to his honor. This friend carried the journal to the Marquis, and the latter agreeing with his friend that an apology was required from Mr. Bristed, he hastened off to Baden Baden, where Mr. Bristed is spending the summer, and demanded a retraction of the injurious expressions. Mr. Bristed refused, and was challenged by the Marquis. Pistols were selected, but no dueling pistols could be found at Baden Baden, and they fought with rifle-barrel pistols. The distance was twenty-five paces, with privilege to advance to fifteen. Only one exchange of shots took place, when the seconds interfered, and the affair was amicably arranged, but upon what terms I did not learn. Major Yates, of the British Army, and Mr. Munson, of New York, were Mr. Bristed's seconds."

A WARNING TO YOUNG FRENCHMEN.

The correspondent of the Times says: "Six years ago a young Frenchman, by the name of Michel, whose time had arrived for drawing in the conscription, and had been notified to that effect, emigrated to the United States with his father and family, and, immediately declaring his intentions there of becoming a citizen, was, at the end of five years, naturalized. With his naturalization papers and an American passport in his pocket, he returned a few months ago to France, and to his native village, and was at once seized and condemned to a year's imprisonment for his contempt of the law in escaping, and will be forced to draw in the conscription at the end of his confinement. He appealed to the American Minister, but the principle has been conceded, and the precedent established, by some unfortunate American Secretary of State, that no man can renounce his allegiance to his native State till he has first paid the debt of military duty he owes her; and on this absurd principle young Michel can obtain no relief. The moral of the story is, when you have once got to a land of liberty, you should stay there."

WHAT THE REVULSION COST PARIS.

The Paris correspondent of The Boston Traveler sends the following: "We have the official returns of the Paris Court of Bankruptcy during the crisis. The number of failures from the 1st of July, 1857, to the 30th of June, 1858, was 1016; there were but 760 during the same period, 1856-'57. The total amount divided among the creditors in 1857-'58 was 4,083,803 francs, and 5,657,442 francs are in hand undivided; whereas only 2,725,704 was divided in 1856-'57. The dividends, however, are larger for 1857-'58 than for the preceding year, since a great deal of the debts was commercial paper, then valueless, which has since been paid; whereas the debts of 1856-'57 arose from losses on grain, and were irrevocable. It is said the French loss by returned bills does not exceed 7,000,000 francs during the last crisis."

A NEW WAY OF RAISING THE WIND.

The following novel manner of "raising the wind" has just been brought to light at Rouen. A man and his wife opened a shop some months ago in that town, and speedily communicated to their neighbors that they possessed an aunt who, after having passed a disreputable existence in Paris, had purchased in Champagne an estate worth a million and a half of francs. Both husband and wife were eloquent in denouncing the immoral conduct of their wealthy relation; but they admitted that their scruples would not extend so far as to induce them to relinquish the estate, should it be one day bequeathed to them. By a singular coincidence, and as if to remove any doubt which might exist as to the elasticity of the said scruples, the aunt fell ill and died, bequeathing by her last will her entire property to the tradesman and his wife. Immense was the sensation created in the quarter of the town where they resided; and innumerable were the offers of service showered upon them by their disinterested neighbors. The fortunate couple bore their change of circumstances with comparative modesty, and they deigned to accept some of these offers. They decided, and the neighbors approved of the decision, that the aunt should be interred with becoming splendor. But the funds of the nephew were low, and it would be necessary to incur some unavoidable expenditure before obtaining possession of the property, not to mention the funeral expenses decided on, and outlay for traveling. The friendship of the neighbors speedily removed these slight obstacles; one man advanced the heir 6000 francs, another 1000 francs, etc., and even an offer of 300 francs was not refused. The man and wife left for Champagne, and brought back a hamper of wine from the cellar of the deceased aunt, which they distributed among the friends who had advanced them money. This proof of gratitude produced an excellent effect, and one individual advanced the lucky nephew a further sum of 1500 francs. But the lender ascertained, some hours later, to his consternation, that the supposed heir had secreted himself in another quarter of the town when he ought to have been engaged in paying the last honors to his departed relation. This roused his suspicions, and he determined to regain possession of his money. He presented himself at the nephew's shop, and, with an honesty highly creditable, protested that he had made an error of a hundred francs to the prejudice of the borrower in counting out the sum of 1500 francs. The nephew eagerly produced the bundle of notes, and stated that he had already spent some of them. The ingenious lender immediately seized on the notes, and placing them in his pocket, took a hasty departure. In the mean while the police authorities, having reason to question the existence of the estate bequeathed by the wealthy aunt, made certain inquiries, which led to the immediate arrest of the fictitious heirs.

BELGIUM.

HOW PEOPLE GET MARRIED IN BELGIUM.

In the sitting of the Royal Academy of Sciences, M. Quetelet read an interesting paper relative to the number and character of marriages that usually take place throughout Belgium in the year, and containing other statistics of a moral and general nature. The author presented the following table, which is founded upon an observation of the marriages that have taken place in the country during the last fifteen years. He gives 10,000 marriages that have taken place, with the respective ages of the husbands and wives.

MATRIMONIAL TABLE.

Age.	Men.	Women.
Under 21	219	880
From 21 to 25	1,647	2,626
" 25 to 30	3,386	3,016
" 30 to 35	2,120	1,655
" 35 to 40	1,181	880
" 40 to 45	669	488
" 45 to 50	369	253
" 50 to 55	199	116
" 55 to 60	105	48
" 60 to 65	59	21
" 65 to 70	30	8
" 70 to 75	11	8
" 75 to 80	4	1
Above 80	1	0
	10,000	10,000

It thus appears that marriages before 21 years of age are four times as numerous among women as among men. Up to 25 years of age the predominance existed still in favor of women; but after that age the number becomes proportionally less, and diminishes progressively according as the parties approach the last stages of life, when marriages of women are about one-tenth fewer than those of men of similar ages. The smaller comparative number of marriages of men before 25 years may not only be accounted for by the more precocious formation of women, but also by the nature of the social institutions of the country and the exigencies of the military service.

PRUSSIA.

MEETING OF QUEEN VICTORIA AND HER DAUGHTER.

A Berlin letter says: "The meeting between the Queen of England and the Princess Frederick William, her daughter, was very affecting. The Princess sprang into the railway carriage to her royal mother, and the two remained clasped in each other's arms for some time, unable to speak."

ITALY.

SENTENCE OF THE PATRIOTS.

A Naples letter says: "The sixteen prisoners who had received a commutation of punishment were sent for to hear the decree read in presence of the Grand Court. Accompanied by a company of rifles and gens d'armes, bound two and two together, they were taken to the courts, and remained so bound—a fact which was contrary to law. The President immediately sent for Nicotera, who was unbound and led into the private Council Chamber, accompanied by three gens d'armes and an officer. On his arrival the President said, 'It is my duty to exhort you to be grateful to the King, who has commuted your punishment, and I had called you, therefore, to beg you that if you will not yourself cry "Viva il Re!" after the reading of the decree, you will at least persuade your companions to do so.' Nicotera, who was greatly agitated, replied, 'We can not do it. Were we to cry "Viva il Re!" the echo would be "Death to Liberty!" Reserve for yourself such infamy, and leave to us the dignity of silence.' At these words the President, not knowing what next to say, ordered Nicotera to be taken out, and to be bound to his companions.

THE SCENE AT THE EMBARKATION.

"In the afternoon the Government steamer which was to carry off many of the prisoners arrived, and the inhabitants were soon after surprised at the sound of chains which were being landed. From the beach they were taken to the prison in three carts, while another followed with an anvil and three large hammers. The public executioner and his two assistants were called to iron the condemned; and on their presenting themselves they were chained in the following mode: The chain which bound them consisted of 16 rings, and was 4 mètres (or 13 feet) in length, and 16 kilograms (or 35 pounds) in weight; at each extremity was a large ring or semicircle, which was closed by a large nail 20 centimètres in length, and having a diameter of 8 centimètres at one extremity with the head, and at the other it was fastened on an anvil by a hammer. The right foot of one being thus fastened to the left of another prisoner, they can not move except by common agreement: and so they must do the necessary offices of life, not even excluding sleep. This scene of 'ironing' lasted from half past six to half past seven o'clock in the evening, and the antechamber at the gateway of the prison for the time wore the appearance of a blacksmith's shop. Four companies of rifles were under arms in different parts of the city, as though it were in a state of siege. 'In strong contrast with the agents in the scene just described,' said my informant, 'was a woman called Poggi, of Lerici, in the Gulf of Genoa, and mother of one of the prisoners condemned to twenty-five years in irons. This poor woman has followed her son month after month—her devotion might have melted the anvil on which the chains were riveted, yet her grief was insulted by the agents of power. Any one who had the heart of a man must have been touched at seeing that unhappy woman clasping to her bosom the son she was about to lose, perhaps for life, and kissing his chains, while with acute grief he saw that every blow of the hammer was like a dagger in her heart. During the whole of this time the prisoners conducted themselves as though they were enjoying a triumph. After they were chained and manacled, and further bound together by a long rope which extended through the whole line, they were taken between two files of soldiers through the city, and the whole length of the Marina, while all the inhabitants were horrified and quite panic struck by this barbarous spectacle. The subjects of this government are destined, it is believed, to Pescara—the foreigners to the Island of Favignana—while Nicotera, Gagliani, and Valletta are sent to the Vicaria, in Naples, and are destined ultimately, I believe, to S. Stefano. Another political cause will come on shortly at Salerno, in which between one and two hundred are engaged.' "

RUSSIA.

RUSSIAN MORALS.

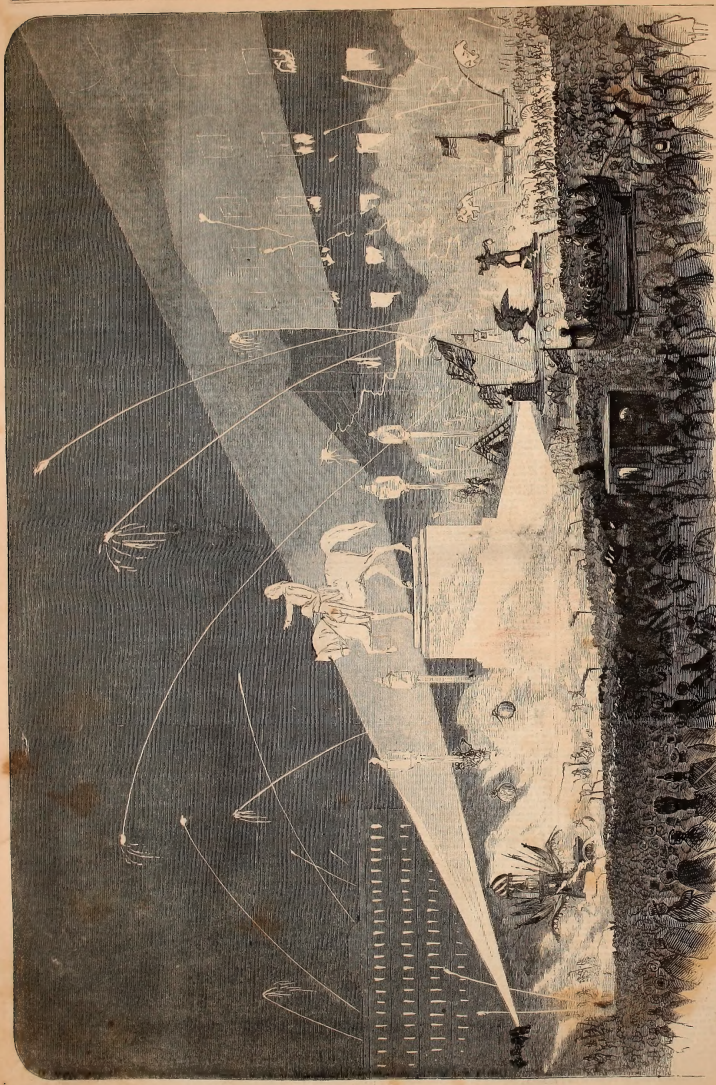
The Presse gives a gloomy account of the demoralization which prevails among the population of Russia, and which is encouraged by the financial system of the country. It appears that 480,000,000 francs, or nearly one moiety of the state revenue is derived from the sale of brandy licenses, and that the Russian peasant is ruined in soul and body by a decoction of river water, nitric acid, sulphuric acid, and tobacco juice. It is calculated, after taking into account the sum paid by speculators for their licenses, the amount which they are forced to expend in bribery in order to obtain the latter, the cost of the decoction which they sell for brandy, and the large profits which they derive from its sale, that the total sum sacrificed by the Russian nation to strong drink is not less than 800,000,000 francs, or 12 francs per inhabitant. Another Government monopoly, which occupies a considerable place in the budget is the sale of playing cards. "Play," says the Presse, "is as necessary to the existence of the aristocracy as brandy is to that of the people. Every body plays in Russia—men, women, and children. They do not play for amusement; they treat it as a profession—as a means of advancing in the world."

WEDDING OF THE CONJUROR HUME.

A St. Petersburg correspondent writes:

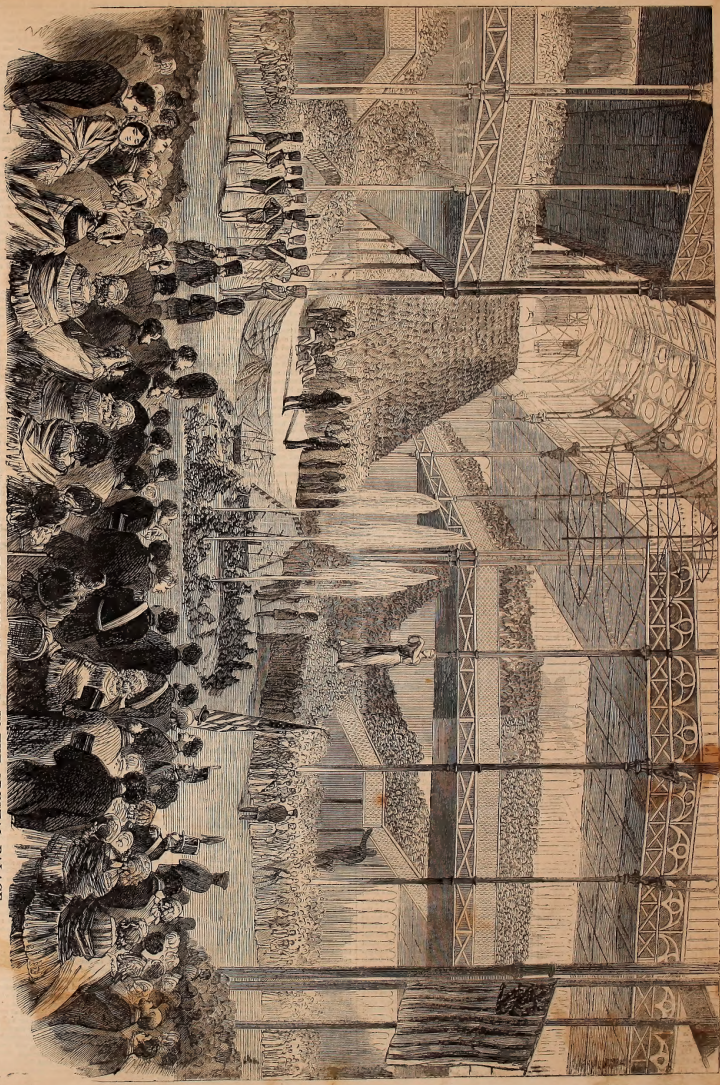
"Hume, the celebrated (or notorious) 'spirit-rapper,' has arrived in St. Petersburg. You have, of course, heard of this man. He is by birth a Scotchman, but is, I believe, a naturalized citizen of the United States. He created quite a furore in Paris, some months ago, and was well received by the Emperor Napoleon, who is said to be a believer in the 'science' professed by Mr. Hume. If the stories told of his exploits may be credited, Hume has performed some feats calculated to shake the judgment of the least credulous; and it is positively asserted that, in one of his exhibitions before the French Court, he 'evoked' the spirit of Napoleon I., who graciously presented his hand from beneath the table for the faithful to kiss, of which rare opportunity many persons present eagerly availed themselves. I suppose you have heard this tale before, as also the report of the impending marriage between Hume and a Russian lady of rank and wealth. It is this conjugal project which brings our 'medium' to St. Petersburg: but while he continues to assert that his magic powers are unimpaired, he refuses longer to exercise them, and intimates his intention to settle down quietly to the enjoyment of the good things of this life, leaving the other world to take care of itself. Malicious rumors have been in circulation to the effect that the lady had manifested a disposition to take back her troth, and that, par consequent, there would be no wedding; or that Hume would, at least, be obliged to go at the old trade, if only long enough to summon from the vasty deep some potent black spirit, or gray, to impress upon the fiancée the necessity of keeping her word. In the mean time the spiritual necromancer has coolly given the lie direct to this gossip by espousing the lady. The ceremony took place on Sunday evening last, according to the forms of the Greek Church, in presence of several witnesses."

TURKEY.



BOMBARDMENT OF JEDDAH.

The telegraph brings us intelligence of the bombardment of Jeddah, from which we learn that when the Cyclops arrived before that place a communication was sent to the Pacha, who was absent, giving him thirty-six hours' time to punish the insurgents. As no answer was returned within the specified period, the bombardment began and continued for three days. The Pacha then came on board of the war steamship, and assured the captain that the culprits were condemned, and that he only awaited orders from Constantinople to execute them. This answer was not deemed to be satisfactory, and the bombardment began again. Ultimately, Ismail Pacha arrived from Constantinople, and eleven of the insurgents were immediately hanged in the presence of all the shipping. The remainder of the culprits were sent to the capital for trial. The Cyclops then left Jeddah for Suez with the intelligence.



CHINA.

THE TERMS OF THE TREATY.

By telegraph from St. Johns we learn that the treaty concluded with the Chinese does not confer on the Allies the right of having permanent diplomatic agents at Pekin, but their Consul-Generals resident at Tien Sien will be admitted to direct intercourse with the Cabinet of the Emperor. A telegram from St. Petersburg says the Chinese Empire is to be open to foreigners, and the left bank of the Amoor River henceforth to be the boundary between Russia and China. Baron Gros, the French Plenipotentiary, is expected home from China in October.

ATLANTIC CABLE CELEBRATION—THE FIREMEN LIGHTING THEIR TORCHES IN UNION SQUARE.

ATLANTIC CABLE CELEBRATION—PRESENTATION TO CYRUS W. FIELD IN THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE FESTIVITIES.

On Wednesday, 1st September, the saddest fête ever witnessed in New York was given in honor of the Atlantic Cable. Broadway, from end to end, was, from morning till night, one monster procession; the houses were covered with transparencies, flags, and all manner of decorations. To attempt to describe the doings of the day would be fruitless and tiresome. We must refer to the daily papers for a full chronicle of the proceedings.

We have engraved, first, on page 577, a part of the procession going up Broadway. The point chosen by our artist was the passage of the Niagara's sailors. One of the newspaper reporters thus describes the scene:

"Another portion of the procession that came to for a moment was the battalion of ambulance men composed of the Atlantic Telegraph cabs, which was neatly wound around, and covered with, the car drawn by sixteen horses and flags and plumes. This important party carried with them no comfort to any of the portion. The fire-works were reckets, Roman candles, etc., which were judiciously cast into the bed of the car. The streets through which the procession marched were decorated as we have already described. But new adornments were added as the night wore on and enthusiasm rose. Almost every two or three doors was hung with colored lamps, and the fronts of the stores and the fronts of all houses were a great feature of the evening, and were used every where to the best advantage. They were strung in brilliant lines across the streets, festooned on the houses, hanging in the windows, and arranged in all the hundreds of pretty designs. The streets on the route were in a blaze of light."

Our third illustration, on page 585, depicts the procession, in the Crystal Palace, of a gold box to Cyrus W. Field, Esq., by Mayor Tiemann. The Palace was well arranged for the memorable event. The platform was erected in the central nave, commencing at the fountain in the centre of the building and running back about half the depth of the nave; in front, in the rear, and after this, in the side window, thus filling the entire space, and on this elevation the orchestra and singers of the New York Harmonic Society; the Brooklyn and Williamsburg Harmonics, Mendelssohn Union, and the Manhattan societies were seated. The whole platform was handsomely carpeted, and draped with the national colors—red, white, and blue. Behind hung the flags of England and the United States, and in the north nave a large green flag with a gold harp in the centre floated.

After singing Mr. Stephens's Ode (given in last number of the Weekly), the presentation was made by Mayor Tiemann, with a neat speech, which was handsomely acknowledged by Mr. Field.

We are happy to have it in our power to contribute our share to the important business of commemorating this great event. All honor to Field, and success to the Cable!

WHAT A RIDICULOUS FASHION!

TUNE—The Ship of the Cannibal Islands.

Now Comes all the rage,
With indies of whatever age,
A petticoat made like a cage,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
'Tis framed with hoops and bars of steel,
Or tubes of air, which lighter feel,
And when a girlie to be genteel,
Or if she've figures to conceal,
It makes their shapes all fairs for out,
A dozen yards, at least, about,
And passes both the thin and stout,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.

Balking walking all the day,
Always getting in the way,
All, except the ladies, say,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

One female takes up half the street,
And can't sit clear in any seat,
You walk half round about if you meet,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
Or in her dress you hitch your sticks,
And tear it, if you're walking quick:
Of Crinoline all men are sick.
It forces them their way to pick.
A carriage with half a dozen
If she rides in it, overflows,
And people short wherever she goes,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.—Balking walking, etc.

In Church she very widest new
Will hold of ladies but a few,
Its door their skirts protruding through,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
And when they go to seats and hold,
They fill chock full the largest halls,
And squeeze the men against the walls;
A man might with his wife more walls.
Am omnibus they occupy!
So that your knees are covered by
Their muslin, while you sofly cry,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.—Balking walking, etc.

There's not a door that's wide enough
For girls to pass with all their stuff,
Without a squeeze, particularly tough,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
The pests their spreading dresses scratch,
The beaux against the brambles catch,
And, what is worse, the Congress match.
They interfere with all dispatch:
'Tis tiresome to the last degree,
With held-up skirts, the ladies see,
Their ankles, it would seem, to show,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.—Balking walking, etc.

There was a time when every lass
Just wore a "bustle"—which might pass—
But now the former enormous size!
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
Before as bulky as behind,
By modern genius smoothed,
Just one point stretched we shouldn't mind,
To suit the whim of womankind;
But Crinoline is all we find,
It really is a deal too much,
And makes the contour woeus for fashion!
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.—Balking walking, etc.

How long will English ladies troop
About encircled by a coop,
Composed of whalebone, lace, and hoop?
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!
The more you scoff, the more you jeer,
The more they'll persevere
In wearing this apparel queer,
Which is in cost extremely dear,
In much annoyance to others,
Which every husband's patience tries;
The fashion not one man advises,
Oh, what a ridiculous fashion!

CHORUS.—Balking walking, etc.

MY AQUATIC REMINISCENCES.

MONY men are endowed with one peculiar hobby. Mine was that of swimming. It would, indeed, have been strange had it been otherwise; for I was, in a sense, brought up in the sea; my childhood and youth were passed on board ships—many of my after-life were passed in trips and adventures upon its friendly and familiar bosom. While yet a boy, I acquired for the ocean, for its waves and its sands, its shells, its pebbles, and its rocks, the most pleasant and familiar feelings. I was as fondly beach, a loudness and enthusiasm which made me long for the day when I should have a boat of my own. When but a child of five or six years old, with what delight did I not venture forth on the bay or upon the river, in company with a cousin of mine, a reputed swimmer! How I would pretend to be frightened, and, with a shout of an irresistible glee and an uncontrollable fear! By-and-by I grew taller and stronger, and could wade out beyond my depth, and, with a cry of sinking, and sprawling, and swallowing many a draught of the bitter brine, I contrived to get to bear my head above water, and to strike out boldly, and to look upon the blue sea with a sympathy unalloyed by apprehension, even if my own balance would toss, and fret, and curl with the crests of angry spumy waves. How I delighted in storm and the loud, leaving to my eyes no other prospect than the heaving waves and the overarching sky, or, perhaps, the phantom-like sail of a ship far away in the distance.

There may be many better swimmers than I am, but I doubt if any can be much more familiar with the waters than I—if any have more of that confidence in themselves which is the sure sign of mastery by long habit, and if any can more heartily relish an element which, of all others, is one of the most healthy, invigorating, and delightful. Often on a fine summer's day, alone or with a few congenial spirits, I have left the shore, and, with a careful dusk swimming to some favorite spot, occasionally coming to land, and, half dressed, lolling on a rock, looking at the sea, or the boats far off, or the sea-gulls, or criticising the aquatic feats of my companions, or engaging in sport, or even talking about in the water till the day was spent. Then swimming home became for me as a matter of such intensity that it will almost seem ridiculous to those who do not reflect that any, even the most trifling pleasure, if followed to excess, will pall well and by thoroughly engrossing one's thoughts.

I have often been, and had dressed, lolling on newspapers, very flaming accounts of the "heroic conduct" of swimmers who had saved others from drowning by plunging in again, and again, and rescuing them, and in the existing temper of my mind I had naturally come to look upon the necessity to imitate the circumstances under which this "heroic conduct" had been displayed. I knew very well that in the case of a child or very weak person falling into the water, it would be no very difficult matter for one of the strongest of swimmers to have her from drowning. It would be little more than taking a piece of wood or any light and unresisting object out of the water. But in the attempt to save a strong man who could not swim, consequently without presence of mind, his strength would be used, at best, to obstruct your kind services, or perhaps, in his frantic agony, to drag you with him to a watery grave. In the case of a man like them, I felt that the attempt would be no child's play. My reflections on the subject were generally concluded with a shudder at the very idea of an attempt to save a man so unwell.

At length I had a rare opportunity of testing my prowess. One day I was strolling about the only dock of the little town near which I resided, when my attention was attracted by a group of people crowded to the end of a jetty, shouting and throwing their arms about with that indescribable agitation and fuss which characterizes the do-nothingness of persons whose presence of mind has been swamped by undue excitement and confusion. I approached, of course, and many perceived that some one had fallen from the pier into the water, which, at that point, was very deep. There was not a boat to be seen within even a distance of a hundred or a hundred-and-fifty yards from the pier, and, with the fishermen all away in the offing. In the mean time, while a boat was being sent for, the surface of the water became ruffled, and the head of a man struggling with its properties. A rope was immediately thrown to him, but he made no effort to catch it, and sank again in an instant. By this time the boat was seen approaching, but at some distance off, and it soon became apparent that, by the exertions, screams were rendered, the man must drown ere the boat could reach him. He arose once more, but only for an instant. I should, indeed, have sprung in immediately upon reaching the spot, but there was an insulting reserve, and as the poor man very high from the water it would have been utterly hopeless for me to do so. Besides, the approximation of the boat, however, altered matters. If I could but suppose him for a minute or two it would be enough, and I threw three of my coats off and swung myself down into the water, holding one end of the rope which I had seized. The confusion, the bungling and agitation of the people on the pier, the rope was pulled from me; but once in the water, I resolved to delay, and deliberately struck out. If I can do any thing well it is diving; and down I plunged accordingly, but found I had misjudged the depth, and that I could not reach the bottom. I rose, and caught a glimpse of the boat, and of my enemy. This, perhaps, be attributed to my having dived too soon, and before reaching the spot where he had sunk. I was rather nervous, especially in a moment of excitement, it is most difficult to preserve a proper direction; but with every nerve on the stretch, I searched in vain. I opened my eyes, well accustomed to salt water, as wide as they could open; I gazed around me, and about; I went round and round; but the waters, overshadowed by the pier, were very dark, and I saw nothing and had no more contact with anything, and up I rose again. The crowd above seeing me unsuccessful, and probably not knowing exactly the spot where the water was rulled at a yard or two from me. I understood their meaning, and with a pang that almost dived again, in the direction they pointed out. By this time I had discovered that it is a very different thing from a matter of amusement, and on an occasion like the present. A strange buttoning of the breast, an intense nausea, overpowered me. I descended a second time. I kept as good a look-out as I could, but somehow or other the water was not clear. I could see, but could distinguish nothing at all. I persisted, however, for some time in my search, but at length, feeling it impossible to keep in my breath any longer, I threw back my head and rose upward, giving to the motion of my body, and rather gild, the power to be rid of it. I was already just near the surface; I could perceive the light of the sky through the uppermost waters—my chest was already gulping for want of breath; I had forgotten every thing in the paramount want of breathe, when—for I dare not express the horror of that moment!—my arms were suddenly pinioned to my sides by what was grasped at by two wiry arms from behind, and I was dragged forcibly downward. That sensation was indescribable. I felt as if my frame would have burst with emotion, when suddenly—as suddenly as I had been seized—I was released, or loosened; and I felt the wretch's arms beating about frantically in the water around me. I had as yet kept in my breath, but I felt myself assisted exertion, and my chest was relieved by a strong fiercely upward, and not quite enough, for the drowning wretch clenched my leg like a vice before I had reached the surface. The impetus, however, drew him along with me, and the second—one and only second—I emerged into the air, and had just time to turn my head to see the wretch sink, and disappear, without swallowing some of the bitter brine on when down he dragged me again. He now loosed me as he thought he would have me with me. I endeavored to tear his arms from me, but I might as well have tried to wrench off an iron bridle. I dived downward in hopes to rid myself of him, but he kept fast. I grasped the muddy sand at the bottom in my right hand, and, in the water, that was already dark, was made black, and I felt the wretch's face as I brought the hand downward. I made a last effort to tear myself from him, but no! he tightened his arms again; I felt his head burrowing in my neck, and his teeth gnawing my ear. Can I ever forget the horror of that moment? I could hold in my breath no longer; I have a vague recollection of catching him by my hands and attempting to wring to strange him. Then the water began to whirl, and I was conscious of a sensation, almost as a strange, indefinable sensation that felt as a relief—a sensation not unlike that agreeable languor and drowsiness that is felt on the verge of fever, when, too exhausted and weak to be sensible to delirium, the senses become benumbed and indistinct, and surrounding objects rock and swim around in the shape of trees, and fields, and fountains, and cascades, and of friendly and familiar faces. I became exhausted and half unconscious, like one drunk with opium, and a plaintive sound, something between the pealing of bells and the hum of a sea-shell, rang in my ears, and then it dropped lower by degrees, and finally ceased. I was drowned around me. I remember no more.

When I awoke again to consciousness I was in bed and at a friend's house. I then learned that when I rose to the surface for the second time I was spoken had arrived upon the scene, and that when I rose to the surface for the first time the people in it had endeavored to assist me, but that I had sunk again before they were able to do so. Some time elapsed before I appeared again, when a boat had been abandoned, and drags had been sent for. At length I rose to the surface in the dead embrace of my terrible companion. We were immediately taken out of the water, and no effort was spared to resuscitate us. My friend only was saved. The unfortunate man whom I had so risked my life for was a person belonging to a lying-in hospital, and in a drunken fit he had staggered into the water. When I found what manner of man it was that I had attempted to save, I was not aware of my own success. I was but too thankful that I had escaped with my own life.

It may be readily imagined that this event was a lesson which I did not soon forget. "A burned child dreads the fire," and a child-man such as may be easily supposed not to have forgotten it either. For some time after I did not even bring myself to bathe again; and when at length my old propensity began to return, I had the keenest horror of being touched by any one, and of having any one near me while swimming. I had become morbidly presumptuous—I had new grown ridiculously timid.

About a twelvemonth had passed away, and I had gone of shooting. Returning, if pleased I ever had been, and my squeamishness had entirely disappeared. One day in summer I was in a boat shooting wild ducks with a party of friends. I had dropped them all, with one exception, at their respective homes, and, with my only remaining companion, was sailing toward the point near which I was landed. A long, heavy swell was on the bay, we had spread all our canvas, and our little boat, heeling over on its side, skimmed pleasantly over the waters. The sun was now in the meridian fierce and unrelenting, and just passing a rude, half-built pier erected for the accommodation of the fishermen, my friend stood up, smoking a cigar, to inhale, as he said, the bracing evening breeze. He was beginning to expatiate on the beauties of the scenery along the shore, when a squall from the land hit us with its force, and, shaking it aside with a fly on one side, and my friend, losing his equilibrium, was capsized overboard. At first I was tempted to laugh, but the boat, heeling more and more, was bearing him away quicker than I could make the sail back toward him, and I saw he had already being no swimmer, lest his presence of mind, I really began to be alarmed. At once I changed my tactics, and, as he beat on the water for his anchor on shore, and jumped into the water, in spite of the heavy sea, at that moment at that hour of the day, was no joke. He was still above water, but must soon go down; and the distance was too great to swim ashore. I threw off my jacket, however, and when he sank I dived after him. "This," I said to myself at this time, did something of a misgiving—something of an apprehension that my fair fate to that of former days should again befall me—broke upon the mind of me. Instantly I projected very cautiously. The water was clear, and that was a great point. I could perceive my mate, to watch him from a respectful distance, and then, when in opportunity occurred, to seize him by the nape of the neck, and to keep his head out possible—to plunge him arms within my own, and then to land with my load. I was proceeding under water as stealthily as I thought this plan admirable, endeavoring at the same time to catch my breath, when—for I dare not express the horror of that moment!—my arms were suddenly pinioned to my sides by what was grasped at by two wiry arms from behind, and I was dragged forcibly downward. That sensation was indescribable. I felt as if my frame would have burst with emotion, when suddenly—as suddenly as I had been seized—I was released, or loosened; and I felt the wretch's arms beating about frantically in the water around me. I had as yet kept in my breath, but I felt myself assisted exertion, and my chest was relieved by a strong fiercely upward, and not quite enough, for the drowning wretch clenched my leg like a vice before I had reached the surface. The impetus, however, drew him along with me, and the second—one and only second—I emerged into the air, and had just time to turn my head to see the wretch sink, and disappear, without swallowing some of the bitter brine on when down he dragged me again. He now loosed me as he thought he would have me with me. I endeavored to tear his arms from me, but I might as well have tried to wrench off an iron bridle. I dived downward in hopes to rid myself of him, but he kept fast. I grasped the muddy sand at the bottom in my right hand, and, in the water, that was already dark, was made black, and I felt the wretch's face as I brought the hand downward. I made a last effort to tear myself from him, but no! he tightened his arms again; I felt his head burrowing in my neck, and his teeth gnawing my ear. Can I ever forget the horror of that moment? I could hold in my breath no longer; I have a vague recollection of catching him by my hands and attempting to wring to strange him. Then the water began to whirl, and I was conscious of a sensation, almost as a strange, indefinable sensation that felt as a relief—a sensation not unlike that agreeable languor and drowsiness that is felt on the verge of fever, when, too exhausted and weak to be sensible to delirium, the senses become benumbed and indistinct, and surrounding objects rock and swim around in the shape of trees, and fields, and fountains, and cascades, and of friendly and familiar faces. I became exhausted and half unconscious, like one drunk with opium, and a plaintive sound, something between the pealing of bells and the hum of a sea-shell, rang in my ears, and then it dropped lower by degrees, and finally ceased. I was drowned around me. I remember no more.

When I awoke again to consciousness I was in

I may as well relate here from what a casual accident the above somewhat vigorous, but very efficient plan of saving a man from drowning occurred to me. The plan itself is a simple one—it is perhaps the only one that is certain of success in like circumstances, but I do not think I should even have thought of it had it not been suggested to me by the merest chance. A few months previous to the incident I have just described I was bathing with some friends near a large and lofty rock, under which, it was asserted, there was a deep marine cavern. Numerous, it was said, had been the deaths by drowning at this particular spot, for many swimmers had, at different periods, attempted, by diving, to explore the cavern, and had been drowned in the attempt. The very danger of the place made me like it. There was an excitement in it, and we used frequently to attempt an entrance into the cavern; but none of us, I suspect, ever had the courage to proceed to any distance in the dark waters under the rock. To speak for myself, at least—I may say that I was indeed fond enough of diving down and looking into the palpable obscure before me, but I never relished the idea of trusting myself within it. We all, I imagine, contented ourselves with diving down, peeping in, and cruising about as long as breath lasted, and then, when we could remain under no longer, we would return to the surface, resolved not to be outdone by each other in the most circumstantial description of the formation of the cavern, and of the strange and unaccountable sights that, with a little stretch of imagination, we might reasonably be supposed to have witnessed within it—for in truth we were sad braggarts. One day, however, the matter was brought to a test. Tom Wilson, a friend of mine, and one of the boldest and best swimmers that I had ever known, maintained that he had entered the cavern, had explored it thoroughly, had ascertained that the stories of its depth were altogether unfounded, and that, in fact, it was nothing more than a large and unusual hollow in the rock. We were all, of course, very indignant at such an assertion. In fact it was a complete refutation of all our own imaginary descriptions of its depths, horrors, and immensity. Tom persevered in his assertion, and as we looked incredulous, challenged any of us who dared to follow him into it. I accepted the challenge, and, allowing him a moment's start, I dived after him. As I came to the dark mouth of the cavern Tom's feet were just disappearing into it—a little to my dismay, I confess, for I half doubted his being really in earnest. However, I followed slowly after him, taking a slightly different direction, so as not to come into contact with him. I had not gone very far before I begun not at all to like the sensation. I had quite lost sight of Tom, for the water, though limpid to the touch, was perfectly dark, owing to the total exclusion of the light by the overhanging rock. I fancied, too, that I felt oppressed, stifled, as if for want of air in so confined a place (such is the force of imagination), and I began to think of retracing my steps, the more so as I really was getting fatigued; and the slowness of my cautious progress having consumed a considerable time, my breath was becoming exhausted. I was preparing to carry my retreat into execution when my foot was struck violently by a human leg, in a manner not so easy to describe as to understand, which clearly denoted that the person who gave the stroke was struggling desperately and in danger. Of course, under such circumstances, one is wonderfully alive to the necessity of getting out of harm's reach, so I made my way as speedily as possible toward the glimmering light at the mouth of the cavern, and it was with no small relief that I emerged into clearer and more translucid water. My discomposure was considerably increased when, as I was springing upward, I noticed a thin streak of blood tracked perpendicularly through the water from the mouth of the cavern to the surface. This was soon explained, for on coming to the air I saw Tom floating helplessly, and faintly struggling, his head and shoulders bathed in blood. Before I could render him any assistance one of our friends was already helping him to the shore. Tom had fainted from loss of blood, and an infant could not have been more easily drawn to the land. He had struck his head against a sharp corner of the interior of the cavern, but had retained sufficient presence of mind to make his way to its mouth, which he had some difficulty in reaching. It was this incident which suggested to me the plan I afterward adopted. Perceiving how easily he was extricated from the water when powerless, I reflected that it might be possible to render powerless a man whom it was necessary to save from drowning, if the harsh but only available method of stunning him were adopted. But then it is not every man that will be stunned. I remember an amusing instance of this. Once, when the rest of us were swimming at some distance from the shore, a good-natured but simple Frenchman, to whom I had imparted my specific for saving the life of a drowning man, perceiving that an Irish gentleman was going through some peculiarly strange evolutions in the water, which he took for drowning, got into a boat, shoved it toward the Irishman, and began belaboring him with a cane. Our Irish friend, of course, did not understand this, and having hunted his persecutor out of the boat, had given the Frenchman the better part of a good thrashing before any of us were able to interfere. He was one, in fact, who wouldn't be stunned. But, as a general rule, the stunning plan is a good one, as must be evident from the facility of saving a man to whom has occurred an accident similar to that which befell Tom Wilson.

I will conclude these reminiscences by recalling the melancholy death of poor Tom.

In the summer following the accident of the cavern, a small party of us, of which Tom was one, made an excursion to an island which lay off some dozen miles from the main land. The day was warm, the sea was calm, and every thing passed off pleasantly. We enjoyed ourselves fishing and swimming, and early in the evening started to return home. As we were sailing along under a nice smooth breeze, Tom proposed to have one more swim. No one offered to join him, but we readily consented to lower the sail and wait for him. Into the water he went accordingly, while we availed ourselves of the pretext of delay to take a supplementary luncheon. Our boat drifted with the ripple and the tide, and there was soon a considerable distance between Tom and us. His head would occasionally be seen on the top of a wave, and then he would disappear in a hollow, but no thoughts of danger ever entered our minds. Some of us dozed, some smoked, some ate, some drank, some extemporized on the scenery. The shore stood up grim and stern far off on one side, the island lay indistinct and flat at about an equal distance on the other. At length some one took up a gun to have a shot at a sea-gull; off went the gun, and down came the bird, badly wounded, at some forty yards distance from us. We pulled toward it, but it was no easy matter to overtake it. After a good deal of delay we succeeded. But now we thought it high time we were getting home, and looked around for Tom, but nowhere could we see him. We were sure, at first, that he must be concealed behind the rising of the waves. We pulled toward where we had seen him last, but nothing was visible on the water. Here and there our boat glided, every eye meantime on the look-out. For two hours we continued beating about in every direction, but it was all in vain. Was it possible! Could we credit our senses? Had we seen him sink, it would have been, as it were, some consolation; but that he should thus vanish and "make no sign," was more horrible than could be expressed. We bore away at length, sadly and sorrowfully, from where our friend, so full of joy in the morning, lay now "unknelled, uncoffined, and unknown."

THE OUTRAGE AT JAFFA.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

WARE, MASSACHUSETTS. September 1, 1858.

SIR,—In the Weekly of the 28th ult. was a short commendatory notice of the conduct of "M. De Leon," in relation to the outrage at Jaffa in January last.

I was in Alexandria at the time he received dispatches from Mr. Gorham (United States Consul at Jerusalem), giving him the details of the affair, and asking his advice and assistance; and wish to bear testimony to the promptness and energy shown by M. De L., who, although the matter was not in his jurisdiction, went by the earliest possible conveyance, at the sacrifice of personal comfort and the risk of his life, to aid in bringing the perpetrators of the crimes to justice.

In striking contrast with his conduct was that of Captain Bell, of the United States ship Constellation, then at Alexandria, and the only American armed vessel in the Mediterranean. He not only refused to go to the assistance of his suffering countrymen and countrywomen—on the excuse that it was a dangerous coast—but as soon thereafter as he could get out of the harbor he left that part of the Mediterranean, and took his vessel to Messina. Had he done his duty, and properly supported the consuls at Jaffa, that outrage would have been promptly avenged, the lives and property of American travelers and residents been more secure, and the recent outbreaks against the Christians would probably have never have taken place.

Yours very truly, S. J. WETHRELL.

THE BEACH COTTAGE.

CHAPTER I.

THE sea-breeze was coming in at the open window as we smoked our cigars, lampless and candleless. The ladies of the party had retired (ostensibly), leaving us, as my wife informed us, to our Rauchstube (my wife was studying German) and our horrid conversation—"men are so disgustingly censorious when they get by themselves." So we sat gazing out over the moonlit sea, catching the breeze as it swelled and bellied out the muslin curtains, and chasing a desultory conversation as Grant prolonged his promenade to our window and Eyre could cease puffing to vouchsafe a word.

Silence held us bound until, after quite a little time, my eye or my ear happened to catch something—whether was it a rustle, or a flutter, or a bat under the ceiling, or what, who could say? But my attention was caught.

So was Eyre's.

I moved in my chair, and "decinerated" my cigar. A flounce, a skirt, a figure was finally revealed.

"Oh, Mr. Smith! I was looking for Mrs. Smith. Has she gone to bed? I was so—so lonely in my room."

"Mrs. Smith is a base, deceiving female," I replied. "She informed me an hour since that she was about to seek her widowed couch; but I have reason to believe she is at this moment indulging in unseemly rioting at the other side of the house."

"Oh, thank you! good-night."

[Exit Ghost, R. U. E.

Eyre gave a little laugh.

"Poor child!" I said, "she was afraid."

"Humph!"

"You heathen! You think she was trying to 'intriguer' you?"

"I know it," he pronounced.

"You are incorrigible—outrageous! What if she did wish to attract you (which I don't for a moment admit)? She wants amusement. But now!—pshaw!"

"They are all alike. Didn't I overhear Grant just now telling her, as he went up stairs, that I was sitting in this window? They are all alike. But never fear for me. 'I'm not to be had at the price.' Besides, I fancy she is too cool a hand ever to let her heart get away with her. She has it too well in hand. All the interest she will ever lavish upon your humble servant will never waste a pound of her dainty person, or take one shade of color out of those cheeks. How she does 'maneger' poor Charley Bayard! . . . . Shall we drive over to Hewson's in the morning, and arrange about this picnic?"

"By all means. I suppose the women will be wild about it. You won't have some brandy and water? Well, good-night."

The breakfast-table found Eyre and Miss Kennedy laggards. Charley Bayard had long since finished his breakfast.

Eyre came at last, and held the door open for Miss Kennedy, with a sarcastic look and an impudent expression of countenance for which he deserved to have his ears boxed—and I've not the slightest doubt she longed to do it. As they both arrived together they were forced to draw lots for the payment of the fine—fifty cents (for peanuts) and a conundrum—which was always imposed upon the last, but as she confessed herself bankrupt, absolutely beggared by her investments in the inevitable fair, he agreed to draw the short straw—or loan her the amount, if she preferred—on condition of her allowing him to put three questions to her.

No! She was perfectly willing to answer questions—oh, quite so—but she considered questioning impertinent, and didn't choose to submit to it.

She caught the twinkle in Eyre's eye as she looked up, and it prompted her to inform him with a hint and dignity quite disproportioned to the occasion, "that she was not aware what possible questions he could have to ask which could afford the slightest interest to any one." But her antagonist was deep in an egg, and oblivious to all but the charms of biscuit and coffee.

"Jack," he said, suddenly looking up, "have you any chills and fever about here?"

"No," I replied; "but, as the Illinois squatter said, they sha-a-a-ke dre-e-a-a-dful 'bout half a mile d-d-down the r-road."

"Then it is prevalent about here?"

"Rosalie and I have never had it—nor the children; but the servants, new ones especially, sometimes have a shake or two."

"Then you ought to warn your visitors. I couldn't but think last night (I was restless and wakeful, and sat smoking in my window until two o'clock), as I saw the mist rolling off the hills down on to the meadows, what a jolly night it was for Johnny Ague. Didn't you think so, Miss Kennedy?"

What there was so very discomposing in the question I do not know; it was a simple question enough, but Miss Kennedy was crimson in a moment—a rare weakness with her, and put down in an instant.

"Really, Mr. Eyre, I know nothing whatever about the matter—and care less," was her composed answer. "If you feel any curiosity upon the subject, I have no doubt you can satisfy yourself by a series of personal observations."

This last was given with peculiar viciousness, as if she wished he would, and catch the devil's own ague.

I don't know how the deuce it was—any other man would have considered himself most confoundedly snubbed, but Eyre went on eating his breakfast with remarkable placidity, and an amazing relish. He was an owl in regard to sleeping, and a perfect sleuth-hound on the track of a feminine peccadillo; the slightest clew was enough to give him the key to a whole volume. What could the man have seen?

Miss Kennedy, however, was not the woman to succumb to any one, much less to allow an impertinence (albeit covert) to pass unpunished, and for the next fifteen minutes Eyre was as delicately and cleverly, yet as thoroughly trounced as a man need be. I marveled at him—at the perfect stolidity and ponderous quietude with which he withstood the attack; a twitch of his mustache, or a flicker of the eye, merely marking the appreciation of a connoisseur at an unusually adroit or skillful thrust. I really think the man enjoyed it; and the cool and inscrutable eye with which he rewarded her as she finished was the sublimity of mute eloquence.

"Now, Mr. Bayard," she commanded, as she arose flushed, but only half triumphant, "I expect you to pilot me to that wonderful spring to-day of which Rosalie has been telling me, precisely on the stroke of twelve. She tells me if you look into the spring and count fifty at high noon, you will see your future husband looking over your shoulder."

This sally was received with a shout of laughter, and Charley was strenuously advised by the united voice of the company not to go, or to beware how he looked over her shoulder.

* * * * * * *

As Eyre and I were returning from Hewson's I managed to get out of him (I had promised Rosalie to do it), as we drove along, that Miss Kennedy had been talking to Charley Bayard at her window until one o'clock the night before; and he bespoke my assistance to get Charley out of the way, while he spoke to Miss Kennedy at the spring.

Eyre hurried into the house and got his gun, and started off for the swamp, muttering something about a woodcock; telling Charley Bayard by the way that his dog had run off to the village, and was safe to be awfully thrashed. A few steps brought him to the wonderful spring, and there, sure enough, was the naiad, busily contemplating something in the spring—probably the snails. With cat-like steps he crept up and looked over her shoulder. She started up, with a face of the direst bewilderment.

"Miss Kennedy, consider yourself under arrest; you are my prisoner, and I intend to incarcerate you upon that tree trunk until you have given me a promise."

"Mr. Eyre, I protest."

"Your protest shall be noted. Now then, will you voluntarily confess to all your sins and delinquencies, and plead guilty, or must I proceed to recite my proces verbal, and summarily indict you according to law?"

"Nonsense, Mr. Eyre; this is the height of absurdity, and I don't understand you."

"Must I proceed to read my indictment, and recapitulate my charges against you, seriatim et verbatim, or will you confess at once?"

"Mr. Eyre, I insist upon your putting an end to such a farce. It may be very amusing to you, but I consider that you are infringing the limits of politeness."

"The law takes cognizance of no such word, Miss Kennedy. I am here as prosecuting counsel, and in that capacity I summon you to answer the charges pending against you, and to show cause why judgment should not be passed. I ask you again, will you confess?"

"I deny your right; and once more—"

"I enjoin you to confess."

"I never will!"

"Take thought, Miss Kennedy. The confession will come with a better grace from your lips than will the accusation from mine."

"I don't know what you mean."

"You do. You know that you have lately, with cruel and treacherous intent, and with culpable thoughtlessness, so looked, and acted, and spoken, as to have utterly usurped and appropriated this poor boy, heart and soul. You have invaded his heart with a cold and pitiless intent, and having established yourself there, you are remorselessly torturing his honest breast for your sole and individual pleasure. He has not a thought, or a feeling, or a wish, but centres in you. He is no longer a free agent; you rule his thoughts, his brain, his impulses, as completely as you rule his heart. Is not this enough for your vanity? Or must you see him ruined for life by a disappointment at its very outset—dragging out a listless existence, embittered by the heartlessness of the woman to whom he has given his all—the first, best, and truest feelings of his heart. He is not even lucky enough to be under the necessity of earning his bread, which might suffice as an antidote to the benumbing effects of a disappointment. His is not the nature which could bear this with impunity."

"Mr. Eyre, I beg—"

"Don't ask for my pity, Miss Kennedy, for I have none to give. It is to you, and such as you, that women are indebted for the verdict of the world which stings them so. They initiate the evil by allowing a spirit of coquetry to usurp their faculties, and the 'lex talionis' prompts many a man to follow their example. See the evil you have done. Who will comfort this poor boy when he sees your altered manner; and when I meet him, restless and unhappy, and am forced to sit down, and take him by the hand, and tell him that he must 'go that way no more'—that his dream is ended—the play is played, and the curtain fallen; that henceforth he must know you no more, and banish you utterly from his heart? What will that poor mother say when she sees what you have done to her son; when he confides to her, with a boy's bitter tears, what has changed him so? Ay, you may sob, Miss Kennedy, but rivers of tears can not comfort that son and that mother, nor can years of repentance put that heart as you found it."

"Oh, Mr. Eyre, let me see him. I will explain all to him—indeed you are mistaken—"

"No, Miss Kennedy, you may not see him. That I will take upon myself. You can do him no good. My ministration will be bitter, but it will be wholesome; my knife will be sharp, but it will carry life; and he will need all his strength and all his pride to stand the shock."

* * * * * * *

What passed between Eyre and Charley I never knew, but the latter came home late in the afternoon, and went quietly up to his room, and began to pack his trunk I think, for the next I heard of him was a message, through a servant, that he must go to town the next day. I went up to see him and found him quietly putting up his gun-case and making his preparations for departure. He told me, with a proud but grave dignity, that his mother had been alone so long in town that he thought he ought to return; and then he wasn't feeling quite like himself of late, and he thought change would do him good. Poor boy! my hea[rt] ached for him, but he was always as brave as [a] lion. I did not combat him, but bade him God speed, only exacting a promise that he should co[me] down in the autumn.

Eyre was unusually taciturn that afternoon a[nd] evening. Something had evidently disturbed [his] wonted cynical indifference. Late in the evenin[g] as I was on my way to chain up Rory, I met h[im] coming through from the beach by the way of t[he] coach-house.

"Jack," he broke out, as we paced slowly b[ack] to the house, "God forgive me, but I've done a cr[uel] thing. I couldn't help it though. The boy [had] to be saved; but I must be a fearful hypocr[ite]. What right had I to talk to that girl as I d[id]? What is it that the Bible says, 'Let him wh[o is] without sin among you cast the first stone.' [I] sometimes think I am an awful villain."

A few days after the picnic we determi[ned] upon a grand spree. The whole party were t[o go] to town by the early boat, and spend the da[y in] the city.

If ever a vision of dazzling beauty floated [be]fore a man's eyes and stole away his sense[s, it] was Helen Kennedy, as she sat under the aw[ning] of the steamer that breezy summer morning, [with] her light flounces rippling in the wind, and pa[rry]ing the attacks of the men with a delicate and [un]affected coquetry. Poor Grant she was enti[rely] too much for; she had wound him up to a red [heat] of bewilderment and despair, and dispatched [him] utterly stranded and confused, to watch for Hun[t's] Point (which we had passed a quarter of an [hour] ago). It was amusing to watch her suddenl[y] set him with all the rollicking fun of a school[girl] and then look on at him hopelessly flounderi[ng in] the mire of his bewilderment, demurely p[ushing] him farther and farther in.

Eyre was sitting by her side as serenely c[alm] as if no perturbing comet could ever shoot withi[n the] placidity of his planetary sphere. Though h[e] but little, however, he was by no means unappreciating, and I think he thoroughly enjoyed her gayety, her spirits, and her fun—more than he chose to confess, perhaps—his mouth had a very quizzical twist.

We were all to meet at Delmonico's for lunch, and I couldn't but think as Eyre offered his arm to Miss Kennedy as they walked up the wharf together, what a confounded good-looking fellow he was, in his light summer costume, with his broad shoulders and his long mustache and his stalwart limbs.

A day in town in August is no joke, and a very hot party we were, as we sat down to table at Delmonico's, and consumed vast amounts of claret and frappèd Champagne. Rosalie and Miss Kennedy had been transgressing orders, and infringing their contract; for besides eleven bundles (by fair count) and a hat-box they had provided themselves with—a dog.

Imagine a dog in August—in the dog-days—a little dog—a little strange dog—a little strange dog who wept and refused to be comforted—and who, when not thus engaged, insisted upon picking a quarrel with all his friends. Fancy this wretched animal quartered upon our party in addition to the box and bundles, and demanding of its unhappy owner, Miss Kennedy, the greater part of her attention and the whole of her person for his performances. (She confessed to Rosalie that he gave her a huge scratch just inside her dress.) His first proceeding was to put his legs into her soup—he then insisted upon licking her face—after which demonstration of affection his ire was excited by Rosalie's bonnet which lay upon a chair, and which he attacked with fiery growls. He wound up his performances by having a grand battle with Grant in the middle of the table over a piece of bread, with one foot in the butter, and his tail covered with ice cream.

We cut a rare figure on our way down to the boat. Miss Kennedy's attention was fully engrossed by her dog, whom Grant, much to her horror and disgust, had discovered he could excite to a pitch of explosive frenzy by squinting at him, and he continued to repeat it at short intervals in the omnibus, highly pleased with the feat.

Eyre insisted upon playing porter and carrying the hat-box from the omnibus to the boat, and making himself very hot and useful generally; but the long cool sail and the glorious afternoon cooled all our grievances, and we arrived at home very tired, but very well contented.

* * * * * * *

The summer lapsed into autumn—and Eyre was with us again, alone.

CHAPTER II.

Charley Bayard had come down by the midday train, and walked over to meet us at Rosalie's instigation. He had come up the hill at my back, just in time to make a royal double shot on a brace of plover, and to spoil mine utterly.

Eyre came up as we were picking up the birds, and it did me good to see their meeting. If ever two men loved one another I believe they did. Such perfect mutual trust and reliance was beautiful to see! Charley was very young, but I don't think a shade of jealousy ever came between them. Their sympathies, their pursuits, their purses were one.

After tea I stood looking out at the sea and the drifting gale, as it swept through the pine-trees and thundered on the desolate beach—half listening to the low-toned conversation about the fire—half thinking some unquiet, restless thoughts. It must be a thoroughly young and strong and healthy spirit which can resist the depressing influences of such a scene, or not strike a note in unison with its dreariness.

Rosalie, who was reading her letters by the fire, suddenly interrupted me by breaking out:

"Oh, Hampton!" she cried, turning to Eyre, "Helen Kennedy is coming down to-morrow to spend a week or two before Thanksgiving."

Eyre gave a grim smile, "crossed" himself, and uttered, "The saints be atune us and harm!"

Rosalie laughed out, "You wretch, I'll tell her!"

"No; but is she really coming?"

"So she says."

I stole a glance at Charley, to see how he took the news; but his face said absolutely nothing.

Well, the young lady came the next day, and Hampton was deputed to drive down to the station for her. As he was about to drive off, Rosalie made a great parade of presenting him with a charm—an amulet to protect his susceptible heart against the wiles of the siren. Deuced little need of it, it seemed to me! It was a delicate little female affair, scented and perfumed, with pink satin covering, and all that; and he got strict injunctions only to open it when "the time came."

Something had come over Miss Kennedy—a change, a nameless charm, which made her absolutely bewitching. It was not that she was gentler, quieter; her spirits were as gay and her wit as lively as ever; but there was a happy light in her eye at times, a soft smile on her parted lips, which made her dangerously attractive. I abandoned her to the other men with a Spartan virtue; but even I, paterfamilias, was not too old nor too insensible to feel a twinge or two of jealousy, at which that much-enduring female, the exemplary mother of the little Smiths, would have been exceeding wroth had she known it. Perhaps the confinement to the house, inseparable from the deep wintry weather, may have quieted her spirits somewhat, but she never complained or showed symptoms of restlessness.

We had two or three delightful evenings with music and singing (she was wonderfully accomplished in all those things), and those sober, quiet talks which autumn is so sure to bring in its train. Charley Bayard seemed as happy as the day was long. So our only element of awkwardness was removed. No one would have supposed, to look at him, that he was a disappointed lover. No one would have surmised, to have seen him hunting the squirrels with all the zest of a boy on our long walks, or with his sandy head and broad-backed shooting-coat (none too free from rents) bent over a burrow and urging on Rory to scratch his poor little nails off and bark himself hoarse, that the woman who held his heart-strings in her hand was standing at his elbow, equally interested with himself. All her coquetry with him was laid aside, and her demeanor to him was charming.

Eyre was the only one who did not seem to abandon himself fully to the genial influence of the moment. He seemed somehow at variance with himself, and utterly unsettled. He was at times pursued by the very demon of unrest. No room was comfortable to him at those times; no chair could be found to suit his weary restlessness. He would wander into the room and sit down abstractedly for a few moments, and in an instant he would be off again—out at the door to look at the weather, or whistle to Jack and then shut the door in his face, and march in and take up a book and turn over the leaves for a while; then he would whistle to himself, and finally post off down to the beach for a walk.

At other times he would be all himself again, and full to overflowing of life and humor; and then he was the life and soul of the party. What jolly times we had when we all got frolicking like a parcel of children, the dogs enjoying the sport quite as keenly as the rest. Jack seemed to be Miss Kennedy's especial favorite, and it was as good as a play to see her sit and talk to the dog, and teach him all sorts of odd tricks, and quaint, outlandish ways which no one else would ever have thought of, while he would stand looking at her solemnly, with his head cocked on one side and his ears pricked forward, giving a sober wag of his tail now and then, or putting on a face of the most intense doggish wisdom. This seemed to be Eyre's especial torment, and he would sit in a state of ridiculous uneasiness while it was going on, looking at her and then at the dog, then changing his seat, and finally striding out of the house, well knowing that Jack would rush after him, and betake himself to his favorite beach walk. Once she tried to detain the dog, and had partially succeeded, when a shrill whistle from Eyre outside was too much for Jack's affectionate eagerness, and in his struggle to get away her dress suffered to a dire degree.

She was chagrined and annoyed. She felt it more than the triviality of the circumstance seemed to warrant, and after that she never attempted to detain him.

I came upon Eyre fifteen minutes after, on my way down to the boat. He was sitting moodily on a stone gazing out over the water, with Jack lying at a little distance. Suddenly he stretched out his hand.

"Come here, Jack, my old boy," he said. "Come and talk to your master. It's a d—d bad world, and the fewer we trust in it the better. You are the only true friend after all."

I withdrew quietly and walked on, sorry and pondering.

One day Rosalie met me in the passage, with her handsome eyes as big as saucers.

"Oh, John!" she said, "what do you think I have discovered?"

"What is it, little woman? A mare's-nest, I suppose, as usual."

"I have just found Helen Kennedy fast asleep on the sofa, and her pocket-handkerchief, soaked with tears, on the floor. The poor child has cried herself to sleep."

And she exhibited the flimsy little article in a most sorry and dismal plight to be sure.

"But that is not all. You know that rose-bud that Hampton gave her in joke this morning? She had that all crumpled up and laid on her hand under her cheek!"

"Whê-u-w! So!"

"John," and her eyes looked me through and through, "what do you think?"

"I think you must be a wise little woman, and keep your own counsel."

"What a wretched, wretched business! Who could have foreseen it? What can you do?"

"Hampton must go."

We were sitting in the billiard-room, smoking, a morning or two after, when Eyre was called out of the room by a servant. I never knew until long after the purport of that message, but its consequences broke up our pleasant coterie for the winter, and scattered the inhabitants of the Gestadehof far and wide.

"Miss Kennedy would like to speak to him a moment in the east parlor."

"The weapons rust for want of use, and they are to be tried on me," was his thought. "I know it, and yet I go. What weak fools we men are!"

I can imagine Eyre's face of pitiless irony as he entered.

"What murderous project upon the peace of the male community can I now assist Miss Kennedy in perpetrating?"

"Mr. Eyre, you were always cold—you have lately been cynical—you are now cruel and unjust. I have not sought this interview only to beg for a truce—to ask for a cessation of hostilities between us—but to ask for a little of your good opinion. Not even the strongest and most self-reliant of us can be always indifferent, and bear with injustice. It is a hard world to fight against, and I sometimes feel that I want sympathy—and help." Here her lip quivered. "Why can we not be friends?"

"I can assure you, Miss Kennedy, that my feelings toward you are of the most friendly nature," said Eyre, in his coldest tone. She felt that his face wore that look of stony impassibility which she knew to be as unfathomable as mid ocean.

She sighed as she gazed into the fire with a quivering lip, but in a moment she put aside the weakness.

"It is hard to be repulsed when one has asked for sympathy," she continued; "but I suppose we must all fight the battle of the world alone and unassisted. Each one is too much absorbed in their own private pursuits and interests to give much thought to another. But I sometimes feel as if I wanted assistance. Why do you dislike me so, Mr. Eyre?"

"Really, Miss Kennedy, you are fond of generic terms. Dislike is a strong word."

"You do—you dislike me thoroughly—and you do me injustice in many things where I feel it most keenly. Indeed I am not so bad as you think me."

"I have no right to constitute myself your censor, Miss Kennedy. God knows I am too great a sinner myself to dare to judge my fellows."

"You have not always held those tenets, Mr. Eyre. "You allowed yourself to judge me once, and most cruelly and unrelentingly did you do it."

"It was like the surgeon and his knife, Miss Kennedy: the stroke must be made, though the flesh quivers."

"But you misconstrued me utterly."

"I acted according to the best of my knowledge and belief."

"May you not have been mistaken?"

"I think not."

"Mr. Bayard bears none of the marks of a rejected suitor."

"That, Miss Kennedy, is owing to the innate strength and manliness of his noble heart. He is as incapable of cherishing a malicious thought as was his chivalrous namesake. I have reason to know that many and bitter are the hours of suffering you have cost him."

"You may be right; and one day I trust I shall be allowed to crave his forgiveness. But may not your conclusions have been based upon false premises?"

"How?"

"I may confess it now. I might have loved Mr. Bayard—should have loved him—had you not withdrawn him. I thank you for it now; I can see that it was wisely done for both of us. He never—noble, and true, and manly as he is—he never could have insured my happiness. He was too young—too near my own age—to have commanded the respect which I should wish to feel."

"And you were really interested in him?"

"Be generous, Mr. Eyre. Do not abuse the advantage I have given you. Rest assured that you did me cruel injustice. Whatever may have been my thoughts and feelings, I was not the heartless coquette you imagined me. Can you not believe it?" she asked, with a piteous smile.

Whether it was the smile, or the tone, or a weakness which he shrank from acknowledging even to himself, his face changed to the coldest impassibility, and the smile with which he prefaced his next sentence was one of glittering irony.

"Miss Kennedy, we are both of us too old in the ways of the world to be the dupes of one another. Such a farce is utterly profitless. Rest assured that I accord you the most sincere admiration and full appreciation of your consummate tact and rare attractions; but I am the dupe neither of my own vanity nor of your finesse. If I err, it is with my eyes open and consenting."

She sat gazing at him for a few moments, white and still, and not a word came to her; and then, with an unconscious movement which brought half a sigh and half a sob, she turned herself to the fire, and was silent.

Eyre was pitiless—as he was even to himself. It was part of his nature; he could not help it. He was unrelenting even in his very pleasures; and many a time have I seen him ride through wind and rain and storm for the attainment of an insignificant object, which was valueless as soon as obtained. But he was pitiless ten-fold when he felt himself the victim of deceit.

"Is my audience at an end, Miss Kennedy?"

He had to wait long for an answer. It finally came, in a stifled voice.

"It is, Mr. Eyre. . . . . I had hoped to have justified myself—to have earned your respect—but that is all over now." And then the bitter tears came unrestrained and overflowing.

Eyre had seen tears before—bitter tears of agony and remorse and shame—and his stern nature had never relented; no hesitation or weakness had ever come to him then. Why did he hesitate now?

But he did hesitate, and stood still—waiting until the storm should have passed, and the lull succeeded.

She wept on, utterly unmindful of him, until her tears were exhausted—more and more quietly as relief came to her; and then she sat, with brimming eyes, gazing into the fire.

"I don't know, Miss Kennedy," he said, hesitatingly; "I suppose I must ask your pardon if I have done you injustice, but what can I do. I have been brought up in a hard school, and it has taught me to trust no one, to suspect all men, and to reject whatever comes to me in an alluring or seductive guise. It may be the consciousness of my own weakness, but I must guard it the more jealously—it may be that I go too far, but I err upon the safe side. Heretofore life has but too thoroughly justified my convictions. As yet I have never met with truth, I have never met with honor, I have never met with friendship which put to the test save once—though that noble instance goes far to redeem all. I have had a bitter experience, Miss Kennedy, of which the world knows but little, and out of my weariness I often ask myself, cui bono?"

"And yet you seem happy or careless. I often envy you your weighty calm, your strong, healthy, self-reliant nature. I doubt if any ordinary shock could ever move you, if any unwonted influence could ever disturb the tenor of your life. You never feel the want of a friend to guide and counsel you."

"I have learned the folly of it."

"But I have not, Mr. Eyre. Why can you not be a friend to me?" she asked, holding out her hand beseechingly, and with quivering lips.

Eyre's color forsook him for an instant, and he walked to the window. Her eyes followed him sadly but tearlessly.

"Is it possible that your antipathy can be so strong?" she murmured. "What can I have done to have repelled you so. Can I be so unamiable, so inestimable that I never can know a true friend?" and her eyes filled with hot tears of bitter regret.

Eyre struggled long and manfully, as he stood with the impetuous surging rush of passion, the hot and fiery impulse of lusty youth, and when at last he turned, the knotted veins were standing out upon his forehead.

"Do not try me too sorely, Miss Kennedy. Do not abuse your power, and trample me utterly into the dust. I am a man, and I share the weakness of men." Then all the barriers of his reserve and caution seemed to give way, and he was swept onward by the impetuous torrent of his love, carrying with it thought, memory, prudence, right—all were swept away. "Yes I, Miss Kennedy—I who have prided myself upon my indifference, my coldness, and my caution—I, old in the ways of the world and despising it, too wary for its wiles, too strong for its allurements; I, Miss Kennedy—hear it, and add it to the triumphs of your vanity—I have succumbed to your fascinations, I have surrendered to a woman! Laugh at me, point at me, say I deserve it! I acknowledge it, and that I have walked into the snare knowingly, weakly, and with my eyes open. Let me confess it now, and make my discomfiture complete. I will humble my pride to the dust. Many a time have I sat in the hall below by the hour together, listening for the sound of your footstep above, thinking myself doubly repaid if I but caught the rustle of your dress. Yes, blind, infatuated idiot that I was, I have walked behind you and plucked the flowers that your dress has brushed against, and fondled Jack in secret for the caresses you had bestowed upon him. I have sat in my window at night watching the light from your window upon the grass and the shadows crossing it, and have walked my room till daylight listening if you stirred. I am a precious dolt, am I not?"

Miss Kennedy sat with clasped hands and parted lips, the hue of all the roses glowing in her cheek; a startled, joyful light shining in her eyes.

"Oh, Hampton!"

That was all she said; a simple word enough, but the tone thrilled to the remotest fibres of his frame. For one single instant he stood drinking in the intoxicating delirium, the next he strode to the mantle-piece and buried his head in his arms with a groan.

Miss Kennedy started up to approach him, but he motioned her away.

"Spare me, Miss Kennedy, spare me, spare me!" he groaned. God help me! I am a wretched unfortunate; I have a wife who has been an inmate of a maison de santé these eight years past!"

She stood, looking long at him, with wild eyes and parted lips, the color going out of her lips as she sank down on the sofa.

"Miss Kennedy—Helen—say that you do not love me!" cried Eyre, springing toward her and grasping her hand as she sank down; but the pulse was gone—she had fainted.

With one long, passionate kiss, he laid her back upon the sofa, and hurriedly pulling the bell, he strode out of the room. I met him in the hall, and, with bloodshot eyes, he told me to send Rosalie to Miss Kennedy instantly.

* * * * * * *

The Gestadehof was deserted; its inmates were scattered, and the wintry gales and the snow had it all to themselves. Eyre and Charley Bayard were in England; they had gone abroad immediately after our breaking up, "for a year," Charley said; "forever, he hoped," was Eyre's aspiration. They had wandered, for eighteen months, through France, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Spain, the Mediterranean, Egypt, the Red Sea, Cairo, and now they had wintered in England for the fox-hunting. Miss Kennedy had gone South immediately with a relative, and, after a prolonged stay, we had heard that her health was not good, and she was going to Italy.

One morning Rosalie came running into the room, and upset my coffee cup in her eagerness.

"Oh, John," she cried, "just look at this!"

And in the London Illustrated News was the following announcement:

"On Thursday, the 21st inst., at St. George's, Hanover Square, by the Very Reverend the Bishop of ——, Helen, daughter of the late James Wheaton Kennedy, Esq., to John Hampton Eyre, Esq., all of the city of New York. American papers will please copy."

And, sure enough, our letters by the same mail brought us a "full, true, and particular account" of the "Hanover Square event," as Eyre called it, with strict injunctions to open the Gestadehof as soon as possible, as they meant to favor us by the next steamer—Mrs. John Hampton Eyre having signified her intention to that effect, "sur le champ" de l'eglise?

Eyre's poor wife had died six months after he went abroad, and released him from the terrible thralldom to which he had been a slave for eight years; and a few hints to judicious friends had sufficed to accomplish the rest.

We had a jolly reassembling down at the old place. We were all there—all the old set—and Grant, as good-natured as ever, though not yet married. Heaven save the mark! but his marriage was a sublime affair. I may be tempted one day to write its history.

I used quite frequently to happen into Eyre's dressing-room, to consult him about our plans. One day I found the door ajar, and walked in without knocking. I found him standing before the glass quite still and absorbed. I went up to him and looked over his shoulder. It was Rosalie's charm he held in his hand, which had been hidden in a crack of his drawer all these long months, and now turned up just when it was not needed. It contained only three words:

"Remember your wife."

Her woman's perceptions had been prescient.

THE NEW BASIN AT CHERBOURG.

CHERBOURG.

We herewith place on record, as landmarks in the progress of practical science, two views of the great basin of Cherbourg, which has just been inaugurated by the Emperor of the French in presence of the Queen of Great Britain and a number of other famous people.

For the better understanding of the great work which has just been completed, it must be said that Cherbourg was naturally a miserable sea-port. The French shore of that channel which the English call the British Channel, and the French La Manche, or the Sleeve, is unhappily badly provided with secure harbors. Havre is molested by a shifting sand-bank, and is unfitted by other causes from being a navy dépôt. Cherbourg, protected on two sides from the winds, and situate just opposite the Isle of Wight, naturally presented itself as a proper home for national vessels. Unfortunately—protected as it was on two sides—it was so unprotected on the others, that in 1692, when a French fleet sailed thenceforth at the instigation of the exiled King James the Second, it was met by the English Admiral, beaten, chased in and out of Cherbourg, and at last utterly destroyed. Again, sixty years afterward, the English and French being as usual at war, Cherbourg was successfully attacked by a British squadron, captured, gutted, and abandoned. These accidents set the rulers of France thinking about the defenses of the port. Vauban drew a plan, the gist of which consisted in a breakwater; but the Great Monarch (as the wretched doll known as Louis XIV. was called) had no money to spare, and the plan remained on paper for over a century.

The first practical beginning of useful work at Cherbourg took place in 1782. In that year the first cone or pier was sunk; it was intended to follow it up with a series of similar cones, the whole to constitute a breakwater. From 1782 to 1790 nine million cubic feet of stone were lodged on the line traced out by the engineers for the breakwater. But so imperfect was the plan, and so spasmodic the exertions, that as fast as the cones were sunk they were destroyed by storms; and in 1790, when the whole work was reviewed, it was found that all that had been done was thrown away. It is said that the last remains of the cones or piers which had cost so much money were destroyed by a peculiar species of teredo or worm: it is not stated, however, whether the worm in question had two legs and walked erect.

Napoleon the First saw the necessity of making Cherbourg a safe naval port, and directed the works to be continued on Vauban's plan. They were accordingly prosecuted with success for several years, and strong hopes of their perfect completion were entertained till, one stormy night in 1808, a terrible gale set in, and not only destroyed all that had been done, but engulfed two hundred of the workmen and a heavy battery of guns which had been placed on the breakwater. The Emperor was not the man, however, to be discouraged by an accident. As soon as he had leisure to devote his mind to the subject, in 1811, he gave orders for the revival of the works. They were accordingly resumed, and some substantial progress had been made at the time the combined despotisms of Europe restored the Bourbon dynasty. Thirteen years then elapsed without adding a stone to the breakwater. In 1828, Charles the Tenth, who as a young man had reported on Cherbourg for the Government of Louis XVI., spent some money in following out the plans of the Emperor. His overthrow caused a delay of ten years. In 1840, Louis Philippe resumed the work; and prosecuted it with some vigor. It was continued by the Government of 1848, and at length, in 1853, Napoleon the Third had the satisfaction of completing the breakwater. It is thus described:

The breakwater, the upper portion of which is in masonry, lies for base on immense artificial embankment 2¼ miles in length, by about 900 feet in width, its average height being fifty feet. It is in two unequal parts, forming at their point of intersection an obtuse angle toward the sea of 160 degrees. In general terms, the Cherbourg breakwater may be described as presenting a mass of rubble-stone, of the length and breadth above stated, having a slope from the bed of the sea in the level of nearly 23 feet below high-water line of spring tides, toward the roads in the ratio of one base to one in height (1 to 1). The top of the mass then has a much more gentle inclination, for in the width of 181 feet its inner summit attains the level of 13½ feet below high-water line, and there it slops against a wall, almost vertical, rising 7 feet above the same high-water line or datum.

THE WATER RUSHING INTO THE NEW BASIN, AUGUST 7, 1858.

There is a level platform at this height of 20½ feet wide on the eastern arm, and 21 feet wide on the western arm; and beyond it there is a solid masonry parapet (about 5 feet high, and rather more than 8 feet wide) toward the sea. The outer line of this parapet is, in fact, in the continuation of the sea-face of the wall, and the latter has been built of coursed and dressed masonry, laid with the greatest care, and composed of the very best materials, upon a general bed of hydraulic concrete 5 feet thick, laid over the loose rubble hearting. The bottom of the concrete is about 20 feet below datum. Beyond the edge of the masonry which protects the foot of the vertical wall, the top of the rubble hearting of the breakwater has assumed a slope of 1 in 10 toward the open sea under the influence of storms. This slope continues until the top line has descended to 47 feet below datum, and thence it continues to the bottom at the rate of 1¼ to 1.

The small materials used in the hearting of the breakwater are naturally exposed to be displaced by storms. Of late, however, a very effectual mode of protecting the sea slope has been adopted, consisting of huge artificial blocks, cubing not less than 20 yards, placed upon those portions of the breakwater which are most exposed to the effects of the sea. These blocks are composed of rubble masonry and of Portland cement mortar, the cement being English.

The entire cost of the breakwater has been nearly £3,000,000 sterling. The expense, however, is comparatively trifling when the result obtained is taken into consideration. No matter how tempestuous may be the weather, a sure and safe anchorage exists within its shelter for about fifty sail of the line, and as many frigates.

There are three floating docks, or great basins, at Cherbourg. The first was inaugurated in 1813, by Marie Louise, acting for the Emperor. It was hewn out of the solid rock, and cost ten years' labor. The second was opened on 25th August, 1829, under the government of Louis Philippe. The third is the one to which Louis Napoleon has given his name. It was commenced on 28th June, 1836. The mode in which the stubborn rock was hewn was by a process of mining never hitherto attempted on so large a scale. Shafts were sunk, in the first instance, from which galleries were cut in various directions, which were charged with gunpowder, and exploded by the electric spark. The upheaving and rolling of these immense masses of solid rock, which followed the explosion, formed a series of most imposing spectacles, which were witnessed with great interest by the people of the town. The rock, having been loosened, was removed by trucks on a railway, and thrown into an indented part of the coast called St. Anne's Bay.

The new basin is less in extent than the two others combined, but is greater than either taken separately. In it room can be found for fourteen men-of-war, and the amount of water it will contain is estimated at 1,600,000 cubic metres. The ceremony of flooding it took place on August 7. The Emperor and Empress and their suite were the last persons who trod the cement and granite floor which was to be forever covered with water. But, alas! the long-expected immersion, as a spectacle, was a total failure. The water was to have been let into the excavation, in a great and sudden rush, through one of the two locks that connect this inner basin with the two smaller ones between it and the sea. The water, it was thought, was sufficiently controlled by a dam and caisson. The dam, as already described, was constructed of earth, inclosing a mine at its base. This should have kept the water at the level of the outside dock, while the caisson was floated away. The dam would then have been the only barrier between the vast empty space and the external docks, and, finally, the sea itself. But when the water was admitted up to the dam, either the flood was stronger or the barrier weaker than had been calculated. One end of it was washed away, the mine was destroyed, and it was too late to remedy the disaster. So the great coup of the day—the anticipated explosion, the sudden rush of the element, and its first dash and spread over the immense granite level, were all lost.

The ceremony, such as it was, is thus described by an eye-witness:

"At half past twelve their Majesties, with a numerous staff and suite, arrived at the port. Cannon from all the forts announced their approach, gens d'armes were seen trotting across the bridge beyond the broken dam, followed by the escort and a line of carriages. They soon arrived at the triumphal arch leading to the pavilion, around which were grouped all varieties of uniforms. A few minutes afterward, the Emperor and Empress entered it. Whatever the Emperor has to do in public he dispatches with the most business-like celerity. Immediately after his arrival he descended the long wooden stairs that led down to the bottom of the dock. He had the Empress on his arm. They were followed by all the staff and the ladies in attendance, a very brilliant train. A group was formed round the inauguration stone, under which was placed the usual coins and records, amidst the firing of cannon and acclamations of the public. The ceremony was soon over—all the ceremonies have been very brief—and the imperial party reascended. Now ought to have come the grand spectacle, the admission of the waters; the Emperor would have given the signal, the mine would have been fired, and in one mighty bound would have taken possession of it. But its actual entrance was more quiet, it was even humble; a subdued stream from a sluice, opened without noise, crept in and spread itself imperceptibly over the space. There was nothing more to be done, except the bestowal of a blessing on the work by the Bishop of Coutances, with the same state and attendance as the inauguration of a railroad, and the same chanting and prayers. The Bishop and clergy were stationed on the quay, nearly under the stern of the Ville de Nantes. The ecclesiastical ceremony was much longer than the secular form that preceded it. At its conclusion the Emperor commenced a tour of all the workshops and departments of the port. The public dispersed; but of many the retreat was cut off, half-way out, by a line of gens d'armes, and, alas! a bridge withdrawn, which said even more inexorably, 'You can't pass here!' A long circuit of the establishment, through and round the fortified enceinte, and out of the western gate, increased the distance to the town to a plurality of miles."

The English have got a queer idea into their heads that Cherbourg is a menace to them. They cling to it with British pertinacity. In fact, the Emperor has only completed a work on which all his predecessors had labored; and which will be a far greater ally to commerce—the chief foe to war—than any thing the French have done this half century.

Miscellany.

—AN English officer who had charge of a gun at the taking of Delhi, and entered the city among the first, thus tells

How a Pandy was Shot.

At the bend of the lane there was a huge tree in which one Pandy had managed to ensconce himself, and, dodging behind a large branch, he avoided every shot we fired at him, while three of our men fell beneath his fatal aim. Two were wounded, and one killed. Sitting close by me were two Afghan Pathans, squatting on their haunches, smoking, and calmly gossiping in Pushtoo. They belonged, I think, to the Guides, but having somehow or other got separated from their corps, probably in the search for loot, had thought my little nook, protected as it was by the picket and guns, as safe and comfortable a place of refuge as they could find. I touched one of these fellows on the shoulder, and said to him, in Pushtoo,

"You Pathans are great shots; why don't you knock that Pandy off that tree?"

"Sahib," said he, "since you wish it, I will kill that Pandy; but why do not the red coats kill him?"

So saying, he raised himself slowly, put up his hookah, and proceeded with great deliberation to load his matchlock, a weapon with a barrel about six feet long, a straight stick for a stock, round which the live-match was wound, and very small bore. Down this he poured a handful of very coarse powder, over that rammed down the ball, and over the ball a bit of cloth, then primed, but all with the greatest gravity and solemnity; then, salaming to me, he dashed across the street, avoiding a shower of balls, and disappeared in a shop on the opposite side, nor was he seen again for some time—rather to my alarm.

We had waited for about a quarter of an hour, when suddenly an old Pathan clutched me by the arm, and pointed. I looked out in the direction indicated, and at that moment the gentleman in the tree fired at us. Suddenly, from the roof of a house close to the tree, up rose our friend, calm and deliberate as ever. He shifted his aim two or three times, and then fired, and over rolled Pandy, from the tree to the roof, from the roof to the street, shot through the forehead.

—When the fight was over the officer took a stroll about the streets, in the course of which he met with an Adventure in a Zenana.

I was close to a huge gateway, when I detected a movement behind one of the wooden gates, which was open and folded back; a moment's delay might be death. I drew my sword and cocked my revolver. An old Mussulman tottered out, and, falling at my feet, clasped me round the legs and begged for mercy. I questioned him as to who he was, what he was doing, to whom the house belonged, et cetera. For some minutes he could not articulate for fear; but as soon as he saw that I had no intention of hurting him his instincts returned, and he commenced lying with great volubility; so, catching him by the arm, and holding my pistol to his forehead, I desired him to show me over the house, clearly explaining to him that, whatever happened to myself, if he led me into any trap I would blow his brains out. . . . .

We proceeded together to the door of the zenana, and, after some expostulation from within, were admitted, passing through two or three passages, and crossing once or twice the roofs of houses. We at length reached an apartment where three old women were spinning, and a fourth lay on a bed crying passionately. The room might have been called the Temple of Luxury. Large, lofty, and with arched ceilings, the upper walls were covered with illuminative designs; round the room, for about the height of six feet, a kind of padded wainscoting of yellow silk was fastened, so as to form an easy back for the lounger sitting on Turkish cushions, while rich carpets covered the floor. Opening from either side of the apartment were the gussul-khana, or bathing-rooms; the buruf-khana, or ice-house; the baberchi-khana, or kitchens: all fitted up in the most splendid manner with all the apparatus of luxury. Round the room were ranged atta-dans, or perfume-boxes; pan-dans, or pawn-boxes; and peek-dans, or spittoons, of solid silver. Two hookas—one lighted and ready for use—literally covered with gold, turquoise, and emerald—caught my sight; and two small gold lamps, studded with alternate diamonds and rubies, and inscribed with verses from the Koran, gave out a strong perfume and a bright light, in front of an enormous mirror which occupied one end of the room. Were I to say that the effect produced on the mind by the appearance of this apartment was a blaze of gold, silver, and jewelry, I should not exaggerate. The old women, seeing me, dropped their wheels, and, falling on their knees, howled for mercy; while the lady on the charpoy, in whom I recognized my former vision, buried her head in a shawl and wept more violently than before. I made the old man assure the women of their safety, and stepped up to her and whispered in her ears a few words in her native tongue. She slowly raised her head and drew up her vail. A face more lovely I never beheld. She asked if I intended to kill her. I replied with assurances of comfort and protection.

I arranged a plan for her. That evening, disguised as a boy, she and her attendants passed through the gates of the city, and she reached my tents in safety, with all her property in money, jewels, shawls, and clothes. My servants were too old and too confidential to blab; and as I gave my own tent entirely to her and her servants, and returned to sleep in the city, with directions that no one should be allowed inside my inclosure, the adventure was never known. Two days afterward I contrived her safe escape to the Punjab, with all her portable property and servants, including my ancient guide, who blessed me most fervently when we parted, and requested Heaven to make me a General quickly—a prayer which I hope may be granted; but I rather doubt it.

—BISHOP WHATELY thus points out the differences between

Grace and Elegance.

Grace is, in a great measure, a natural gift; elegance implies cultivation, or something of more artificial character. A rustic, uneducated girl may be graceful; but an elegant woman must be accomplished and well trained. It is the same with things as with persons; we talk of a graceful tree, but of an elegant house or other building. Animals may be graceful, but they can not be elegant. The movements of a kitten or a young fawn are full of grace; but to call them elegant animals would be absurd. Lastly, "elegant" may be applied to mental qualifications, which "graceful" never can. Elegance must always imply something that is made or invented by man. The general rule is, that elegance is the characteristic of art; and grace, of nature.

—HERE is a philosopher's opinion of Women:

Women remark manners far more than characters. The mental force which might be compressed and pointed into a javelin to pierce quite through a character, they splinter into little tiny darts to stick all over the features, complexion, attitude, drapery, etc. How often have I entered a room with the embarrassment of feeling that all my motions, gestures, postures, dress, etc., were critically appreciated and self-complacently condemned; but at the same time with the bold consciousness that the inquisition could reach no further. I have said within myself, "My character—that is, the man—laughs at you behind this vail. I may be Satan for what you can tell; and you would not perceive, neither, if I were an angel of light."—JOHN FOSTER.

Random Readings.

'Tis with our judgments as our watches; none are just alike, yet each believes his own.—POPE.

The body sins not; 'tis the will
That makes the action good or ill.—HERRICK.

I call by the name of wisdom, knowledge rich and varied, digested and combined, and pervaded through and through by the light of the Spirit of God.—DR. ARNOLD.

The gods in bounty work up thorns about us,
That give mankind occasion to exert
Their hidden strength, and throw out into practice
Virtues that shun the day, and lie concealed
In the smooth seasons and the calms of life.

Nothing is more absurd than the common notion of instruction: as if science were to be poured into the mind like water into a cistern, that passively waits to receive all that comes.—HARRIS.

Admiration must be continued by that novelty which first produced it; and how much soever is given, there must always be reason to imagine that more remains.—JOHNSON.

Act well at the moment, and you will have performed a good action to all eternity.—LAVATER.

GENIUS AND VIRTUE.—Genius has limits, virtue has none: and every one pure and good can become purer and better still.—RICHTER.

GOD'S LOVE.—To do good is of the very nature of God, as it is the nature of fire to warm, and of light to shine.—CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA.

PLEASURE.—All pleasures must be bought at the price of pain. The difference between false pleasure and true pleasure is just this—for the true, the price is paid before you enjoy it; for the false, after you enjoy it.—JOHN FOSTER.

As every thread of gold is valuable, so is every minute of time; and as it would be great folly to shoe horses—as Nero did with gold—so it is to spend time in trifles.—MASON.

Science is too lofty for measurement by the yard of utility; too inestimable for expression by a money standard. These groveling ideas of the objects of science, which constantly jar it in its intercourse with the world, ought to find no response in the breast of any devotee who would draw inspiration from its shrine.—PROFESSOR PLAYFAIR.

TRUE HOSPITALITY.—It is an excellent circumstance that hospitality grows best where it is most needed. In the thick of men it dwindles and disappears, like fruits in the thick of a wood; but where man is planted sparsely, it blossoms and matures, like apples on a standard or espalier. It flourishes where the inn and the lodging-house can not exist, and dies out where they thrive and multiply.—HUGH MILLER.

LOVE AND HOPE.

I have heard many say
Love lives on hope; they know not what they say.
Hope is Love's happiness, but not its life.
How many hearts have nourished a vain flame
In silence and in secret, though they knew
They fed the scorching fire that would consume them!
Ignorance is the curse of God;
Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.
SHAKSPEARE.

A brave man thinks no one his superior who does him an injury; for he has it then in his power to make himself superior to the other by forgiving it.—POPE.

The person whose clothes are extremely fine I am too apt to consider as not being possessed of any superiority of fortune, but resembling those Indians who are found to wear all the gold they have in the world in a bob at the nose.—GOLDSMITH.

A Christian is the highest style of man.—YOUNG.

Adversity borrows its sharpest sting from our impatience.—HORNE.

Oh, Death! thou strange, mysterious power, seen every day, yet never understood but by the uncommunicative dead, what art thou?—LILLO.

Work with boldness and with speed,
On greatest actions greatest dangers feed.

God gave you that gifted tongue of yours, and set it between your teeth to make known your true meaning to us, not to be rattled like a muffin-man's bell.—CARLYLE.

Our actions are our own; their consequences belong to Heaven.—FRANCIS.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

A FEW evenings since, a gay party of Astorians were enjoying a moonlight sail upon the East River, when it was proposed to stop and visit Fort Schuyler. "For what purpose?" asked Wormwood; "what will be done when we go there?" "What will be done!" replied the mover of the proposition (a waggish Astorian), "why the soldiers will present arms, and the ladies will fall in!"

A FLORAL SENTIMENT.—If you wish for "Heart's-ease," never look to "Marry gold."

The surest way to lose your health is to be all the time drinking that of other folks.

A CAPTAIN OF THE OLD SCHOOL.—Another fine old sailor of the past day, as brave as Cæsar, but whose Commentaries, if he had written them, might not have been quite so good (as the schoolmaster had not gone abroad in his youth), commanded a ship of the line at Trafalgar, and pushing, as he would be sure to do, into the thickest of the fight, had two or three of the enemy's ships belaboring him at the same time; the sauve tête, or splinter netting, was cut away, and having knocked him down, entangled him in the meshes. On getting clear, stunned and excited by the blow, he cried out, "Let un come on, let un come on; let a dozen on un come on—I'm blowed if I strikes—I'll never strike—no, never—to nobody whatsomdever!" And a most effective speech this was; it was heard on one deck and repeated on the others in the pauses of the firing, and the hearty guffaw with which it was received was more exhilarating than any amount of blank verse.

Why is the letter S like a sewing machine?—Because it makes needles needless!

We are sent to the ant to learn industry; to the dove to learn innocency; to the serpent to learn wisdom; and why not go to the robin redbreast, who chants as cheerfully in winter as in summer, to learn equanimity and patience?

A Hibernian had come far to see Niagara, and while he gazed upon it, a friend asked him if it was not the most wonderful thing he had ever seen. To which he replied, "Never a bit, man; never a bit! Sure, it's no wonder at all that the wather should fall down there, for I'd like to know what could hinder it."

THE FIRST GRAY HAIRS.

A silver tress is 'mid thy hair
I never saw before—
The first that time hath woven there,
To warn thee youth is o'er!
But think not I can love thee less
Because thy youth departs;
Ah, no! that little silver tress
More closely binds our hearts!

It is decreed that youth must pass,
Why should it be deplor'd?
For in our child (as in a glass)
I see thy charms restored!
Thy gentle smile plays o'er her face;
And nut-brown is her hair—
Like thine, sweet love! ere I could trace
One tress of silver there.

Those people who turn up their noses at the world might do well to reflect that it is as good a world as they were ever in, and a much better one than they are likely ever to get into again.

Here is a specimen brick of slang advertising, cut from a late London paper:

ONCE TRY, YOU'LL COME AGAIN
TO HARRIS'S
(Established upward of 20 years),
SLAP UP TOG, AND OUT AND OUT KICKSIES BUILDER,
1 B H, HATTON GARDEN,
23 ditto (late Driscoll's), and
33 W STREET, SOMERS TOWN.

Mr. H. nabs the chance of putting his customers awake that he has just made his escape from India, not forgetting to clap his mawleys upon some of the right sort of Cotton, when, on his return home, he was stunned to find one of the top manufacturers of Manchester had cut his lucky, and stepped off to the Swan Stream, leaving behind him a valuable Stock of Moleskins, Cords, Cloths, Doeskins, etc., and having some ready in his kick, grabbed the chance, stepped home with the swag, and is now safely landed at his crib. He can turn out Toggery of every description very slap up, at the following low prices for

READY GILT—TICK BEING NO GO.

Upper Benjamins, built on a downy plan, a monarch to half a finnuff. Slap up Cloth Togs, 1 pound 1 quarter and a peg. Moleskin ditto, any color, lined with the same, 1 couter. A pair of Kerseymere Kicksies, any color, built very slap up, with the artful dodge, a canary. Pair of stout cord ditto, built in the "Melton Mowbray" style, half a sov. Pair of Broad Cord ditto, made very saucy, 9 bob and a kick. Pair of Moleskin, all colors, built hanky-spanky, with double fakement down the side, and artful buttons at bottom, half a monarch. Pair of stout ditto, built very serious, 9 times. Pair of out and out fancy sleeve Kicksies, cut to drop down on the trotters, 2 bulls. Waist Togs, cut long, with moleskin back and sleeves, 12 peg. Cloth ditto, cut slap, 14 peg.

Mud Pipes, Knee Caps, and Trotter Cases, built very low.

A decent allowance made to Seedy Swells, Tea Kettle Purgers, Head Robbers, and Flunkeys out of Collar. N.B.—Gentlemen finding their own Broady can be accommodated.

☞ OBSERVE THE ADDRESS!

SERIOUS REMARK BY A ROGUE.—A sanctified thief, hearing of the proposed bill for the greatly required improvement of the law in criminal cases, made a grimace, and said, "It will increase our trials!"

A TOAST FOR YOUNG AMERICA.—"Here's to the Flag of Stars and Stripes, and may it dash its stars if it doesn't soon outstrip the entire world!"

THE LETTER X.—In algebra x stands for an unknown quantity. It is pretty nearly the same with Beer. Double X and Treble X only too frequently stand for an "unknown quantity"—of hops.

A noted miser, having relented so much as to give a beggar a sixpence, suddenly dying soon after, the attendant physician gave it as his opinion it was from enlargement of the heart.

"With all thy faults I love thee still," as the man said to his wife when she was giving him a curtain lecture.

"Westminster Hall," said pompous Lord Thurlow, "is open alike to the richest and the poorest." "Yes, my lord," said Erskine, "and so is the London Tavern."

A young physician, a recent graduate, was asked why he had not gone to see his father, who had just died. The father lived in Indiana, the son in Virginia. He replied, that "the intense torridity of the circumambient atmosphere had, by its condensation, so diluted the placid aqueous fluid of the enormous River Ohio, that, with the most superlative reluctance, I had to procrastinate a premeditated egress into the palatinate province, until the morbid excitement of the pericranium had extinguished the vital spark."

A celebrated oculist being called on the stand as a witness in a court of justice—one of the counsel asked him "if he was present at the transaction." Brief-wit anticipated the oculist and said, "Surely you know he is an eye witness."

Men are very apt, in relating any incident, to express themselves in terms belonging to their own occupation or profession. Here is a case in point. An acquaintance of ours who had been recently appointed to the office of notion in a neighboring town, and who was fully sensible of the importance of the office, met us the other day, and after the usual salutations, said to us, "you have old Jim Dove—down in our town?" "Oh, yes," we answered. "Well," said he, "we've got him posted."

The learned and venerable Chief Justice of the State of Illinois—sometimes confounded by jokers with the lesser but same time arguing a point of law before him, which his honor evidently could not find in his memory. At length the counsel, to illustrate his point, commenced, "now, may it please your honor, according to Blackstone, and some others, ergo, and fenders?"

The impression which the peculiar size of the pocketbook and the capacity of the pocket in which the former were stabled.

The best shot ever heard of has been made in Calais, Maine, where a young man killed a partridge with a rifle at the birth of a dog, and the next morning found the animal dead, the bullet having killed him in the night. The ingenious race of Englishmen, from Gordon Cumming down, to any similar publication which may have the misfortune to be neglected to beat this.

Yankees are universally allowed to be unrivalled in answering questions, but quite Irish loquacity with Yankee interrogation met on equal ground in a pilot of a steamboat, but raised in Vermont, was rebuked by the latter with whom she was living for her unnecessary curiosity to ask questions. Closing the rebuke, the lady remarked, "You bet that I'm from Vermont, where, for true to nature, the girl replied, "do the cows ask many questions?"

Lord Byron once said: "You never know a man's character until you have been married or have set up a partnership with him, or a woman's until you have married her."

INSTINCT OF ANIMALS.—No horse ever found a mare's nest. That discovery can only be made by a donkey.

When does a cow become real estate? When turned into a field.

A man in Vermont was so dirty that the assessors taxed him at real estate.

Washington visiting a lady in his neighborhood, on leaving the house a little girl was directed to open the door. He turned to the child and said, "I shall return my little dear, to give you so much trouble." "I wish, Sir," was replied, "it was to be more."

A Mr. Downing, of Red Wing, Minnesota, was pursued by a mad cow, and only saved himself from injury in a horse-cart trick, which he had barely time to reach, but where he sat in safety, looking down with a grin on the cow, and very much angry passion, at the ox who was trying the tongue of his horse in a manner not warranted, by butting the butt of the tree. There are Minnesota puns.

Dr. Samuel Johnson abominated puns. He defined punster, "a low wit who endeavors at reputation by double meaning." And he even carries this bitter feeling beyond the pale of wit, when he pointed out a sentiment of which he gives this definition: "A young, inexperienced, unmarried writer." Of Lieutenant-General Sigmund Cullintaine, the Italian tutor at the Academy, she beholds this sentiment fulfilled. He delivered a course of experiments in Harper, in Punch, in Leslie, and others of that class. Occasionally he is absent, and then a shudder of one of these horrors, even in a daily print! He declared, on the night of the last Friday, that any person who dared to pen a pun should be sent for punishment to the penitentiary.

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, Sept. 6, 1858.

The foreign trade of the past for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Sept. 4, 1858	$3,510,417	$1,597,202
Corresponding week, 1857	3,576,962	1,140,611
Decrease	$66,459
Increase		$456,947

The export of specie was only $562,057; rather more than a third of the amount of the corresponding week last year.

Money is a shade dearer than it was. It may be quoted at 5@6 on call on mixed and 6@7 on the commercial paper, according to quality and date. Exchange on Europe is about the same; very many sellers at 9½@ 10, with few transactions at the higher figure; on Paris at 5.12½@5.11.

The Stock Exchange has been dull throughout the week, with no particular movement in prices. It is understood that the New York Central Railroad Co. will endeavor to compromise their difficulties. The following table shows the movement of the Boston Exchange last week:

	Aug. 28.	Sept. 4.
Missouri 6s	84½	84½
La Crosse Land Grants	7	7
Delaware and Hudson	93	93
Pacific Mail	104	104
Illinois Central	114	114
New York Central	80	79½
Erie	18	18
Hudson	38¾	38½
Reading	46¼	46¼
Michigan Southern	24¾	23½
Michigan Central	50	49½
Galena	84	83½
Cleveland, Toledo, & Chicago	72¾	71¾
Toledo	54	54
Illinois Central	84	84
La Crosse	7½	7½
Milwaukie and Mississippi	19½	19½

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY

NEW YORK, Monday, Sept. 6, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been generally quiet for the leading kinds of Breadstuffs, the demand having been, to a large extent, supplied from the stocks of the speculators for home consumption, and for Europe and Cuba. On Thursday and Friday Wheat was nearly sought. Shortly on operations in Corn were less as fair request at strengthening prices. Provisions have attracted considerable attention, and we have also Coffee, Crude and Refined Sugars and Teas, closing firmly at our noticed figures. . . Hay and Hops have been more inquired for. . . Seeds and Linseed have also been freely dealt in. . . The trade in Dry Goods is moderately active for Spring and Summer fabrics, the selling stocks of fabrics not exactly adapted to the wants of buyers. Standard and choice fancy productions are generally firm. The Dry Goods import during the week amounts to $1,597,202, and the withdrawals for consumption, the week previous, to $1,140,611. The value of the imports since January 1 reached $41,742,368 against $76,193,018 the same week last year. . . The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable activity. . . We append a brief list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Superfine and Extra Flour, per bbl.	$3 70	@ $4 85
Superfine to extra State, per barrel	5 00	@ 5 50
Superfine to Extra Western, per barrel	4 90	@ 5 30
Extra Western, per barrel	5 10	@ 5 90
Extra up to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 75	@ 6 50
Extra Canadian, per barrel	5 60	@ 6 50
Extra to Double Extra, per barrel	5 75	@ 6 50
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl.	3 85	@ 4 00
Corn Meal, per bbl.	3 25	@ 3 50
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 10	@ 1 15
White, per bushel	1 15	@ 1 20
Rye, per bushel	73	@ 76
Barley, per bushel	60	@ 65
Western Oats, per bushel	30	@ 33
State Oats, per bushel	36	@ 38
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	42	@ 45
Canadian Oats, per bushel	38	@ 40
Cotton, middlings, per pound	12¼	@ 12½
Hay, per 100 pounds	75	@ 87½
Prime Pork, per barrel	15 50	@ 16 00
Mess Pork, new, per barrel	17 00	@ 17 50
Prime Mess Beef, per barrel	9 00	@ 9 50
Beef Hams, per barrel	19 00	@ 20 00
Cut Meats, per pound	8	@ 9
Lard, per pound	11½	@ 11½
Butter, Ohio, per pound	14	@ 17
Western Butter, per pound	13	@ 17
Cheese, per pound	7	@ 9
Rice, per 100 pounds	5 75	@ 6 75
Tea, Coffee, per pound	24	@ 30
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6	@ 8
Cuba Molasses, per gallon	27	@ 30
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	7½	@ 8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	30	@ 35
Crude Tallow, per pound	9	@ 9½
Refined Tallow, per pound	10	@ 11
Hops, per pound	8	@ 12
Crude Petroleum, per gallon	40	@ 45
Tallow, per pound	10	@ 10½
Coal, per ton, at per 2000 pounds	3 75	@ 4 25
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	43	@ 48
Pig, per barrel	15 75	@ 16 00
Common Boots, per 100 pounds	165	@ 170
Leaded Gilt, per pound	14	@ 16
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	7	@ 14
Seed Leaf Tobacco	7	@ 14
American Fleece Wool, per pound	37	@ 46
Do. Pulled, per pound	30	@ 40

Stocks of several Articles in New York about Sept. 1.

	1857.	1858.
Coffee, packages	111,250	45,417
Sugar, boxes, etc.	16,346	13,264
Hemp, tons	1,000	1,000
Hides, number	17,000	22,393
Hides, number	312,776	64,478
Saltpetre, hogsheads	11,177	6,719
Molasses, barrels	14,881	2,543
Rice, tierces	17,000	17,000
Beef, tierces and barrels	9,057	6,129
Rum, hhds.	4,000	4,200
Rice, bags	3,000	3,000
Cotton, packages	90,843	66,926
Sugars, boxes	12,393	15,196
Sugars, hhds. and tierces	11,179	9,171
Tobacco, Crude, hogsheads	6,000	11,921
Tobacco, Manufactured, packages	4,505	4,021
Tobacco, Manufactured, pkgs.	2,000	1,000

Breadstuffs.—Flour, 1 p. c. decl. For Liverpool—Cotton, 1 @ 3-32d. per pound; Flour, 3d. per barrel; Grain, 1½d. per bushel; Provisions, unchanged. The stock of flour in store and afloat is 1,000,000 barrels, and of wheat 2,000,000 bushels. Other ports proportionate. Receipts of Flour, 1,000,000 barrels; Wheat, 2,000,000 bushels.

Dry Goods.—Jobbers' Markets, last Wednesday were less active, the large purchases having interrupted business. Many of the retailers replenished their supplies on Thursday preceding. Ahem, on the regular market-day, trade in Boston was dull, and prices were unsettled. The Milch Cows were in stock request, at previous figures. Veal Calves were in moderate request, at former rates. Sheep and Lambs were plenty, and, at the close, lower, but not very freely. Swine were in fair request, and in steady change, with a moderate inquiry. The reported sales of Cattle, made during each of the last five days, are compute as follows:

	Week ending Aug. 28.	Week ending Sept. 4.
Beeves	6,101	6,704
Milch Cows	191	191
Veal Calves	501	491
Sheep and Lambs	5,000	5,000
Swine	6,763	9,056

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday, there were about 1,000 Texans:

Illinois, 1,472	Indiana, 599
Ohio, 1,000	Kentucky, 600
New York, 743	Pennsylvania, 19
Missouri, 1,000

The range of prices according to the actual sales of the Live Stock at the Forty-fourth City Market last week was as follows:

Extra Premium Beeves, per pound	7 @ 8
Common to ex. Milch Cows, per head	30 @ 46
Veal Calves, per pound	6 @ 7
Sheep and Lambs, per head	1 50 @ 5 00
Do. per pound	5 @ 6
Live Swine, per pound	6 @ 6
Dressed Hogs, do.	7 @ 8
Hooting Pigs, each	2 00 @ 2 50

The Fish and Oyster Markets are well supplied with the leading articles, and prices generally rule low. The following are the receipts last week:

Blackbellies, per basket	2 25 @ 2 50
Do. per barrel	7 @ 8
Hucklebellies, per basket	2 25 @ 2 75
Do. per barrel	7 @ 8
Pears, do.	1 25 @ 1 50
Peaches, per basket	1 00 @ 1 50
Plums, per basket	1 00 @ 3 00
Sweet Potatoes, per bushel	75 @ 1 00
Potatoes, new, per barrel	1 75 @ 2 25
Potatoes, new, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Onions, new, per barrel	1 50 @ 2 50
Do. per bushel	75 @ 1 00
Cabbage, new, per 100	2 00 @ 6 00
Cucumbers, per 100	1 00 @ 1 50
Tomatoes, per bushel	1 00 @ 1 50
Green Corn, per 100 ears	25 @ 50
Watermelons, per 100	12 00 @ 15 00
Nutmeg Melons, per barrel	1 00 @ 1 50
Nutmeg Melons, per basket	50 @ 75
Cucumbers, per 100	75 @ 1 00
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	10 @ 11
Eggs, Western, per dozen	10 @ 11
Chickens, per pair	37 @ 50
Fowls, per pound	10 @ 12
Fowls, per pair	50 @ 62
Ducks, per pair	62 @ 75
Turkeys, per pound	10 @ 12
Turkeys, per pair	1 50 @ 2 00
Pigeons, per dozen	1 50 @ 2 00
Quails, per dozen	1 50 @ 2 00
Snipe, Meadow, per dozen	62 @ 1 00
Snipe, Beach, per dozen	50 @ 75
Plover, per dozen	1 50 @ 2 25

ADVERTISEMENTS.

KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE. Now $3 80 Subscribers will receive Two Prize of the ATLANTIC SUBMARINE CABLE. With certificates from Cyrus W. Field and Tiffany & Co., The Dec. No. with Photograph and steel plate of CYRUS W. FIELD.
JOHN A. GRAY, Publisher, 16 and 18 Jacob Street, New York.

TO CASH AND SHORT TIME BUYERS.
NEW STOCK OF
RIBBONS AND DRESS TRIMMINGS.
MITCHELL & MCLINTOCK,
(LATE MITCHELL & HOWARD),
OPPOSITE METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
ARE NOW PREPARED TO SHOW ONE OF THE most select and desirable stocks of silk sleeve goods to be seen in the city.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "THE CITY OF THE GREAT KING," the most superb work on Jerusalem ever published. 24 Engravings, 12mo. 350 pages. In and around Shechem, a charming book on Christianity. Price, $1.25; sent by mail, postage paid. Liberal valuable work for Canvassers extant, $5. Sample Copies of all Books sent by mail, postage paid, to parties who will act as Agents. Address, Postage Paid, or orderly express. T. CRAIG & SON, Philadelphia.

ANTHON'S CLASSICAL SERIES.
LATIN LESSONS. 75 cents.
ZUMPT'S LATIN GRAMMAR. 75 cents.
ZUMPT'S LATIN ELEMENTARY. 50 cents.
LATIN PRIMER COMPOSITION. 75 cents.
LATIN READER. Prose and Poetry. $1.25.
LATIN GRAMMAR. Abridged. 75 cents.
CESAR'S COMMENTARIES. 75 cents.
SCHMITZ'S HISTORY OF GREECE. $1.00.
SALLUST'S JUGURTHINE WAR, &c. 75 cents.
THE GENUS OF VIRGIL. $1.25.
THE WORKS OF HORACE. $1.25.
CLARKE'S EDITION OF VIRGIL. $1.25.
THE GERMANIA, &c. OF TACITUS. $1.00.
CESAR DE BELLO CIVILI, &c. 75 cents.
CORNELIUS NEPOS. $1.00.
CLARKE'S CLASSICAL DISPUTATIONS. $1.00.
JUVENAL AND PERSIUS. $1.00.
FIRST GREEK BOOK. 75 cents.
GREEK PROSE COMPOSITION. 75 cents.
GREEK READER. Prose. 75 cents.
NEW LEXICON OF THE GREEK AND ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. 75 cents.
GREEK PROSODY AND METRE. 75 cents.
GREEK METRICAL PARAPHRASE. $1.25.
XENOPHON'S ANABASIS. $1.00.
A COMPREHENSIVE MANUAL OF SOCRATES. $1.00.
HOMER'S ILIAD. First Six Books. $1.25.
MANUAL OF GREEK ANTIQUITIES. 621 cents.
MANUAL OF ROMAN ANTIQUITIES. 621 cents.
MANUAL OF GREEK LITERATURE. $1.00.
THE ILIAD OF HOMER, &c. 75 cents.
COMPLETE GREEK DICTIONARY. Royal 8vo, $5.00.
COMPLETE LATIN DICTIONARY. Royal 8vo, Sheep, $5.00.
SMITH'S DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN BIOGRAPHY AND MYTHOLOGY. 2 vols. 8vo.
Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

TIFFANY & CO.,
No. 550 Broadway, New York,
ANNOUNCE THAT THEY HAVE SECURED THE ENTIRE
ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH SUBMARINE CABLE,
Now on board the
U. S. Steam Frigate Niagara.
In order to place it within the reach of all classes, and that every family in the United States may possess a specimen of this wonderful mechanical curiosity, they propose to cut the Cable into pieces of four inches in length, and mount them neatly with brass fronts.
Each piece with be accompanied with a copyrighted facsimile certificate of
CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.,
that it is cut from the genuine Cable. Twenty miles of it have been actually submerged and taken up from the bottom of the Ocean. This will be first sold in precisely the condition in which the great Cable now lies in the bed of the Atlantic.
Orders will be received from dealers and others for not less than 100 pieces at a time, at $50 per hundred. Retail price 50 cents each.
Each order must be accompanied by the money, in funds current in New York, as it will not be possible to open accounts. A register will be kept of the orders, as they are received, and they will be filled in rotation without favor or partiality.
A large quantity of the specimens will be ready, it is expected, for delivery within a week.
NEW YORK, August 28th, 1858.

ATLANTIC CABLE NOTICE.
TIFFANY & CO. have secured a large quantity of the cable that, although they have arranged with the Newsby Works—in addition to their former orders—to mount the Atlantic Cable, the demand is so great that they are not able to supply orders as fast as they have been received, and are received. They therefore appraise the trade and others that, while they will continue to receive orders, to be filled in their turn, they will not be able to fill the orders in the state it comes from the Ocean, as it will come part filled first, in small lengths of not less than forty feet, and in smaller quantities at $1 per foot, which will enable purchasers to have orders executed in mid-themselves.
August 30, 1858.

"VROOM & FOWLERS'"
WALNUT AND WILLOW SHAVING SOAP,
Guaranteed to suit the most fastidious.
JOHN B. VROOM, COR. MAIDEN, CLIFF & BEEKMAN STS., N. Y.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MACHINES are the only machines manufactured by any person in connection with the Sewing Machine, in which the needle moves perpendicularly to the surface of the work, or cloth, and which is not operated by a rotary motion. Persons wishing to purchase a machine which will not tear the cloth, will find information on the subject at 458 Broadway, New York.
I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

DR. THORNE. A NOVEL. By AUTHOR OF "Thornedale." Price 50 cents. Published by Ticknor, Austin, $4.00.

DR. THORNE. A novel of rare merit of fun—a thing not common in these days. We can promise a hearty laugh to all who undertake the perusal of the book.—[Saturday Evening Post. The characters are real creatures of human nature, fresh and natural, and the incidents are of the most amusing character.—Doctor Thorne is a rich original, and as such, with all his eccentricities and idiosyncrasies, will be welcomed by the reader.—[Boston Courier. The book is a mine of manufactured delicies that is only meant to beat a hearty laugh. There is more in it, however, than a vein of touch of pathos; it is interesting, and is written in good English.—[Philadelphia Inquirer.

We are prepared to name him the author of Doctor Thorne and Thornedale as a tolerably safe surmise.—[Ed. N. Y. In Doctor Thorne the handling is broad and powerful, but coarse, and more remarkable for vigor than finish, because every touch is the result of thought and feeling, and not of mere mechanical skill. The author possesses a rich vein of humor, and a keen appreciation of the ludicrous, and sensible and penetrating observation, embraces a wide range of character, and has the power of delineating it so as to give all he writes the strength and consistency of a picture. Dr. Thorne is a character which we are disposed to us to be unexceptionable in its exuberant independence of conventional rules.—[Courier.

A story with characters not merely serving as vehicles for the exhibition of odd or comical traits, but developed in the events, and, what is more to the purpose, interesting in their own right.—[Commercial Advertiser.

In Doctor Thorne Mr. Thornedale has given us a novel of the first class. There is humanity of nature—a truthfulness of life—a healthy appreciation of the foibles of men and the fine and cheerfulness of spirit which portrays them with a kindly and genial humor that is delightful. Dr. Thorne is a character that will be remembered. He has—the glad recognition of all things noble and excellent.—[Albany Gazette.

This is a very good novel—one of the most agreeable and instructive that we have read for a long time.—[Observer.

Sparkling with life and animation to the very end.—[Boston Post.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above Work by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States (under 300 miles), on receipt of the Money.

PATENT ANGLESEY LEG and ARTIFICIAL LIMBS. These unrivalled substitutes for lost Limbs are supplied only by WM. SELPHO, 815 Broadway, opposite the Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

CIRCULATING in every District of the United States.

Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

The Only A Limited Space is devoted to Advertisements.

I. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

II. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and can not escape the attention of the reader.

5. None but the most respectable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not so large, proportionally, at times of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise by the Month, Quarter or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

TERMS OF HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Five Copies for One Year (and one extra)	8 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

SIR THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," is commencing in HARPER'S MAGAZINE for October, with illustrations by the Author, and continued in the DECEMBER NUMBER, now ready. It is printed from early sheets received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA—
This celebrated Extract will speedily purify the blood, and, when so required, produce a healthy, piquant tone and vigor to the system, and gradually, but surely, eradicate disease.
Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

EFFECT OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH ON THE EUROPEAN DESPOTS. [FROM PUNCH.]

JOHN. "Hold hard, Jonathan."
JONATHAN. "All right, John. He's goin' down."

CURIOUS OBJECTS OFTEN SEEN ON THE SEA-SHORE AT LOW WATER.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE FROM A CONVIVIAL POINT OF VIEW.

THE NORTHWEST COAST; or, Three Years' Residence in Washington Territory. By JAMES G. SWAN. Map and numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

As many eyes are now turned toward the Pacific, Mr. Swan's book will be received as a valuable contribution to our limited stock of knowledge regarding men and things on the Western shores of our country. His narrative is enlivened by personal incidents and adventures, and by legends and anecdotes illustrative of character among the natives of the forest.—Philadelphia Christian Observer.

In this book we find the most satisfactory account yet published of our Northwest Coast. The descriptions of scenery, sketches of Indian life, and the customs of the natives are depicted with a simplicity and earnestness that vouchsafe for its fidelity.—Boston Herald.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

GENEVA MEDICAL COLLEGE.

The Annual Course at this Institution will commence Oct. 5th, and continue sixteen weeks.

FEES (payable in advance).

Matriculation Ticket, taken only once..... $ 5 00
General Ticket to the whole Course..... 75 00
Graduation..... 30 00
Demonstrator's Ticket..... 10 00
Anatomical Material..... 5 00

For circular or particulars apply to

Prof. TOWLER, M.D.,
Dean of the Faculty,
Geneva.

HUNT, WEBSTER & CO.'S IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH SEWING MACHINES,

$, For all manufacturing purposes and family use, are preferable to any other machine. 458 Broadway.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLORENCE, MASS. (Three miles from the Northampton Depot). Price for Patients $12 per week.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MACHINES.—NEW and VALUABLE IMPROVEMENTS.—A new Tension and a Hemmer that turns hems of any width without previous basting. Office, 343 BROADWAY, New York.

DIAGRAM OF THE LOCK STITCH.

This is the only Stitch that can not be ravelled, and that presents the same appearance upon each side of the seam. It is made with two threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and interlocked in the centre of it. Send for circular.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MACHINES.—No other sewing machine for family use ever equaled this, either as respects the beauty of the machine or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 453 Broadway, New York.

ATWATER'S PATENT $15 AND $25 SEWING MACHINE received the FIRST PREMIUM over Singer's and Wheeler & Wilson's, at the State Fair, held at Buffalo, October 9th, 1857.

The Cheapest and Best SEWING MACHINE in the market.

Office, 493 BROADWAY, New York;
Send for descriptive Circular.
H. C. BURDMAN & CO.,
Sole Agent for the United States.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, Nos. 48 and 50 East 59th Street, near Madison Park. Boarding and Day School will re-open on Sept. 15th next. Classes in Mathematics, English, Spanish, German languages, besides the French, which is the language of the School. A Junior Department has been added. For details, references, &c., circulars to be had.

Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY, for YOUNG LADIES. Horseback Riding and Salt-Water Bathing. Applications for admission or Catalogue to be addressed to the PRINCIPAL, MRS. T. P. SMITH, Boston, Mass.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWELVE or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing HARPER'S WEEKLY left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 90.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. JACOB LITTLE, ESQ., WITH A FINE PORTRAIT.
II. LITERARY.
III. THE LOUVRE.
IV. FIFTH AVENUE IN THE COUNTRY, WITH A SPLENDID ILLUSTRATION.
V. HOME TO OLD CHINA.
VI. LAUNCH OF A CHINOLINE.
VII. FACT, FANCY, AND FUN, BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS.
VIII. LITERARY.
IX. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
X. FOREIGN NEWS.
XI. A WEEK AT BADEN-BADEN, WITH EIGHT FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
XII. THE EX-POLICEMAN'S STORY.
XIII. VIEWS IN AND ABOUT SALT LAKE CITY, WITH TWO ILLUSTRATIONS FROM PHOTOGRAPHS.
XIV. HOW I BECAME A PRIEST.
XV. THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.
XVI. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XVII. CONFLAGRATIES.

JACOB LITTLE, ESQ.

PERHAPS no man out of the political world has been more famous throughout the United States than the gentleman whose portrait we give on this page. Like all other conspicuous characters, he has had his share of abuse as well as praise; but, praised or blamed, no man at present living has exercised a larger influence in the financial world, nor has any one contrived to attract more general attention from the moneyed community.

Like most of our financial magnates, Mr. Little came to the city poor. He was, like many other great and good men of this State in our day, a New Englander by birth. Born at Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1797, he set out to seek his fortune in New York when he was twenty years of age. It is understood that, though he did not arrive here precisely in the condition claimed for most heroes at their first start in life—barefoot and hungry—he had no superfluity of property, and no assets to speak of, except a quantity of spare time and a pretty clear head. To what vocation his first efforts were directed we are unable to state; but shortly after his adoption of New York as his home, he found himself a clerk in the counting-houses of the famous old Quaker, Jacob Barker.

Not many days since the writer met Mr. Little in Wall Street, in company with a very old gentleman, with whom he was in earnest and respectful conversation. When the pair separated, Mr. Little, rather more excited than is his wont, asked of the writer,

"Do you know that old gentleman? That, Sir, is my old master, Jacob Barker. How well he looks!"

To one who had been in the habit of regarding Mr. Little as a mere man of money—a bull or a bear, as they say in Wall Street—there was something quite touching in the affectionate look which the old man cast over his venerable "master" as he tottered down the street, and in the humid twinkle of the eye which old reminiscences seemed to have excavated.

In the days of Jacob Barker, long before the revulsion of 1837, before the revulsion of 1825, the Quakers were a power in the commercial world. They were an honest, industrious, and extremely shrewd race of merchants; not devoid of humor and sarcasm; and though religious non-combatants, not in the least disposed to allow themselves to be the victims of coppery. One of this fraternity—a dealer in specie and exchange, and a large purchaser of gold coin—one day left his counting-house in haste, and crossed the street to accost a friend. He had just purchased a quantity of doubloons, which he had omitted to look up in his safe. The office was empty. When the old Quaker returned the room was in the same condition—no one was in it—but one of the bags of doubloons was missing. The Quaker looked up the others, and opened not his mouth on the subject of the loss. Days passed, and weeks; but no reward was offered; no policemen were set on the track of the thief; the old Quaker bore his loss stoutly. Two or three months afterward his neighbor, a small mercantile man, happened to be in his counting-room, conversing on the topics of the day. Suddenly turning to the Quaker, he inquired,

"By-the-way, friend, ——— did you ever hear any thing of the bag of doubloons you lost?"

Up started the old Quaker in an instant:

"Then're the thief, John! then're the thief! I never told any one I lost the bag!"

Needless to say that the doubloons were restored, and the clumsy rogue pardoned, with a caution to go and sin no more.

Of Mr. Barker himself a story equally characteristic has been told. To some readers it is very familiar; but as there are many to whom it will be new, we may as well repeat it here. Mr. Barker was a large ship-owner. He had many ships at sea, and—as was the custom in those days, before Maury had mapped the tides and the winds—some of them were constantly being lost. One of Mr. Barker's ships had been a long time out of port. Fears were entertained for her safety. Sharing the general anxiety, Mr. Barker called at a Marine Insurance office, and expressed his desire to effect a fresh insurance on the vessel. The office demanded a high rate of premium. Mr. Barker offered a lower figure. Without coming to any understanding Mr. Barker left the office. That night a swift messenger from New England brought him news of the total loss of the vessel.

He said simply, "Very well." Next morning, as he drove down to his counting-house, he stopped at the insurance office. He did not get out of his carriage, but, summoning the secretary from his seat, he observed, quietly:

"Friend, then need not make out that policy; I've heard of the ship."

"Oh, Sir!—but, Sir—Mr. Barker," stammered the cunning secretary, dashing back into the office, and rummaging again in a moment, "we've made out the policy, and you can't back out of it."

"How so, friend?" asked the old Quaker very demurely.

"When you left last evening we agreed to your proposal, and the policy was made out at once. The office became liable, and you must take it. See, here it is!" and a clerk at that moment brought out the policy, with the signatures hardly dry.

"Well, friend," said old Jacob placidly, "if then will have it, I suppose I must take it." And he put the policy in his pocket, and drove to his office. Before that evening the Insurance Company and all the world had heard of the loss of the ship.

It was under this shrewd, cautious merchant that Jacob Little passed his apprenticeship to trade. He was five years in Jacob Barker's office. When he left it he set up for himself as an exchange and specie broker. It is said that, in those humble days, Mr. Little used to spend the daylight hours in his office, ready to buy or to sell specie or bank-notes to any chance customer; and that the evening he devoted to a regular round of visits to large retail houses, of which he bought all the uncurrent money they had to sell. Many years must have passed before his business became worthy of public notice. How many hundred specie and exchange brokers there are in this city whose names even no one ever heard out of their little circle; and who, living from hand to mouth, might make fortunes, or break, or die out altogether, without so much as a line in a money article! Such was Jacob Little till about twenty years ago.

Twenty, or perhaps twenty-five, years ago the young broker began to be generally and favorably known. It began to be understood that he was uncommonly energetic, honest, and prompt. The current quotations for exchange could be had without an instant's delay at his office. He was always there; always ready to give a prompt and correct answer; always ready with his check-book to buy uncurrent funds at higher rate than any one else. Orders given to him to purchase stocks (though stocks were less thought of in those days than they are now, and railroads had hardly been invented) were invariably executed honestly, shrewdly, and promptly. Jacob Little began to be known—began to have correspondents in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans.

At that time a business was carried on between New York and the South, the gist of which was the exchange of notes for specie. It was a very profitable business, and seemed to be a growing one, though it has long since died out. Into this business Mr. Little entered, placing himself in competition with the magnates of finance. He succeeded. He was more assiduous and far quicker than his rivals. He lost no time in frivolous gayeties; gave his whole soul to his work; and while his competitors were deliberating he decided, acted, and carried off the prize. His business increased with strides so stupendous as to be scarcely credible.

As a broker, his expenditure had always been trifling; and net profits

JACOB LITTLE, ESQ.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

office demanded a high rate of premium. Mr. Barker offered a lower figure. Without coming to any understanding Mr. Barker left the office. That night a swift messenger from New England brought him news of the total loss of the vessel.

He said simply, "Very well." Next morning, as he drove down to his counting-house, he stopped at the insurance office. He did not get out of his carriage, but, summoning the secretary from his seat, he observed, quietly:

"Friend, then need not make out that policy; I've heard of the ship."

"Oh, Sir!—but, Sir—Mr. Barker," stammered the cunning secretary, dashing back into the office, and rummaging again in a moment, "we've made out the policy, and you can't back out of it."

"How so, friend?" asked the old Quaker very demurely.

"When you left last evening we agreed to your proposal, and the policy was made out at once. The office became liable, and you must take it. See, here it is!" and a clerk at that moment brought out the policy, with the signatures hardly dry.

"Well, friend," said old Jacob placidly, "if then will have it, I suppose I must take it." And he put the policy in his pocket, and drove to his office. Before that evening the Insurance Company and all the world had heard of the loss of the ship.

It was under this shrewd, cautious merchant that Jacob Little passed his apprenticeship to trade. He was five years in Jacob Barker's office. When he left it he set up for himself as an exchange and specie broker. It is said that, in those humble days, Mr. Little used to spend the daylight hours in his office, ready to buy or to sell specie or bank-notes to any chance customer; and that the evening he devoted to a regular round of visits to large retail houses, of which he bought all the uncurrent money they had to sell. Many years must have passed before his business became worthy of public notice. How many hundred specie and exchange brokers there are in this city whose names even no one ever heard out of their little circle; and who, living from hand to mouth, might make fortunes, or break, or die out altogether, without so much as a line in a money article! Such was Jacob Little till about twenty years ago.

Twenty, or perhaps twenty-five, years ago the young broker began to be generally and favorably known. It began to be understood that he was uncommonly energetic, honest, and prompt. The current quotations for exchange could be had without an instant's delay at his office. He was always there; always ready to give a prompt and correct answer; always ready with his check-book to buy uncurrent funds at higher rate than any one else. Orders given to him to purchase stocks (though stocks were less thought of in those days than they are now, and railroads had hardly been invented) were invariably executed honestly, shrewdly, and promptly. Jacob Little began to be known—began to have correspondents in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans.

At that time a business was carried on between New York and the South, the gist of which was the exchange of notes for specie. It was a very profitable business, and seemed to be a growing one, though it has long since died out. Into this business Mr. Little entered, placing himself in competition with the magnates of finance. He succeeded. He was more assiduous and far quicker than his rivals. He lost no time in frivolous gayeties; gave his whole soul to his work; and while his competitors were deliberating he decided, acted, and carried off the prize. His business increased with strides so stupendous as to be scarcely credible.

As a broker, his expenditure had always been trifling; and net profits of four thousand a year be considered magnificent. But from the six prizes now suddenly leaped to a hundred thousand; thisdoubled and quadrupled; and in the height of his success as a specie, exchange, and money-broker, he actually netted over eight hundred thousand in a single year, clear profit, all losses deducted.

An anecdote of the most extraordinary of his facilities—his quickness of perception—may serve in some measure to explain his wonderful success. A man came to his counter with a draft on Boston. Mr. Little gave him at once a $500, a $100, and a $20 bill. The man left. In a few moments he returned, saying,

"Mr. Little, Sir, I think you made a mistake. That was a draft for $620 I gave you, and you have only given me $620." And he held out the $100 and the $20 notes.

With almost fierce sharpness—the tone familiar to all who know Mr. Little—he asked the man, "Where was you born?"

"To the Bank of America, to deposit my money, and it was there I—"

Mr. Little did not wait to hear the end of the sentence. Dashing on his hat, he ran out, hastened to the bank, and returned, in almost less time than it has taken to tell the story, with the missing $500 bill in his hand.

"Here, Sir," said he, to the overjoyed customer: "you dropped your bill at the bank counter, and if I had been a quarter of an hour later you would never have seen it again, let me tell you."

There came a time when the specie business fell away, and Mr. Little's profits declined in consequence. But a still grander field was opened—the Railroads—the great modern civilizer—were coming into play, and the great question was how to build them. Their ownership and valuation every one could see; but how to raise millions upon millions of dollars was not so readily understood. Mr. Little placed himself in the van of the railroad movement. He was himself at this time a large investor, and his character for sagacity and shrewdness was so well known that wherever he led rich men were ready to follow. At this time, in the beginning of the railway era in the United States, Jacob Little was indispensable to every railway scheme. Every successful project for a new railway had him for a director, manager, or friend; if he said that a line of road to the moon could be thoroughly was he identified with the leadership of the railway world, that he was the man whose name was extensively worked on a very different and far less worthy man—he was known as the Railway King. Again, like his business, as I have before one, fortune awaited his ventures. Hundreds of thousands rolled in upon him; and was it possible to talk of him as not the owner of a million but of millions. His fortune, indeed, must have been at this time enormous and prodigious.

Again a time came for a change. Like all good things, railways were overdone. Speculation was carried to excess: could not pay by any chance. Roads were projected for the sole purpose of swindling stockholders. Dividends were declared out of capital; mismanagement, roguery, and blundering financial schemes were the order of the day. Mr. Little was one of the first to see the effects of this state of things, as he had been the first to perceive the benefits of railway system. With his usual promptitude he acted upon his convictions. He turned sides. There was no disgrace in this. He told every one that, as most of the railways were managed, they could not be paying property; and, as an example of his faith, he continued to buy their stock at future periods below the price current at the time of the contract. This was called, in Wall Street parlance, "selling stock short." Of course this policy, adopted by a man of such influence, was well-calculated to be the ruination of the knaves who were busily engaged in getting up impossible railways, or paying unearned dividends on lines already constructed. Of course, between such men and Mr. Little it was thenceforth war to the knife. It is affecting, at this moment, to read the virulently-indignant tirades in which they denounced him as a miserable stock gambler, and as an enemy to the great interests of the country. As Mr. Little had been spending his money in building great lines of road below cost, and those who now abused him were out of pinafores, it is not likely that their words disturbed his slumbers. But for many years he had hard work. It was easier then than now to "get up a corner," and to punish the bears. As all stocks were issued in amount, if a man contracted to deliver so many thousand shares, in a certain stock, it was quite feasible for the owners of all said stock to lay their heads together and say that he could not have it. This was frequently practised with Mr. Little; and though his unexampled resources and extraordinary boldness carried him safely and triumphant through crises of this kind, he was sometimes compelled to pay smartly to those who cornered him.

One of his great feats in opposition to "the street" is well remembered.

It was in the days when Erie Railroad stock was selling in the neighborhood of par, and when, by dint of paying dividends which were not earned, and publishing reports which were not true (practice, of course, embraced by railroad men of all sorts), the management had contrived to imbue the public with quite a high opinion of the value of the property. Mr. Little was a few miles off. He did not believe in the property, and he was ready to give practical evidence of the want of faith in it by offering to deliver it at a future day below the market price. The chief owners of Erie resolved to catch him. They took all the contracts he offered, and, meanwhile, entered into a compact among themselves not to sell him a share. Before he dreamed of the plot, he was bound to deliver to them several thousand shares, and all the brokers were fitted up by the conspirators, and out of his reach. The day came when Mr. Little was to make his delivery. By this time the plot was well understood. The common talk of the street was that that morning "the bulls would break Jacob." They—the bulls—had not the least doubt of their success. They had his contracts and they had the stock; it seemed impossible that Mr. Little could escape.

He came down to his office that morning as calm and as cool as usual. The bulls were amazed at his jaunty, pleasant manner. One or two ventured to call upon him in the hope that he would propose a compromise. But he preferred to talk about the weather. At least they thought that he would steal out and offer to buy the stock; but he did nothing of the kind. What could he mean by it? The day wore on, and he was the more calm either that which they knew he had not got, or he must break. They were very nervous indeed in their little camp.

Unfortunately for them, they did not know the character of the Erie Railroad as well as Mr. Little. One of the many vicissitudes which have befallen that famous corporation occurred in 1848, in which year the Erie Railroad fought, and nearly perished. It owed a pretty round sum, and couldn't by any means pay. Then the firm stroke which the owners shared with it, the Erie direction bethought themselves of issuing to the creditors convertible certificates of indebtedness, which would extend the amount due by the Company to the holder, guaranteed that the Company would not sell or hypothecate its own stock for cash certificates. Of course, so long as the creditors were insolvent the Company was the holder and absolute thought of converting his certificates; and by the time the Company had recovered its credit had forgotten all about them. Every body except Mr. Little. He remembered the circumstance perfectly; and when the time arrived that the bonds fell sacred him, he went round quietly and bought up all the certificates he could find at about 50 per cent. these in his hand, at one o'clock of the fatal day, he presented himself at the office of the Company, and demanded of them that they should take back all their ancient debts had stalked into the office! Dividends and interest were paid up. Still there was no excuse possible. The language of the certificates was unequivocal. They made out the figures, and found that Jacob had bought and had overwhelmed the bulls by tendering them all the stock he had to take.

They refused to take It, on a frivolous pretext, and to this day the question is unsettled, both parties having a claim to the stock. The Company did not break.

Wall Street remembers several other crises which nearly saw the ruin of Mr. Little. He stood alone against the street—Iron Magar, the street beat, as it was called. Still they had the advantage of a large capital, uncommon resources, and a wonderful sagacity. When Mr. Jacob Little, a man of scarcely inferior ability to Mr. Little himself as a financier, and as serious and successful a bear, he was left to sneer and daring. For years he contended alone against the bold, and succeeded.

But in such a contest fortune could not forever remain on one side. Mr. Little had broken all, or nearly all, his rivals. He had made himself the master in his trade, and had helped them on again. He had strengthened them by the force of the soundness of the bear principle that he set no limits to his operations. He was ready to sell ten thousand shares of stock which he knew he could not borrow, and he left his rivals more than formerly; and he broke.

This accident has occurred to him more than once. But it is a well known saying among the brokers that they had rather have Jacob Little's unexpended power than a million dollars in checks. For much as the world has heard of Mr. Little's fortunes (high and low), it has never known how much he has invariably paid every creditor a hundred cents on the dollar, with interest. At the rate he had business, he was in a position to make or to break every year. In the year after his first stoppage, it is stated, he realized $1,000,000 net profit, after every creditor in full (a bagatelle of something less than a million), but realized, clear and clean, twelve hundred thousand dollars himself.

His principle was very simple. He knew that in Wall Street, as elsewhere, there were two classes of people—paying dividends which they did not earn, and misrepresenting facts in their reports. He knew that if he bought the stock of companies of this most come when he would be rewarded. Events have justified the correctness of his calculations. Unfortunately for him, when the crisis came, which he had foreseen for years, he was not in a condition to profit by it, and the opportunity did not have reaped went into other men's garners.

Mr. Little is now in his seventy-second year. In Wall Street. He is better known, and perhaps more generally liked, among the brokers than any other member of his whole-souled class. He has never known to pass an unfortunate debtor, to risk a man of character, or to refuse any one aid on a debt which he could pay. All who enjoy his acquaintance respect and love him.

Mr. Little's partner since Mr. Little applied for readmission to the Board of Brokers, his suspension having expired, is Mr. Hall, under the custom of that body to admit candidates on their first application, especially if they have previously filled a vacant place. The dignity of the Board, the value of a seat are enhanced by a certain difficulty of admission. It is not every one that makes applicants for admission are prepared by their friends for a preliminary ordeal or two. When Mr. Little was proposed, this last time, a few words were said in his favor by his proposer, and he sat down. Up started a broker whose firm had had some difficulty with Mr. Little, and began to raise objections. He had hardly opened his mouth when then there arose a storm of indignant outcry from every quarter of the Board. Bulls and bears cheered, and stamped, and vociferated their relief at a famous leader. The "boys" were boys indeed, and very angry ones; the unlucky opponent of Mr. Little's nomination incontinently subsided; and Mr. Little was installed on the spot.

Mr. Little remained a bachelor beyond the usual term of celibacy. In the year 1846 he married Miss Augusta M'Canty, sister of Madame De Lolo, by whom he has an only son.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 18, 1858.

THE CONVENTION.

IN a previous article we have spoken of the inJ rouds made by the Constitution of 1846 on the Central Power of the State. Next to the changes in this regard, the most important alterations were effected in the Judiciary. The members of the Judiciary in 1846 were confessedly able men. The fees attached were equally unpopular; and the judicial system was universally odious. It is not worth while now to rip up old sores, nor to ask why this was so. Enough it to say, that the unpopularity of both judges and judicial organizations was such, that the Constitution of 1846 not only created the former from office, but did not leave a vestige of the judicial system. The Revision Convention, the creature of power to a nation of foreign birth, could hardly have effected a more complete and absolute change in the administration of justice. A Court of Appeals was substituted for the old Court of Errors; the Court of Chancery was remodelled in many details, burying under its ruins an honest and able Chancellor; and if the side of the Supreme Court was retained, it was done apparently to show how little there is in a name; for the new court resembles the old one just about as much as disorder resembles order, or a madhouse resembles discipline.

To add to the confusion produced by this new system of things, or rather to carry it out more completely, a commission was appointed to frame a Code. It did its work with a vengeance, and to a new judicial organization was superadded a new system of process. Whatever of the new arrangement had been a good one, it would have been a heavy job under these circumstances to set it going; but what a system it is!

The Court of Appeals, the highest tribunal of the State, and the conservative by-word for justice, changes one half of its members every year. Every year it takes into its ranks four new judges. Any one to this service for the twelve months of an eight-years' tenure, this being the year which is to prepare them to take the cold look of the next election. The consequence is, that the decisions of the court of last resort are confessedly vague and fluctuating in the last degree.

As to the Supreme Court: by the Constitution of 1846 it was to be practically divided into eight States—or, as they are called, districts—a court of four members provided for each district, or three where eight courts, it never meet together except once in two years to make rules, the name of the Supreme Court was fraudulently given. The result was inevitable. The decisions in the districts necessarily vary. There is no mode of harmonizing them except in the manner in which go to the Court of Appeals; and thus not only our practice but the great body of our law is every day becoming more discordant in the various throughout the State. Twenty-five volumes of Reports have been published, most of which are utterly useless for any purpose whatever, and every hour only increases the confusion.

To this confusion the introduction of a short form of office, combined with the elective principle, has beautifully contributed. As for the elective principle, in a country governed by universal suffrage, there may be said; the judges no doubt, works better in the country than in the city, and perhaps the matter has not yet been fully tested; but it may be safely asserted that, if the object be to break down the character, self-respect, and vigor of a judiciary either, no more ingenious method could be devised than popular election and a short tenure.

It is not worth while to argue the question at length. The whole history of English liberty, up to the time of the Revolution of 1688, may be considered accessible as an effort to make the Judges independent of the ruling power of the State. This end was attained when the Judges learn were to hold their seats during good behavior. Here we have run exactly counter to this experience, and have deliberately made Judges dependent upon the breath of popular power. The result, it is true, might have been a great deal worse than it is as yet. Nobody pretends that Judges are as corrupt as lawyers. They are honest, and they are men of ability. But as to body they are utterly deficient in vigor, character, and independence. They know and feel that they owe their existence to the ordinary machinery of party politics. They are deeply interested in not offending popular and influential men, whether they be lawyers or clients, and the result is a total breakdown of all discipline and decorum in the Courts; and the invasion of the profession by a horde of uneducated men who are no more fit to try causes than they are to direct the solar system.

No reform of the law, no reform of the bar, can be made without a vigorous, able, and independent Bench to enforce it and to work it out. An army is a mob without good officers—the Judges are the officers of the army of the law. The Convention of 1846 effaced every trace of discipline and order—it destroyed all the real power of the Judiciary, and with their power it destroyed their independence. All reforms will be petty, and partial, and ineffectual that do not recognize this fact, and which do not seek to regain what we have lost.

The object being to secure the independence of the Judiciary, it would seem that the real point is the tenure. Whether a judge be selected for the bench by popular suffrage, or by a Governor, or by the appointment of popular suffrage, is perhaps not very important. The real point is, that when the officer is elected he should feel himself as a free man and a citizen, not a miserable rickety stool, every day slipping more and more from under him.

Nor is the salary all-important. It is, of course, extremely absurd that the income of a Judge living in Binghampton should be the same as that of a Judge living in New York. It is very absurd not to recognize that a dollar in New York is a very much smaller sum than a dollar in Jefferson County. But even this is subordinate to the question of tenure. You may adopt a crude or even an absurd mode of election for judicial offices—you may pay the incumbent an insufficient salary—still, if the place is really clothed with power—which means a dignity and independence—you will always find able men to take it.

This is the be-all and the end-all of every discussion as to the Judiciary. We want such changes in the system as shall make the Judges strong, respected, and independent. Before we are prepared to do this, we may as well let things remain as they are until the State is really ripe for an efficient change. Any petty office to amend or patch up the present system will totally fail unless there is at least a radical alteration in the tenure of the office.

It is conceded on all hands that the present system is disgraceful to the State. The Courts are hotbeds of corruption—justice is a laughing-stock—appeals are endless, and nothing is certain. It is practicable to correct these great evils; but it is not possible to do so while the honestly and boldly lock the mischief in the face and trace it to its cause. We can then apply the proper remedy. Till then we can open our eyes and our mouths, and frankly admit that the real evil of the present system is the total want of independence in every part of the Judiciary. It is not the vicious organization of the Court of Appeals—it is not the disorganization of the Supreme Court—which create the present state of things. It is that the members of both these tribunals are in a condition of painful dependence, which no good condition, whatever the system may be, it is absurd to expect vigorous or efficient action.

HINTS TO ADVERTISERS.

WHERE and how to advertise, are problems which engage the attention of every mercantile man. In this country the benefit of advertising is acknowledged by every man of sense. Every one who has any thing to sell is aware that his sales will be in proportion to the number of the persons who know of him and of his goods; and that, beyond a certain very narrow limit, he can only make himself and his goods known through the channel of advertising. We have all seen very ordinary wares forced by copious advertising into universal use; it is obvious that by the same method almost any medicine will not command a sale if the public be not made aware of its existence through the medium of advertisements. Since the days when popular of modern inventions was neglected for years and ruined in consequence by the public neglect, all to advertise. The general principle being thus universally admitted—that advertising is beneficial and indispensable—the only questions which remain to be solved are, How and where should a man advertise?

The sum and purport of advertising being the introduction of the thing advertised to the knowledge of the public, it follows that those advertisements are the most likely to answer which by meet the eye, and arrest the attention of the largest number of persons. An advertisement is valueless that does not reach a powerful circle of readers. And it is equally useless if, while it reaches the eye of a large number, it be not calculated to arrest their attention.

These two principles constitute the science of advertising, and that advertisement is the best which carries out both with the greatest force. A few illustrations may throw light on the point. A placard in a public conveyance is bad, inasmuch as it is seen only by a very limited class of persons; but it is good, for during the tedium of the journey it is likely that every one will read it. A placard on a wall, is faulty, for even in the most traveled thoroughfare it can only attract a very limited number of eyes; but if it be strikingly and conspicuously displayed, it may tempt every one to read it. The advertising cards which are sometimes inserted in Love-lane caused to be scattered broadcast from a balloon over the British capital, did not meet as many eyes as a few lines in a popular paper; but every one on whose head they fell may be assumed to have examined carefully the mock thunder-bolt.

On the other hand, advertisements may be seen by a great number of persons and yet fail in their aim. As a rule, men are more than indifferent to their neighbor's business. We do not want to know what Jones sells cheap clothes, or Smith good beef, or Robinson sound wine. Our first impression from Jones, Smith, or Robinson tells us his story, is to rate him a bore, and to grow angry with him for attempting upon our time and attention. First, because we know that we require that time and attention ourselves; secondly, because organized wars as that in nine cases out of ten, under pretense of giving us valuable information, Brown and the others want to sell us a part of our money. Hence, if a fair chance be given us, we will not listen to their story. If a fellow were to accost a hundred persons in a Broadway with the remark, "Sir, here is Mr. Brown's advertisement of brushes or hot corn; will you read it?" ninety would either pass on without remark or would throw the advertisement into the gutter; and of the other ten, at least five would insult Mr. Brown's man. It is doubtful if any one of the hundred would comply with his request. Hence it is that an advertisement may actually be laid under the nose of thousands of men, and yet, from the want of something to attract their attention, may be valueless in a business point of view. At least a dozen of these enterprising speculators in this country have cried to make money by publishing gratuitous sheets composed wholly of advertisements. They have always failed, simply because it was impossible to persuade the recipients of their papers to bring sheets even to look at them. People received them, saw what they were, felt indignant at the attempt to bully them into knowing about other men's business, and flung them down. It could not be otherwise.

With regard to advertisements in the ordinary newspapers, countless schemes have been devised in the hope of attracting public attention. Conspicuous position had their day. Then upon a time the newspapers were full of business notices beginning in some such fashion as

"Ten men in every town will find out exactly how every body has provided himself with a pair of Smith's suspenders," etc.—"FAINT FAR IN HIGH LATE—Look for the other day—" and the success of Brown's mantillas (99 only)," etc., etc.

"SAYS BUCHANAN TO CASS, 'Send me a pair of Robinson's superlative Cayenne Pepper,'" etc., etc. Of late, however, this style of advertisement has gone out. People are on their guard against such headings, and even the "Atlantic Telegraph" and "Queen Victoria's Message" have wisely sought to beguile them into reading about the virtues of a certain soap and cheap hats.

The common sense of the public can not long be deluded; and, in this matter of advertisements, the surest way of attracting attention is, after all, to place the advertisement as near as possible to the reading matter in one of being read. Advertisements printed on the most popular page of a popular newspaper will get the most attention. The eye naturally wanders from the flashing editorial, or the telegraph dispatch, to the modest business announcement under it; and in nine cases out of ten the aim of the advertisement is attained. This is so well understood that the leading daily papers charge a premium double for business notices on the editorial and opposite pages.

Advertisements so situate—that is to say, on the most attractive page of a widely-circulated paper—realize, as nearly as is possible at present, the two conditions of a perfect advertisement. They attain the widest feasible publicity, and they attract the largest possible share of attention. Such advertisements are worth paying for.

Half a dozen lines in a widely-circulated newspaper, neatly and brilliantly printed, are still, wear an amusing caricature—are better worth five dollars to the advertiser than whole pages of advertisement toward which the reader's eye is not naturally attracted.

THE LOUNGER.

THE QUARANTINE.

"STATEN ISLAND, 10th September, 1858.

"MR. LOUNGER,—I was glad to see, last week, that Harper's Weekly stated the case of the Quarantine burning so admirably and justly." It suggested that when such an event takes place, unreckoned, in the midst of intelligent and law-respecting citizens, many of them people of property and the most respectable position in every profession, the violence has been confined to a specific and evident object, and the general peace and security of the county have not been in the least degree disturbed—it suggested, I say, that there might be something to be urged which would at least palliate the resort to force which was made on the night of the 1st of September.

"I wish to put the case of the Quarantine seriously before your readers, that they may understand how barbarian," and "gross," and "unwarrantable," and "incredible," and "even than Sepoys," we illegitimate islanders are.

"The Quarantine was placed here fifty-five years ago. (Governor Tompkins came for the first time about fifteen years afterward.) The island was comparatively uninhabited, and when the extent of the city of New York was very much less than it is now. Gradually, in the immediate neighborhood of the Quarantine, a settlement sprang up, at first a mere dependence of that institution, but as the population of the city rapidly increased, and spread beyond Manhattan Island to the opposite shores of New Jersey and Long Island, so it went, in time, to the nearer shore of Staten Island. The New Brighton, Tompkinsville, and Stapleton charming town of the same name, along the terrace at the junction of the Bay and Kill, and the more rustic settlements extended southward, until the Quarantine, placed at the nearest point to New York, became the nucleus of a very populous and rapidly increasing population. Its domain was small, and it was the natural defense to this part of the island, as it may have been to the city.

"The population of the city having overtaken an institution which is in its very nature, however necessary, yet none the less a nuisance to any neighborhood, the unhealthy miasma was thrown on the people and the pest. That the population of the city should have the Quarantine, and the island is not wondered, when you remember that a man on the northeastern shore of Staten Island is never to his business down town under an hour, and at the extreme upper part of the city, and particularly on the Hudson River side of the city, or its population, everybody, even the Quarantine, just as it did the bone-boiling and slaughter houses of the island, has been driven to the shore and built. The live very properly declared, in the letter I quote, that neither the patients have any right to population, and not the population to the nuisance.

"In the year 1858, when the yellow fever was again heard in Southern ports, and was ravaging all of the island, the islanders very naturally saw no reason why they should be the victims of it, when the whole people of the State to sicken and die unnecessarily of a fearful disease. Moved by their feelings and sensitive to their danger, they petitioned the Quarantine—but were restrained by wiser men, who assured them that a boundless evil was impossible to be averted, and that measures would be taken for their relief. By these judicious representations the exasperated people were temporarily calmed. A quieter season also represented to the persons who had charge of the institution the danger of harboring, as was thought, and justice, and humanity, and regard for the dignity of the law, required that it was conducting a fearful hazard to the people by keeping the nuisance.

"Meanwhile sundry efforts were made—protests and petitions—but the year 1856 arrived. The yellow fever came into port again—was hunted into the Quarantine hospitals—and there, even in the midst of the quiet and hard-working population of the island. Indignation and alarm were aroused, and a threatening attitude was taken—blockades—positions were signed—and twice the Grand Jury of the county presented the nuisance to the authorities. Popular demonstrations were again restrained by the assurances of relief, and the people were induced once more to be withstood; the danger to the city was the glaring; and the Legislature of 1857 authorized the Governor to remove the Quarantine, or secure the removal of the Quarantine.

"This, of course, was an acknowledgment by the people of the State, in their Legislature, that Staten Island was an unfit place for such an establishment. The islanders were very ready, and it is a perfectly well understood fact that certain shipping merchants of New York were ready and willing to assist. Application was made to the State of New Jersey by the Commissioners for the occupation of Sandy Hook as a Quarantine station. It is a perfectly well understood fact that certain New Jersey shipping merchants were ready to assist New Jersey, by exciting their pride and jealousy, as well as by other means, to thwart this project. Then there was a lull and a virtual quiet season. The very spare population of that region did not think the Quarantine was worse than useless—inconvenient, if not inadequate—and the buildings erected there were burned down, as the people had threatened, more than once. In the month of last May, Mr. Lounger, I have yet to learn that any action has been taken in regard to Sandy Hook or Point, or that the neighborhood apprehended anarchy. The Governor issued no proclamation. There seemed to be all along a virtual acquiescence that no people could be expected quietly to allow a nuisance to be established in the midst of them. But if such were the case at Seguine's Point, where the population was so scant, what was it at Quarantine, where it was so dense?

"Upon this fevered state of the public mind came the Quarantine, where it was to be—the yellow fever. Now, Sir, we have the testimony of the Quarantine physician that, on a certain evening, the island's score or more of sick were then, engaged in yellow fever ships, and other diseased places, by change their clothes and bed, in a public primary meeting of the people of the town. And there is ample proof that, during all the yellow fever quarantine, workmen from the island went out freely—going home at night to their neighborhood and families—and that there was negligence of all proper effort to isolate the danger. Presently, of course, the yellow fever began its ravages in the village of Tompkinsville, and on the 1st of September there had been at least ten fatal cases publicly known. But the physicians of the leading shipping merchants had officiously declared that the Quarantine grounds were to be enlarged and the sanitarium to be established upon the island.

"The people of the neighborhood now found the question put to them in this way: The Quarantine having been presented as a nuisance by the grand jury of the county, and by the Legislature of the Charleston and Stapleton, and it having been held, by repeated votes, to be a nuisance by the people, the Board of Health of a town had full power to declare what was a nuisance, and that any citizen, or body of citizens, might proceed to abate the nuisance, having due regard to other property—the fact of the nuisance having been expressly recognized by the Legislature of the State—the law providing for its removal having been thwarted by means which will continue to be employed and continue to thwart; and since, therefore, we can no longer look to the law to protect us and our families, as well as the city, of which we are practically a part, from hideous disease and almost certain death, what shall we do? How many more honest men and women, citizens of the State of New York, pursuing their various employments, shall be stricken down and slain by pestilence, before the law shall feel authorized to believe that the law can not protect us, and, consequently, to enforce the first and final human right of self-defense?

"I think that was a question, Mr. Lounger, for people to put to themselves of their lives to determine for themselves; and when the Board of Health of the town, composed of respectable and responsible citizens, again declared the Quarantine to be an intolerable nuisance, and summoned the people to abate it immediately, they acted less like Sepoys than like men who considered that the hour of just self-defense had arrived.

"The Quarantine authorities were soon aware of what was to happen. They had ample time to take measures to remove the sick. They refused not to do so; and the town cause prepared to take charge of them. The sick were accordingly carried out, and laid upon the grass on mattresses, and with attendants; and, while it is profoundly to be regretted that there was any suffering at all, it is only very fairly to be asked whether there was much, if any, more than the patients have now to endure at by the exposure, such as it was. This, however, is entirely a separate question. The right of the people of Castleton to abate a dangerous nuisance, and any crankly incident, but not necessary, to that unquestionable right, is entirely another question.

"The work was begun, and was completed on the following night. Of course there was a great deal of excitement—but is comparable from such a movement: but the act was done calmly and resolutely, and not a householder on the island, for a year, but slept with a sense of greater security than for weeks before. For the act was well understood to be the act of the whole, or a gang of islanders unanimously acting to a bad end, but the rising in a community to remove a great danger which the law had shown its incompetence to remove.

"The argument which would deny to the people of Staten Island the right, under any circumstance, forcibly to abate a dangerous nuisance, would, moreover, deny the right of revolution. But if the right of forcible removal, under any circumstances, be conceded—and, in the face of history, philosophy, and law, it would be very hard not to concede it—then every such case must be judged by its own circumstances, and not by the general principle, which Americans are the last people in the world to deny—that the law must be respected, and that no citizen must await the operation of the law. Therefore, in the present case, the only question is, whether the people had sufficient reason to believe that the law would afford them no redress. They thought they had, and therefore helped themselves.

"Yours truly,

"RICHMOND CLAM."

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

COULD there be any thing more melancholy than the story of Landor's late trial, the sale of his pictures, and his flight from England? His first book was published nearly three years ago. Not to be his last, we trust—as eyes in the daintest form, always upon the most scholarly theses are visible, in the dusty shelves, of the accurately crackled with little squirts, not always clean or good-natured, at passing political events. In the structure of Landor, and in his expression, there was something antique and remote, dashed across with the most modern facilities. He had intellectual sympathy with nearly every nation, and consequently dedicated his works, upon the most diverse subjects, to Bolivar, to Major-General Stapford, to General Jackson, and others; while the peculiarities of orthography were those of the scholar.

A man of competent fortune, he lived the life of a scholar. He lounged in his estate quivered with his tenantry, pulled down a beautiful house to build Gothic, and wrote books which were in the family for centuries, and in 1615 withdrew to an old Italian villa to end his days in peace. He resigned Tuscan seclusion at Florence, whence he returned within a year—but on this May he was

In his "English Traits" Mr. Emerson gives us a charming picture of Landor's domestic life in Italian villa:

"On the 15th May I dined with Mr. Landor. I found him noble and courteous, living in a cloud of pictures as his villa Gherardesca, a fine house, commanding a fine view, and a good garden. I had referred him his books, or inquisitive from some anecdotes, an impression of Achillean wrath, an attitude of defiance . . . but on this May day he was the most patient and gentle of hosts. . . To be sure he is indebted to his choice times to irritation, and is well content to impress, if possible, his English whim upon the immutable Fates. . . He has a wonderful vivacity, eloquent, and inexhaustible. . . Year after year the scholar must have sat down to write for a multitude of single sentences—for wisdom, wit, and indignation that are unforgotten."

The moody fury of a solitary and passionate nature has now irretrievably clouded the last day of a man full of noble and surpassing powers, but deformed by salient defects. It is a terrible thing to live so long—a man more terrible than death—a friend should think so. But in this dark hour when the London Times, the representative paper of England, has not the heart to open its columns to a whose name English Literature must always respect, but dare not in the judgment of the Bar as a common scene, let every cultivated American who recalls his great debt to this indomitable English scholar visit his desk as the dishonored fugitive bend goes by.

THE LOUNGER ventures to plead with "A. H." How can she ruthlessly starve to be melted? Does she not know that the stage-fright is nothing compared with the woman-fright, and that many a nut of the chain and the dinner tables is silent and shy in the presence of the sex? Is it, oh "A. H.," because the sun puts out the fire? As Janet, then, don't suppose it is cold because it looks pale and dull.

"Sole kindly,
Tenderly, over thy kingdom fair!
For we that love, we love so blindly."

TO A. H.

I can't get on with words,
I don't know why! I don't know why!
My case is quite uncommon,
And makes me ugly! and makes me sigh!

The men a favorite call me—
I've many friends to make amends—
At clubs some would blackball me;
But—there it ends! oh! there it ends!

I tell you, other
When I'm in love, I don't know why,
I'm never interesting,
But always dull and always shy.

And oh! my hopes all crushing,
"I'm such a bore, what makes me sigh!
This unamusing and blushing—
That all is not right, I know why!"

And words, too, quite forsake me;
I can't be cool! I can't be cold!
And nobody will take me,
I'm such a fool! I'm such a fool!

But if your hushes scorned
You'll deign to choose, you'll deign to choose,
You'll find me fond and fervent,
But you'll refuse, you'll refuse!

I can't get on with women,
I don't know why! I don't know why!
My case is quite uncommon,
And makes me sigh! and makes me sigh!

O. L. R.

HOMEOPATHIC HOAX.

INCENDIARY.

A RECKLESS Scamp upon Staten Island declares that "Governor King's proclamation is later in the day than is generally supposed; for the island has been under Martial Law for nearly a year!"

A FRESH DEAL.

THE Lounger is this week wrapped in the sheet and carries the caudle of penitence, for his attempted slip of last week, of which he has been promptly reminded, as will appear from what follows both below and above board:

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY, September, 1858.

"MESSRS. CARLTON, SMITH, & DANIELS desire to present their most respectful regards to Lounger, and to suggest to him that he has signally failed in a sum of multiplication, for which, had the element of tobacco been an earth, and engaged in teaching him, he should have received a severe reprimand from his employer.

"The Lounger exhorted some of his correspondents to 'make a deal.' We applauded the advice, for the purpose of solving an arithmetical problem, and determining how many cards were in a pack of 52 and 13.

"Whether such a person can be considered an authority on cards in a subject which we leave for torrential consideration."

NEW YORK, September.

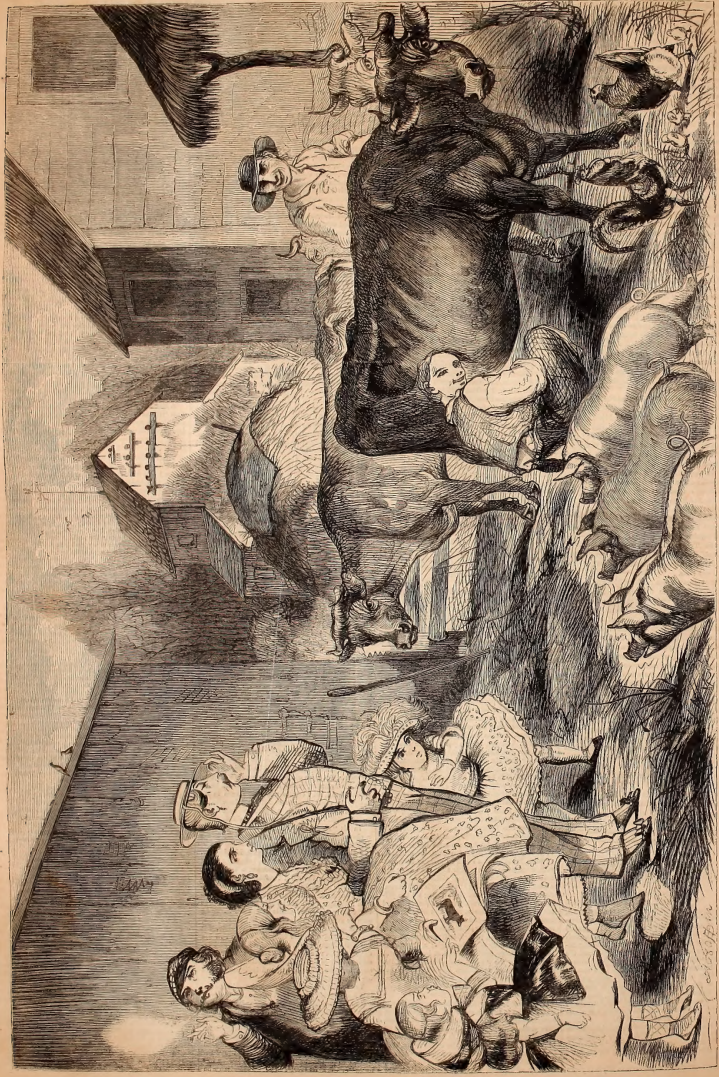
"MR. LOUNGER.—Will you allow a few more words to be said in regard to the 'spots' in a pack of cards, in accordance with what appeared in a recent issue of 'Harper's Weekly?'

"I, and others, have in our hands a number of packs, purchased at different times, and have counted in each pack the number of spots in a pack of playing cards. You must remember that it is several years since I learned the game, and was prepared to have made the assertion; and cards, as well as other things, have changed since then. I have not the least doubt that I was then in existence, but the 'old fashioned' ones were by no means to be found.

"The 'knave' of any suit represents an eleven spot, for it is called eleven in every game; a queen represents a twelve spot, in the same manner; and a king a thirteen spot. Adding the spots in each card contained in these three spots upon them—in a different color, generally, from the ordinary spots—we arrive at the number 52 N. E. for instance, printed across the face of a one-dollar bank-note, which I received a few days since from the most scrupulously back behind and partially covered by the remainder of the pack—and will intended to be dealt and laid and form a prominent feature.



"By counting the spots upon each pack of cards, or counting the spots on a modern pack for what they represent, you have the number 365, or the days in an ordinary year. But it is generally considered and was considered when I learned the game, that the spots had especially as to ridiculous that they represented the number of days of counting one more than any other card in the pack; and the ace of spades—the number one—was considered to be an extra spot—a small one inside of a large skirmish character of the sanskrit, and was represented by a single spot. Now, to make up the required number of spots mentioned by the soldier, add this honorary one to the 364 already given, and 365 will be done.

"A CONSTANT READER.

"JOHN SMITH, PENNSYLVANIA, September, '58.

"MY DEAR SIR,—Your favor of the 10th September 11, I've undertake to explain the way the old soldier managed to get 365 spots in a pack of cards, so telling it to be ready wit, etc.: and then you go on to telling it to be ready wit, etc.: again. Now if, after applying there are but 52 spots in them such authorities as Smith, Dibdil, and Colburn, you will please to find out 365 spots, I will be very much obliged to your own hand. The cards which we use in this section of country are but 52 spots; but I suppose there are more would be acceptable, but the Arkansas cards don't reach us. You recollect the peculiarity of them.

"A CONSTANT READER."

FIFTH AVENUE IN THE COUNTRY.

FIFTH AVENUE IN THE COUNTRY.

THE picture on the preceding page will explain itself. When FITZ-WILLIAM MONTGOMERY, who has recently come into his uncle's property on Fifth Avenue, so far forgets the obligations of his rank as to seek country air and recreation in the dog-days in an unfashionable rural resort, he not unfrequently realizes the predicament which the artist has depicted. Flies, cows, milk-maids in shirt-sleeves and breeches, fat-bodied cocks and hens, farm servants not à beau de rose, troughs full of the provender which are also told the Prodigal Son (poor fellow!) was once glad to get—what a contrast to the artistic, genteel, upright and shining company which FITZ-WILLIAM leads! How he stares and sniffs! And who laughs the heartiest, his party at the rustics, or the rustics at them?

HYMN TO OLD OCEAN.

ROLL softly, Ocean! o'er thine ancient bed,
So long unchained by any power but thine;
No longer lift in pride thy heavy head,
Or toss thy locks in wild, unconquered glee.—
Thou hast at length been conquered, oh, thou fleet!

Down, down, beneath thy darkest, deepest wave,
Where ever-brooding stillness reigns serene—
Far, far below the seaman's nameless grave,
Thid coral stems and lovely sparkling shoots.
A strange, dark, gliding form is dimly seen!

The monster shapes thy restless deep supplies
Play their huge gambols round the slender thing,
And stand—and shoot—with wild, unearthly cry,
When from its magic touch they upward spring.
And dreadful lightnings make their arches ring!

Hush, hush thine awful thunders, sounding Sea!
Oh! cradle softly on thy mighty breast
This child of Science we entrust to thee—
Ah! lull it gently to its eternal rest,
Nor break the bond that makes two nations blend!

Ay—hush thy thunders—for "the still, small voice"
That whispers low across this far ocean
And bids our heart-strings tremble or rejoice,
Is louder than thy fiercest mountain-waves,
When storm and ocean are the tempest raves.

No more shall pining wife or mother wait
The back'e slow passage, for the welcome word
That back the anxious one hugs to her heart
Of darling son, or beamed, absent lord—
Swift as the lightning flash this cord shall speak,
And call the world with its faded hopes to seek!

The same sweet Power that whispered "Peace, be still!"
When thy rude dashings touched his sacred feet,
Has bent over thee, old Ocean! to His will,
And caused "the end of earth" to be as next;
Praise to His holy name! we can no more,
But bow our hearts in silence—and adore!

LAUNCH OF A NEW CRINOLINE.

A LADY of Fashion launched a new Crinoline last week in Union Park. The attempt was perfectly successful, several little boys, who had been attracted by the novelty of the sight, being honor to the occasion by cheering lustily. A policeman looked on, but displayed, in addition, a new stock, his wisdom by not interfering. The Crinoline in question was built at the celebrated establishment of Messrs. Ferguson & Pendleton, Nos. 1 and 3 Jones Street, on the second floor, though, we believe, the bold design and general execution of the fine sweeping proportions emanated in the first instance from the accomplished scissors of Madame Selbe (Ann) Smith (the leading architect of the firm, and German cousin of the first lady), who steadily, if we are not misinformed, for several years under some of the most talented mistresses of the divine art, in some of the most inspired ateliers in Paris. The boldness of the conception is such that Michael Angelo himself, had Necessity driven him to work for a mistress, would be fain to feel ashamed to have owned it for his handicraft. The workmanship is of the most exquisite nature, double silk having been used all throughout the building. It occupied six apprentices incessantly for five days, though they worked in their attic of the cause not less than fourteen hours every day, and on one occasion, nervously anxious to sustain the reputation of the house had guaranteed to send home the dress the following morning, they never went to bed at all! The high finish of the execution reflects the greatest credit on all concerned. It is a truly noble specimen of milliner's architecture, there not being a slip from which how many there are between the heel and the hip) but what is a perfect bell.

The following proportions will give some idea of the enormous size of this new Crinoline:

	Feet.	Inches.
Extreme length	8	7
Length on the pavement	3	6
Size of pocket for manchette, etc.	2	6
Extreme breadth across the shoulders	1	8
Extreme breadth round the base	18	0
Breadths let in obliquely	3	0
Depth of flounces	1	3
Bardes in pounds	92	15—3-8ths

The new Crinoline is Paris-rigged. Its colors are classed as fait on a rich brown and azure ground. The pennant flying at her head is a small marabout feather. The cost of its construction, with its fittings up and all, was little short of $12; a very insignificant sum, when we take into consideration the immensity of the dimensions, which are unquestionably the largest of any Crinoline that ever left the slips of a milliner's building-yard. A companion exactly similar was instantly put on the stocks of the establishment, and will be ready in ten days, if not sooner, the fair craft having received orders to cruise without loss of time in the harbor.

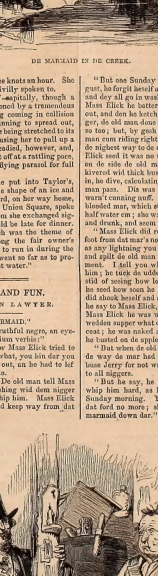
Notwithstanding her bulky build, the new Crinoline sails very lightly, doing easily, without pitching or rolling, her two or three knots an hour. She answers readily, too, when civilly spoken to.

The Crinoline started off—spitfully, though a momentary delay was occasioned by a tremendous bolt of a Newfoundland Dog coming in collision with the train that was beginning to spread out, with every bit of sauce antique being stretched to its last stitch, behind, and so causing her to pull up a little too taut. She soon steadied, however, and, hoisting a Houston rail, went off at a rattling pace, which she maintained with flying pennant for full two hours and a half.

Later in the afternoon she put into Taylor's, and took in provisions, in the shape of an ice and a wafer biscuit; and afterward, on her way home, scudding gayly through the Union Square, spoke with a yachtsman, with whom she exchanged signals of distress, lest she should be late for dinner.

The success of the Launch was the theme of ecstatic congratulation among the fair owner's young friends who happened to run in during the morning. One young lady went so far as to pronounce it "a duck of the first water."

FACT, FANCY, AND FUN.



BY A SOUTHERN LAWYER.

"PLAYING MARMAID."

THIS following is from a truthful negro, an eyewitness to the scene in "totium veritas:"

"And you neber hear how Mass Elick tried to play marmaid? I tell you what, you kin dar you die laughing. His bref gin out, an he had to let de element be warnt torn into.

"I tell you how it was. De old man tell Mass Elick, nex time he go in washing wid dem nigger boys Sunday, he gwine to whip him. Mass Elick no take cantion from dis, and keep way from dat creek long time.

DE MARMAID IN DE CREEK.

"But one Sunday morning in de month of August, he forgit what and tuck de nigger boys down, and dey all go in washing. I turn by dar, and tell Mass Elick he better mind, de old man find him out, and den he ketch it. He say dar was no danger, de old man done went to meeting. I thought to my self, by gosh! I look up and seed de old man cum riding right down to de creek, which war de nighest way to de church, on horseback. Mass Elick seed it was no use to run, so he went down on de side de old man was coming, which war kivered wid thick bush, and jis as de old man ride by, he dive, calculating to stay under dar till de old man pass. Dis was cunning in Mass Elick, but warn't cunning nuff. De old man war on he highblooded mar, which stop to drink, and jerry he no half water cm; she was dry for true, and did drank and drunk, and seem like she neber git nuff.

"Mass Elick did rose outs dat water 'bout two foot from dat ole mar jist like marmaid; quicker as any lightning you ebber seed, dat mar snap ends and split de old man clean outs right into de element. I tell you what, dar was so marmaid in him; he tuck de udder side of dat question, and he stid of seeing how long he stay under dat water, he seed how soon he bile outs dar. And when he did shook hesself and dashed de water out he hab, he say to Mass Elick, 'Whar did you come from?' Mass Elick he was wunner off dan de man at de wedden supper what did not have on de fashionable coat; he was naked as Adam in de orchard, afore he tasted on de apple question: he was silent.

"But when de old man tuck de path for home, de way de mar had scooted, de way Mass Elick buse Jerry for not watering dat mar, was caution to all niggers.

"But he say, he reckon de old man wouldn't whip him hard, as he tuck a splunge hesself dis Sunday morning. You neber git dat mar to cross dat ford no more; she always consate she small marmaid down dar."

"THERE IS BUT ONE WAY TO DO A THING—A RIGHT WAY AND A WRONG ONE, AND I'VE MISSED BOTH."

THE MAN WHO FAILED AFTER TRYING BOTH THE RIGHT AND WRONG WAY.

LOXO before the days of soda-founts there lived in the classic village of Athens, in the State of Georgia, an old character by the name of Byers, or "Uncle Johnny Byers," as he was more familiarly called. His occupation was that of retail grocery-keeper. Two very prominent traits exhibited themselves in his characteristic economy and drunkenness. Which of these passions mostly predominated, was well understood by all who knew him. As much as he loved intoxicating drinks, he loved gold more! He has been known to stand for days and weeks amidst tempting temptations, and all the allurements to entice the appetites of others, and never touch a drop. But let one of his customers call for half a pint (they are thought less in those days), and leave none of it, no matter what kind, and Johnny Byers would not return it to the vessel from whence he drew it; nor, by any means, would he throw it away; he considered it clear gain, and would drink it himself. From this grocery "trait" he derived all his grog.

A weighty patron of John's, knowing well his frugal habits, determined to see to what extent he could be carried by them. One morning in Arch Bob (for such was his name) called at the grocery, and asked for a glass of soda-water.

"It is early in the season; besides, I don't know I have any of the powders: wouldn't lemonade do as well?" said Johnny.

"I must have soda or nothing," replied Bob.

"Let me see if I can find a box," said the grocery-keeper; and, after a considerable search, produced a small oblong tin box containing the desired powders, and a printed label on the top, directing how they should be mixed, etc.

"It's been so long since I made any I have forgotten how it is mixed," continued Johnny.

Putting on his glasses and taking up the box, he read the directions, but evidently not for the first to hear, as follows: "Put the contents of the white paper in a tumbler two-thirds filled with water, and the contents of the blue paper in another tumbler half filled with water; put the lemon-syrup in the tumbler containing the water and the blue powder; mix and drink while effervescing." He mixed the powders according to the directions, but when he turned to get the syrup, Bob drained the tumbler! As soon as he sirup reached the soda, the combination commenced a terrific bubbling.

"Jerusalem! I have missed it!" said Johnny. Throwing the contents of both tumblers together, he gulped the "ill-brewed beverage" down; and as the last of it passed his throat, his countenance gave unmistakable signs that a strange and suspicious feeling was forming in seeking acquaintance with the coats of his stomach. He studied the glasses, and said he was not particular enough in reading the instructions; so he took the examination of the label, he made a second effort, with the same result. Bob enjoyed the joke amazingly. With a loud and profane exclamation Johnny swore he had missed it again, and again swallowed the nauseous draught.

Believing his now crowded stomach with a loud gurgle, he clapped it again his tumbler, and somewhat excited loudly there should be no mistake next time.

Placing his hat on the counter, and putting the top of the box containing the label on it, he read loud enough to be heard across the street, "Put the contents of the white paper in my tumbler, the contents of the white in another; pour the lemon-sirup in the tumbler containing the contents of the white." Here it was my turn to say a word or two; there can not be any mistake this time." As he turned to get the sirup, Johnny "caught on" and Bob had him again! Astonishment, impatience, and anger, were all visible in his countenance, when, in a frenzy of excitement, he threw the box, threw back his head, and swallowed for the third time the incongruous mixture. He complained of sour-belch, water-brash, and an inclination to burst open! told Bob he must call in the evening, and, if he wanted, would learn by that time how to mix the "stuff."

Bob would not be put off; must have the soda-water then or never; insisted that the man who put up the powders made a mistake—those in the blue papers he intended for the white, and vice versa.

Johnny caught at the idea, prepared for a fourth trial, and this time Bob's gagging was not necessary. He was mixing wrong. Of course he failed, but did not fail to imbibe. Throwing himself back, placing his hands on his stomach—which he declared felt like turning inside out—he exclaimed, "I have had one way to do a thing—a right way and a wrong one; and I must be a great simpleton to have missed both!"

Bob then mixed the glass properly, and drank it off, to the astonishment of the gas-blown gracery-man. He also explained how he had tricked him.

"I shall charge you with five glasses of soda-water," said Johnny, greatly excited.

"Do you think it right for you to do all the drinking and make me pay for it, and you have a grocery?" replied Bob.

"Me do the drinking, indeed! The sour soapsuds should never have gone down my throat, but for you making me ruin the soda-water." The two last words seemed to have been thrown, by some sort of an explosion, into Johnny's nose; and if words could smell sour, they doubtless did. After a pause he said, if he had not seen so many fools take it without being killed, he would be very uneasy and alarmed about the load he had aboard—but was satisfied and consoled with the reflection that it was a medicine or drink not dangerous to men of small understandings. This, he thought, would save him; and looking angrily at Bob, he said "it was a good thing (for him) it set so well on the stomach of a rat—"

Here Johnny was seized with a very equivocal paroxysm, whether of vomiting, belching, choking, or bursting, Bob never staid to inquire; and left before the grocery-keeper recovered his breath sufficiently to drink the insulting and opprobrious epithet.

LITERARY.

THE LIFE OF MARY ANNE SCHIMMELPENNINCK, published by Longman, is a remarkable work. Intensely German, yet full of interesting literary anecdotes and sketches of eminent men. We take it up in passing only to extract a new and fresh ghost story to be added to the list:

"While Dr. Priestley occupied the post of librarian to Lord Shelburne, one day Mr. Petty, the precocious and gifted youth whom I have mentioned, sent for Dr. Priestley (Lord Shelburne being then absent, I think, in London). When the Doctor entered Mr. Petty told him he had passed a very restless night, and had been much disturbed by uncomfortable dreams, which he wished to relate to Dr. Priestley, hoping that by so doing the painful impression would pass away. He then said he dreamed he had been very unwell, when suddenly the whole house was in preparation for a journey; he was too ill to sit up, but was carried, lying down, into the carriage; his surprise was extreme in seeing carriage after carriage, in an almost interminable procession. He was alone, and could not speak; he could only gaze in astonishment. The procession at last wound slowly off. After pursuing the road for many miles toward London, it at last appeared to stop at the door of a church. It was the church at High Wycombe, which is the burial-place of the Shelburne family. It seemed, in Mr. Petty's dream, that he entered, or rather was carried into, the church; he looked back; he saw the procession which followed him was in black, and that the carriage from which he had been taken bore the semblance of a hearse. Here the dream ended, and he awoke. Dr. Priestley told him that his dream was the result of a feverish cold, and that the impression would soon pass off. Nevertheless he thought it best to send for the family medical attendant. The next day Mr. Petty was much better; on the third day he was completely convalescent, so that the doctor permitted him to leave his room; but as it was in January, and illness was prevalent, he desired him on no account to leave the house, and, with that precaution, took his leave. Late the next afternoon the medical man was returning from his other patients; his road lay by the gates of Bowood, and, as Lord Shelburne was away, he thought he might as well call to see Mr. Petty, and enforce his directions. What was his surprise, when he had passed the lodge, to see the youth himself, without his hat, playfully running to meet him! The doctor was much astonished, as it was bitterly cold, and the ground covered with snow. He rode toward Mr. Petty to rebuke him for his imprudence, when suddenly he disappeared—whither he knew not, but he seemed instantaneously to vanish. The doctor thought it very extraordinary; but that probably the youth had not wished to be found transgressing orders, and he rode on to the house; there he learned that Mr. Petty had just expired."

J. Hammond Trumbull, Esq., of Hartford, has heretofore laid the public under obligations by the publication of two volumes of the PUBLIC RECORDS OF THE COLONY OF CONNECTICUT, and is now about to issue a third volume, bringing the records down from 1667 to 1689. This publication is undertaken by Mr. Trumbull at his own expense, for the love he bears to Connecticut and her early history. He will publish only so many copies as are subscribed for prior to October 16. But the expense of the publication is nothing compared with the labor and skill required to decipher the hieroglyphics of those old times. We believe that it is well understood in New England that no other man is able to do it.

The records of the colony of Connecticut possess interest, in a historical point of view, which every American citizen, especially if of New England descent, will appreciate. Here are old wills, and old family names and stories. Here are the accounts of stout men and excellent women from whom we are all proud to claim descent, in their dealings with one another, with a common enemy, and with their God. The volumes already issued bear all the exciting character of romance. The pages are inexhaustible in interest. There is one last will of an old divine, in the first volume, which is a model of simple, yet grand, thought—a will which alone was a more valuable legacy than the lands it devised. We recommend every family of New England descent to subscribe for the forthcoming volume, and procure the first two with it. Mr. Trumbull's labors will be particularly valuable to the cause of history; and in the value which all historians will place on the books, enriched as they are by his careful and judicious notes, he will find the reward of his disinterested work.

William Radde (New York and Philadelphia) publishes a MANUAL OF HOMŒOPATHIC THEORY AND PRACTICE, with a treatise on the homœopathic treatment of surgical diseases, by Dr. Hempel and Dr. Beakley,* Professors in the Homœopathic Medical College of Pennsylvania. The volume is intended for family use as well as for students and practitioners. It opens with an essay on homœopathy and the law of cure according to this school of medicine. The body of the volume contains directions for the application of homœopathic remedies to each and every disease which flesh inherits.

Whatever has been the improvement introduced in medical science by homœopathy, about which doctors and patients differ, it is not to be denied that it has done much toward bringing common sense to bear on the treatment of diseases. Even when ridiculing the new doctrines as essentially absurd and senseless, the "regular practitioner" finds himself impelled to abandon the old-fashioned style of treatment according to rule, and apply to each case the results of his own examination and opinion, independent of the practice which his predecessors pursued in such cases.

There is a chance for advance in medical science now. All the wisdom of the world has not been exhausted heretofore, as some of the older sorts of medical men were wont to imagine. Already a little less medicine and a little more care is recommended by the most sensible allopathic physicians.

We confess that, until we examined the work before us, we did not know any thing about homœopathy. Too many who have condemned it as a system are as ignorant as we were. Dr. Hempel has a distinguished reputation in Philadelphia, while Dr. Beakley is known in New York, as well as the former city, as a very accomplished physician and surgeon, and a gentleman of excellent judgment and discretion. Probably no two homœopathic physicians could be found better qualified to prepare a manual of the theory and practice of their school. The volume is intended for family use; and we may safely recommend it even to those who are accustomed to the other practice; for its admirable directions on the general subject of health and disease; its sound advice, which all classes of medical men will approve; and, furthermore, as a very readable and intelligible account of the homœopathic practice.

No error is greater, as we learn from the book before us, than the idea that homœopathic physicians give only infinitesimal doses. In many instances, especially in cases of what is commonly called acute disease, the practice recommended is as severe as any allopathic physician ought to desire. In treating of fever and ague, the authors remark that "some attacks will yield perfectly to a few globules of the thirtieth potency of ipecacuanha; others have to be treated with quinine in substance; others, again, are readily controlled by a few globules of the thirtieth potency of cinchona; whereas, in thousands of cases, arsenic has to be given in doses of one-fifth of a grain."

We can not lay the book down without referring to the admirable essay on Hygiene, and the general care of the body. No family can fail to profit by the study of this chapter; and we recommend our readers, without consulting their medical advisers, to take the private advice of this book, which will be well worth ten times the fee to the publisher which it will cost them.

We have from Ticknor & Fields THE BETROTHED, in two volumes, being the continuation of the "Household Waverley." We can not too often call attention to this really exquisite edition, every successive volume of which tempts us to a new reading of the old favorites. The issue is approaching completion; and he who has taken it volume by volume will not feel the price, while he will possess a copy of Scott which we consider decidedly superior to any other extant, not even excepting the author's favorite edition.

Peterson publishes another novel by Mrs. Southworth—THE TWO SISTERS. The story, as usual with this lady, is chiefly laid in Virginia, but the history of Magdalen, the heroine, or one of the heroines, carries her through strange scenes and adventures in Paris and London. We have always admired the power of Mrs. Southworth as a writer, and consider some of her novels as of the highest rank. The present is, perhaps, equal in interest of plot to any she has written, but lacks the polish which she was formerly accustomed to give her finished works.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

STOPPAGE OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

MR. FIELD has published the following card: "I have received, from Newfoundland, a dispatch informing me that although the insulation of the ocean cable remains perfect, no message has come over it for several days. The last telegraphic dispatch that I received from England was dated London, September 1. What may be the cause of the cessation I do not know, but I conjecture that it is the change of the shore end at Valentia, which I was informed was about to be made.

"CYRUS W. FIELD.

"NEW YORK, September 8, 1858."

THE CABLE NOT BROKEN.

Mr. de Santy, the electrician in charge of the Atlantic telegraph at Trinity Bay, declines to make any statement relative to the cable for publication beyond the positive assurance to the Agent of the Associated Press that there are only temporary difficulties of an electrical nature, and that there is no reason whatever for the rumor that the cable had parted.

LATEST FROM SALT LAKE CITY.

The Salt Lake mail has arrived at Leavenworth. It was 21 days en route. The Mormons and the orderly and Government officials were attending to their business. As soon as the Associated Judges arrived, the trials for treason would be commenced. No arrests had yet been made. The Indians were very troublesome about the city, and had killed several of the Mormons. One family were massacred while moving south. Dr. Forney, Indian agent, was out among the tribes making treaties, and has thus far been successful. Engineers were out locating the four posts on the western division of the mail route.

DOINGS AT SALT LAKE CITY.

The Times correspondent writes: "It is interesting to watch the rapidity with which this city is now improving in every respect. One can hardly realize that six weeks ago it was entirely deserted; that all these stores now thronged with customers were closed, and that all these dwellings now surrounded with noisy little urchins were fastened up, with doors nailed and windows boarded. Never before was this city the scene of such activity in every branch of business, and I doubt whether, since its foundation, the people have been more happy than at present. All look cheerful and contented, as if satisfied that they were now to be protected by the laws from whatever they may consider as oppression or imposition.

"The mercantile interests of the Territory will be attended to the coming season—for there will be no less than eight Gentile stores here during the next winter, the usual number having been two.

"About 600 wagons and 7000 oxen are employed in the transportation across the plains of the goods for these merchants."

WHO FIRST CONCEIVED THE OCEAN TELEGRAPH.

The directors of the Atlantic Telegraph have published a statement as to the origin of the Telegraph. We make the following extract: "With respect to Mr. Horace B. Tebbetts and Mr. Frederick N. Gisborne, the two persons particularly alluded to in those communications, there is written evidence to disprove the claims of both of them. The Charter of the Newfoundland Electric Telegraph Company, which was obtained by Mr. Gisborne in 1852, did not authorize nor allude to a telegraph across the ocean. When our negotiations with that Company began in the early part of 1854, we found it almost entirely in the hands of four persons, Mr. Tebbetts, Mr. Gisborne, Mr. Otis P. Jewett, and Mr. Darius B. Holbrook. With them the negotiations were carried on, principally through Mr. Tebbetts and Mr. Gisborne. To explain their plans and resources they put into our hand a copy of their charter, a prospectus, a list of their property, some testimonials to their engineer, and their latest circular, dated New York, January, 1854. In none of these is there the remotest allusion to crossing the ocean by telegraph.

"The charter of the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company was drawn by one of us, on the passage from Boston to St. Johns, and was introduced into the Legislature of Newfoundland, and was read for the first time on the 28th of March, 1854. This charter began by declaring that it was 'deemed advisable to establish a line of telegraphic communication between America and Europe by way of Newfoundland,' and by one section gave authority to establish a submarine telegraph across the ocean from Newfoundland to Ireland; by another section prohibited any other Company or person from touching the coast of Newfoundland or its dependencies with a telegraphic cable or wire from any point whatever for fifty years; and by a third section, granted the Company fifty square miles of land upon the completion of the submarine line across the Atlantic."

THE REPUBLICAN STATE CONVENTION.

The American and Republican Conventions failed to effect a union last week, and separate tickets have been nominated. Immediately on the assembling of the Republican Convention at Syracuse, on 9th, a motion was made to proceed to nominate, viva voce, candidates for Governor and all other State officers to be supported by the Republican party. It was urged that such a proceeding would be improper during the absence of the Committee of Conference, as their report might influence the future action of the Convention, and the motion was laid on the table, after some debate. The motion was then made that when the nomination for Governor came up, it should be informal, and the vote be viva voce. A strong effort was made to strike out the words "viva voce," and insert in their place the words "by ballot," but it was voted down, after considerable discussion—149 to 85. General Nye, from the Committee of Conference, now reported the result of their deliberations, stating that it received the sanction of six out of the eight members composing the Republican committee. Messrs. Upham and Talcott, the two dissenting Republicans, then explained the grounds of their disagreement, when a very excited debate sprung up, which ended in the report being referred to the Committee on Resolutions, with instructions to report whether it formed a basis for a proper union, and an adjournment was had to two P.M. On reassembling, a series of resolutions was submitted against the acceptance of the report, and discharging the Conference Committee, which was adopted amidst considerable excitement. A motion was immediately made to proceed to ballot for a candidate for Governor, which motion was adopted, and, after some preliminary speech-making, the Hon. E. D. Morgan was nominated on the second ballot. The nomination was made unanimous; and Robert Campbell, of Steuben, was subsequently nominated by acclamation as candidate for Lieutenant-Governor. A Committee was appointed to notify the Americans of the action taken, and to inquire what names they had to propose. A recess of half an hour was then taken. After the recess the proceedings of the Republicans gave offense to the Americans, and all chances of a union were lost. The Convention perfected its ticket as follows:

For Governor.................... E. D. MORGAN.
For Lieutenant-Governor.......... ROBERT CAMPBELL.
For Canal Commissioner........... HIRAM GARDNER.
For State Prison Inspector........ —— EVEREST.

THE AMERICAN STATE CONVENTION.

The American Convention did not organize until 11 o'clock of 9th, owing to the delay of the Committee of Conference in agreeing upon a report. When the Committee came in, Mr. Brooks announced that a report had been agreed upon, unanimously on the part of the Americans, and nearly so on the part of the Republicans. A long and spirited debate ensued on the propriety of its adoption, when, it being understood that the Republicans had discharged their Committee and taken the report from their hands, pending a motion to lay the resolutions on the table, the Convention adjourned till 3 o'clock. On reassembling, the proposition to table was lost. Various messages then passed to and fro between the two Conventions, relative to the terms of an agreement, but it was found impossible to coalesce, and the Americans proceeded to the nomination of an independent State ticket, which was perfected as follows:

For Governor.................... LORENZO BURROWS.
For Lieutenant-Governor.......... N. S. BENTON.
For Canal Commissioner........... J. R. THOMPSON.
For State Prison Inspector........ W. A. RUSSELL.

The Convention, after mutual congratulations, then adjourned.

COLLISION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES TROOPS AND THE CIVIL AUTHORITIES.

At the Ocean House ball a body of the Government troops were called upon to keep order, and the Newport News tells the following story of the consequences: "Certain streets and avenues leading to and past the Ocean House were tabooed to the public during the ball, and soldiers were detailed to guard them. The moment those assembled saw these streets guarded by United States soldiers, their 'dander' was up, and continued to rise as they saw individuals and carriages summarily ordered about by the soldiers. About ten o'clock, the Mayor drove up in his carriage. Being told that no carriage would be allowed to pass an avenue open to the public on other occasions, he concluded that he was the right man to test the matter, and essayed to pass through in his carriage, when a soldier on horseback rode up and ordered him to stop. The Mayor declared his determination to proceed, and told the fellow to go about his business or he would have him put in the watch-house. At the same moment, a by-stander informed the soldier that he was addressing the Mayor of the city. The only reply was, 'I don't care a d—n for the Mayor or any body else,' and drawing his sabre, he rushed forward after the Chief Magistrate, who by this time had passed up and alighted from his carriage, coming near trampling him under his horse's feet. The Mayor at once sent for the manager of the ball and asked him what it all meant, and was referred to Colonel Magruder. This gentleman, on being remonstrated with for the unwise proceeding of bringing a detachment of soldiers into the city under such circumstances, expressed his willingness to remove them 'in the course of the evening.' The Mayor insisted on an immediate removal, or they would be forcibly removed, by his orders, to the watch-house. The soldiers were immediately withdrawn and sent back to the Fort, and quiet restored."

ONE OF THE ILLINOIS CANDIDATES.

They tell this story of Lincoln in Southern Illinois, where he resides: Being out in the woods hunting, he fell in with a most truculent looking hunter, who immediately took a sight on him with his rifle.

"Halloa!" says Lincoln, "what are you going to do, stranger?"

"See here, friend; the folks in my settlement told me if ever I saw a man uglier than I was, then I must shoot him; and I've found him at last."

"Well," said Lincoln, after a good look at the man, "shoot away: for if I am really uglier than you are, I don't want to live any longer!"

PERILS OF SERVICE AT QUARANTINE.

One of the reporters tells the following story about one of the police sergeants who has been ordered to do duty at Quarantine: "Yesterday, Sergeant Sam Brevoort stole a few moments from his arduous labors as Commissary to take a walk over the Quarantine grounds. After looking among the tents and new buildings erected, he seated himself on a long rough box under the shade of a tree, and was quietly reflecting upon the unpoetic character of camp life, and the utter want of exalted sentiment in the employment of furnishing beef, bacon, beans, potatoes, bread and butter to sixty policemen. But his reverie was interrupted by hearing a voice, and looking about, he discovered one of the hospital employés addressing him, and the dialogue proceeded as follows:

"'Hullo there, you sojer man,' said the employé.

"'Well,' said Sam, rather vexed at the want of appreciation of his official position, 'what do you want?'

"'Like your seat?' was the next question.

"'Yes,' said Sam. 'Suppose I do. What then?'

"'Well, I only wanted to say that the man in the box you're settin' on died of the yallar jack yesterday, and I kinder thought you might like to know the fact.'

"Sam jumped about twelve feet without stopping to thank the party for his information; he left the Hospital grounds to resume his duties among the commissariat."

MURDER WILL OUT.

A dog recently brought a skull to his master in the woods near Detroit, Michigan, and on investigation the body of a railroad conductor named John Hickey, formerly of Georgia, was discovered. He must have been killed nearly a year ago. An Irishman named Kennedy is suspected of the murder, but he has escaped. The Detroit Free Press says:

"We have here a case which does not often offer. A man is murdered, robbed, and left in the woods, in the midst of a swamp. The murder remains a secret for nearly a year, and is finally revealed by a dog, which brings the skull of the murdered man to his master, having gnawed it for his supper. The letters found reveal the names of the murdered man and the murderer, after the silence of months had rested upon the terrible deed. The murderer is tracked from one extremity of the Union to the other; three times escapes, as if by the interposition of a supernatural aid; and still remains at liberty. The proofs that can be brought against him are overwhelming, and would result in his conviction if he could be found. The facts, until now, have been confined to those first cognizant of them, but so long a time having elapsed, the propriety of making them public is no longer doubtful. The murderer is thought to be somewhere in the North, probably in Illinois or some other Western State."

PERSONAL.

J. R. Giddings, of Ohio, is engaged in writing the "History of the Anti-Slavery Fight in Congress," and his retirement will enable him to finish the work at an early day.

The subjoined card appears among the advertisements of a Richmond daily paper:

"TO THE PEOPLE OF VIRGINIA!—I hereby proclaim myself a candidate for the office of Governor of the State of Virginia, and shall urge, with whatever ability I possess, the wisdom of accepting 100,000,000 of acres of the public land, the money accruing therefrom to be applied to the gradual extinction of Slavery, by purchasing the young slaves and their migration beyond the United States. Had Virginia applied the 100,000,000 of acres that she gave to the United States in 1787 to this purpose, the banks of her majestic rivers would now be teeming with a thrifty white population, and strewn with cities, villages, and cottages. She would (among all the States of the Federal Union) have been first in Agriculture, first in Commerce, and first in Manufactures. Give me but a fair field to combat my rivals—I ask no other favor—and the triumph shall be mine.

"Your servant, ever faithful and true,

"HENRY ABRAM."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE LAST TELEGRAPHIC MESSAGE.

The Times publishes the following messages, the last received from Newfoundland at our latest dates from England:

"NEWFOUNDLAND, August 24, 11 30 P. M.

"Two miles shore end ample; have half mile small cable plenty: it is stowed on the beach. Two splicers and jointers here. Six gallons naphtha required. Please send authority to draw on Brooking £100, required immediately for laborers' house in a wilderness. Roads to make and woods to cut and clear. Ought to have some more relays; have only one. Great difficulty in sending letters from here. Have written fully."

"VALENTIA, Wednesday, 1 A.M.

"The cable is now working splendidly. We are conversing freely with Newfoundland.

"The signals to and from are strong and perfect. A telegram has just been received, dated New York, 25th, 12 53 A.M., stating that the Persia has taken the Europa's passengers and mails."

DECLINE IN THE COMMERCE OF ENGLAND.

The Board of Trade Returns for the month of July show a decrease in the declared value of exports to the extent of more than a million and a quarter as compared with the same month last year—a fact that proves how slowly England is recovering from the great financial crisis of '57. In the foreign trade for the month an increase appears, of the outward entries, of 372 ships and 4679 tons, and on the inward entries of 119 ships and 41,000 tons. The inward coasting trade has increased; but there is a slight falling off in the outward entries.

MORPHY'S GAMES AT CHESS.

Bell's Life contains the following: "Mr. Morphy (who is only about twenty years of age) has favored us with the exact score of all the games he has played since he came to the old country, not thinking it worth while to include a number of games played giving the large odds of rook or knight, all of which he has won. Beginning with Herr Lowenthal—while we write the match is not over; but Morphy has but one more party to win. They have played twelve games, of which Morphy scores eight, draws one, and loses three. With Mr. Barnes, of the St. George's Club, Mr. Morphy has played twenty-six games, winning nineteen and losing seven. With Mr. Boaden, Morphy has played nine games, winning five, losing one, and drawing three. Of twelve games contested with Mr. Bird, Morphy gained no less than ten, drawing one and losing one. With Mr. Hampton, the American has played and won two games; and of six played against the veteran Herr Lowe, the American wins six. With the Rev. Mr. Owen, Morphy played five games, winning four and losing one; and then, giving pawn and move for a match of five games, won all five, drew two, and lost none! It was agreed that if Mr. Morphy beat Mr. Owen at pawn and move, he was to play a second match at pawn and two moves, which second match we shall, doubtless, therefore, hear of in due course, Morphy being remarkably given to carry out all his undertakings."

MR. MORPHY'S LAST GAMES.

The Birmingham Journal has the following: "On Friday the proceedings were almost entirely suspended for the purpose of watching the progress of a chess-playing feat never before witnessed in England. We refer to Mr. Morphy's playing eight games blindfold. His opponents were Lord Lyttelton, President of the Association; Mr. Salmon, the best player Ireland affords; Mr. Kipping, a very strong player; Mr. Avery, Mr. Carr, D. Freeman, Mr. Rhodes, and Mr. Y. R. Wills. The play commenced at one o'clock and terminated about a quarter past six, and resulted in Mr. Morphy winning every game except the one with Mr. Kipping, Secretary of the Manchester Club. The match between Messrs. Staunton and Morphy stands thus: Stake £500 a side, the scorer of the first eleven wins; to commence on the 1st November next."

NEWS FROM THE LAST ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

Captain Collinson has received the following letter from Captain M'Clintock, who started early last year on another expedition for the discovery of some traces of Sir John Franklin:

"YACHT FOX, HOLSTEINBORG,
"Commenced May 3, 1858, closed May 7.

"MY DEAR COLLINSON,—Our cruise hitherto has been short and sharp, most lamentably short, indeed, but, thank God, it is not at an end; the real work is only now beginning. We have only got to repeat the attempt this year. Our progress was finally stopped in Melville Bay, August 18, from which time up to the 25th of April we remained in the pack, drifting southward with it. While beset, we have drifted from 75½° N. to 63½° N.; the whole amount is 1194 geographical miles. You will understand what disappointment and anxiety this ill-fortune entailed upon me. For a whole month in Melville Bay our fate hung in the balance. The season was very similar to that of 1848, when I was with Sir John Ross; the whole bay was crammed full of light pack, and there was no land ice. Having previously examined the edge of the middle ice down as far as 72 20 without any prospect of success, there was but one course open to me—to enter the pack whenever a favorable opportunity offered, and trust to boring through into the north water. This is what Sir J. Ross did; and being on the same spot, and also on the same day, and, moreover, a very favorable opportunity of long leads opening out, I tried the same plan. We did not succeed; a long run of southerly winds closed the ice together so much that it did not open again. Still I had the precedent of the North Star from which to draw the hope of a drift through into the north water; and this, I think, we should have done in time to save our season but for the grounding of some bergs on a bank off Cape York which it has been our lot to discover. We drifted up within 24 miles of that cape, and subsequently far to the westward before commencing our southern march."

PROSPECTS OF CAPTAIN M'CLINTOCK.

"We are in excellent health, and the ship uninjured. She leaks a little, and we had to pump her out all winter three times weekly. Forty tons of coal remain on board, and we will take in as much more at the Waigat. As for provisions, we have, excellent in quality, of salt meat seventeen months', preserved meat and pemmican thirteen months', etc. From this you will see how well provided we are, and how easily we can complete ourselves for a third winter at Beechey Island. With regard to my future plans, I see no reason for departing from my original scheme. If early into the west water, I will thoroughly sift the Pond's Bay natives, so as to separate the history of Belcher's abandoned ships from such knowledge as they may possess respecting Franklin's ships. I hope to look into Port Leopold before visiting Beechey Island, as the former would be the place to which we would have to fall back. If the launch is injured, I will take a boat from Beechey Island, and leave her there should I go down Bellot Strait, or at Cape Walker, should I succeed in getting down Peel Strait. Should I get down to the Magnetic Pole I will pass on the east side of King William's Land, communicating with the natives, and into Fish River. If I can manage to complete my work in Fish River by ship, it would be an immense advantage to winter near the southwest angle of King William's Land.

"Disco, May 24.—For the early part of this season I shall be among the whalers, leisurely following their motions; but, should they not persevere to the north as long as I think desirable, I must then judge for myself whether to persevere or return south with them, and seek a southern passage. I purpose sailing to-morrow morning. We shall long remember the kindness of Mr. and Mrs. Olrick and all here. Yours very sincerely,

"F. L. M'CLINTOCK."

THE THACKERAY AND YATES DIFFICULTY.

The Critic speaks as follows of the Thackeray and Yates difficulty: "Whether, as a contemporary asserts, Mr. Justice Willes has or has not given an opinion as to Mr. Edmund Yates's cause of action against the Garrick Club for having expelled him, we can not say. It is very unlikely that a judge would commit himself to an opinion upon a case which might possibly come before him in a judicial capacity; but whether that be so or not, we have little doubt that, if Mr. Yates prosecutes his case in a proper manner, the Committee of the Club will awake to the unpleasant fact that they have acted not only unwisely, but illegally. The Club is possessed, we understand, of funded property to the amount of £3000 or £4000, besides the lease of the house, the furniture, plate, wines, etc., and a very valuable collection of pictures. Now, when a member has paid his entrance fee and subscription, he acquires an equal share and ownership with the other members of the Club in each and every part of the property which belongs to the Club. The members are, in point of both law and fact, partners, and they take the common property share and share alike. It may, perhaps, be argued that the laws of the Club form part of each member's contract with his fellow-partners, and that the by-laws give a power of expulsion for gross misconduct or becoming infamous. Even granting that, the Committee will have some difficulty in proving that the description of Mr. Thackeray comes within either category. If we are not misinformed, it will be before a Court of Equity, and not of law, that this knotty point will have to be debated, inasmuch as Mr. Yates's best remedy is by a bill praying to have an account taken of the partnership property, and to have it sold by public auction, and his share of the proceeds paid to him. This seems a very pretty quarrel as it stands."

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR AGAIN.

MR. LANDOR has ended his long career with an act of speechless infamy. The London Times thus epitomizes the story:

"It is with unfeigned reluctance that we perform the duty which has been cast upon us of saying a few words about the trial which took place at Bristol on Monday last, in which Mr. Landor was defendant. Mr. Landor, as is sufficiently notorious, returned to England many years ago weary of his Tuscan expatriation. He fixed himself ultimately at Bath. In that city he made the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Yescombe. The lady was the plaintiff in the recent action. Acquaintance ripened by degrees into friendship, or at least into intimacy, and for many years Landor and the Yescombes were in constant, almost daily, intercourse; indeed, it appeared that Landor was in the habit of dining with them about three times a week. In their family there resided for some time a young lady to whose name, although it was mentioned at the trial, we have no wish to give any additional publicity. For some cause unexplained it was judged right that she should leave the Yescombes and be removed to Cheltenham; and this it was which roused Mr. Landor's anger, and led to the publication of the libels. Omitting the dirt, here are a few of the points charged against a lady by Walter Savage Landor: He said that she had been guilty of perjury; that he had given her £18 to pay for him, and that she had stolen half the money; that she had stolen £5 out of a letter which he had given her to put in the Post-office; that she had retained a tradesman's receipt—had not given him the money, but had availed herself of the receipt; that she had stolen seven shillings from the counter of a tradesman's shop: that she had obtained £100 from him under false pretenses. Now, it was not pretended by Mr. Landor's legal advisers that there was a shadow of pretense for any of these charges. They were the mere outpourings of a venomous and cankered spirit.

THE ANONYMOUS LETTERS.

"Mr. John Forster, the gentleman whose name is so well and so favorably known in the literary world, went down to Bath to see if he could not put an end to a dispute which, as he saw at a glance, could only bring shame and discredit upon Landor. Mr. Forster succeeded in obtaining the old poet's initials to an apology, in which he withdrew all the offensive and libelous charges which he had concocted and circulated against Mrs. Yescombe, and added a promise that they should not be repeated. This well-meant and judicious interference was not, however, destined to be productive of any permanent effect. No sooner was Mr. Forster's back turned but Mr. Landor renewed his attacks, and this time with the most cowardly weapon in the slanderer's armory. Walter Savage Landor, the poet, the man of letters, the gentleman just tottering on the verge of the grave, actually condescended to have recourse to the expedient of anonymous letters, and these letters contained such filth that one may well wonder how the ideas could occur to a human brain. Friendship and sound judgment could do no more for him. One of these anonymous letters was so utterly and indescribably filthy that the counsel for the plaintiff declined to import it into the case. Landor was saved, like the skunk, by the very intensity of his own dirt. When the counsel on his side was called upon, he could not say a word in the defense of the nasty old man, except that the jury should consider his great age. When Landor was a young man, or even a man in middle life, filth was the fashion. A wit and good fellow of the days of the Regency would now be scouted out of decent society if he made any effort to be amusing in his own peculiar line. In such a school Landor had been brought up, and therefore it was suggested that he should be judged by the morality of a former day rather than by the rules of decent behavior which obtain in our own time. Of course the jury would not listen for a moment to such palliation as this. The end was a verdict for £1000 damages against Mr. Landor; but this is the lightest portion of the result. How ineffable is the disgrace to a man of Mr. Landor's ability and reputation, at the close of a long life to be mixed up with so disgraceful a transaction! A slanderer, and the slanderer of a lady—a writer of anonymous letters, and these letters reeking with the foulest odors of the dirtiest stews—a violator of his pledged word—who is it to whom these words must now be applied?

'Who would not weep if Atticus were he?'"

PERILS OF CRINOLINE.

The Border Advertiser says: "The following incident was witnessed the other day, and is, perhaps, the most amusing instance that ever attended the wearing of those hooped balloons in which it is the rage of the present fashion of the fair sex to incase themselves. On the top of Nelson's Monument, on the Calton Hill, Edinburgh, three young ladies appeared, emerging from the rather narrow labyrinthine stair-case which leads on to the gallery, with skirts of enormous extent, which had evidently sustained some squeezing in the progress up. This feat they had managed with the determination which generally distinguishes the sex; but now the question was, How were they to get down again? A pretty strong draught was ascending the funnel-like opening, which completely inflated the crinoline skirts, and in vain did they endeavor to squeeze their hoops into any thing like moderate compass for the descent. The scene that followed baffles description, and had nearly been the death, from convulsions, of the gentlemen who accompanied the party. The result was that two of them were obliged actually to take off the hoops, while the third did not escape to terra firma without the sacrifice of a fine green barège dress, which was torn to shreds in her frantic efforts to accommodate herself to the straitness of the occasion. Let fashionable young ladies make a note of this before they attempt the ascent of the monument on a breezy day."

FRANCE.

PROGRESS OF DESPOTISM.

The Paris correspondent of the Times asserts that the administration of M. Delangle has not realized the expectation of fairness and moderation held out at his advent to power. On the 30th of last month twenty persons passed through Toulon on their way to the dismal swamps of Cayenne. These poor wretches had not been sentenced by any public court; they were deported under the so-called law of public safety after secret examination. Among the unfortunates was M. Delecluze, prefect of the department of the Nord under the republic. The treatment of this gentleman was cruel in the extreme.

A NEW SORT OF MAN-OF-WAR.

It is said that a vessel is about to be built at Cherbourg, to be called Vaisseau-bélier (battering ram), a sort of man-of-war, of which the first idea belongs to the Emperor, and which is intended to act by its mass and by its speed; and an expectation is expressed that the introduction of this new element into naval warfare will completely change its character.

PROBABLE MARRIAGE OF THE DUKE OF MALAKOFF.

The Morning Post says: "The Duke de Malakoff is shortly about to repair to Paris en congé. It is understood that, in all probability, the illustrious and gallant bachelor will not return as such to these shores.

"The future duchess is said to be a French lady connected by family ties with the Empress Eugénie.

"It may be hoped, therefore, that the éclat so long and necessarily wanting to the French Embassy may be restored under the auspices of an embassadress."

The Observer says: "We are assured that it is to sign the marriage contract that the Emperor has put off for eight days his departure for Biarritz. It is also added that the dowry of Mademoiselle Valera will be given by the Emperor, and that it amounts to a million francs. Probably there is some exaggeration in this figure, but it is also stated that the trousseau is given by the Empress. It is further stated that the marriage will take place on the 8th of September, the anniversary of the taking of the Malakoff."

A WORK THAT TAKES 3000 YEARS TO WRITE.

The Paris correspondent of the Philadelphia Bulletin says: "In the course of this present month of August, the Academy will publish the first volume of its Historical Dictionary of the French language, a work commenced fifty years ago. The learned gentlemen have put into practice the precept of Boileau, who, in his Art Poetique, advises that we combine the qualities of the hare and the tortoise. The first volume of the dictionary contains about four hundred pages in 4to, and concludes with the word abusivement—an adverb that, in this case, seems rather epigrammatic, as far as regards the way in which the authors have used the patience of the public. If the Academy continues to labor with such impetuous zeal, it will reach the letter Z in about 3000 years. Quite an encouraging prospect for those who are inclined to subscribe."

MARRIAGE BETWEEN TWO WOMEN.

An extraordinary case is now pending before the civil Tribunal of Castelsarrazin, near Toulouse. A lady of that town, who was married so far back as 1845, has brought an action against her husband to have the marriage declared null and void, on the ground that he is not a man but a woman! The tribunal, at her request, has charged three physicians of Toulouse, all professors of the faculty of medicine there, to make a personal examination of the husband, and to report the result. The alleged woman is represented by the local journals to be five feet six inches high, and to be apparently of great strength.

A TAX ON THE EXPANSION OF HOOPED SKIRTS.

According to the Courrier de Charleroi the lessees of dancing saloons in Belgium complain bitterly of the falling off in their receipts, occasioned by the extra space now occupied by crinolines. An instrument, called the "Crinolimètre," has consequently been adopted by some of them, and persons whose crinolines surpass a fixed development are charged an extra admission fee. At a ball given on Sunday 22d, at Montigny, one female was measured and charged an extra 75 centimes; another person, of an economic disposition, preferred reducing her crinoline by taking out two hoops!

A CAT RACE.

A Paris correspondent writes: "Horse races, donkey races, carrier-pigeon races, human foot races, are familiar to all; and rather dear, it is to be feared, to many of your Anglo-Saxon readers. These sports are most of them as old as the races of men. It was reserved for the men of Liege to make an addition to our cursory amusements, undreamed of by nomadic Tartar or classic Greek, or aristocratic Englishman. They have instituted cat races, the first of which came off a few days ago—I should say a few nights ago, for this novel kind of race differs as much from others of the category in its accidents as, to use a term of the schools, in its quiddity. Eighteen cats, belonging mostly to persons living in one quarter of the city, were put into bags, and carried to a bridge more than a league distant, where they all took their start about midnight. The disposition of these animals to return always to their wonted place of abode is well known. The cat first back, under or on the roof of its fathers, came in at half past twelve, and won the prize. The larger part of the rest followed close, and made good time. Two or three only of the whole company, either laggard or dissipated, delayed their return till daylight—rare exceptions to the general rule of feline fidelity and morality.

TURKEY.

MORE OUTRAGES ON THE CHRISTIANS.

Advices are said to have been received in Paris from Trebizond of outrages having occurred in that quarter, arising from Mohammedan fanaticism. Some eighty Turks made a razzia on a town called Santa, while the Christian inhabitants were at a church at some distance, which was surrounded, so as to prevent information reaching them. They then completely stripped the town, and outraged the women and girls. Bashi-Bazouks are stated by the same advices to have fired on the encampment of the English Consul, who was on his route from Trebizond to Erzeroum.

EXTRAVAGANCE OF THE SULTAN.

The murmurs of the Turks at the extravagance of Abdul Medjid are growing louder and more general. The Sultan receives, out of a revenue of less than £8,000,000, a civil list of £1,200,000; but, not content with that, he has contracted debts to the amount of £4,000,000; and such is his mania for building palaces for himself and the different members of his family, that he has now in course of construction eight palaces and five kiosks, or smaller buildings, which are estimated to cost from £8,000,000 to £10,000,000. The present Ministry seem desirous to bring about a financial reform in the palace. They first asked for the reduction of the pay of divers functionaries, and for the abolition of certain offices which are absolutely unnecessary. A gracious answer was returned, but the hint was not taken; the extravagance of his Imperial Highness continued, so that the Ministers, finding more direct measures necessary, at last found courage to send in a new representation, signed by them all, giving a deplorable picture of the financial condition of the country, and pointing out the impossibility of going on any longer at the present rate. What the effect will be remains to be seen. If, as is feared, some self-seeking members of the Ministry try to gain favor by pleading that they were secretly opposed to such a bold and irreverent proceeding, there will be a change, not of the system, but of the Ministry.

ITALY.

NEAPOLITAN TYRANNY.

A letter writer says: "His Majesty is still at Ischia, and as a proof of the extraordinary precautions taken by the police, I may instance the following case: As the King was driving the other day a man held up his hand with a petition. His Majesty ordered him to be brought, and received his petition. Directly afterward he was seized by the gens d'armes, severely beaten, and then thrown into prison, where, after four days' confinement, his friends could obtain no information about him."

EGYPT.

AN ARAB IN THE WRONG BOX.

A letter from Cairo of the 9th says: "A curious circumstance occurred a few days ago in this city. A man wearing the costume of a cophte (Arab Christian) went to the shop of an Arab butcher who is noted for his antipathy to the Franks, and ordered some meat. When it was supplied the cophte objected that the weight was not exact, and the butcher in a rage began abusing him, after which he heaped curses on Christians in general. The cophte told him that he would complain to the zabet (police magistrate), and ordered the butcher to accompany him to the tribunal of that functionary. The butcher, thinking that the zabet would be sure to be on his side, readily consented, but on arriving at the tribunal, he found to his vexation that the zabet was no other than his customer. The butcher immediately received 500 blows on the soles of his feet, and was dismissed with a recommendation to be more respectful for the future to Christians."

INDIA.

THE PALACE OF THE GREAT MOGUL.

Mr. Russell, the correspondent of the Times, has gone to Delhi. We make the following extracts from his letters:

"And, now, we see before us the noblest battlemented wall on which my eyes ever rested. It is the wall of the Palace of the Mogul. A grand face of rich red sandstone, darkened by time, crenellated in two rows, rises to a height of fifty or sixty feet above us, and sweeps to the right and left in melancholy grandeur, slightly broken in outline by turrets and flanking towers. Except the Victoria gate of our new Palace of Westminster, I have seen no gateway so fine in proportion and of such lofty elevation. The massive iron and brass embossed doors open into a magnificent vestibule in a great tower, which rises high above the level of the walls, and is surmounted by turrets and four cupolas of elegant design. On passing the gates we find ourselves in a sort of arcade, vaulted and running for the length of the tower, in the midst of which there is a very small court richly ornamented with sculptured stone-work. The arcade conducts us to an open court-yard, surrounded by houses of excessively poor aspect. At one side there, in the turreted gateway, two of our countrywomen were brutally murdered. But in the court-yard before us a more terrible scene was enacted. There is a dry stone well, in which there once played a fountain, in the centre of the court. Above it a venerable and decaying tree casts an imperfect shadow over the stone seats on which, in former times, those who came hither to enjoy the play of the waters and their refreshing music were wont to repose. It was at this spot, beneath this tree, and round the fountain, that the Christian captives, women and children, after several days of painful respite and anxiety, worse than the fate they dreaded, were hacked to pieces by the swords of the ferocious and cowardly miscreants. Around the very place where that innocent blood ran like water, as grim monuments of retribution, are ranged, row after row, the guns taken from our enemy; our guards are in the gates; and of the many who took part in the murders, it is probable few live to dread the punishment which, sooner or later, will strike them. The mouldering walls of the palace buildings, broken lattices, crumbling stone-work, and doors and wood-work split, decayed, and paintless, the silence only broken by the tread of the sentry, or our own voices, rendered the whole place inexpressibly sad and desolate. But sadder still when one thought of the voices—of the cries—which resounded within these walls one short year ago.

THE "ELYSIUM ON EARTH."

"On ascending by a flight of steps four or five feet in height to the terrace on which the Dewan Khoss is built, and looking in through the wide arched door-ways, or rather between the rows of pillars on which the roof rests, we saw any thing but the dazzling magnificence for which our little reading had prepared us. In fact, the hall was filled, not with turbaned and bejeweled rajahs, Mogul guards, and Oriental magnificence, but with British Infantry in its least imposing and prepossessing aspect—namely, in its undress, and in its washing and purely domestic hours. From pillar to pillar and column to column extended the graceful arches of the clothes-line, and shirts, and socks, and drawers flaunted the air in lieu of silken banner. Long lines of charpoys, or bedsteads, stretched from one end of the hall to the other—arms were piled against the columns—pouches, belts, and bayonets depended from the walls, and in the place where once blazed the fabulous glories of the Peacock Throne reclined a private of Her Majesty's 61st, of a very Milesian type of countenance, who, with brawny arms bared to the shoulder, as if he were engaged in a matter requiring no ordinary exertion of muscular strength, was occupied in writing a letter for the edification of some humble residence 'West of the Shannon.' The hall was so obscure that the richness of the decorations and the great beauty of the interior were not visible till the eye became accustomed to the darkness, and penetrated through the accidents of the place to its permanent and more pleasing characteristics. Then, indeed, one could form some notion of the extent to which the praises of travelers and poets had been justified in times gone by, and could hear without a smile the scrolled hieroglyphs over the three entrances, in precious stones and metals, translated into the hackneyed and pompous boast. 'Oh! if there be a Paradise on earth, it is this! it is this! it is this!' As one of the soldiers said, 'Begorra, the chap that put up that had a droll notion of Paradise anyhow. Wid the hate and the flies I think it must be more like the other place.' The magnificent pavement has been taken up and destroyed, and the hand of the spoiler has been busy on the columns and walls of the Divan.

THE EX-KING OF DELHI.

"In a dingy, dark passage, leading from the open court or terrace to a darker room beyond, there sat, crouched on his haunches, a diminutive, attenuated old man, dressed in an ordinary and rather dirty muslin tunic, his small lean feet bare, his head covered by a small thin cambric skull-cap. The moment of our visit was not propitious—certainly it was not calculated to invest the descendant of Timour the Tartar with any factitious interest, or to throw a halo of romance around the infirm creature who was the symbol of extinguished empire. In fact, the ex-King was sick; with bent body he seemed nearly prostrate over a brass basin, into which he was retching violently. So for the time we turned our backs on the door-way, and looked around the small court, which was not more than thirty feet square. In one corner, stretched on a charpoy, lay a young man of slight figure and small stature, who sat up at the sound of our voices and salamed respectfully. He was dressed in fine white muslin, and had a gay yellow and blue silk sash round his waist; his head was bare, exhibiting the curious tonsure from the forehead to the top of the head usual among many classes in the East; his face, oval and well-shaped, was disfigured by a very coarse mouth and skin, but his eyes were quick and bright, if not very pleasant in expression. By the side of his charpoy stood four white-tunicked and turbaned attendants, with folded arms, watching every motion of the young gentleman with obsequious anxiety. One of them said, 'He is sick,' and the Commissioner gave directions that he should lie down again; and so, with another salam, Jumma Bukht—for it was that scion of the House of Delhi in whose presence we stood—threw himself on his back with a sigh, and, turning his head toward us, drew up the chudder, or sheet of his bed, to his face, as if to relieve himself from our presence.

HOW SICK HE WAS.

"That dim, wandering-eyed, dreamy old man, with feeble, hanging nether-lip and toothless gums, was he indeed one who had conceived that vast plan of restoring a great empire, who had fomented the most gigantic mutiny in the history of the world, and who from the walls of his ancient palace had hurled defiance and shot ridicule upon the race that held every throne in India in the hollow of their palms? He broke silence. Alas! it was to inform us that he had been very sick, and that he had retched so violently that he had filled twelve basins. This statement, which was, it must be admitted, distressingly matter of fact and unromantic, could not, I think, have been strictly true, and probably was, in the matter of numeration, tinctured by the spirit of Oriental exaggeration, aided by the poetic imagination of his Majesty. The passage in which he sat contained nothing that I could see but a charpoy such as those used by the poorest Indians. The old man cowered on the floor on his crossed legs, with his back against a mat which was suspended from door-way to door-way, so as to form a passage about twelve feet wide by twenty-four in length. Inside the mat we heard whispering, and some curious eyes glinting through the mat at the strangers informed us that the King was not quite alone. I tried in vain to let my imagination find out Timour in him. Had it been assisted by diamond, and cloth of gold, and officer of state, music and cannon, and herald and glittering cavalcade, and embroidered elephantry, perhaps I might have succeeded, but as it was I found—I say it with regret, but with honesty and truth—I found only Holywell Street. The forehead is very broad indeed, and comes out sharply over the brows, but it recedes at once into an ignoble Thersites-like skull; in the eyes were only visible the weakness of extreme old age—the dim, hazy, filmy light which seems about to guide to the great darkness; the nose, a noble Judaic aquiline, was deprived of dignity and power by the loose-lipped, nerveless, quivering, and gaping mouth, filled with a flaccid tongue; but from chin and upper lip there streamed a venerable, long, wavy, intermingling mustache and beard of white, which again all but retrieved his aspect. He seemed but little inclined for conversation; and when Brigadier Stisted asked him how it was he had not saved the lives of our women, he made an impatient gesture with his hand, as if commanding silence, and said, 'I know nothing of it—I had nothing to say to it.'

HIS FAMILY.

"His grandchild, an infant a few months old, was presented to us, and some one or two women of the zenana showed themselves at the end of the passage while the Commissioner was engaged in conversation with one of the begums. Here was this Begum, a lady of some 35, very aggravating to the ex-Great Mogul, who was both in pain and anguish, and very anxious to get away from him. 'Why,' said she, 'the old' (yes, I believe the correlative word in English is) 'fool goes on as if he was a king; he's no king now. I want to go away from him. He's a troublesome, nasty, cross old fellow, and I'm quite tired of him.' Bowstrings and sacks!—was not this dreadful language? But the ex-Mogul is a philosopher; he merely asked one of his attendants for a piece of coffee-cake or chocolate, put a small piece in his mouth, mumbled it, smiled, and pointing with his thumbs over his shoulder in the direction from which the shrill and angry accents of queenly wrath were coming, said, with all the shrug and bonhomie of a withered little French marquis of the old school, 'Allah! listen to her!' And so we left him alone in his misery. He numbers upward of 82 years, but they are said to be only of lunar months, and that his real age is 78."

CHINA.

HOW THE EMPEROR HAS SWINDLED THE ENGLISH.

A Paris letter says that it is affirmed that the 30,000,000 francs of indemnity to be paid by China to the Allies will be paid in English and French money, of which the Emperor of China has got a quantity, to which he attaches no value, it not being current in those parts, and his ideas on the subject of exchange being very vague. I know not how this detail can have come hither, and probably it is merely a fabrication, but it is ben trovato, and one can imagine the Chinese potentate and his Ministers chuckling at the idea of overreaching the barbarians by paying them in worthless sovereigns and Napoleons—just as Balzac's usurer, in payment of the diamonds a spendthrift has sold him, hands him a bundle of his protested acceptances.

The amount of the indemnity is not yet certain; nor whether or how it is to be divided between the allies.

THE TERMS OF THE TREATY.

The Moniteur contains the following telegram in advance of the mail:

"Baron Gros to his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

"TEIN-TSIN, June 19.

"The wishes of the Emperor have been fulfilled in China. That vast empire is thrown open to Christianity, and nearly the whole of it to the commerce and industry of the West. Our diplomatic agents will be allowed to reside temporarily at Pekin. Our missionaries will be admitted every where. A Chinese envoy will be sent to Paris. The murderer of the missionary Chappedelaine will be punished; it will be announced in the Pekin Gazette. The laws against Christianity will be revoked. All the engagements are taken, and in part secured (consignés) under the seal of the Imperial Commissioners. France and England obtain the most ample concessions."

CANADA.

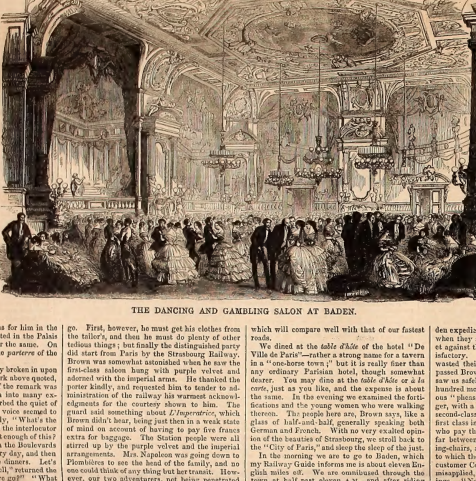
BOAT-RACING AMONG LADIES.

While we have female equestrianism in New York, the women of Canada have a new way of exercising their bodies, not less effective. The Collingwood Journal says that, on the 17th August, four ladies contended, in a boat-race, for a prize of $25. The bay was dotted over with every description of boats, large and small. In the midst of all appeared a trim little white boat, in which were seated two ladies, dressed in white, without hats or bonnets, oars in hand, ready and, apparently, anxious for the contest. Soon another boat, black, and somewhat larger than the other, launched out from the shore, with two lady rowers, also dressed for the occasion, with black straw hats, arms bare, and as cool and calculating as you please. At the signal, the firing of a gun, the boats started, and, after an exciting race, the black came in some fifteen lengths ahead.

A CATHOLIC SCHISM.

We find the following announcement in a Canadian paper: "The Rev. M. Chiniquy, so well known in Canada as the Apostle of Temperance, and a most eloquent preacher, and whose resistance of Episcopal authority in Illinois has, latterly, excited so much painful feeling among his orthodox compatriots, has, at length, been induced to take a rash and, probably, an irretraceable step. Bishop Duggan, of Chicago, who had succeeded Bishop O'Regan, solemnly ratified the canonical censures and interdict pronounced by the latter against Mr. Chiniquy; whereupon the reverend gentleman, about the 22d ultimo, in the court-house of Kaukakee, and in the presence of a great crowd, made a public declaration that he separated from the Catholic Church, and was going to found a sect, under the denomination of 'Eglise Chretienne Catholique,' independent of Rome and the Bishops. This conduct is said to have offended many who had hitherto adhered to his ministration, and it is supposed that not more than a hundred or so are likely to continue attached to his fortunes." The affair creates some sensation.

A WEEK AT BADEN; BEING A LEAF FROM A BOHEMIAN TOUR.



THE action of this remarkable drama commences at Paris, in the year 18—. Two young men of distingué appearance are dining in a café much frequented by medicos of limited pecuniary means. The fact may as well be let out at once; they were dining, à prix fixe, at two francs, and the dinner is much better than you will get at some of the small hotels. The most distingué of the young men, of course the writer of this, having finished his cigarettes, becomes inspired with an idea. He looks anxiously at the partner of his toils, and ejaculates, "I say, Brown!" Now Brown was a person with red hair, and of a sanguine disposition. No one could have had the Saxon idea more firmly fixed than Brown. No matter what country Brown might be in, he looked upon all persons who did not speak the English language as foreigners. Brown lived in a little hotel with a large name, just out of the Place de la Bourse, and halfway between the Temple of Pietas and the Palais Royal. Brown was happy, that is, if happiness can be vouchsafed to any mortal. He had a little cage on the premier étage, a copy of Galignani's Guide, a little French dictionary, and a rather smart-looking concierge, who used to fix his sleeve-buttons for him in the morning. Then Brown breakfasted in the Palais Royal for two francs, and dined for the same. On grand occasions he patronized the parterre of the Grand Opera at four francs.

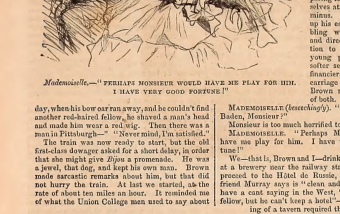
This state of elysium was rudely broken in upon by the person who made the remark above quoted, "I say, Brown!" The author of the remark was a person who had tempted Brown into many extravagances, and had much disturbed the quiet of that individual's existence. His voice seemed to inspire Brown, who inquired mildly, "What's the matter now?" "Well," returned the interlocutor of Brown, "haven't you had about enough of this? I'm tired of walking up and down the Boulevards and looking at the same faces every day, and then coming here and eating the same dinners. Let's make a break out of this." "Well," returned the agreeable Brown, "where shall we go?" "What do you say to Baden-Baden?" "What's at Baden-Baden?" "Oh! lots of things. There's baths, and all sorts of waters, and rouge et noir and trente-un, and dukes and princes, and all sorts of things. It is a kind of Saratoga, Blue Lick, and Virginia Springs, all rolled into one."

Brown was delighted at the idea; Brown would go. First, however, he must get his clothes from the tailor's, and then he must do plenty of other tedious things; but finally the distinguished party did start from Paris by the Strasbourg Railway. Brown was somewhat astonished when he saw the first-class saloon hung with purple velvet and adorned with the imperial arms. He thanked the porter kindly, and requested him to tender to administration of the railway his warmest acknowledgments for the courtesy shown to him. The guard said something about L'Impératrice, which Brown didn't hear, being just then in a weak state of mind on account of having to pay five francs extra for baggage. The Sixteen people were all stirred up by the purple velvet and the imperial arrangements. Mrs. Napoleon was going down to Plombières to see the head of the family, and no one could think of any thing but her transit. However, our two adventurers, not being penetrated with devotion to Louis Napoleon or Mrs. Louis Napoleon, stirred up the employés in a lively style, and were soon bowling over the railway at the rate of thirty miles the hour. This express train leaves Paris at seven o'clock in the morning, and reaches Strasbourg, about three hundred miles off, at half past four in the same afternoon—a rate of speed which will compare well with that of our fastest roads.

We dined at the table d'hôte of the hotel "De Ville de Paris"—rather a strong name for a tavern in a "one-horse town;" but it is really finer than any ordinary Parisian hotel, though somewhat dearer. You may dine at the table d'hôte or à la carte, just as you like, and the expense is about the same. In the evening we examined the fortifications and the young women who were walking thereon. The people here are, Brown says, like a glass of half-and-half, generally speaking both German and French. With no very exalted opinion of the beauties of Strasbourg, we strolled back to the "City of Paris," and slept the sleep of the just.

In the morning we are to go to Baden, which my Railway Guide informs me is about eleven English miles off. We are omnibused through the town at half past eleven A.M., and after riding about three miles we arrive at the banks of the Rhine, of which remarkably overrated concern Brown gets his first sight. It has here an attack of yellow jaundice, and is crossed by rather a shaky bridge. There's not a bit of any thing romantic about it save the name. We have here to display our passports. Those in English, from Washington, are only glanced at; while those from the Legation at London, being in French, which the officer can read, are more closely scrutinized. Brown has one of the latter, but, notwithstanding his ferocious appearance, he was not consigned to a dungeon several feet below the surface of the earth, but permitted to cross the Rhine. It was about half past twelve when we rolled into the railway station at Kehl, where our baggage was overhauled by the custom-house officers. Gruff, heavy-bearded, women-frightening fellows they were too. Brown had a packet of fancy soap, which he had bought in Paris, because there was rather a good-looking young woman to sell it. The packet struck the officer of the customs as something suspicious. He looked at Brown interrogatively. Brown smiled amiably, and said, "Soap!" Cerberus shook his head. Brown grew excited, and ejaculated "Savon!" Another shake, and general bellig'rent of Brown and other passengers waiting for the customary formalities. "Who knows!"—exclaimed Brown, in a voice in which desperation and rage were equally mingled—"who knows what soap is in Dutch?" Nobody replied; when Brown, animated by one of those sudden expedients which always occur to great minds when they are in a tight place, rubbed the packet against the beard of the soldier. That was satisfactory. He had heard of some people who wasted their time in washing their faces, and he passed Brown, soap and all. Half past one o'clock saw us safely packed in the Baden railway, with a hundred more tourists, in the second class; numerous "plenasnts" in the third; and a fat old dowager, with a poodle, in the first class forward. The second-class cars in Germany are as good as the first class in France or England; so the passengers who pay the extra for the first class are few and far between. They have, however, sofas, lounging-chairs, and all sorts of nice things; in addition to which the conductor always calls the first-class customer Count or Prince, which titles, even when misapplied, are very agreeable to some people's feelings. "Nobody would ever call you so, Brown." "Why not?" "Because you have red hair. Who ever heard of a red-haired prince?" "Why, wasn't there William Rufus?" "What, Blake?" "Oh no, that king that was before Victoria—his hair was red, and so was the Earl of Blanks. He had a ship up the Mediterranean, and painted his gig red, and had a red-haired crew for it; and one day, when his low car ran away, and he couldn't find another red-haired fellow, he shaved a man's head and made him wear a red wig. Then there was a man in Pittsburgh—" "Never mind, I'm satisfied."

THE DANCING AND GAMBLING SALON AT BADEN.



A GAMBLING-TABLE AT BADEN.

Mademoiselle.—"I PERHAPS MONSIEUR WOULD HAVE ME PLAY FOR HIM. I HAVE VERY GOOD FORTUNE!"

The train was now ready to start, but the old first-class dowager asked for a short delay, in order that she might give Dijon a promenade. He was a jewel, that dog, and kept his own man. Brown made sarcastic remarks about him, but that did not hurry the train. At last we started, as the rate of about ten miles an hour. It reminded me of what the Union College man used to say about the accommodation train from Schenectady to Saratoga. They alleged that they could jump off the cars, pick some berries, and jump on again, without missing ones in ten times. We reached Baden at half past four in the afternoon, having traveled at the rate of two English miles per hour. The omnibus was a shade faster than the railway.

THE WAY TO BADEN.

The eloquent Murray—what should we do without him?—says "that there can be but one opinion as to the beauty of the town of Baden, embosomed among hills forming an offset or commencement of the Black Forest range, and seated on the banks of the Oos." The same authority tells us that the Romans, who had a remarkably sharp eye for the good things of this life, discovering the mineral springs here, set up a colony; and some remains of their work in the baths may yet be seen. After being thus historical, our Murray has a bit of sarcasm, thus: "During the season, princes may be met with in abundance, but are usually outnumbered by blacklegs."

So much topographical and general information was imparted to Brown as we were preparing to discharge ourselves at the Baden terminus. Brown pricked up his ears when gambling was mentioned, and directed my attention to a rather fast young person of the softer sex, and an old financier, in the same carriage with us. Brown made a sketch of both.

MADEMOISELLE (lisseter-ing).—"Do you play at Baden, Monsieur?"

Monsieur is too much horrified to speak. "

MADEMOISELLE.—"Perhaps Monsieur would have me play for him. I have very good fortune!"

We—that is, Brown and I—drink very good beer at a brewery near the railway station, and then proceed to the Hôtel de Russie, which our friend Murray says is "clean and good." They have a cant saying in the Navy, "Once a dog, always a dog, fellow, but he can't keep a hotel"—as if the keeping of a tavern required the highest mental and physical qualifications. Our hotel-keepers, Brown, are generally too ornate for their business, and look to their customers to the tender mercies of subordinates, who ape the airs of their masters. Here, you see, we are received in a civil way by the proprietor himself, who shows directly to pleasant apartments on the first floor, and overlooking the promenade. When you remember, Brown, the tremendous race which we had to have from the railway at Saratoga to the United States or Congress Hall, you can appreciate the contrast here, where people generally take pains to secure their apartments a day or two beforehand. We range ourselves quietly at the table d'hôte, and already feel as much at home at Baden as if we had been there a month. The dinner is good, the wines splendid—that's real Clicquot that you are drinking, Brown—and, altogether, our lines have fallen in pleasant places.

Life at Baden may be easily described. It is a little town built upon the hillside, and, like all watering-places villages, seems to have no vitality except what it draws from foreigners. Its chief profit lies in fleecing strangers. The pleasant promenade—the magnificent Conversation House and palatial Drinking Hall—the smooth, well-shaded roads—all come from the profits of the master vice of the human race. With the regular hôtels of Baden, gambling, to a greater or less amount, is as much a matter of course as eating or drinking. The tables are placed in the Conversation Hall, which is as free to the public as our City Hall Park. Attached to the hall is a grand saloon for dancing, with a fine theatre, where they give French plays in the season. They can afford to pay the best artists, because they immediately lose their salaries at the gambling tables. The play begins always at 2 o'clock in the morning, and ends at midnight. The banker puts upon the table every morning a certain sum—I think it is twenty thousand dollars—which can not be removed by the bank until night. The scene around the table, given by the artist in this article, is a picture that can never be forgotten. Old and young, men and women, people of all ranks and conditions, throng the tables. The croupiers and dealers have that hard, stony expression peculiar to their craft; while in the faces of the players one may see the effects of the vice in all its shades. At each turn of the wheel nothing is said, or seen, or heard, save a whisper or a chuckle, as the long rakes of the bank gathers in its harvest of gold and silver; for so much are the odds in favor of the bank, that those who form it can afford to pay altogether one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars per annum for the privilege of keeping the rooms open. Citizens of Baden are not permitted to play at the tables. It is proper to swindle the outsiders, but not your own people. Put down five francs, and see what becomes of it. Around goes the mystic wheel, out comes the wooden rake, away goes the five francs.

THE GODS MOSTLY WORSHIPED AT BADEN.

The bank goes on steadily winning; the dealer glows with delight as he looks at his victims; the worshipers of the gods of Baden grow more numerous and more feverish as the game proceeds. The soiree are filled with a great crowd. The ball-room resounds with the notes of the last waltz of Strauss. The gayety of Baden is at its height when there comes a report of a pistol, freezing every one with horror. It is a young Neapolitan, who has dissipated a noble fortune at the gaming-table. He staked his last Napoleon; he lost, and, rushing out into the clear fresh air, with the mid-summer moon shining calmly over the promenade, he deliberately blew out his brains. Every body is shocked for the moment, but in an hour afterward the tables are again thronged, and the ball-room by no means deserted.

Baden, as I told Brown, is a great rendezvous for the Paris litterateurs, who come down there in July and August, spend all their loose cash, and then go home. They are generally inveterate gamblers, and as literary men never have any luck, even by accident, they always lose. Several of them have written capital little books about Baden, and it is the interest of the proprietor of the gambling-tables to keep them there as long as possible. A short time since he gave a diejeuner to the most prominent of the crew, and, after dinner, addressed them as follows: "Gentlemen, you came here with small amounts of money—from five hundred to five thousand francs. You can not afford to play against the bank; it is from the persons who play small amounts that we have the profits: they never win. After this warning you may play if you will. If you win, well; if not, I shall be obliged to return to you the amount of your losses."

I am not acquainted with the results, but I presume that they all played and lost as usual. Sometimes the heaviest losers of one season combine against the bankers for the next, and raise a large capital, with which they hope to break the bank. Such combinations have been successful, but failure is the rule. The general course of play at Baden may be expressed as below. And the rout to Baden is guarded as in the accompanying picture.

But Brown says he has enough of gambling, and so we will promenade. Here is fine music, all sorts of society, plenty of fun, resplendent cafés, myriads of white-aproned waiters, countless sights, elegant equipages, and all the bustle of the gayest European capital. Baden does not cover so much space as Newport or Saratoga; and, as nearly all the people live in the hotels, they are concentrated together upon the promenade or in the Conversation House in the evening, or at the Trink Halle in the morning. Here is the most curious scene of Baden. In the centre of the great hall are fountains, which supply to all applicants the twenty-eight different German medicated waters. In an angle there are still more waters to be had in bottles; while, outside, goats are being milked to supply the morning draught for delicate young ladies suffering from too much rest and a superfluity of pokaos over night. The morning bath, walk, and drink in Baden is something which approaches the sublime of intoxication. Some of the Virginia baths are said to be equal to those of Baden; but there is no place where health and pleasure can be sought with so much success as at Baden. Is there, Brown?

THE MAN WHO WON $100,000, AND BROKE THE BANK.

One fine morning Brown and I drove up to the top of the height which is crowned by the old castle of the Dukes of Baden. They thought they would make themselves successful; but the French troops having ravaged the plains, the inhabitants of the mountain were starved out, and obliged (like Captain Scott's coon) to come down before they were really attacked. The view was superb, the wine excellent (the old castle is a restaurant), the trout superb, and the cheese quite the cheese. We saw all sorts of places and things through a telescope on the top of the castle, and sighted the Black Forest, which is a humbug alongside of Brown's Tract, in the State of New York. It was a fine morning altogether. Other things we saw, such as the new castle, the stiff old

THE VETERAN CROUPIER WIPING HIS THUMB, AND STUDYING HIS AUDIENCE.

1. SITS DOWN TO TRY HIS LUCK.
2. LOSES, CONCLUDES TO TRY AGAIN.
3. LOSES AGAIN! ONE MORE VENTURE!
4. LOSES! BASCALLY CARDS! WELL, TRY ONCE MORE.
5. LOST BAPERLOTTE!

Prince of Prussia, no end of Counts and things of that sort; the young gentleman who drives four horses, writes letters to the papers, and then fights duels fifty feet apart on account of them—and much more that was interesting to me but not to relate.

So now Brown, we've done Baden; and, if you please, we'll depart to-morrow for Frankfort, Mayence, and the Rhine. Whether we take the readers of Harper's Weekly with us or not, depends upon their opinion of us as traveling companions.

THE EX-POLICEMAN'S STORY.

It was an old house in Bayard Street. Yes, a mighty old house—wooden, and gable-end to the street. And so dilapidated! Door not! The crazy, who were once supposed to have a mortgage on it, had foreclosed time out of mind; and the rats bought it at sheriff's auction.

It was a blustering, bullying night, November that found me sitting in the front room, second floor, of that old house. Through the keen northeaster, and the every-now-and-then storms of sleet, I had come hither on a little one of my larks. The variety I indulged in was that of going with sets of out-of-the-way places, in all kinds of out-of-door weather, without any sort of an umbrella—coughing but an ounce top-coat, and no cud to Hessian boots. I do this to see life.

The single occupant of the room was a grizzled, bony man, about fifty years of age, but so worn and stooping that he seemed a good deal older. Altogether, his right, dingy yellowjous face, and those dark, talon-like hands of his, left nervous and bare by a pair of very ragged mittens, made him look like a statue of Troublous Times done in Berlin iron.

This was the man's own room in that house in Bayard Street. But there were other lodgers—there always are other lodgers in houses in that street, whose numbers vary from ten to fifty, and have no one room occupied by a very small and dirty boys apiece. Accordingly, when I first came into this room of which I speak, and saw a shoeless three-year-old, very fire in it, and thought how mighty cold the old man must be if I had to shiver in my overcoat and Hessians. And my head out on the dark and dirty hall, "John! Jim! Pat!" accost of a liberal answer from one, at least, of the lodgers' dirty little boys to my invitation.

I was agreeably disappointed in my calculation of the man's poverty, in immediately coming from sight, certainly, of a grate from the premature infant up to the bobbledehoy, who rushed out into the watchful interim, always-awaycreaming, "What's up?" The promise of a dime, conditioned upon the faithful discharge of his trust, to a selection from any one of the wine turned out to be Pat, operated so benignantly upon the mind of that youth, that he conceived to go for a pack of cards and a bottle of sidling wood. Just as he was putting on his fragmentary shoes to his forth, that bully of a wind made, through the outer keyhole, such an excellent acoustic imitation of a pleasant family teatable that I felt like defying it by a production of the genuine article, and adding to the commission a pound of ham, a loaf of bread, and a shilling's worth of tea. In about ten minutes Pat actually came back with the provender and the money, whether from innate honesty or because the bewilderment of possessing such a treasure of cash prevented him from calculating the extent of "the time" he might have had for that amount, is a question for casuists.

Suppose now the fire made, the tea drawn in another lodger's hired kettle, the ham-rasher done to a turn on still another's frying-pan, these eatable and drinkable comforts, together with the bread, vanished before the starred appetite of poor old Troublous Times, and the last of the lodgers who came out to snuff the savor in the entry, and say, "My! Hosts old Hallett having a feed?" gone back to the groups they called bed—and you arrive at the exact date where I began at first.

Old Hallett—so, that was his name—looked out the ashes out of an ancient black pipe which had been lying cold on the mantle-piece, filled it from my box, and then began

"Well, I'm beat! I'm quite confounded! If my body had come to me this afternoon and said, 'Hallett, a fashionable coming—you'll be wholly really take an interest like, and want to know all about you, how you got on—which I'm not going bread and ham and cards and—and you give you a regular old-fashioned supper,' I'd have said, 'No, you don't.' I'm too old a bird to find that way!' For you're the first man that has spoken a good word to me this ten years.

"And you'd like to hear my story, would you? Well, it may be interesting to you; as for its being so to me I can't say much. But here goes.

"I have always been a taker-care of other people's safety. When they had watchmen in New York I was one of them. When they started the police system I went into that corps. Night or day for thirty years I was on duty, through hot and cold, wet and dry, watching and walking, to see that no harm happened to life or property so far as I could help it. I was twenty-three years old when I began, fifty-two when I left off—but very old for that age.

"I got to be forty years old, and I was still a single man. A man who has so little time for his bread and butter you may think, sure enough, he still see for making love. And I always had a queer, old-fashioned idea about getting married—that a fellow must love, and love first, if he wanted to do the thing up all right. I've known plenty of people who looked at those things as a matter of business, and they seemed young enough to do it; but I, and the girl, she's got a little something, so we'll just fiftch to and say nothing more about it.' I went to see one or two weddings where the thing was done in that way, and hang me if I didn't ask myself all the time the parson was going through the operation, what difference there was between that and the coupling together of any dumb stock for formin' purposes.

"But the girl—that's the idee never came into my head. Bless me! fifty times a week. Sometimes when I had to plant a lodger in the cells, or break up some fierce scrudge, and she made up a sweet little face and said, 'Thank ye!' on the other side of the way, I'd see my regular idiot, Hallett, mulley my boy! I wonder whether that's the fortune that any woman will ever go with you in your life, just across the street; when it would be so nice to be going all the way down to the Battery—the jumping-off place of the world—with a right hearty girl, and not like the big one?" Then, too, when I was on my night patrol, and every now and then one of those poor creatures would be brought in redolent of honor and goodness to whirl round and round for a few years in the Hell-gate of this city, and then be sucked down out of sight—God knows where—when one of these passed by, all tricked out in gay colors, and laughing so deucedly, and looking so happy, I grew quite downhearted with wondering if God couldn't have saved one of them when she was young and innocent to be the wife of a poor, honest man like Hallett. So many women going to the fiend, and not one for me! I tell ye it was a riddle which nearly drove me mad.

"Well, as I said, things went on this way until I was over my fortieth birthday. My old mother, whom I was taking care of all along, died, and I was all alone in the world. My world—that means the three rooms I lived in any way, which made my best, and the one little room in Grand Street where I did what eating and sleeping I got there.

"One night in the November of the year I was forty—very much such a night as this, only heavier a little, perhaps. I was sitting there all back and forth on patrol, with my hands in my pockets—thinking and wondering as usual. On the other side of the way, and on a man whom I went by, talking quite loud, and walking at a rate which was almost a run. I didn't quite hear what they said, but their manner was noticeable, and I stood still under an awning to watch them. They reached the corner and stopped. In the bright light of the lamp there I saw the woman lift up her hand, caressing like —oh, such a beautiful white hand that trembled and seemed to speak like a human face—the cursed ruffian that was with her hit her a blow with his great fist, and down she went on the sidewalk like a dead thing, without a groan.

"Quick as a flash I sounded the call for help and put after that fellow. But he was in time, and the man who kept him engaged by me, as soon found that he would get to his crib before any other policeman could reach me. In the mean time, there was that poor creetur that he'd just felled, devil that he was, lying senseless on the hard, cold pavement. I knelt down and near to see whether she was dead or not. See, though my club, so to speak, was thirsty for him as if it had a fever, I turned from him in time, and to the corner. I raised her up in my arms; she was still breathing, slow and heavy, but outside of that gave no more sign of life than the stones she fell on. There was a light in the drug store a block off, so I carried her there as you would a baby, and knocked and rang until the sleepy boy got up and let me in. We laid her down on a settee, and poured brandy down her throat and rubbed her hands and feet and did everything sides to her nose—Lor', we did every thing for the poor creetur—but it seemed as if she never would come to. Then the boy ran to a doctor's, and when she opened a pair of great, wild, black eyes and asked where she was, and if she'd been dreaming, and such like, I was perfectly beside myself with joy.

"Thank be God, Sir, she had never opened her eyes again!"

Old Hallett clutched convulsively at his throat as if he would choke down with one blow the dangers of his something terrible which was rising from within, and then went on.

"I'm not a man, Sir, given—oh, so pretty! I've seen a great many good-looking women, as is natural, considerin' all the chances I've had in my day; but in the whole of 'em I don't think I'm talkin' exaggerated when I say that she was the best-looking one I ever saw. The most wonderful thing about her was her hair. I've told you how white and speaking it looked in the gas-light, where I first saw it; now I couldn't help taking it up and kissing it and nursing it like a little bird against my bosom, making an excuse that it was cold, and saying 'God bless you!' to the man who'd left her my kind. I am not ashamed, after all."

Here Hallett blew the got wide awake and natural like once more, so that sooth could talk in a low, feeble voice, she told me she wasn't hurt much—her head only pained her a little—but was ill. Should I take her home? I asked her.

"At the speakin' of that word 'home,' she began to take on dreadful. She hadn't such a thing in the world, her mother was dead, and her father—the drunken brute that struck her—hadn't been sober for a month, and was just turned out of a poor old room they had down in Cherry Street, because he wouldn't pay his rent. He struck her, and when she begged him to go to the Station-house and ask a lodgin'. And now she didn't believe he'd gone to, or what would become of him. He was found three weeks after floating off Pier No. 1.

"As she spoke in her broken, heart-sick voice was telling me this story, the druggist's boy behind her hand put his tongue in his cheek, and counted so much money of his eye as a fortnight's which made me clutch my club tightly again, and feel as if I would like to teach him manners. But I listened her—yes, to the end, I believe her yet. I had heard a good many pitiful stories in my day; some of them I couldn't swallow; but, I tell ye, they weren't told in that voice, or with that hand explaining them and patting them home.

"Did you ever notice how quick a man will sometimes settle what's been a puzzle to him for years? Every thing she's ever thought regardin' Hell and what not the wickedness and the hows go flyin' through his head like an express train; then comes something inside of him like a long whistle, and before he can speak, the strain's stopped at a depôt he never dreamed of, and he goes ashore out of it for his whole life. Well, that's what I did. I've often thought since that the smell of the drugs in that shop must have crazed me, for, quick as a flash, I saw all the future days I'd ever have to spend in my service—all the questions I'd been asked by myself—all the doubts, and the wonderin' and the twists, and the whirls, ran by me and shot up with a rout just at the foot of the settee where I was kneeling. For, I said to myself, though this young thing is wretched poor, and her clothes are so thin that they can hardly hold together, I would be telling a lie to my heart in a rich, precious thing, and her honor hasn't a rent in it. And though I am forty years old, and she can't have more than fifteen, she may live enough to make my lone room shine with a light which I never nor except when I was dreamin.

"So I said to her, 'You're mistaken; you have got a home.' She looked up at me in a sort of startled, wondering way, and stopped crying. But notwin' my badge, and seein' I was on the police, she hid her eyes with that white hand they say, but which, now I was receptacle, and I stood still under an awning to watch them. They reached the corner and stopped. In the bright light of the lamp there I saw the woman lift up her hand, caressing like —oh, such a beautiful white hand that trembled and seemed to speak like a human face—the cursed ruffian that was with her hit her a blow with his great fist, and down she went on the sidewalk like a dead thing, without a groan.

"Quick as a flash I sounded the call for help and put after that fellow. But he was in time, and the man who kept him engaged by me, as soon found that he would get to his crib before any other policeman could reach me. In the mean time, there was that poor creetur that he'd just felled, devil that he was, lying senseless on the hard, cold pavement. I knelt down and near to see whether she was dead or not. See, though my club, so to speak, was thirsty for him as if it had a fever, I turned from him in time, and to the corner. I raised her up in my arms; she was still breathing, slow and heavy, but outside of that gave no more sign of life than the stones she fell on. There was a light in the drug store a block off, so I carried her there as you would a baby, and knocked and rang until the sleepy boy got up and let me in. We laid her down on a settee, and poured brandy down her throat and rubbed her hands and feet and did everything sides to her nose—Lor', we did every thing for the poor creetur—but it seemed as if she never would come to. Then the boy ran to a doctor's, and when she opened a pair of great, wild, black eyes and asked where she was, and if she'd been dreaming, and such like, I was perfectly beside myself with joy.

"Thank be God, Sir, she had never opened her eyes again!"

Old Hallett clutched convulsively at his throat as if he would choke down with one blow the dangers of his something terrible which was rising from within, and then went on.

"I'm not a man, Sir, given—oh, so pretty! I've seen a great many good-looking women, as is natural, considerin' all the chances I've had in my day; but in the whole of 'em I don't think I'm talkin' exaggerated when I say that she was the best-looking one I ever saw. The most wonderful thing about her was her hair. I've told you how white and speaking it looked in the gas-light, where I first saw it; now I couldn't help taking it up and kissing it and nursing it like a little bird against my bosom, making an excuse that it was cold, and saying 'God bless you!' to the man who'd left her my kind. I am not ashamed, after all."

Here the got wide awake and natural like once more, so that sooth could talk in a low, feeble voice, she told me she wasn't hurt much—her head only pained her a little—but was ill. Should I take her home? I asked her.

"At the speakin' of that word 'home,' she began to take on dreadful. She hadn't such a thing in the world, her mother was dead, and her father—the drunken brute that struck her—hadn't been sober for a month, and was just turned out of a poor old room they had down in Cherry Street, because he wouldn't pay his rent. He struck her, and when she begged him to go to the Station-house and ask a lodgin'. And now she didn't believe he'd gone to, or what would become of him. He was found three weeks after floating off Pier No. 1.

"As she spoke in her broken, heart-sick voice was telling me this story, the druggist's boy behind her hand put his tongue in his cheek, and counted so much money of his eye as a fortnight's which made me clutch my club tightly again, and feel as if I would like to teach him manners. But I listened her—yes, to the end, I believe her yet. I had heard a good many pitiful stories in my day; some of them I couldn't swallow; but, I tell ye, they weren't told in that voice, or with that hand explaining them and patting them home.

"Did you ever notice how quick a man will sometimes settle what's been a puzzle to him for years? Every thing she's ever thought regardin' Hell and what not the wickedness and the hows go flyin' through his head like an express train; then comes something inside of him like a long whistle, and before he can speak, the strain's stopped at a depôt he never dreamed of, and he goes ashore out of it for his whole life. Well, that's what I did. I've often thought since that the smell of the drugs in that shop must have crazed me, for, quick as a flash, I saw all the future days I'd ever have to spend in my service—all the questions I'd been asked by myself—all the doubts, and the wonderin' and the twists, and the whirls, ran by me and shot up with a rout just at the foot of the settee where I was kneeling. For, I said to myself, though this young thing is wretched poor, and her clothes are so thin that they can hardly hold together, I would be telling a lie to my heart in a rich, precious thing, and her honor hasn't a rent in it. And though I am forty years old, and she can't have more than fifteen, she may live enough to make my lone room shine with a light which I never nor except when I was dreamin.

"So I said to her, 'You're mistaken; you have got a home.' She looked up at me in a sort of startled, wondering way, and stopped crying. But notwin' my badge, and seein' I was on the police, she hid her eyes with that white hand they say, but which, now I was receptacle, and I stood still under an awning to watch them. They reached the corner and stopped. In the bright light of the lamp there I saw the woman lift up my name's Harry Hallett. I ain't rich; I don't live up town in a big house with pictures and looking-glasses in gold frames, and I'm only a policeman. But I'm like that's so, I've got a roof and a heart inside of me, and a room for Grand Street outside of me when I'm in-doors; and if either of 'em isn't good enough, then you shall never go to the station-house—that's all.'

"The druggist's boy began a indulgin' of himself in some comic and faces which didn't exactly suit my present feelin's, so I gave him a shove which enabled him to sit down without intendin' it on the head the girl, almost before she knew it, from the settee and out into the street. The cold air a kind o' revived of her, and as she looked at me, felt quite strong enough to walk I let her do it, and took her gently along, a leanin' on my arm, around to my place in Grand Street. Once or twice I looked her up and and warm in my own bed, and went off to attend to my beat till morning.

"Wasn't I a happy, glad man! I didn't mind the cold; I wasn't lonely any more; for my own thoughts, which before that had been more bother than any thing to me, I never looked out for, turned all at once into mighty pleasant company, and seemed to patrol up and down with me, shakin' hands, kissin', and saying, 'Wish you joy! wish you joy, Harry Hallett!'

"My! but it was be-a-ti-ful!

"I don't mind it now, Sir, by stretchin' out. So I'll just tell you, as you must have guessed a long way back, that, by-and-by, we were married. We were not a young couple—that is, only one of us—but we had a wedding, and the prettiest corpse would have called remantic. For the first time since I entered the service I got leave to be off beat for a day, and we had the ceremony done in church, and not Mary—that was her name—had pretty little rosebuds stuck about in her hair, till she looked like a fairy, and then came home to Grand Street to a house. But, O Lord! I mustn't think of that, or I shan't keep up till I get through.

"Mary was a woman unless I'm like incrasin' in' stablishment. So Mary and I took one more room in the Grand Street buildin', and began keepin' house on a small, quiet sort of way. I had been known in the Department for a good while, and, as I had always tried to do my duty, was considered pretty well of. So when I applied to be put on the day service altogether, I didn't find much difficulty in getting what I asked. That gave us all the pleasant long evenings together, and when I got home after work, and found a sweet woman there to sup at the top of the stairs, in place of the dumbness and dark, I used to climb up into, all tired from my beat, I tell you every step seemed like getting higher and lighter into a little heaven. And then, when I felt her arms round my neck, and her kiss on my mouth, and that wonderful little white hand of hers—that all our housekeeping could not soil or cramp—but was where the bright tea-kettle was a singin', and the two cups sat waitin' by the toast on the white cloth, and the candle was lighted, and every thing all brushed up and tidy, smiling 'How-dye-do, Harry Hallett?' right into my face—

"Oh! I mustn't think of that notion.

"Well, time went on, and we'd been married about a year. We began to know that, before long, the Good Lord would send us to them of us to love one another in that dear old place. And at last the hour came. Of a soft spring night a little baby was born to us. It was born dead. Thank God!—born dead."

Again old Troublous Times, as if realizing how deep must be his wretchedness when he could fervently render so dreadful a thanksgiving, caught at his throat and choked his heart down.

"The mother was sorely tried by this trouble. So was I; but most of all because I feared she would never be up again. She was ill and sick, after much pain and weakness, and was about again the same as before.

"We lived very much alone. I never had time to make any very large circle of friends. I don't know as how I wanted to—for friends is a precious sight too often, these smooth-faced fellows who would get off your beat to drink with you, and then rapid-fire you with questions. So I was civil to every body, and minded my business, and hardly a soul. Mary was enough for me—to the thought of her was good company to me all the daytime, and at night in the light of her face, and the kisses she'd give, was a whole household of friends a drinkin' my health out of prize-pitchers and singin' glees. I never knew days of wonder more than that.

"It's come across me, pretty hard too, a great many times since then, that I didn't do altogether right in this. One was getting things all fresh and rosy, and fond of society, while I was, in a manner, an old man. Old enough to have been her father, and I should look 'round with a start, wakin' up like, when I spoke to her. It would not be considerable to see her so—and accordingly; one night says I, 'Mary, my love, I'm afraid you're sick, sin't you?' Oh, no, there was nothing the matter—perhaps it was the weather—that must be all.' So I took heart, and was glad, whenever a number day came, and I got to myself as I walked up and down the beat, 'good weather for Mary, the little un's a singin' now.'

"By-and-by, the weather came when, I must say, I was a kinder startled. Once or twice I came up stairs in the dark, and some one—I will follow my own notion—I would wrap up in a cloak and muffler brushed by me in a hurry, and shot out of the street door. And now and then I noticed that Mary opened her drawers that there were dead leaves and strings of ribbon that looked like as if there'd been a nosegay there, and that it was all gone. It fell to pieces. And one time I came on a little bottle of Cologne, which I had never seen before, in a dark corner. So I determined to lay a bit of linen to tie up a little scratch I got makin' an arrest. So, says I, 'Mary, a present, my dear? is a pleasant thing, but I don't like that any wrong, but supposin' some of the other lodgers had given it to her, for there was a woman in the house who was addicted to soaps and scents on the Bowery. But Mary said no, she had bought it herself—it was so nice for the handkerchiefs on Sundays.

"At last there came a night—O Lord, it seems as if I hadn't heart to go on!—when Mary and I had one more evening years ago—and keeping still can't help it. How would you feel, suppose you'd been married to a woman for years, and to her only woman you ever loved or could love in all the wide world—and suppose, I walked in dreamin', myself never, at all times, lost sight of her, or stopped sayin' God bless her! and you came back, half sick, from the street, along town's dusk, one September evening, and caught her sitting on another man's lap, with her arms round his neck, and his round her waist, and she singing out all those words you'd ever said to her when you were wakin' in dreamy, you'd have felt, I say"

At the sight of that picture, drawn out of the dust of his memory's poor disordered lumber-room, for the first time perhaps in years, to be wiped and paraded in its fearful freshness, the dear old dead out on the Berlin iron front of the Troublous Times, as they stand beading an icicurn on some burning summer's day. With his rugged sleeve he wiped them away.

"Well, what d'ye think of that? It was a nightmare!—an awful scare that from the blood and kept the fat boiled out of my temper a little. I never said nothin'. I didn't move a step from the sill of the door, but just stood still—with a big weight on my head, and a cheap sorry' barking about the eyes. I've heerd tell of men that have come home and found such like, and, before the wicked one could turn about, have driven a knife into his heart and killed the wretched creetur had been a leadin' to damnation with him. I never done any thing like it. I couldn't even draw breath to groan, as I've told ye."

"Before that mare likes went off o' me the mast had gone. He made a rush at me with all his force—he knocked me down, and was down stairs and out of the door in a flash. And I was left alone with the woman—her as were my Mary—never, O God! to be mine again.

"The blow had stunned me a little at first—so that, for a minute, I was more amazed than I had been before. But, shortly, when I had got strength to lift myself up, I felt wrath as never ever, and seemed quite brought to. And I understood, sensibly, why it was that she crouched, dumb and trembling, in the corner with her hands over her face, as if they were hidin' my eyes.

"I knew it was because she had made me a man that knew well and the devil's length of it, but, if it wasn't the craze made me think so, she heard the good souls in heaven cryin' for me then. I knew it was because all hope for this world was gone for both on us.

"But if she thought I would bluster or take on she are mistaken. I went up to her very slow and calm—I drew her hand from her face, and said, 'Look at me! Don't be afeard of me —I hain't gone mad—leastways not mad—but you're safe—quite safe—so far as raisin' of hand or mine can hurt ye. Four years ago this fall I found ye for dead. Ye might have never opened your eyes again on this world but for me. I wish to God ye never hid—for your sake, mind, not for mine! But that's why I have been with the angels. I took ye to my breast like a baby—I warmed ye, I nourished ye, I comforted ye—and I spoke—but not out —ye owe me nothing for that—no, not even your love, if ye couldn't give it. I was an old man, you was young, and it was my habit. I'll not tellin' ye that bein' thankful to a man wasn't reason enough to make his wife, if she was all to Bet I was blind—blind with the lightnin'-stroke of you that came flashin' down on me through the darkness of a great, long, black night of life. And if I was to blame for not seein', I'm gettin' punished now—punished!—punished! Let me take it all on myself—my head—don't be afeard, I say—I'll never try to make you mine.'

"And now, look ye. These past years since I took ye to my home ye be proof I never pried. I'd have sold all I had to get ye; if ye'd dropped into the deepest sea, I'd have gone to the bottom to bring ye up or stay with ye. If ye'd fallen from the top of Trinity, down yonder, I'd have jumped after ye. If I'd lost ye in the crowd, I'd have gone bareheaded, barefoot, through sun and rain, till I found ye, over the world. Somehow never darkened ye to me in the night's shame like a glory ye was. Flames or waters, death, couldn't have held me back from goin' where you'd gone.

"O God! to think to-day you've gone where I can't follow ye! I reach your hand—I touch ye—but I can't get to you—I can't bring ye back. There's been an awful confusion in all that great love I thought you were a lovin' me with. Just as I come in that door I felt it heave, and now there's a gulf between us.

"Stay in this room, it shall be yours always. I don't unsluther the only hand that ever laid on my breast. Stay! it's what I want—I've got by of what I make, is yours. I'll see that you're taken care of well, kindly. But I never shall come back again.

"And as to him—him as robbed me—him as blamed me—him as put me down from him as dragged you out of the heaven where you were my God, I go to hunt him, yes, through hell!"

She lingered, head old man part cast out of himself in these awful words. No longer bent, no longer cowed and sullen, but upright, terrible-eyed, and menacing with his clenched, iron hand, so that he seemed sublime as an avenging angel. And I could read what his soul had been in the strange, mixed words that at last uttered in a wild shriek that pierced me.

Then he sank back again. A great shudder came over him, and his voice once more grew low and broken.

"I went away. I wandered all about the streets, not much knowin' or carin' where. When I met people I knew, and they said, 'How d'ye do, Hallett?' I said I was very well. And I thought I was, for I didn't somehow understand as yet how it was I hadn't been dreamin', and it was real after all.

"I said I wouldn't go back any more to the room. Somehow or other I did, notwithstanding. I had kind of an idea, perhaps, that I might find her there, a wonderin' where I'd been, and frightened because I hadn't come. I pulled open self up stairs, a leanin' hard on the bannisters. I went to the door—it was all still and dark as a grave. I opened it—remember my melody in there. She was gone—gone—forever!

"Something came over me—a stroke or it like—and I fell down by the door inside. It seemed to know how it was, again, and that felled me.

"I wish I'd shut the door before I dropped—My God! I do. I wish they'd ha' let me lie there, not a knowin' o' any thing, to die quiet and forget and be forgotten. Nothin' would have been heard o' me till the man came round for rent the next Monday, and then I'd have been out of trouble. But, 'no! I was to be left, in a voice of children peevishness, 'folks never can let ye alone—never. I got a little sleep however, for I didn't know nothin', moon's a stone, for six weeks. Then I woke up in the hospital. The first thing I see was a white wall on one side of me, then I turned over, and there was another white wall on the other. Then I looked right up, and there was a man standin' there all in black, with spectacles; and says he, 'Well, my man, we've been very sick, and we're all right now.' I thought of where I was last, and another of these lightnin' twins I told ye on went through my head inside of a minute, and I answered to me. And as the black-coat said the word 'better,' I thought he meant it to laugh at me; and says I to myself that's a devil, and I'm in the bad place.

"Did you ever wake up, the first time after somethin' awful had happened, and find it come on, all fresh and dazzlin' bright, just like that white light that used to be over the Museum? D'ye wonder I thought I was in the bad place?

"It's an awful tedious story to tell—how I lay in the sick ward day after day, a cellin' on God to let me die, and how best 'twas part of wantin' to help myself off and for very sickness of heart bein' too cowardly—too weak to move hand or foot. And so strong inside was I broken that it seemed as if my soul would shake my body to pieces, just as you've seen some big engine rattle down an old frame house, when it's mad of an engineer put it into. I'll just cut short, and say that I got well so I could go around.

"For a little while I was so poor, a leg-up again I didn't know what I should do. I'd been a cellin' Mary!' and sayin' wild things all the time I was crazy to the doctors, and that's all got out, together with the fact that she wasn't nowhere to be found; and if there wasn't foul play suspected, leastways I was thought to head-quarters that I must have lost my ideas altogether. I was let alone, and felt if quiet possible, to get back on the old beat. As I wasn't brought up to no trade, except police, was only fitted for that, and was getting heavy, and my pocket got pretty light. All this time I had nothin' to think of but the hell I was in, and fifty times over, the way it began and was.

"I had got a sort of little hole, that was cheap and kinder secluded like, where I could keep my traps (what few was) and stay still. If yd somethin' turned up to drag out my cussed life by. It was way down Anthony Street—what they call Worth now, by. I never was able to find out, for it ain't worth mary red, except what the wretched cullies I used to haul up there could tell me. It was a place for good-shop-liftin' business and panel operations; but it was good enough for me, not bein' choice about my company with the unfortunate inside of me day and night a devil worse than the worst of 'em. And so, one fine there come a day to me there, when I had just now't left and one month's rent to pay. Says I, 'Hallett, of the deuce's name, what d'ye think of the detective business?'

"God enough for them that likes it,' says I, a glum enough, suspicious-like. I didn't know my fix, and wanted my influence to get him on to the force.

"'All right, my ole feller,' says he; 'but how would you like it by way of variety, supposin' it was yourself that took it up for a living?'

"'Make yourself clear,' says I, a openin' my eyes a little.

"Well,' replied the young man, 'the long and the short of it is this. They've come to the conclusion at the Department that there ain't quite enough action about here lately—they're on now for a babbin' of rascals, and they've concluded to egonize a special force for that intention—'

"'Organize,' says I; for ye see I wanted to help him on a bit, bein' he hadn't much book larnin'.

"'Well,' says he, 'I don't care what you call it. Your name was up before the big 'uns, and, considerin' the fact that you're one of the oldest fellows on the books, and counted knowin', and had done some shiny things by way of hailin' up marauders during your hotral existence, they sent me to hunt you up, and ask if you'd like to put on the line.'

"'Count me in,' says I, and jumped up, sharp like, as if fire mixture before I hain't been thinkin' of pettin' an eye to myself. It is strange how a man who would give all he's got to be let die, will hold on, tooth and nail, to a chance of livin', ain't it?

"I was on the Detective force for a good while. I was in some pretty ticklish business, and came off well—with banners flyin'. You may have heerd tell of the way Short-foot Jackson was fetched, and the way Billy Millers was broke out at their fence down Mott Street? Well, I was in that, and there were folks that said it couldn't be very well done without me.

"But all this wasn't what I was after. The first reason—perhaps after the fear of starving like a dog—that kep' me takin' the place was the chance it gave me of some day or other huntin' down the cursed fiend that had dragged her out of sight of heaven, and made me homeless and reckless forever. So I worked on, never mindin' tire or worry more'n a straw, if so be as how I might find her. I might come on to his track and be quits with him.

"One morning, when there wasn't much business on hand, and I was sitting in my chair up at quarters, a lookin' over the Herald to keep from thinkin' of myself, there came into the room an old gentleman, about sixty, I should say, in a high state of frustration, who said his house had been robbed the night before, and that was the reason he'd come in three months. He was so mighty scared that we couldn't get much into how it was done from any thing he said, nor who done it, nor where it was done. He didn't say nor Captain, 'Hallett,' says he, 'suppose you go along with the gentleman and see what we can do for him. Mr. Updyke—that was the old man's name—this is one of our most tried and trusted officers, and if any body can attend to the business for you, he can.'

"So we just sailed along together, and taking a stage, went to the up-town part of the city. It was a house in Twenty-third Street that had been broken into, not far from the Eighth Avenue. Coming to the house I couldn't find a shatter off the hinge, or a door with the lock broke. There wasn't a hole bored through any where, nor a pane out, nor a window forced. Every thing was just as it had been when the family went to bed the night before, savin' the little matters of the spoons, a silver waiter, and maybe a French clock or so.

"I own that at first I was a little bothered. But as I looked I asked to be shown into the garret. It was a garret—none of your scaled attics, all partitioned off with lath and plaster, but a real long unfinished place, as big as the whole top of the house—with the beams showin' all layers and bare above, and full of queer bidin' places, among cradles and chairs, trunks and bandboxes and chests, and crockery. I mounted the ladder with the old man, and began examinin' the trap-door. I looked at it pretty thorough for about a minute, and then says I to the old gentleman who was standing by in a state of great excitement, 'How long is it since any of your family were through this here?'

"Not for months and months,' was the old gentleman, 'never think of such a thing—how should they?'

"Says Mr. Updyke,' says I, 'It's my opinion that this is as how you've been broken into.'

"Lor!' says he, 'd'ye think so?' 'Most sartainly,' says I. 'Or look a here.' Then I showed him what had proved the fact to me. In the first place, the hooks that held down the door were both unfastened. Besides that, the old black marks of mildew all along the lines where the door had laid through months of wet and dry on the coamings of the outside didn't now square with the combings by no means, but were quite out of line. And my last stake before was a print in the dust that had stuck on every step, of a small shoe—that, accordin' to my nature, must have belonged to the little foot of a woman, and quite a little foot at that.

"Says I, 'Have the kindness to call your domestics together, and give me a chance to look at their shoes, for if any of 'em can make good a man, perhaps we've got a clew that there can't be any mistakin'.'

"The old gentleman did as I asked—and, by threatenin' to search, got the cook and the chambermaid, and the lady's maid, and the little girl that ran errands, to parade, one arter the other, before me. But none of the feelers of them hadn't no such foot as that—so small and lady like. So we sent 'em all down again, very much baffled and vowin' they wouldn't stay an other day.

"I stood and thought for a second—then says I, 'Hallett, somebody else been here!' says other woman, that might have come up here and let in her pal, and then gone away with him, on the roof?'

"The old gentleman thought for a while, too—and then says he, 'Mrs. Updyke has had a seamstress in the house—a very nice, pretty, respectable young woman; but she can't have had nothing to do with it—dear, no! we are all much taken with her, she's so modest and pious, and we'd trust her with any thing we've got. Leastways, she always leaves at seven o'clock in the evenin.'

"Who saw her out of the front door last night? Well, let's think.' No more did Mrs. Updyke. And comin' to find out, nobody hadn't. She went out by herself, very quiet, and they heard the front door shut after her, from the basement where they were takin' dinner—that was all.

"Was any body in the up stairs part of the house, jest at that time?' No—nobody, as far as they knowed. Very well—as the lawyers put it—that was my theory of the case directly. This young woman had watched her chance, and when all the folks were down stairs had made herself up—dressed herself in free to give 'em that like—and then slipped up into the garret to hid among the rubbish till the house was eatin'. After that matters wasn't difficult.

"Says I, 'Will you have the kindness to tell me where that young woman lives?'

"O Lord!' says the old gentleman, 'you ain't a goin' for to arrest her? I wouldn't have you do it for the world! I should never forgive myself if that innocent young creetur were brought into any suspicion.'

"'Dear me, Sir,' says I, laughin' like, 'ain't goin' to hurt a hair of her head.' Just a way o' mine, you know, to a sorter put him off.

"'Well, then,' says the gentleman, 'if you want to prove her innocence or any thing of the kind, you'll be always willin' to send for her to number so and so, such a street.' It was a place in one of the numbered streets in Brooklyn, a little this way above Fourteenth, and down by the North River. Then I left the house and went back to head-quarters. I got my boots off and took like an old gentleman for a first class o' family as was possible. I put on a wig of somethin' like—a pair of gold spectacles—black kids—and fashionable coat, vest, and pants, and a big frill with a Californy di'mond breastpin in it. And as I looked old enough, God knows, I didn't do nothin' for my hair, but left the locs about the mouth and eyes to speak for themselves. And, after all, I don't doubt my best friend—supposin' I'd had such an article—would ha' known me. Then I took a yellow bags and went up to the Sixth Avenue cars.

"I hadn't no trouble in the least to find the house. It was a low, two-story brick buildin', with a very neat wooden front painted black altogether as if it deserved a better neighborhood. The curtains was drawn down close to the first and second front windows, and there was a sound inside, mure'n if all the folks was dead. I had to knock about a dozen times before I could raise any body.

"By-and-by there came to the door, and opened it about half-way, a woman who might have been forty years old and was professed very mothery, in a scant bombazine gown, with a white handkerchief round her neck, and a big shawl over—but lookin' in the face, a kind o' sideways, and hard and cruel. 'Well, Sir?' says she, in a voice that corresponded.

"I made my voice broken and feeble like, and said, 'I've come, ma'am, to find a seamstress that's been recommended to me by an old friend of mine—does she live here?' Her name is—I think—' here I took out a piece of paper and pretended to have acted my memory—'Oh, yes! Ellen Williams—yes—yes, that the name; does she live here?'

"The woman eyed me pretty sharp for a minute, and then, says she, cold and firm as before, 'No, she don't live here—she used to—but she's left.' 'I don't know exactly where she is now, but if you'll leave your number, I'll try to find her for you and send her round. Fine, hard look.

"I wrote some number or other, just to appear natral like, of some street that never was heard of in the directory, and gave it to the woman, who then, without another word, slammed the door to in my face. I made up my mind to that pretty sharp, for I knew by the cut of her lexain' on my cane like a respectable old gentleman, that somethin' happened in there a little closer at the steps, and what d'ye think caught my eye? As sure as I live, there was the marks of her young arms! One had gone down and the other had turned in the direction toward the door! My spectacles had bothered me before, not bein' used to 'em. Now I looked over the rail and saw the marks plain. I could ha' held up my hand and sworn they was the same in any court whatsoever. And they had only been printed on. So my mind was made up a little stronger yet, to keep a sharp look-out on that house.

"The next thing to do was to think about for a place to hide in, where a fellow could see without bein' seen. Fortunately the lot opposite wasn't yet built on, and there was a high board fence in front of it, and a pile of lumber agin' the hinder side. So says I, 'That's my ticket —the very thing to a T.'

"Down I goes to head-quarters again, gives the wink to a down young fellow, who was known as a lion and had been with me in some pretty hard arrests already, puts on my ordinary citizen's dress, and goes back with my comrade to Chelsea. After some little trouble we found out the owner of the vacant lot, and introduced ourselves, and tellin' him we had to keep a lookout for some 'un as might do him as much harm as had been done to our client, we prevailed on him to let us spend the night between lumber and his fence. It was a pretty close, about large enough

—s'posin' it was an oven—to bake two loaves of bread in. The lot was, as good luck made it, the length of the whole block—so we let ourselves in by the other street, not darin' to awake suspicions, of course, by enterin' opposite the house which was to be watched.

"Well, there we stayed—Bill Humphreys and I—cooped up, and mighty uncomfortable, and seein' nothin' all day but dirty children and pigs, and now and then a fellow goin' to the tavern for the drink they sell on all the corners in that part of Chelsea. We looked through the cracks in the fence by turns, watch and watch, all day long, and the curtains was never raised, nor a blind turned, nor the door opened. About eight o'clock in the evenin' Humphreys began to get grumpy, and gave it as his opinion that we'd been sold. "What the devil's the use," says he, "of lyin' here like crop any longer? I'm for goin' either go over and search, or clear out and call it a bad job."

"Go low,' says I, 'an hour longer, and then, if somethin' don't turn up, I'll talk to you about this one of these ars'."

"It was just about an hour when somethin' did turn up. The door opposite opened about six inches, and the face of the woman I see in the mornin' looked out quick and sharp, up and down the street, as if she were discoverin' whether the coast was clear. Then she drew in her head again, and I thought I heard her say, 'All right!'

"About a minute more and the door opened wider. A man came out, with a big tarpaulin slouched over his eyes, a shovel on, and over that a heavy cloak—I twist at everything I see. He had a basket on his arm, and when he had reached the gat-lamp that was in front of the next house, in a fool he lifted the basket, put a lantle, to see if he'd got every thing all correct, I suppose. I tell ye, I looked with all my eyes! What d'ye think I see? Why, there was the very ornaments, in bronze and gilt, that was in the old gentleman's description of his French clock.

"'Quick as lightnin', Bill!' whispers I. 'See if your pistols is all right, and follow me when we mayn't want 'em. Quiet now! But over the fence like a shot!'

"Sure a good deal than I've told ye, Bill Humphreys and I took that fence at opposite corners. One of us struck the street a little way behind, the other just in front of the man that was the one in front. I was up with him just as he turned to leg it. I grabbed him by the collar, and clapped his hand over my shoulder, pressin' the fingers down, this way."—(Here old Hallet indicatedat me into this famous mode of arrest, known among rogs and thieves as that of "Letter X.")—"So," he resumed, "so that he couldn't bodge an inch. Bill came runnin' up, but I told him, 'Let be, I have got him safe enough, and he must attend to the house. He started back, and just then the fellow I had pinned gave a big, loud whistle. Holdin' him by the hand couldn't help that.

"Bill just nodded to the step, and with his heavy shoulder had made the first plunge to break the door in, when a light at one of the upper windows answered the whistle, and out of a small white hand, with a revolver in it, stuck through the blinds, and aim right at my head. There was no time to think, so I wrenched the man round and ducked behind him, so that, struggle as he might, he covered every thing but my legs. Just soon enough for me, for the big hand that pulled that trigger was steadied by the devil, first a bang, then a yell from the within I had hold of, and the blood spirted right in' out in a little stream from jest under his shoulder. He staggered back, droppin' the basket and pullin' me after him; but I'd got hold of a snake, 'D—n you!' in my face, and there was no further use of hands for holdin' of him in this world. Bein' free where pistol was in a sight quicker. I let him be, snatched up the basket, and hurried back to help Bill.

"He wanted it, sartain. Two desp'rate women in a match for half a dozen men. It seems as if you couldn't settle one of 'em, a remembers' of your mother and sister, till you hadn't nothin' else left to do for life. Comin' up into the room where the pistol'd been fired, I see Bill, with his face all one mass of blood, bendin' over one woman, a tryin' to bring her mad, lightin' hands together to put the handcuffs on, and had pulled down his head by the hair so it covered her face all up; and behind him stood the bag I'd taken in the mornin', just a-goin' to bring a big chair-rung down back of his ear. I grappled her as I would a tiger, for the hell a cruelty of her face made me almost forget what I wasn't a man. About two minutes more and she was roped down on the bed with the bracelets 'round her wrists—not hurt at all, but easy' mad.

"By this time, too, Bill Humphreys had succeeded in getting his hair loose and handcuffed the woman he had taken. He lifted his scored and bloody face from the wretched creature who was prostrate under him, and what d'ye think I see? What d'ye think I see?

"Oh, my God! It was my wife! Her as had been Mary Hallett. All foamin' with rage, her face beautiful as ever, bedeviled into somethin' awful. And I had to look right into her eyes, and she into mine!

"She stopped gnashin' her teeth; the blood all ran down out of her face, till it was white as snow; she gave one terrible shriek— Hark! I heard it then!" and old Hallett crouched, trembling as in an ague fit. "No, no,' said I, stroking his forehead with my fingers, "it was only the wind through the keyhole—that's all. Don't be afraid, I will stay by you and God knows I feel for you, to the very bottom of my heart."

"No, it wasn't the wind. I've heard it before, alone here in the dark—often, often. It's over now. Never mind.

"Then she shut her eyes, and Bill Humphreys says, 'She's gone!' Good for her—the best she could do.

"As I saw her a bit's time for dead—her as had once been my soul, my very bein'—I forgot all I had come back to the night to do, and I'd'a let up from the stones of Broadway, still and pale as she was now, and carried her on to heaven's help, to well as Old Hallett, 'cept years of sunlight I ever saw around my bed. I seemed to be back there again. I lifted her head, and laid the basket all a-down on one side my lap and patted it, and called Bill Humphreys to bring me a glass of water.

"He looked at me with his bloody face, and says he, 'Hallet, are you gone stark mad? What are ye doin' with that hell's naisling basket? Let her die! Let her go! Come, I'll and then ask me to get water! Are ye mad, I say?'

"I did look at him, and says I, 'I believe I am; if I ain't I ought to be. I wish I was.' Then I put my coat under her head and let her lie on it. I got water myself. I took Bill Humphreys by the hand, and drew him just outside of the door, out of sight of the bag to lay down on the bed. He followed me, scared like, believin' me really out of my head.

"'Bill Humphreys,' says I, 'you ever hear tell on my trouble, the trouble?' 'I have that,' says he. 'Very well, that's her—her—' 'Good God! d'ye tell me so?' says Humphreys.

"'And now, Humphreys,' I kept on to him, 'I've often been a good friend t'ye. When ye was in jail, I sent ye word never to plead guilty as you was ready. I watched with ye when ye had the Typhus. The time we broke up that there store in the Old Mulberry, I helped ye to get Knife Pete Delgety was going to stick you with and took the slash on my own arm. And to-night the bag would have been your job with the chair-rung if it hadn't been for me.'

"'All right,' so ye did, and thank ye for all, a thousand times,' says Bill, impatient like, wanting me to get through.

"'Well,' says I, 'I've saved a little somethin'—less hundred, I guess, and it's yours, all that's mine—it's in the Rose Hill Savin's Bank. That's yours. I've got a gold watch that hangs over the mantel. Only Bill Humphreys, you here! Say an hour I shot the man.' Don't push it, Bill! Ye owe me that much.'

"I stood and looked at him in an agony. I thought I saw a tear droppin' down among the scores and scars on his face, and knew that by the next minute he pushed up arm away, and says he,

"'Hallet, I pity ye, but I can't help ye—not if ye was my brother—justice must go agin feelin's. Bring along that woman,' pintin' to the bag on the bed, 'if I can't get her off, and explain to carry the other to the station, and I'll take her—but go she must.'

"I tried to get me to do as he said, but I wouldn't hear o't. 'No,' says I, 'I'll take her myself—you might handle her rough to the jail. I'll carry her first of yours. I'll go with her any where, short of hell.'

"So I took her up, careful and gentle, like old times, and carried her to the next house. By this time the old woman had got sobered down, and seein' she had to go, let Bill take the bracelets off, and follow me quiet enough. We found a crowd around the dead man, and several police were there tryin' to make way and carry him off.

"The M. P.'s knew us, and asked no questions except if we'd been successful in nabbin' the arrest. We said "Yes;" and they opened for us, keepin' back the crowd, and bringin' the dead man and the woman to the station-house.

"She was cold and still as ever when I laid her down on a bed in the station-house. I just told the fee'ar a minute and a half's time to where the man as was shot was stretched out. I lifted up the shawl as was gathered round his head, and says my plain, for I knew I'd never see him but that damned he'r! And—perhaps it is devilish, but I can't help it—I felt like leapin' and singin' with a sort of crazy joy, to see that whose hand he'd died by—to think how sweet a revenge is that wasn't meant to be!

"So they were locked up. The old hag and she, now come to at last, but all mute and mad like, staring wildly and answerin' no questions.

"It was several months afore they came to trial. I found out every day how matters was a goin' on, and at last I heerd that the Grand Jury had brought in two bills agin her, one for bein' second principal in a burglary, another for shootin' her accomplice, while she was watchin' the house like a sentinel act. And the lawyers told me that last was murder. She might swing for it, at any rate it would go awful hard with her.

"My God, Sir! could I stand by and see that? Could I hear the bell toll, and see the sheriff goin' with his posse, and see the papers tell in great black letters that she had died that awful, strugglin' death? She, the woman that once laid on my bosom, turnin' the face that I loved best, beside myself with joy, to an awful stony wall, and a pitiless stony mob—and man that couldn't have no mercy, and God that couldn't understand, and then shuttin' out their eyes in horror on this world, to meet the next without repentin'? I'd ha' taken her place sooner a hundred times. Dare to? Listen, and see if I dared!

"Bill Humphreys, though he had to be cruel didn't love to be back to the night, and he won't never let on to a soul that she was my wife. So, while the warden of the prison where she had hooned away to, to well as Old Hallett, the smart 'un, the detective, he hadn't the fust idee what else I was—Hallett, the husband of the murderess. So, one night, as it was quite the w'rds bedtime, and he was thinkin' about goin' his usual round to see every thing safe and snug, a queer old figger of a woman, the loonest on the pins, the stoopin'est, the most totlish ye ever did see, came nobblin' up to him as he sat by the fire, and rapped by the grate. At first he was surprised when the figger threw back her hood and he saw Mary Hallett? Not let me say that knowin' trouble, slapped me on the back, and says he, 'Good for you, old boy! At it again, boy? Well, what's up now? What brings you here, with an unfortunate tendency to gettin' into other folks's on a visit without ringin' the gate' to sarcumvent with that 'are this evenin'?

"Says I, 'Have you got a lodger in here called Hallett?' 'Yes,' says he, 'and a devil of a night Bill Humphreys and I broke up that fence over to Chelsea?'

"'Very well, we have,' says the warden; 'her trial don't come on till next week.'

"'I want to see her,' says I; 'there's another trouble come upon me, and I'm in a good deal about, and I've been a gettin' myself up so that she'll think I'm the aunt of the man as was shot and tell her Bill Williams and she'd be glad to hear from foul any body.' Then I mocked the voice of a very old woman, wheezin' and mumblin' my words, and then a little and sharp, till the warden rolled in his chair with laughin'.

"At last says he, 'It's pretty late, to be sure, but then, Hallett, I'll do an important favor. I'll give you fifteen minutes, if ye can get through by that time, and if ye must do it to-night.'

"'Yes, I must,' says I, 'and it won't take longer than that. And now I know you're anxious to be off on your round; so don't wait for me, but just think of your boy's bed, and a floor till I get through, and tell him that the sign I'll give to show I'm done will be when I'm a-comin' out.' Only your old aunt, my dear.'" And I came the old woman again till he shook his sides.

"So he took me to the cell, unlocked the door, and said, 'A visitor for you, Ellen.' I shuddered, and he slammed the key behind and, I heard his boy come to wait at the door.

"It was dark a bit pitch inside, but a rustlin' in the corner of the room, and a faint and gentle voice, that said, 'Well, who is it? told me how to steer. I had made up my mind that if the warden didn't, he make myself known, and he would scream, and the game would be up right off.

"So in a feigned voice I said, very quiet, 'I've come to save you from this place; don't make a sound, and in five minutes you will be free.'

"Even as it was she was going to give a little shriek, but I put my hand on her mouth and said, 'Mary Hallett, you dare to betray me, and you'll hang us both! Put on this gown of mine over your night-dress, stick your feet in these shoes, and lie on the bed like Sairy Gamp! Hold the string on top of your head, put this hood on and draw it close round your face. Now the spectacles.

"Not much longer than I've been tellin' ye did it take to finish the disguise. All the time she seemed like a leaf, gradually becomin' more sartain who it was as was doin' this for her.

"'Now,' says I, 'I believe ye look enough as old as I am to know how to get out, pasain' for me, bein' as there's a boy waitin' with the key, who don't know my height as well as the warden. But ye must walk like me too. I hobbled in, you must hobble out. And ye must talk like me, in the pass-word is, 'Good night, old aunt, my dear.'" See if ye can say it as I do.'

"I drilled her on that until she could do it just as well as I did. Then says I, 'Now ye know who I am. But hush! don't dare to think of me as aught but a feel like living thanks. Neither likin' nor body nfeared for my sake.'

"I'll be found out to-morrow morning, but they'll all say as how I'm mad—so I am, stark mad, and that kind of folks are safe.' She just got time to say two words, 'Forgive me!' Says I, 'Don't speak that word, the part of your life I'd have to forgive I must have forgotten, or I wouldn't have been here to-night. I only remember her as I took home from the civil ceremony of Bridewray, it's her I'm a-savin'. Pray to God for what ye are now!' And don't go back to hell, Mary!' After that word I didn't dare to trust myself, but pushed her from me, and said, 'Go! carefull, now! for your life!' After which I covered myself up in the bed where she'd been lyin'.

"Every second seemed more'n a year. She hobbled across the floor, makin' the natural sort of noise with her shoes that old women do down, I heard the bolt slide. I jest dared uncover my head enough to see her open the hood till the warden's shoulder, and hear the words 'terrible,' but yet very well indeed, 'Only yer old aunt, my dear.' Then the bolt slid back again, and I began to breathe. At the debt I meet the warden and get stopped to tell what success I'd had, she was safe. If he did meet her, the success was too—yes, a hundred to one agin her.

"For an hour I lay in a cold sweat, tremblin' like a leaf, and hearin' all the while horrid slees. Now I'd think that they'd caught her and locked her up somewhere else, to face me with her in the mornin'. Then the chance if it was really her as had escaped—if in the dark I hadn't let out some other woman—and she was still waitin' for the dreadful day's doom. For I'd risked all to save her, and if she was to be my damnation and her own once more in this world, by sufferin' a fellow-creature as she had lived a felon's life, then I couldn't never hope again for Heaven's grace. But all kept quiet and I reasoned that the warden knew me so well he would have come back to see if it could be as he had done such a crime, if he'd suspected it—and by-and-by I fell asleep.

"The next mornin', of course, it was found out that the woman in the cell was not Mary Hallett. The Sheriff came to see me—so did the District Attorney, and even one or two of the Grand Jury. They all knew the history of Knife Pete Delgety, and how he had sworn to have she was—and, last of all, why I did it. For a day or two I kept my bed, and answered their questions, yes or no, not tellin' a soul the real reason for what I'd done, and Bill Humphreys was man enough not to let on till I told him he might.

"By-and-by, when every body had heard of it, around and in the jail and the station, there were about ten people in on one day, all on 'em seemin' real gentlemen, and one o' 'em had been talked to by Bill, and he had my heart seemed o' a sudden to warm to him. I jumped up from the prison bunk where I was sittin', and says I,

"'Hear me, all o' you Sirs as wants to know why I did this here. She sinned again God—she sinned again me—she sinned again Bill, and she made my last years a hell. She did that which there's no mercy in man for. I have gi'n her the best mercy I had in the power o' God.

"'Who here has got a daughter that he would leave off tryin' for, short of the job? Who's got a sister, the murder of whose body would shut up his heart from it? Who's got a babe that wouldn't follow its mother's father through nights and days, through pains and watching, if there was one chance o' savin' her on the edge o' the gallows, or the brink of hell? Who? I say.

"'That woman was once my wife.

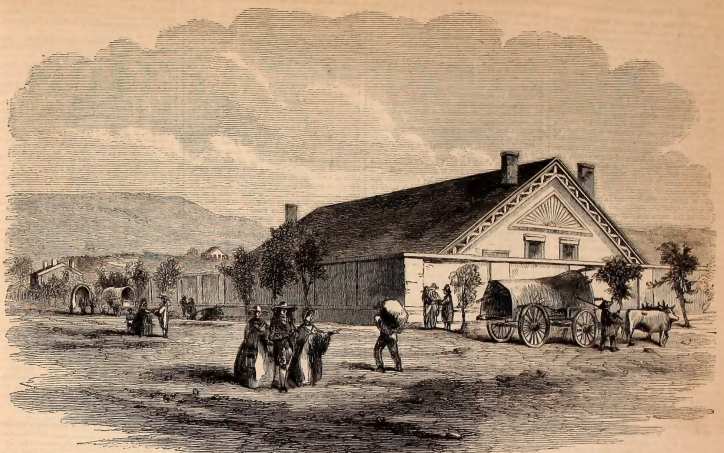
"Now, that a fool as I am old man who has you like. I wasn't blind—or deaf—or an idiot. I know the law. I've been brid up to preservin' from a boy's time, and I'm a old man now. Who's you were wakin' for business, I was wakin' for the law. When you slept I kept it for you. I know that I've done it for you, for I've known one I was born, I'm not so ignorant as not to know that it will turn agin me and punish me. It might, and I'm ready for it.

"'If I be fined, let the law take all I've got for it. If I be imprisoned, let the stone walls keep me as long as the law says I must stay there. If it be the gallows, I sha'n't flinch to meet what I've wanted these two years. But after all that's how God has made me, and I'm what he's before Him, I find out I've saved her—as I've gi'n mercy, I know I shall—Oh!'"

"Harry Hallett, then hast found mercy! For even as the old man, roused into wild eloquence by this remembered plea, willing to have forfeited his life as freely as he dropped back into his chair, and was gone.

Come, then, indictment for his crime, like the record of the old time gentle-hearted soldier's oath, was blotted out by a seraph's tear drop, where the pen has inquest of each fact of the spirit that did them—where the city whose streets he walks needeth no watchmen—where the thieves of life, of riches and of honor keep not in and steal—where, for evermore, there shall be no discord between love and duty, but both are one and indivisible.

On the books of an asylum not far from New York I found these two entries:



1st. "Ellen Hallett. Died. Entered October 12, 18—. Tried for procuring escape of prisoner. Acquitted, and sent here, being insane."

2d. "Escaped. December, same year."

Under these I added a third:

3d. "Set free, utterly restored. November 21, 18—."

Has he found her safe? A great vail hangs over the answer. Kind souls, pray for her—pray for the wife of Harry Hallett.

THE TABERNACLE AT SALT LAKE CITY.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BURR & MOGO.]

VIEWS IN AND ABOUT SALT LAKE CITY.

THE first of the accompanying pictures presents a view from the street (looking toward the north-east) of the west wall of the Temple Block, Salt Lake City, with the Tabernacle in the foreground, its lower half concealed by the wall which surrounds the entire square of ten acres. This wall is built of adobes, plastered with a durable cement, and surmounted with a coping of sandstone.

The Tabernacle is a large, commodious building, capable of seating nearly 2500 persons; back of it, partially hidden by trees, and in the next corner of the block, stands the Endowment House, in which are conferred the mysterious degrees of Mormon priesthood. It is used for this purpose temporarily until the Temple is completed. Apostate Mormons, shuddering at the thought of the dreadful oaths taken therein, look upon this building as the very hell of hells. The windows of both of these structures are still boarded up as they were prepared previous to the late abandonment of the city. The building standing alone upon the bench in the rear, presenting its gable to us, is the City Arsenal.

Beneath the young shade trees surrounding the block, and by the side of the pure mountain stream which flows along the edge of the sidewalk, may be seen two emigrant wagons, with their motive-power lying at rest.

The second man in the priesthood, the most extensive practitioner in polygamy, and the most vulgar and profane man in the Mormon Church, is Heber C. Kimball. Our second picture represents the group of dwellings occupied by himself and families, also surrounded by a heavy stone wall, with clese and massive gates, well suited to a county jail. Heber has a bad reputation as a husband, is excessively jealous of his wives, and a poor "governor." His "spirituals" frequently run away from him, and when at home quarrel so much that he finds several separate buildings absolutely necessary. Our view of his group of dwellings is the best evidence of the fact. The buildings outside his walls are more humble. It will be seen that Heber's block stands upon rising ground, running up to the very edge of the bench at the mountain's foot. In the foreground and bending around at the left is one of the larger irrigating canals. This is the finest property in the valley next to Brigham's.

THE RESIDENCE AND HAREM OF HEBER C. KIMBALL, SALT LAKE CITY.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BURR & MOGO.]

HOW I BECAME A PRIEST.

In the autumn of 1839, just thirty-five years ago, my sister and I went to pay a visit to an aunt, married to a wealthy wood-merchant of Bellinzona. I was then eighteen, and la Petite some years younger. Our uncle and aunt, who had no children, grew very fond of us, and would not hear of our leaving them; they talked of adopting the little one, and of taking me into the wood business. We, on our part, were willing enough to stay with them; for never before had we known so much comfort, our parents being rich in nothing but sons and daughters. The winter of 1838-9 was more than usually severe; the snow lay deep in the valley: all the small streams were frozen, and no saw-mills could work. Our uncle grumbled and smoked, and smoked and grumbled, from morning till night. But several large orders had come in, he was uneasy at the delay he was forced to make in executing them, he must have a large stock always filled in summer, but not removed till winter, when, by means of long slides, formed of rough trunks of trees, which water is poured on to procure a coating of ice, the timber is conveyed to the foot of the mountain. At that winter's end no one among the stoutest-hearted of the Burratori—the men are so called who cut and bring the wood to the lake—would venture up to the forests. There was nothing for it but to wait till the cold moderated. But February, with its wild blasts, came and passed, and still the men refused to work. At last some warm sunny days ushered in the month of March, the snow left the valley, and the icy fetters of the snowy streams melted quite away. The sunshine was succeeded by sunshine within; my aunt's husband now whistled about the house, making each of his fingers go of its small round tune, and Ave Maria the Seven Burratori had agreed to go up the mountain. As during the last three weeks they had been neither a fresh fall of snow, nor any indication of a thaw, the woodmerchant declared no danger was to be apprehended. In fact, the mountain, from its nature, was little subject to avalanches, nor had any such accident occurred within the memory of man.

Tired out by such long inactivity, I was willing to join the intended expedition, and at last worried my uncle into granting me permission to begin my apprenticeship on the next day. I was just one of the can of an old fellow called Piccio, generally recognized as the chief of the Burratori. We were to set out on the Monday morning, and my mother the job would be completed by the following Saturday.

We had, however, forgotten to ask la Petite's consent. She, who had never been separated from her even for a day since her birth, came in to tears from morning till night at the idea of my leaving her for so long a time. My uncle was in a rage, a soft-hearted man, so he agreed to go with us himself, and take the little girl also as far as Agnolia, a village in the Val Biogno, lying at the foot of the mountain to which we were bound. This arrangement put an end to my sister's grief, and early on the Burratori step out night and day till the work in Bellinzona was at an end, or as if one of us she had remained at Bellinzona. We were provided with woolen wrappers and the means of kindling a fire; and as you may believe, the thought of this bivouac had infinite charms for my imagination.

The cold on that memorable Monday morning was perhaps, as intense as it had been during the winter; but as there was no wind, it was not keep to their engagement. I can not affirm that sleeping which I was not a delightful but a painful anticipation; still, I relished being treated as a man, and never complained. On the Wednesday old Piccio declared it was beginning to thaw, and on Thursday it was perfectly clear that the frost had broken up; indeed, it was a fine clear sky, piping down the grooves cut in the mountain's side by the spring and summer torrents. The Burratori did not seem to care, for the afternoon prevented any dangerous accumulation of snow in our immediate vicinity. Long ere the sun appeared to and from the forest, our night's shelter being to the natural caves formed by projecting rocks, which, in a manner of course, were at that part of the mountain where there was no wood. We strained every nerve to finish our task on Friday evening.

Three or four hours more would have done it, said Piccio in a despondent tone, as the sunset overtook us, and a large stack of timber still lay before us.

"Well, then, let us be up by peep of day," cried I, "and we may all be back at Bellinzona by the evening."

On the morrow we only mustered five; three of our party were missing. Had they deserted, or only gone on in advance?

"We shall soon know," said the remaining Burratori, and with one accord they set to work with such, unearthly yells, ending in shrill peals of mad laughter, that, though, I had heard of the necessity of holding communication with their comrades at a distance, I was nevertheless disagreeably startled. These yells can be heard an incredible way off. When there could be no reasonable doubt that the missing men had deserted us, one of the southern exclamations of "Ohè gatto di marmo!" "cat of marble," meaning lazy fellow!), "you shall pay for this."

The loss dispirited us, for the work still to be done required all our original strength of limbs to get it finished in the time proposed. The dawn was just whitening the horizon when we began our ascent, and a little breeze, barely enough to make the pine branches quiver, was blowing from the west. Piccio's only son, a stout, handsome young man, the way of our party, prophesied we should have a fine day; but as the light increased, great black masses of clouds came up from the northwest.

"A bad sign, I say!" cried Picurio; "we had better turn back."

I was somewhat vexed at this advice, and answered hastily: "Those who are afraid, may go back; I shall keep my promise to my uncle, I'll and with the rest of the wood unassisted," and I walked on; the rest followed, but in silence.

Our path up the mountain, now winding in and out through pines, now passing under steep, bare rocks perforated with caverns, ran along the edge of a ravine several hundred feet deep, at the bottom of which lay, silenced under a huge snow-drift, one of the great mountain streams, which, as I said, our could be heard miles away, as it dashed and roared in its precipitous descent to join and swell the Lake Maggiore. The sky, the whole horizon, were mountain-tops bristling with spears of pine, and the sun, as I gazed, soon gilded by the rays of the rising sun.

"Look!" cried I, "it is not the promise of a fair day."

Old Picurio shook his head as before, for at the moment a pale, watery sunbeam darted from a vapor, shot into view. In another moment it was entirely obscured by the clouds which speedily covered the whole sky. The sighing breeze suddenly grew into a turbulent wind, and soon pricked up their feet.

The men stood still, looking uneasily about them, muttering between their teeth: "Will it warn t'un not? As for you, my masters, I don't know."

"I told you so," cried Picurio; "those clouds are a sign of bad weather, and we had better turn back at once. The holy Virgin protect us from an avalanche!"

"Nonsense, father!" replied the son; "you know there are never avalanches on this mountain."

"Don't say so, my son; I remember hearing my father speak of a terrible one."

"As for me," I interposed the young man, laughing.

Nevertheless, the old man's words had produced an effect; for, as with one accord, we all turned round and began to descend toward the village. The wind came on as if by magic, the snow, rushing from every quarter of the heavens, "a mighty and a strong," soon filled the ravines. A thick, fast-falling snow, which, whirling in mad eddies, and flying up and down, almost blinded us. We were in a quandary indeed. Old Piccio, Picurio, who had assumed the lead; but what with the snow and the difficulties and dangers of the path, we could scarcely keep our feet. After one blast, which nearly hurled us down the ravine, we stood aghast, and looked at each other in silence. No one could. Not a word was spoken; for by this time the heaven had become as dark as night, and, as many an anxious glance was cast around in search of any signs of the dreaded disaster.

We had reached a point about half-way down the mountain, where the path passed through a mere cleft between two rocks. Here we were forced to go two by two. At that instant a boom like that of a distant waterfall struck on our ears, and we stopped, and looked at each other, and, with clubs above us, a large white mass, like a living thing, fell from the heights, and passed along the edge of a rock, hover for a second, topple, then come crashing down.

"The avalanche! the avalanche!" burst from every lip. "To the left! to the caves!" shouted Picurio, throwing himself with his face to the ice, twinkling of an eye down fell the enormous white mass in front of our refuge; there we were unhurt, but shut in between a wall of rock behind, a wall of ice in front.

For the first few moments of bewilderment, Picurio cried out: "Who is here besides me?" It was pitch dark—so much was even one's own hand.

"As for you, my dear," replied Piccio, "you're all right."

"My son! my son!" exclaimed the old man, "is that thou?" and he began to sob as I had heard him weeping. Awful were those moments. Buried alive—a living death! Again the only sign of life was hearing the stillness and darkness of the tomb. Often in the silent watches of the night do I hear the dreadful sound that broke in dreams I live over again that terrible scene.

"Have you your axe, young man?" cried Piccio.

No. In the perilous moment when he had forced his companions to turn back, I had thrown it out of hand.

With all the energy of despair we flung our whole weight of our bodies against the inert mass which shut us into our living tomb—hopeless. It must have fallen into a ravine—hurled by the avalanche fell in the early morning, and the Ave Maria was singing when I recovered my consciousness. Yes, we distinctly heard the bell of the church of Agnolia. No words can describe the rapture I felt at hearing to this voice from without; it seemed to say distinctly: "Hope in God's mercy!"

"Let us pray," said the old man. We recited the Angelus, and told the rosary. After that we made more exertions, but all in vain, only to die. The sound of the church-bells had taken away the terrible feeling of despair entirely cut off from the living. We felt sure that, as soon as we were missed, all the village would turn out on the morrow to search for us, and that probably we were able to hear the bells so clearly, it would not be difficult to make our voices heard by the same means. Luckily, our day's food was in our pockets, provided it into several portions, so that it should last as long as possible. When the bells ceased, we had no doubted obtaining our release.

Presently the church-bell began to ring again. It could not be the De Profundis; sufficient time had not elapsed; besides, the strokes were quick and sharp, not slow and solemn. Glory be to God, it was the storm-bell; the alarm was given, and good souls would soon be on the search for us. Neither Picurio nor I spoke, so eagerly did we strain our ears to catch the sound of approaching voices, long before it could reach us. Hours we could have reached the mountain. I think the beating of our hearts might have been heard in that dead silence.

At last, at last we distinguished the barking of a dog. I recognized the bark at once: it was Bibi, la Petite's pet. Nearer and nearer it came, until we could hear him whining and scratching the snow which hid us. Then the blessed sound of human voices became audible. Full of hope and joy, we threw ourselves once more against our snow barricade; we dug at it with hands and feet, striving to make a breach large enough to might let our friends know our situation. We worked with all our might, but the noise fell away heavily on our own ears. Many times we were aware that the seekers were close to us—we heard their voices—we shouted. We could hear Bibi, with anguish we understood that we could not make ourselves heard. Near as the seekers were, we could hold no communication with them. Exclamations of horror, pity, and grief, met our ears. The names of our unfortunate companions were pronounced in tones that plainly revealed that they had given them a burial, many expressions of how best to carry away the bodies, wonder about us, and then our expected deliverers departed. Again the despair took possession of us as their retreating steps grew fainter and fainter; and finally, we were left alone to die. Such was God's right arm is long enough to reach us even here.

I tried to pray, but my thoughts wandered to my home; all the childish griefs I had known were remembered, and my last wish was that my body should never see father or mother, brothers or sisters again! all my faults to them rose up in judgment against me. I know not how long I remained on the rocky ledge, sparing myself no repelling mouthfuls. I must have fallen into a deep, dreamless sleep, for I know nothing more till Picurio called to me that he heard the bell for early mass. It was the Sunday after our departure, and we each ate a portion of our bread. All that day and the evening night passed in alternations of hope and despair. By the next morning—the beginning of the third day since our entombment—our little provisions had been exhausted. We were oppressed by feverish thirst and gnawing hunger—a horrid death was before us, and we knew it. We had parboiled at once was to be averted in comparison with the lingering suffering we anticipated.

We had ceased to speak, ceased to pray; I had no hope now—no faith. In sneezily silence we sat by each other, though, I may say, the approach of pangs of death, when suddenly the deep hush was broken by a familiar sharp bark. It was Bibi again! Oh, the unutterable joy of hearing the life-like fellow tearing and scratching at the snow block-ing up up our entrance! There was a small chink that made let rays rain down my cheeks; it was a child's voice—no other than la Petite's—crying: "He is here! I am sure he is here! Oh, my God, oh, my God, oh, my God!"

One heard no more within us as we heard many steps nearing our prison. There was danger, too, for many cautions were given. The child's voice was heard once more: all! "Make haste; je make haste! Give me a hoe; I can dig. My poor brother! I will save him, I will save him!"

At last a long stick was pushed through the snow wall; it touched me; I seized it. There was a shout of "He is not a miracle!" mingled with the child's wild cry of "Brother! brother!" Another stick was thrust through and caught by Piccio. Not a whisper was now to be heard; every one worked; minutes seemed hours to us before we opening was made large enough to drag us through.

When we once more saw daylight and dear familiar faces we fell down, fainting with joy. We were lifted out and laid at the feet of the old earl, who, in spite of his infirmities, had ventured up the mountain to bless and encourage the efforts of the men. Overcome by the child's agony of grief, had consented to make one more search for us.

"Thank God, my sons, for your deliverance," were the old priest's first words, "and devote to His service the lives He has so miraculously preserved."

It was this, then, la Petite, that led me to become a priest; and la Petite, who, through God's mercy, saved my life, has made my home her home.

"She would have made a capital lady-abbess, though," said M. B.—looking at her with unfeigned pride.

"And old Piccio?" asked Jessie.

"He died in my uncle's house."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"PAT," said a gentleman to his servant, "what's all that noise in the street?" "Oh, nothing, Sir! they're only forcing a man to turn volunteer."

A schoolma'am of this city tells the following rich incident:

She was teaching a small school in an adjoining town, and "manufacturing" her own "new pieces," one Monday noon, she seated herself with the family around the usual plenty, and made a meal of brown bread, fat fried pork, and roast potatoes. Just before pushing back from the table a youngster of ten years exclaimed, "I know what good victuals is. Yes, ma'am—I know what 'tis."

Do you, indeed!" calculated the embarrassed schoolma'am, not knowing what to say, and ashamed to say nothing.

"Yes, ma'am! I knows what good victuals is. I've been to school to you three times, and eaten here on 'em."

There is a good story of an eccentric lord, or rather, nobleman-quite habitués, to the effect that one was, on one occasion, presented by a clergyman, known to him, a new sovereign from a neighbor and put it in—her own pocket.

PRETTY GOOD.—A young lady remarked to a Pic the other day, that his penchant (which, by-the-by, was not very much in one respect resembled Sim. before in the room commenced guessing what it could be. At last a smart-looking little boy, who had, until now, sat in one corner silent, was asked to guess. After examining the knife pretty closely he turned round, and in a cunning manner said, "Well, I don't know, unless it is because it's dull."

A young gentleman, very conceited and vain of himself, called on Miss Sadie Sly, who was not pretty, to face such pitted by the small-pox, was, not long since, invited by a friend to call on a young lady whom he knew slightly. When called work came in fashion of the time, the gentleman man; I can't get you to do it."

An old lady being asked what she thought of the morning in India, replied that, to her mind, it was extremely like a Scotch mist.

The sons of an emperor in Venice got into a quarrel. In the heat of passion one of them said to the other, "You are the greatest ass in Venice." Highly offended at their conversation by his unfortunate grandson. "Come, come—you forget that I am present."

A conscious and conceited lady, vaunting her good figure, boasted to another that her waist was small and had always been remarkable for the beauty of their backs. "Ah, madam," replied the other, "your forehead and all ways so glad to see them," was the reply.

"What do you often pop, but never stop to pick up?"—A hint.

"How are you, Count?" said a noted wag to a spruce looking gentleman of the genus ass, "I have just obtained the indigent sent," "who are you, and why do you call me Count?" "Why, Sir," said the fop, "I understand in New York last week, and I supposed you were of royal blood." "Not exactly."

The Evening Post says: "We stop the press to state that Mr. Bryant has just returned to the city." We are informed us that it has been thought best to have the first dispatch sent the new telegraph come by the steamer."

A mean economizer, in reply to whatever question might be asked him, invariably answered, "Just a distinction." A cardinal, having invited him to dine, proposed to drink a glass of wine with him, and asked him if he would take it white or red. "Your eminence is going to join that he has an important question to ask me, I will answer it under any circumstances, provided it is going to a distinction," said the priest. "If I am not," said the economizer, "I will answer you no—if you ask, is it lawful to baptize in your excellency's name?" "Why, yes!" for there is, really, no difference between it and water."

A boy in company, wanting his servant, called out, "Jack, bring me a knife!" "Which of mine?" A lady present answered, "On your shoulders, Sir."

A lazy fellow, lying down on the grass, said, "Oh, how I wish that this was called work, and well paid for!"

Julius Cæsar Hannibal, giving an account of his sovereign, says: "All the passengers were now hearty, and, as I did not think enough, de cap'n gave me leave to go ship to have too, and she bows too."

Some one speaking of a celebrated bear-singer, said, "He is a bear-ly-ant singer." "Oh, yes," replied Sneezy, "the whole issue of his life has been bear-ly-ant."

Punch says that the characteristic of a time-piece is tendency towards fine endeavor, for "it always keeps its hands before its face."

"Will you take something?" said a teetotaller to his friend, who was complaining of a cold in the head. "Yes," was the reply. "Well, Frank, 'tis'r take a nut."

The New Haven Register says: "A few nights since, owing to an accident, the fire-signal in the old city of Hartford until late, and, in consequence, these awaiting the fire-signal in Hartford had retired to rest. One gentleman was a demure-looking Yankee, inclined to have a wag. Finding that the fire-signal was not given, he leaned back against the wall, and 'went at it.' He was not long in getting response enough to satisfy even the last by one of the officials, and told that 'stilling up the fire-signal' would not do in that case."

Punch has detected the astonished sleeper, "no sitting up and sleeping?"

"Will you take something?" said a teetotaller to his friend, who was complaining of a cold in the head. "Yes," was the reply. "Well, Frank, 'tis'r take a nut."

"Will, I declare," replied the other, "this is a mean place! Won't you ask the Company if I mayn't gape?" Whereupon the official, with a "stretch' that put the officious official to instant flight."

"Can you return my love, dearest Julia?" "Certainly, Sir, I do return it every night."

Jim Sinkis puts every thing to use. His wife has a fine head of hair, and he strops his razor on it.—Ex exactly!

A woman has been arrested in Albany for stealing old iron; she had fourteen pounds of it secreted in her bosom. Her affection must have been iron bars.

A fellow who got drunk on election day, said it was owing to his effort to put down "party spirit."

A man and his wife were quarreling about who should wear the breeches; in the mean time one knocked at the door. The husband ran out stripped of his pants and breeches, and asked him whom he wished to speak with. "The person answering to the description is the master of the house. "Well," said he, "a little time and I will answer to that description, for the case is desperate." So stepping in, his wife and he went to it again, and she at last yielded to him the breeches. "Now," said he, then mayest speak with me. I am the minister of the house; but I could not tell him so because my wife would not let me get out of the controversy."

"Pat," said a gentleman to his servant, "what's all that noise in the street?" "Oh, nothing, Sir! they're only forcing a man to turn volunteer."

Why should crinoline be abolished?—Because it introduces all sorts of women into the fashionable circle.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, Sept. 13, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been dull and heavy for nearly all kinds of Breadstuffs. . . . Cotton has been more sought after at buoyant prices, closing, however, quietly. . . . Provisions have been moderately inquired for. . . . The movements in Groceries have been less extensive, but prices have ruled steady and firm. . . . The imports during the week amounted to $1,414,124 against $2,984,418 the corresponding week of 1857, and $2,763,982 against $13,756,459 the same week in 1856. . . . The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations. . . . We append a revised list of the highest quotations for the leading articles:

Unsound State Flour, sort	$3 40	$4 40
Superfine to extra State, per barrel	4 55	5 50
Superfine to Savoy Western, per barrel	4 35	5 10
Extra Western, per barrel	5 10	5 80
Fancy to extra Genesee, per barrel	5 90	6 50
Extra Canadian, per barrel	5 50	6 50
Mixed to Extra Southern, per barrel	5 30	8 15
Fine to Superfine Rye Flour, per bbl	3 50	4 15
Corn Meal, per barrel	3 15	3 75
White Wheat, per bushel	1 25	1 35
Red Wheat, per bushel	1 16	1 30
Mixed Western Corn, per bushel	66	70
Yellow Corn	73	76
Rye, per bushel	90	95
Barley, per bushel	67	80
Oats Oats, per bushel	40	50
Jersey and Penn. Oats, per bushel	41	43
Southern Oats, per bushel	40	42
Cotton, middlings, per pound	13½	13½
Moss Pork, per barrel	17 50	18 00
Prime Pork, per barrel	15 00	15 50
Country Mess Beef, per barrel	11 00	12 00
Cut Meats, per pound	10½	11
Lard, per pound	11	12
State Butter, per pound	14	18
Ohio Butter, per pound	13	17
Cheese, per pound	7½	9
Rice, per 100 pounds	3 75	6 75
Rio Coffee, per pound	10½	11
Cuba Sugar, per pound	6¾	8
Muscovado Sugar, per pound	7	8
New Orleans Sugar, per pound	7	8
New Orleans Molasses, per gallon	30	40
Hyson Teas, per pound	27	60
Gunpowder Teas, per pound	30	60
Domestic Whisky, per gallon	24½	28
Hops, new, per pound	7	10
Hops, per pound, 1857	3	5
Hops, per pound, 1856	40	45
Tallow, per pound	9½	—2
Crude Turpentine, per 280 pounds	3 75	4
Spirits Turpentine, per gallon	40	42
Tar, per barrel	1 75	2 12½
Common Rosin, per barrel	1 75	2
Linseed Oil, per gallon	75	78
Kentucky Tobacco, per pound	5	15
Seed Leaf Tobacco	6	35
American Brown Wool, per pound	15	20
Pulled Wool	25	60

The Live Stock Market last Wednesday week was depressed. The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compares as follows:

	Week ending	Week ending
	Sept. 1.	Sept. 8.
Beeves	6,794	5,501
Milch Cows	107	107
Veal Calves	491	559
Sheep and Lambs	18,000	15,500
Swine	9,000	13,100

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Fore to premium Beeves, per pound	$ 5	@ 8
Common to Good Milch Cows, per head	35	@ 50
Veal Calves, per pound	4	@ 7½
Sheep and Lambs, per head	3 75	@ 5 50
" per pound	5½	@ 8
Live Swine, per pound	6½	@ 7½
Dressed	8½	@ 10
Roasting Pigs, each	2 50	@ 3 50

WHOLESALE PRICES OBTAINED BY PRODUCERS AT WASHINGTON MARKET.

Apples, new, per barrel	$1 50	@ 4 00
Pears, "	3 00	@ 12 00
Peaches, per basket	1 25	@ 3 50
Plums, per basket	1 25	@ 2 50
Grapes, will, per pound	3	@ 6
Lima Beans, per basket	1 25	@ 1 50
Potatoes, new, per barrel	1 25	@ 3 25
Potatoes, sweet, per bushel	1 50	@ 2 75
Onions, new, per barrel	1 50	@ 3 00
Turnips, per bushel	50	@ 75
Cabbages, per 100	2 00	@ 6 00
Cucumbers, per bushel	75	@ 1 00
Pumpkins, per 100	3 00	@ 5 00
Green Corn, per 100 ears	75	@ 1 25
Watermelons, per 100	15 00	@ 25 00
Nutmeg Melons, per barrel	1 50	@ 2 00
Tomatoes, per bushel	37	@ 50
Cucumbers, per 100	10	@ 50
Egg Plants, per 100	1 00	@ 2 00
Eggs, N. Y. and N. J., per dozen	15	@ 18
Eggs, Western, per dozen	13	@ 15
Chickens, per pair	37	@ 75
Fowls, per pair	75	@ 1 00
Ducks, per pair	62	@ 1 00
Geese, each	62	@ 1 50
Turkeys, per pound	12	@ 15
Pigeons, per dozen	50	@ 75
Woodcock, per dozen	3 75	@ 3 50
Snipe, Upland, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00
Snipe, Ox-eye, per dozen	30	@ 50
Plover, per dozen	1 50	@ 2 00

ADVERTISEMENTS.

TEN THOUSAND NEW SHAWLS.
WILL BE OPENED THIS WEEK,
Forming part of the stock of the
BANKRUPT ESTATE OF
ARMAND LANTERIER,
Of Paris,
Including the
NEW MANTLE SHAWLS.
And MANY OTHER PARISIAN NOVELTIES.
ALL TO BE SOLD WITHOUT REGARD TO COST,
TO CLOSE THE ESTATE OF THIS BANK-
RUPT FIRM.
W. D. BUTRILL,
311 BROADWAY.

LADIES VISITING THE SEA-SIDE, TOURISTS, AND TRAVELERS

Will find the application of

GODFREY'S EXTRACT

OF

ELDER FLOWERS

both cooling and refreshing to the Face and Skin, allaying all heat and irritability, removing Eruptions, Sunburn, Freckles, and Tan, and rendering the skin soft, clear, and healthy. Price One Dollar.

EUGENE DUPUY, 609 Broadway,
Family Chemist.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

LIFE ILLUSTRATED is a First-Class Family Newspaper, designed to encourage a spirit of Home, Manhood, Self-Reliance, and Advancement among the people; to illustrate Life in all its phases, and ought to be read by every Family.

Published Weekly, at Two Dollars a year, by Fowler and Wells, No. 308 Broadway, New York.

THE FLOWER OF THE FLOCK.
BY PIERCE EGAN,
Author of "Tom and Jerry of the Period," "The Snake in the Grass," &c., &c.

Complete in One Volume. Price 50 cents.

It is certainly one of the most charming fictions we have ever perused.—Daily Times.

Mailed free of postage.

FREDERIC A. BRADY,
179 Nassau Street, N. Y.

NEW HAND-BOOKS.—HOW TO WRITE
HOW.—HOW TO TALK.—HOW TO BEHAVE.—AND
HOW TO DO BUSINESS. Containing, in a handy, useful sense volume, may be had, pre-paid, by First Mail, for $1 00. Address, FOWLERS AND WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

HUNT, SWEETSER & CO.'S
IMPROVED HIGH-SPEED
SEWING MACHINES.
For all manufacturing purposes and family use, are preferable to any other machine. No. 463 Broadway.

Inventors, look to your Interests!!

HOW TO GET A PATENT, or, The Inventor's Instructor, Pocket-Companion, and Hand-Book. By Edgar Fawcett. 2 cents, or 3 three-cent stamps.

FREDERIC A. BRADY,
179 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HOUSEHOLD WORDS,
CONDUCTED BY CHARLES DICKENS.
For Octobra. Price 25 cents.

Now ready, and for sale by all Booksellers and Periodical Dealers.

Subscription $2 00 a year.

FREDERIC A BRADY,
179 Nassau Street, N. Y.

HOW TO DO GOOD AND GET "PAID FOR IT."—THAT is, agency for our Publications. The terms are such, there can be no possibility of loss. Every Family will be a subscriber. Send for particulars address, FOWLER AND WELLS,
No. 308 Broadway, New York.

NOW READY.

A NEW EDITION OF THE GREAT TELEGRAPH SUPPLEMENT
TO
HARPER'S WEEKLY.

Orders can now be supplied for the above, if sent in at once.

Price Five Cents.

DR. MUNDE'S WATER-CURE AT FLUSHING.—Patients from the Northern Depot. Price for Patients $15 per week.

DEDICATED TO
CYRUS W. FIELD, ESQ.

THE ATLANTIC CABLE BOUQUET,
Beautifully pressed spray and fragrant flowers, prepared especially in honor of the national ovation held in New York, Sept. 1. E. DUVY, Family Chemist, 609 Broadway. Sold every where.

TO CASH AND SHORT TIME BUYERS.

NEW STOCK OF
RIBBONS ARE NOW IN TRIMMINGS.

MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,
519 Broadway,
OPPOSITE METROPOLITAN HOTEL,
ARE NOW PREPARED TO OFFER ONE OF THE most select and desirable stocks of the above goods to be seen in the city.

"THE BOUDOIR SEWING MA-CHINES."—Hunt's Patent Lock-Stitch Machine is generally in use (being the Family favorite), that special reference, with a few words of praise by or voice, may become unnecessary. Those about purchasing will find four patterns to choose from at all times, at 463 Broadway, Street, N. Y.

P. S.—Circulars and Specimens of Work by mail if desired.

"VROOM & FOWLER'S
CELEBRATED MILITARY SHAVING SOAP,
Guaranteed to suit the most fastidious.
JOHN B. VROOM, 174 FULTON STREET, CORNER OF N. Y.

YELLOW FEVER AND BILIOUS AF-
FECTIONS.—Those who are subject, by contact, or who, from their peculiar position are liable to contact of the contagion, will do well to protect themselves by an occasional dose of Brandreth's Pills, which will prevent all danger. If used when the prostration of all the powers of the life-forces ensue, whether with yellow fever, delirium, by purging, or by simple dizziness and uncertainty of action of the limbs, the following is to be done is to take a dose of BRANDRETH'S PILLS.

The very cause of these difficulties will be speedily removed. Let no one be deterred from the use of this medicine on account of its unpleasantness. The remedy is not so with external, spurious, or nauseous. It is true, you may occasionally experience a little qualm, but even if it does! the fetid sickness, the sudden deaths which follow the use of other and more powerful remedies, are experienced for the mothers and fathers who have permitted their loved ones to use them. May it in all cases be done legitimately and not against light and reason.

In any painful disease let four or six of Brandreth's pills be taken every few hours. This method will relieve the pain as soon as opium or other anodynes, and there will be no evil after effects. Another and yet another dose may be taken, if the pain is not relieved, at the end of an hour or two. Should the patient, however, from misunderstanding or mistrust the pills, he will have the advantage of knowing that he is using one of the best of nature's remedies.

Brandreth's pills, plain and sugar coat ed 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building.

GENUINE
ATLANTIC CABLE.

BALL, BLACK & CO.,
565 Broadway,

TAKE PLEASURE IN INFORMING THEIR FRIENDS and the Public, that they have secured a a sufficient quantity of the

ATLANTIC CABLE
TO SUPPLY ALL DEMANDS.

And in order that every one may receive a souvenir of this—the most remarkable event of the age—and so that it shall not be cumbersome, we have mounted it up to be worn as charms or watch keys.

In Brass, for 12½ cents each.
In Silver, for 50 cents each.
In Gold, for from $1 50 to $5 00 each.

We are fully in the reputation of our House in all the guarantees needed, when we assert that this Cable is the veritable one from on board the steamer NIAGARA. In addition to the above, we have the documents to place the genuineness beyond question.

New York, August 24, 1858.

WHEELER & WILSON'S SEWING MA-
CHINES.—NEW and VALUABLE IMPROVE-MENTS.—A new Pamphlet containing that have been done of any width without previous basting. Office, 505 Broadway, New York.

DIAGRAM OF THE LOCK STITCH.

This is the only Stitch that can not be ravelled, and that is alike on both surfaces; upon each side of the fabric it is made with two threads, one upon each side of the fabric, and imbedded in the centre of the work.

SINGER'S NEW FAMILY SEWING MA-
CHINE.—No other sewing machine for family use ever equaled it, either as respects the beauty of its stitches or the perfection and variety of its work. Call and examine it.

I. M. SINGER & CO., 458 Broadway, New York.

TRUE THRIFT!

AMERICAN WATCHES!!
APPLETON, TRACY & CO.,
MANUFACTURERS, WALTHAM, MASS.
ROBBINS & APPLETON,
GENERAL AGENTS, 182 BROADWAY, CORNER LIBERTY,
NEW YORK.

These Watches are recommended by the highest authorities to be faultless in principle and quality, and to take the foremost place among the finest Watches of Europe.

The movements are simple, tasteful, and substantial, and are highly finished by the aid of a system of machinery of the most exacting nicety from crude materials in a single establishment, by competent and uniform processes, and so sold at about half the prices of imported watches of a similar grade.

All Foreign Watches are made by hand at retail prices ranging from $50 to $500, the actual cost to make being the only ones made by machinery upon a uniform system.

Each watch is examined, tested, and the movement regulated by certificate for ten years. They are especially adapted for railroads, as they are not affected by the usual changes of the trains.

There is an article of common use as little understood, and about which so much charlatanism and swindling exists, as that of Watches. Foreign Watches are all imported watches.

Nine-tenths of hand-made watches are defective, and are continually getting out of order. In many parts of the country, it is impossible to find a good Watch repairer. The watch repairing is always uncertain and expensive. The movements of American watches dispose of all these difficulties.

COUNTRY MERCHANTS,

as well as watch dealers, can keep American watches as a part of their miscellaneous stock, and thus supply their customers at the lowest prices.

Liberal credit given to trustworthy dealers in all parts of the United States.

PHILADELPHIA—JNO. A. STODDART, 33 South Third Street.

BOSTON—Otter, 163 Washington Street, and sold by the Watch Dealers throughout the country.

"AUCTION GOODS" & "JOB LOTS,"
AT THE CASH RIBBON HOUSE
OF
MITCHELL & McLINTOCK,
516 CHAMBERS STREET.

JNO. FARRELL.

FRENCH PROTESTANT INSTITUTE for YOUNG GENTLEMEN, Nos. 48 and 50 East 9th street, near Madison Park, Boarding and Day School, will re-open on Sept. 15th inst. Classics, Mathematics, English, French, German, and Spanish. Ecole Preparatoire, which is the language of the School. A Junior Department for Boys from 6 to 10 years of age. For references, &c., circulars to be had. Prof. ELIE CHARLIER, Director.

MORFHEAD'S
CELEBRATED PLASTER.
The Great Strengthener and Pain Destroyer. The best and cheapest Plaster ever offered to the World. Simple and pleasant in its application, certain and effectual in its results. A harmless, scientific, external remedy, applicable for the relief of Pain at any time, in any place, and for any cause. Sold by Druggists. Price 25 cents per box. If you do not think Morfhead's Plaster, if pain is there, the Plaster will stick there until the Pain has vanished. Thousands have experienced the Pain and PAIN CAN NOT EXIST WHERE THIS PLASTER IS AP-PLIED. Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Sciatica, Weakness, Debility, Nervousness, Neuralgia, Dyspepsia, Coughs and Colds, Pains in the Limbs, Aches of every kind, Sores and Cures, are immediately relieved, and with a little patience, permanently cured by the magic influence of the ELECTRIC PLASTER. It is the simplest, surest, safest, and cheapest remedy ever offered to the afflicted, as the application is universally adopted for the removal of pain in every part of the human frame. To each and every purchaser of this Plaster, a Pamphlet is given gratis, and without annoyance or trouble. Its price is within reach of all—rich or poor—all may have it, and all should have it who are sick and suffering in any way. Sold by all Druggists in every City, Town, and Village in the United States.

ANDREW'S LATIN-ENGLISH LEXI-
CON, founded on the larger German-Latin Lexicon of Dr. Wm. Freund. With Additions and Corrections from the Lexicons of Gesner, Facciolati, Scheller, Georges, &c. Royal 8vo, Sheep, $5 00.

LIDDELL AND SCOTT'S GREEK-ENGLISH LEX-ICON, based on the Lexicons of Passow Francis-KUGK, based on the Lexicons of Passow Francis-KUGK, and Jacobitz, and the Inscriptions, in which the Proper Names and the Proper Names contained in the Principal Greek Authors, by Henry Drisler, M.A., Librarian of Columbia College. Royal 8vo, sheep extra, $6 00. Recommended by the Faculties of Columbia College. Royal 8vo, sheep extra, $6 00.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

TO ADVERTISERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A MAGNIFICENTLY ILLUSTRATED PAPER,
Circulating in every Section of the Union,
Offers unusual inducements to those who desire to bring their business prominently before the community.

1. Only a limited space is devoted to Advertisements.

2. The character and diffusion of the circulation are unequaled.

3. The Paper is generally preserved for Binding.

4. The Advertising Pages are rendered attractive, and are to many the attraction of the reader.

5. None but the most reliable class of Advertisements are admitted.

6. The charges are not at large, proportionally, as those of any other Weekly or Daily Paper.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for Three Months or more.

TERMS.—Fifty Cents a Line.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

$65. HOWE'S DOUBLE THREAD
LOCK-STITCH SHUTTLE-STITCH SEWING MA-CHINE, with Table and Treadle complete, and equal to any $100 machine, is NOW SELLING, fully warranted.

FAMILY SEWING MACHINE DEPOT.
HOWE'S PATENT LOCK-STITCH SHUTTLE
SEWING MACHINES.

The Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine is the best cheap machine ever offered to the Public. Fifteen minutes only required to learn to operate them. The Fifty Dollar Machine is warranted to excel all other family machines. Call and examine, or send for a circular. Agents wanted. C. W. THOMAS & CO., 489 Broadway, N. Y.

SINGER'S IMPROVED SEWING MA-
CHINES for all manufacturing purposes.—To accommodate those who desire to inquire at a distance, a circular will be sent by mail, on application. Those in the city are invited to call and examine. Send for a copy of SINGER & CO.'S Gazette, containing full description, &c. Specimens of work, and full information on the subject.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

MYSTIC HALL SEMINARY, for YOUNG LADIES, Stamford, Fairfield County, Connecticut. Boarding Building. Application for Admission or Catalogue to be addressed to the Principal, Miss C. P. SMITH.

Boston, Mass.

PATENT ANGLESEY LEG and ARTI-
FICIAL HAND. These unrivaled substitutes for the natural members are made by W. SELPHA, 310 Broadway, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel, N. Y.

TO LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.—Ladies and Gentlemen who wish to acquire the genuine, or to perfect themselves in the art, can receive instruction from an accomplished player, by addressing A. B., Box 370 Post Office, New York.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—
Purifies the blood, restores to the stomach its tone, and imparts to the whole system the entire organization. Prepared and sold by A. & E. D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

A SPLENDID NUMBER.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGA-ZINE FOR OCTOBER.
CONTENTS.

STRAHAN SIDE OVER THE ANDES.
Illustrated by Five Engravings.
DEATH AND BURIAL OF CECIL.
Illustrated by Sixteen Engravings.
THE MYSTERIOUS DUEL: ITS MOTIVES AND AS-SOCIATIONS. By T. B. Thorpe.
THE CHRONICLES OF CARLINGFORD.
AN UP-COUNTRY ADVENTURE.
THE FIRST LOVE.
THE TRIAL AND EXECUTION OF JOHN HUSS. Illustrated.
MARK VIETOR. By Richard Henry Dodgard.
THE BRIDGE WITH BELLS.
ENJOYING OUR WORK.
A BRIEF HISTORY OF HER CHOICE.
THE VIRGINIANS. By W. M. Thackeray.
LITERARY NOTICES. Fashions. Editor's Easy Chair.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
MR. PUNCH'S VIEW OF MRS. POTIPHAR'S GRAND SOIREE.

Illustrations.—Punch prepared to Receive.—Five Aggravating Cases.—Punch Ready.—Punch Ruined.—Punch in a Quandrie.—Promenade.—Enjoy a Cigar.—Punch Restored.—Punch Triumphant.—Punch Made.—An Accident.—Reflects.—Effects of an Accident Punch Sobered.—Punch Supper.—Retires.—Catches a Full.—Exit.—Finale.

PUBLISHED THIS OCTOBER.

Illustrations.—Promenade and Dinner Costumes. —Under.—Cap.—Under-Sleeve.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$2 00
Two Copies for One Year	3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00
And an Extra Copy for every Club of Ten Subscribers.

In Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. Postage is Twenty-four Cents a Year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY,
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER PUBLISHED IN THE WORLD.

Five Cents a Number; $3 50 a Year.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for Six Months	2 00
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of Twelve or Twenty-five Subscribers.

The Postage in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please to send to the Office, 329 Pearl Street, Subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

SCENES AT A BATHING-PLACE.

JULIA. "Oh! Aunty dear, do come and duck under the wave. You've no idea how delicious it is!"

What that spiteful wretch, JANE, declares he beheld when he went to see the ladies bathe at——

RETURNING FROM THE COUNTRY.

LADY'S MAID. "Please, Sir, Missus says you've to put this in your portmanteau."

"THE WORST OF WEARING ONE'S BACK HAIR DOWN IS THAT IT MAKES THE YOUNG MEN STARE SO!"

THE "OLD DOMINION."

THERE is a State well known to Fame,
The land of the "Old Thirteen,"
The noblest of the "Old Thirteen,"
The State that "never tires."
The mother, she, of Presidents;
And it is our intention
To show that she has given birth,
Through genius and invention,
To something more than one who rules
The people of a nation,
That is, a boon to bless mankind
Throughout the vast creation.

One of the Old Dominion's sons,
Fond of his coffee, very,
Conceived a plan by which to get
The flavor from the berry;
And as we live in days of steam,
He thought he'd not eschew it,
To bring about what he desired;
Steam was the thing to do it.
And not be he then at a loss,
In which he placed a faith,
In the principles of science,
He made it for a coffee pot
That would defy all scandal,
And then the "Old Dominion" he
Placed on it as a handle.
The "Old Dominion Coffee Pot"
Was christened at its birth,
And with this name was painted,
A better boon, 'tis said,
A richer boon, to yield and endues
To happiness and health,
And bless us through economy,
Which is the road to wealth.
This fact is fixed, and it may be Proved in a demonstration;
And that it may be understood,
We'll give an explanation.

In all old-fashioned coffee-pots,
Save as the coffee boils,
The fragrant berry of its sweet,
The noble steam despoils;
Then, laden with aroma, it
Escapes from lid and nave,
And with the coffee's virtues all,
Right up the chimney goes.
Insipid slops alone remain,
This simple fact revealing,
That steam has only left behind
What was not worth the stealing.
But in the "Old Dominion" steam
Is in its coarse wrought,
And of the sweets it has purloined,
Is suddenly divested.
Athwart its path, set as a trap,
A reservoir is found,
And, laden with its stolen sweets,
The steam therein is drowned.
No fragrance, therefore, can escape;
No virtue can be wasted;
Two fluids the "Old Dominion" proves
When once they're united.
Each drop, you'll find it is void
Of character or merit,
A drink well worthy of the gods,
Delicious in its flavor.

Don't think that, if you lay aside
The pot you've been using,
And buy the "Old Dominion" but,
You've a great piece to pay;
It is not so; what you invest
Is far from being lost,
The coffee saved within a year,
Will ten times pay the cost.
There's not a household using it,
But holds to this opinion,
And if you're wise, you'll go at once,
And buy an "Old Dominion."

The "Old Dominion Coffee Pot" is manufactured, under the patent for the United States, by ARTHUR, BURNHAM, & GILROY, 117 and 119 South Tenth Street, Philadelphia. Also manufacturers, under the patent, of Arthur's celebrated Self-Sealing Fruit Cans and Jars, and the "Old Dominion" Tea Pot.

☞ For sale by Dealers in Housekeeping Articles, and storekeepers generally.

TEN THOUSAND NEW CLOAKS,
Comprising the fashions
Selected by
LOUIS VICTOR ARMAND,
and JEAN JACQUES LAMONTAINE,
Will be sold this week,
AT SPACIOUS AND ELEGANT STORE
No. 56 BROADWAY,
Between Thompson's and Taylor's Saloons.
THE RICHEST PARISIAN NOVELTIES
AT MERELY NOMINAL PRICES.
To close the affairs of the bankrupt firm.
W. D. ESTERBE.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. II.—No. 91.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1858. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

CONTENTS.

I. REV. SAMUEL I. PRIME, WITH A PORTRAIT.
II. EDITORIALS.
III. THE LOCUSTS.
IV. THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION ON STATEN ISLAND, WITH TWO FINE ILLUSTRATIONS.
V. PAUL MORPHY, THE CHESS CHAMPION, WITH A PORTRAIT.
VI. THE COURT, WITH DIAGRAM.
VII. THE SON OF FRANCE, WITH PORTRAIT OF THE IMPERIAL PRINCE.
VIII. LITERARY.
IX. DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.
X. FOREIGN NEWS.
XI. LUMBERING IN MAINE AND NEW BRUNSWICK, WITH THREE SPLENDID ILLUSTRATIONS.
XII. CONVERSATIONS ACROSS THE CABLE.
XIII. OUR WALL.
XIV. BROWSE: "WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?"—Continued.
XV. SALT LAKE CITY, AS SEEN FROM THE OBSERVATORY, WITH A SPLENDID ILLUSTRATION.
XVI. AN HOUR WITH A PHENOGRAPH.
XVII. THEIRS WERE AND CHRISTMAS.
XVIII. MARKET AND FINANCIAL REPORTS.
XIX. COMMODITIES.

REV. SAMUEL I. PRIME, D.D.

REV. SAMUEL IRENÆUS PRIME, D.D., is well known from his long and successful editorship of the New York Observer. In this position his name has been frequently before the world, and also on the pages of a number of popular works of travels as well as of general literature, which he has from time to time published.

He is now in the prime of life, having been born at Ballston, in this State, on the 6th of November, 1812, and consequently at present is forty-five years of age.

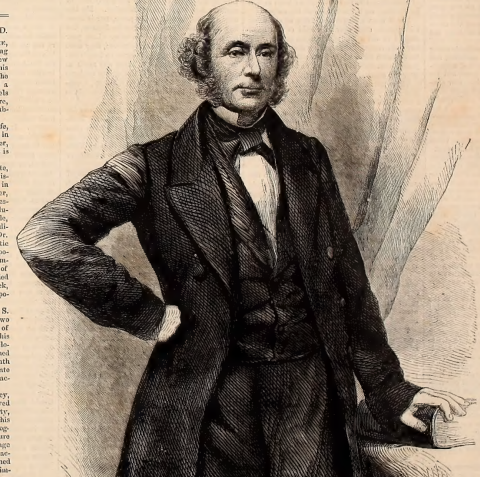
His ancestry were men of note, whose names are found in the history of the Presbyterian Church in America. His great-grandfather, Rev. Ebenezer Prime, was a Presbyterian clergyman of ante-Revolutionary times, a graduate of Yale, and a distinguished scholar and divine. His grandfather was Dr. Benjamin T. Prime, whose patriotic songs form part of the preserved poetry of the Revolution, an accomplished physician, a graduate of Princeton, and a man of varied learning, who wrote freely in Greek, Latin, French, and English, both poetry and prose.

His father, Rev. Nathaniel S. Prime, D.D., deceased about two years ago, was also a graduate of Princeton, and well known for his scholarly abilities and pulpit eloquence, as well as for his published works. His recent life and death are remembered with affectionate veneration by a large circle of acquaintances and friends.

While he was yet in his infancy, the parents of Dr. Prime removed to Cambridge, Washington County, New York. It was here that his boyhood was spent. His rapid progress in study gave promise of future distinction. At eleven years of age he was fitted for college, but on account of his youth he was detained at home. Here he had, and improved, that opportunity of observation which he has turned to rare account in that little volume "The Old White Meeting-house," in which the pastor is his own father, and the rugged Richard is the portrait of his own boyhood. Few volumes descriptive of rural life possess a sweeter charm than these quaint pictures, in which the features of frolicsome but innocent youth, and of patriarchal grace, are so beautifully blended.

He was not yet fourteen years of age when he entered Williams College. Before he was seventeen he was graduated with one of the highest honors of his class.

He studied theology at Princeton, and before he was twenty-one years of age he entered upon the duties of the ministry. The first scene of his labors was at Ballston Spa, but a single year's service so affected his health that he was compelled to retire from active labors. After a while he resumed his efforts in the pulpit. His place of labor was on the Hudson, opposite Newburgh. For three years he was enabled to sustain the burden, but again his health failed. Constrained to relinquish his chosen field, he turned his attention to literature in connection with the press. In 1840 he became connected with the New York Observer, of which, with a slight interval, he has ever since been the efficient editor. This interval was that during which he was Secretary of the American Bible Society. To this post he was elected in 1849, but the public speaking which the duties of the office required affected his health and compelled his resignation.



In 1853 the repeated failure of his health induced him to try the advantages of foreign travel. He spent some time in Europe, visiting its principal cities, and its scenes of historical interest; thence passing to Egypt and the Holy Land. The incidents of his travels, with accompanying observations, appeared first in a series of letters in the columns of the Observer, and were afterward collected and published in two volumes by the Harpers. Few books of travels make the reader as thoroughly the companion of the author. He directs our attention to just those objects which would be most apt to interest our own minds, and in an easy and familiar style presents them before us.

Dr. Prime is the author of several works which have enjoyed a high degree of popularity. To some of these we have already adverted. His "Old White Meeting-house" will always be a favorite. It has something of that same tenderness and genial pathos which characterize Goldsmith's "Deserted Village." Strokes of playful humor alternate with the breathings of a reverent spirit, and we have many a picture that would almost invite the pencil of the old painters.

Several smaller works have appeared from his pen, and have enjoyed extensive popularity. Their evident design is simply to do good. His "Thoughts on the Death of Children" has had a large sale, and has carried consolation and comfort to thousands of afflicted hearts. The reader seeks no order or assurances than what he finds in reading it, that its language of consolation to the mourner comes from one who has wept himself.

Dr. Prime is eminently if not ultra conservative, and has little faith in those more violent reformers who, like Mohammed, present their creed in one hand and the sword of vituperation in the other, and force it on choice. His whole nature revolts at the imperious attitude of men who would revolutionize Church and State to execute their pleas, and who would carry the fortress by storm. He has little sympathy with those who are so eager to "bear testimony" against the sins of their neighbor as to forget their own. He is willing to trust for more to the slow but steady progress of Christian truth and Gospel influence. Thou, in the eyes of some, are moral sins, and in the case of Dr. Prime we believe them to be both original and actual, nor do we imagine that he would shrink from the imputation. Flash reform, flash preaching, flash any thing, is his especial abhorrence. We can scarce conceive of him as having any sympathy with quackery in medicine, pettifogging at the bar, or empiricism in the pulpit or the rostrum. He is a sentinel to let no kind of pretense pass till it can give the watch-word. Each intermeddling with established institutions finds no favor at his hands. If you wish to rouse all the chivalry of his nature, denounce them. Impeach the wisdom of the fathers by the substitution of your own; commend the Emersonian or Theodore Parker school; vent your transcendentalism about the absolute religion or universal conscience; insinuate your skepticism under a celatio or any other guise, put in a plea for Puseyism, Neology, or rampant Abolitionism, and if your stupidity or ignorance is not beneath contempt, you will find that you have a serious account to settle. Prompt as Knightly Pelasius for the defense of the Holy Sepulchre, he is ready to do battle for what he deems sacred, and the mask of any pretended liberality is mercilessly torn off.

In controversy he is earnest. He speaks direct and to the point. You feel that he is not playing a game of fence. Every word strikes home. With quick sagacity he sees the vulnerable point of his antagonist, and rarely misses his aim. If you have any doubt of it, you have only to see his victims squirm. Right or wrong, the blow has told. He has not been demolishing scarecrows or windmills. What he has said is sure to provoke an answer, if that be possible. Yet he is by no means bent on prolonging controversy. He has no disposition to make a martyr of his victim. He knows just when enough has been said, and is not anxious to have the last word. When a subject has been sufficiently discussed, he is content to let it alone severely. Indeed, one would be surprised to find in a year's review so small a bulk of controversial matter in his columns. Much even of this is due to the merciless manner in which his views are handled by opponents. It would be strange if the provocation to which he is subjected did not sometimes induce, on his part, some asperity of language scarcely in keeping with the tone of his other writings or his private character. As little as this is to be commended, there are few of his opponents that would be authorized to cast the first stone, nor do we believe that even among them would be found a severer critic of what escaped him in the heat of dissertation than himself.

REV. SAMUEL I. PRIME, D.D.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Magician at the dinner-table as in the social circle, and you would scarcely recognize the man on whom satirical reformers have heaped the epithets of an Hildebrand. You would see nothing indicative of the tomahawk or scalping-knife. You would need no frowning brow; you would not see him biting speech or latent sarcasm; you would see a man, perfectly Congregational indeed, but without a particle of almost chivalrous courtesy. There would be no absence of manner, no affected condescension, not a cold affability, not a studied feminine gentleness of manner that would leave no room for the supposition of the kind of man sending controversialist. If you have a good story to tell, you may be sure he will listen to it, enjoy it with a hearty laugh, and tell you another not unlike it. His conversational resources are ample and promptly command. He is a thorough man of duty; is ready at repartee; and never pleads or flags. Few men have seen more of the world, or have had better opportunities for observation. There is scarce a notability of the day, scarce a person of history or of mark, with whom he has not been in some way come in contact. His acquaintance with the Old World is from personal inspection, and his scrutiny of public events is keen and sagacious. All these acquisitions are at the call of a ready memory, and a intelligence naturally acute. He is thus fitted to grace those scenes in which he delights to mingle. Few men have warmer admirers or more devoted friends. Indeed, the seeming contrast between the character occasionally given of him and between the gravity appropriate and natural one which belongs to him in social life, reminds us of Homer's hero, who terrifies his child by the glittering helmet, which on the young heart sighs by a father's smile when the helmet is laid aside.

Dr. Prime's style varies, of course, with the subject discussed. But, except in controversy, it is characterized by an unstudied ease and flow, often blending the tender or pathetic. An occasional stroke of playful humor enhances the gravity of the subject, or invests it with new attraction.

As a speaker, Dr. Prime is easy, graceful, and impassioned. His personal appearance is in the perfectly self-possessed, and speaks directly to the point in hand. His person of a commanding height, his head bald on the front and top, but intelligence in strongly stamped upon his whole aspect, and the quick movement of his eye as he grasps his audience with its penetrating glance, indicates his perfect possession of the occasion and agency, and his clear apprehension of what the occasion demands.

In the pulpit he has great and remarkable power in absorbing the attention of his audience, and carrying them with him. His power of becoming king is that which appeals to the heart, and his power of pathos is always irresistible. Few clergymen are so successful in the use of anecdote. He goes "unused to weep." There is no demonstration, no affectation, no attempt at sensation in his style, but there is a thrilling and engrossing power which leads his hearers to the tears he sheds in prayer, or, and his heart on the subject, until he is excited to the tenderness which all men know best befits the man who has been taught of God to be his guide.

Few men have ever manifested a deeper interest in whatever conduces to the welfare and social improvement of the community than Dr. Prime. Institutions of benevolence, charity, moral reform, and general education, receive his active support and by ready advocacy. For ten years he was a resident of the city of Newark, and took an interest more than any other the "Newark Library Association" owes its existence and prosperity. "His course during his residence in Newark," says one of a different ecclesiastical connection from himself, "was characterized by unwearied activity, not in all things promotive of the well-being of society, as well as by that consistent walk in public and private life, and active co-operation in every good word and work," which are among the chief credentials of the Christian minister.

Few men can be found whose labors with the pen occupy to many hours of each successive day, and have those engaged in the same avocation for varied literary and social recreation. Yet instead of shrinking from the labor, he seems to have availed by its weight, his spirits are ever elastic and fresh for renewed effort. Applications for addresses and discourses, which under ordinary circumstances would feel themselves forced to decline, are frequently met with prompt promptness, evincing the sprightly energy of a mental constitution incapable of indolence, and to which the highest activity is a source and delight.

In the full maturity of his intellectual powers, with twenty-two years of labor in the midst of conservative religious press of the country, his career of usefulness seems to be only just begun, and the religious world looks to him as one of its great hopes in the war with infidelity and error which now seems to lie before us.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1858.

THE CONVENTION.

WE have referred, in one or two previous articles, to the subject of the approaching Convention to reform our State Constitution. We have spoken of the office performed by the Constitution of 1846 upon the Central Power of the State, and upon the Judiciary. Let us now look a little at the Administration of the Law.

Pope has somewhere a famous couplet to the effect that only fools dispute about a form of government; that the proper administration of the ruling power is the only thing that sensible men should look after. However this proposition may be in regard to government generally, it certainly contains a word of wisdom in regard to the Department of Public Justice, and especially of Civil Justice.

Whether the system be the Common Law of the time of Mansfield, or the Code of Fear, the Civil Code of France, the organization of Massachusetts or of New York, it is undeniable that results unfavorable and fatal to justice are produced under either of them, if honestly and intelligently administered: and that neither can produce any but the most unsatisfactory results, and distress, unless fairly and ably carried out.

What we call the Law is, to a great extent, a matter of practice and usage. It is not the fact so important what the rule is, as that it should be promptly, intelligently, and honestly applied.

Now, what is the fact in the Administration of justice. We have had innumerable reformers of the Law—enough for half a dozen countries. We have had change after change alike of our law and of our judicial system. We have had lawyers subsidized, and the Common Law so metamorphosed that its own father would not know it. We have had a Commission to alter the Criminal Law; and now we have had a Commission is sitting (which, with stupendous boldness, proposes, for nothing, to revolutionize the entire Practice of Pleading, which is the contemptuous child of Young America is beginning to be sick of the very phrase, Law-Reform.

Now, in all this, there is one thing we cannot say that we shall lose sight of the fact that what we want is, above all things, a proper administration of justice. As we have said, this is a matter half so important as the application of the rule. Whether a demand shall be enforced in a court of law, or by a Judge in Equity, whether a case is called a Court of Law; whether a claim shall be presented by a thing called a bill, a remedy, or a declaration, is nothing to the people. A thing is suit shall call himself a plaintiff or a complainant, is not near so essential as that, when he thinks proper to enforce his demand, he shall be decided honestly, intelligently, and promptly.

This will hardly be disputed; and yet we pay in little regard to this self-evident truth as if it had nothing to do with the subject.

But if the Convention of 1859, or any other Convention, shall ever take hold of this great subject in the right way, which, among many other good results, the first thing they will do will be to pause for a while from our eternal tampering with the rule of right, and look a little after the application of the rule.

There are two things without which a judicial system is but a mockery and a delusion, and a fraud and a mortification and a failure. These are, first, such an arrangement of the system as shall insure to the people the full benefit of the independent Judiciary; and, secondly, a provision for reasonable modifications of the system from time to time without perpetual alterations of the Constitution.

How are these objects to be secured?

First, as to the Judiciary. The Judiciary in the world can a really able or a really independent Judiciary be secured without a radical change in the tenure of office? Can Courts, Courts and Courts of Appeal—no may elect, or appoint, or create Judges by tossing up coppers—we may do what we please, we shall never have a competent Judiciary until we make them feel strong in their seats—till they are strong in their seats.

What but a tenure of office during good behavior, talent, of energy, of learning; but nine-tenths of it is thrown away because the Judges have no real security. There is no security in short terms—none on bad morals. There is no restraint—no order—no discipline.

If bad Judges require any discipline, if it be ever come, must come from the Judges. No crowd of equals can ever marshal or direct itself. What but worse than bad will result from attempts to control, guide, and order them. Are the bar ready for this? Are they willing to submit to such control? Is it in the line of their matter times. If the bar of the State of New York feel this, they can settle the matter without the slightest difficulty. They can refuse to practice to the great state of things—if they think it is good—if they are even lukewarm to its evils—better not. Let the Judiciary be left holding a Convention.

Again, it is unquestionable that, in some way, a mode be provided of making temporary or gradual changes in the system as pressure of business or the progress of State shall demand. In fact, New York grows so rapidly that any system you may make to-day will to-morrow be inadequate. The subject of State reform, then, the State is always too big for its breeches.

Now this is well provided for in the practical British island of England in regard to one of the causes: and it is in regard to the trial of causes that the difficulty most seriously presents itself, for while, or before the first trial, a large majority of cases end. Now in England the Nisi Prius Courts are all held by special Commissioners—the Judges always head the Commission, and usually hold the Courts; but the names of some leading lawyers are also always inserted, and whenever a pressure occurs, they are sent on extra jury and helps to clear the calendar. Why not try something of this kind here?

We have indeed attempted to reach the evil by references; but references are dilatory, expensive, and unsatisfactory, and it might have been known that they would so prove. They are deprived of all publicity, and without publicity judicial proceedings will forever be infected with some abuse or another. There is no check, no stimulant, no corrective so potent as the simple spell of publicity. Wisely do our Constitutions declare that the proceedings of Courts of Justice shall always be open to the public.

One word more. What does the law of the State of New York desire? What do the lawyers wish? Do they wish, do they intend, a real reform or only a partial change of justice? If they do, they can have it. If not, they had better stay at home, and leave the Convention to the action of Temperance Law and Personal Liberty bills.

MARITAL LAW IN RICHMOND COUNTY.

FOR the information in the history of this State, one of the counties—Richmond—has been placed under marital law. The statute under which this extraordinary proceeding has been had, empowers the Governor, in the event of insurrection or rebellion—that is to say, in the event of incapacity or unwillingness in the county officials to save process or keep the peace and have the laws obeyed, to pronounce said county in a state of insurrection, and to order the Militia of the State to the spot to afford main force to the authorities. A State or a county can only be said to be in insurrection when the civil instruments of the law are, by popular violence, prevented from performing their duty: when the officers will not or can not serve process or effect arrests, when the coroners refuse to arrest the sheriffs, and when the posse commitatus, after due summons, refuses to render the aid of the officers of the law. In such a case as this, and to no other, the statute applies. In view of the exposition of the law, then, the country will be amazed to learn that there has been no resistance whatever to the administration of the law in Richmond county. The Sheriff has never refused to serve any writ or process, and every one knows, that he has never needed to call on the posse, nor is there any reason to believe that, had he done so, his request would have been in vain. Last year when he called on the county militia, they were so few and in marching order at an hour's notice, though he wished to have them ready at midnight. The Sheriff of the county declares himself able and willing to do his duty, whenever he shall be called upon to do so. It is true that a mob lately destroyed an hospital in the county; but there was no resistance to the county authorities, for they had not time to enforce. New York might as well have been placed under martial law in consequence of the Great Fire of 1845, which broke out in the Astor mansion county in consequence of the burning of the hospitals.

The consequences of this terrible blunder of Governor John A. King will be more widely felt than in its present generally foreseen. In the first place, it is a heavy expense on the State. At present 200 millionaires are on duty in Richmond county for no earthly purpose except to annoy the inhabitants. They cost about $600 a day. It is intended to keep them there till the Legislature meets, say four months, by which time they will have cost the State (for the whole thing being illegal, the State will of course have to pay them) $75,000. Secondly, the precedent is a bad one. It is well known that at bottom politics had much to do with the passing of these Statutes. They had become the centre of political attack and defense; their continuance was a source of pecuniary gain to the political party which Governor King labors for, and their abatement a cardinal point with the democracy. Now if the Governor may, without any real evidence of insurrection, send down troops to restore the balance to the side of his political party, of course every future governor will do the same. Whenever party feeling runs high, an unscrupulous governor may remove his opponents by declaring them in a state of insurrection, and ordering troops on them. It is easy to see whither this practice would lead. It is doubtful whether, under "marital law," the citizens of Richmond county have a civil or political rights. It is not certain that they are not disfranchised. How admirable a plan to disgrace a hostile county, to take advantage of a casual riot to declare it in insurrection and disfranchise it! In no one say these hypotheses are far-fetched; the experience of the past two years shows that no limits can be set to the liberties of party unscrupulousness.

There is one other result which may flow from this high-handed and illegal maintenance of Governor King, and that is, his impeachment. We have reason to believe that preliminary measures to that end are already being taken. There can be but one objection to such a procedure—namely, that it would give the culprit too much importance. Two years governorship have earned for John A. King the good-natured contempt of some, and the bitter derision of the others among his fellow-citizens; every one will be glad to be relieved from his rule. But that many would regret to see his public career protracted even by his impeachment.

THE END OF THE ASTRONOMICAL QUARREL.

WE referred, some weeks ago, to the quarrel which had arisen between the Trustees of the Dudley Observatory, of Albany, and the Astronomers of that institution. We showed that the pretension of Messrs. Pierce, Bache, and Henry to force their private privilege, Gould, on the authorities of the Observatory, and to retain control of that establishment in defiance of the Trustees, in whom its ownership and direction are vested by law, was one of those delusions to which men of high scientific attainments and limited intercourse with the world are naturally liable. And we expressed the hope that the Trustees would not allow themselves to be overborne by the newspaper cry. Gould, as Dr. Gould's friends had created on this behalf, but that they would persist in the course which seemed lest calculated to make the Observatory practically useful, independently of distinguished persons and high-sounding names.

For thus exposing the side which seemed to us to be the side of common sense and science, we have been vehemently assailed, both in public and private, by Dr. Gould's friends. We have made no reply to our assailants, confident that, when the facts were fairly set forth, they would justify our position. At length, after a lapse of several weeks, the Trustees of the Dudley Observatory have just published an account of their stewardship.

We are using no exaggeration when we say that this elaborate document absolutely slays Dr. Gould and his protectors, Professors Bache, Pierce, and Henry. Its character may be inferred from the fact that, though for several days have elapsed since it appeared, no reply has been attempted; in fact, it is unanswerable. It convicts Dr. Gould of incapacity, of high meanness and treachery, as a man; it shows him to have been, if not intentionally, at least in effect, hostile to the practical success of the Observatory, as an astronomer. It proves that the aim of Dr. Gould and his learned friends was to make the Dudley Observatory a tender to that magnificent institution, the Coast Survey, and that, as every one knows, in the private preserve of a select circle of exclusive scientists. It shows that their deliberate purpose was to make the one entirely exclusive as the other; to carry out at Albany the tyrannical policy which has well-nigh ruined the American Association for the Advancement of Science—and not only to allow none of the donors to, or Trustees of, the Observatory to reap any glory, or derive any advantage from that establishment, but likewise to exclude from such glory and advantages every scientific man who was not prepared to lay his neck under the foot of the managers of the Coast Survey. It proves, that so far from devoting himself, soul and spirit, to the Observatory—as Dr. Gould's friends claim he did—he paid the utmost vanity in consequence of the burning of the hospitals.

The consequences of this terrible blunder of Governor John A. King will be more widely felt than in its present generally foreseen. In the first place, it is a heavy expense on the State. At present 200 millionaires are on duty in Richmond county for no earthly purpose except to annoy the inhabitants. They cost about $600 a day. It is intended to keep them there till the Legislature meets, say four months, by which time they will have cost the State (for the whole thing being illegal, the State will of course have to pay them) $75,000. Secondly, the precedent is a bad one. It is well known that at bottom politics had much to do with the passing of these Statutes. They had become the centre of political attack and defense; their continuance was a source of pecuniary gain to the political party which Governor King labors for, and their abatement a cardinal point with the democracy. Now if the Governor may, without any real evidence of insurrection, send down troops to restore the balance to the side of his political party, of course every future governor will do the same. Whenever party feeling runs high, an unscrupulous governor may remove his opponents by declaring them in a state of insurrection, and ordering troops on them. It is easy to see whither this practice would lead. It is doubtful whether, under "marital law," the citizens of Richmond county have a civil or political rights. It is not certain that they are not disfranchised. How admirable a plan to disgrace a hostile county, to take advantage of a casual riot to declare it in insurrection and disfranchise it! In no one say these hypotheses are far-fetched; the experience of the past two years shows that no limits can be set to the liberties of party unscrupulousness.

There is one other result which may flow from this high-handed and illegal maintenance of Governor King, and that is, his impeachment. We have reason to believe that preliminary measures to that end are already being taken. There can be but one objection to such a procedure—namely, that it would give the culprit too much importance. Two years governorship have earned for John A. King the good-natured contempt of some, and the bitter derision of the others among his fellow-citizens; every one will be glad to be relieved from his rule. But that many would regret to see his public career protracted even by his impeachment.

We have indeed attempted to reach the evil by references; but references are dilatory, expensive, and unsatisfactory, and it might have been known that they would so prove. They are deprived of all publicity, and without publicity judicial proceedings will forever be infected with some abuse or another. There is no check, no stimulant, no corrective so potent as the simple spell of publicity. Wisely do our Constitutions declare that the proceedings of Courts of Justice shall always be open to the public.

One word more. What does the law of the State of New York desire? What do the lawyers wish? Do they wish, do they intend, a real reform or only a partial change of justice? If they do, they can have it. If not, they had better stay at home, and leave the Convention to the action of Temperance Law and Personal Liberty bills.

its endowments. Blamable as the astronomers have been, the Trustees are not blameless. As men of business, it was ridiculous in them to allow themselves to be so easily duped; nor should they have suffered themselves to be, at last, ousted from premises which they are bound by law to hold for a specific purpose. These considerations will not escape the attention of the Legislature this winter; and if that body should, as the Surrey hopes, reorganize the Observatory, and displace the Trustees, they will only have themselves to blame. For they—with of my experience and small means—undertook a trust which most certainly yet remains unfulfilled.

THE LOUNGER.

THE FEAST OF CERES.

Now that the literary festivals are ended the agricultural begin. In almost every county of every State there is a Society of Farmers; and in the golden days of September and October they bring together the best they have grown, or made, or raised—and whoever has a new machine, or a better plan of old ones, may be sure of an audience both admiring and appreciating. Besides the county societies and fairs, there is the great central State Fair, at which the intelligent agriculturists of the State is generally fully represented.

Not even the silent corn can celebrate their feast without speeches. Every County Fair, as well as the State, has its orator, and the nature and drift of his speech is already known to the association. And any man who can speak well upon any general subject must be able to say a few words speaking to farmers about farming. The occasion is not technical or professional, but universal. A correspondent of the New York Tribune says that agricultural fairs would be quite perfect, if the orators only knew a little of the subjects upon which they were to speak, or owned only so much soil as would fill a flower-pot.

But to suppose that a man knows nothing of the principles, or history, or importance—in its relation to the State—of agriculture, because he is not a farmer, shows certainly that the supposer is not very familiar with the matter. An Agricultural Fair is like a Gallery of Fine Arts. It is interesting to the farmer, as the other is to the painter, technically. But the great pleasure and profit derived from both may be enjoyed by all. A man can be delighted with a picture without knowing how to mix paints, and with the products of the soil knowing how much of what kind of manure to apply to their culture. It is not necessary that a man to address them upon such a day, they do not expect to hear from him practical directions for raising wheat, but practical considerations upon their pursuit in itself and in its relations to society.

These fairs are not only pleasant and useful as assemblies of neighbors interested in the same things, but they are the direct means of encouraging that extensively intelligent taste, without which farming is likely to become one of the most sluggish of human pursuits. Where a farmer employs two-thirds of the population in agricultural, it is easy enough to see that more depends upon the intelligence of the farmer than the number of apples in a bushel or of tons of hay to the acre.

The reader who remembers the sketch, by Pope, of "Fifth Avenue in the Country," in our last paper, will be amused with the following, which puts a fact into rhyme.

A farmer, having hay for sale,
Addressed a boy one day,
And asked him "if he wished to buy
A load of fresh-cut hay."

"What hay?" replied the indignant boy,
Offended at the question,
"Do I look like a hoss, to need
Your hay for my digestion?"

"Look like a horse!" in turn exclaimed
The vender of grass;
"You do not look much like a horn,
But very like an ass!"

GEOGRAPHY IN THE CARTS.

THE famous geographer Malte Brun is dead. He was a Frenchman, and it is a curious question whether geography in France was learned in the stars. A late number of the clever Charivari, the Punch of Paris, contains the following:

"There are human built of glass, why shouldn't there be houses made of cotton?

"Two companies have been organized in America, and have just been joined, if we may believe the newspapers of that country, which pay out an annual dividend of two centesperates of Louisiana, the Courrier of Charleston."

The name Charleston presents us its humorous illustration a picture of a philosophical gentleman who unwilling son to a Kangaroo, and underneath the legend, "Charleston Courrier, the Kangaroo." We turn to our old Grand Kangaroo of Central America."

The picture represents a genuine animal; but the only Kangaroo of Central or South America we know to our Natural History is le Général William Walker, who made his disbanded leap from Greytown to New York, took to the shades, and has never been heard of since.

LETTER FROM A HIGH PRIVATE.

THE Lounger, as his constant reader has been allowed by a parent, profoundly partial, to publish the following graphic and interesting letter from one of the heroes now gallantly engaged with the bloody insurgents in our domestic feuds:

"ARMY OF OCCUPATION,
"CAMP ISAACS, September, 1858.

"DEAREST MA,—I am dreadful wet, and I've got a horrid cold in my head, and I've got a pain in my boots from tramping round in the dust and dew; but then the sunsets of the glorious service in which we are engaged is as good as hot bottles to the feet, and delicious as a warming-pan in a January bed.

"You can have no idea of the awful barbarity and reckless lawlessness of this part of the country. The gorgeous imagination of an Ariosto is also equal to the task of coloring it high enough. Every night houses are burned down and the inmates ruthlessly slaughtered. The rancor against the yellow fever patients is such that the mob mobs one every evening, and Ray Tompkins and John C. Thompson tear off the cooked flesh and consume it, while the Custodes Board of Health Dances the Fisher's Hornpipe. That lively hob-of-mad an humorist, Robert Emmet Tompkins, the Thompson, the efficient and sorrowful Medical Officer, and, in proportion, for any part of him, Tertiary Inhabitant, is always in the thickest fray, to his own words, in the state of 'the poor men that I've had the honor to be in influence on the ground that night.' You know the bitter result to those poor men. Those who were not scorched to death in camp, or died of the hot-house since, it's all very well for Dr. Walker to say at the examination that they were burned like a Spanish nut, but rather beautiful. Dr. Walker is a malignant Scot.

"Dear Ma, I don't wonder we both cried so when you knew I was coming to such a place, and never go cheering up my drooping. But, mum, when a man is enrolled upon the military lists he takes his life in his hand. I've not only done that, but I've done it twice. I've done it for Uncle Sam's dreadful. I wish you'd just send some of Polkinghorn's Gastronome.

"You know we've been on a great many excursions, which consisted mainly of dancing the polka, and drinking Champagne. We've had a good deal of field, in the very presence of the enemy and the heart of the country, you understand, mum. Yet the troops behave most gallantly. A fluxe set of heroes have rarely been seen. When we are down, grand drill, you know, mum, and I believe we believe that these infernal shooters actually shoulder their sticks and march up to the cannon's mouth in lines, where we can't reach 'em? And worse than that, they twiddle their nasty fingers on their dirty noses at us as we go past, and, with the impertinence of infamous than the others, have been known to send out, when Colonel Lynch was on a visit to his sister, sugar, man, who made your breeches? You can better, dearest parent, conceive the refined indignity of that insult, than I can describe it, when my worthy Colonel is an equally worthy tailor.

"One feature of the campaign is the very rare act of amnesty, loudly declared at evening parade, the other day, that our gallant commanding officer was in the very Lyon's den of the foe, and actually at "Lions indeed!' screamed another mad barbarian, who brought more Lions to the camp and left them with him. 'Do you see, my mother? Do you catch the refined malignity? Do you know what the Father's gone in? I'll tell you, mum, when I show you, upon application at Camp Washington.

"Colonel Lynch has made a most touching and flute command of the island. He went the other day to surprise a well. The owner locked his gate and defied him to enter. The gallant Deputy Administration Colonel Lynch told him he had a right to do so. John is the chief citizen of Sullivan's Island, and should take the water at all hazards. Saying this, he withdrew to another well: thus, as it were, cutting his out second base. But the very eloquence of his gallant exploits in suppressing this hideous Negro insurrection, are forgotten in the known altogether as Field-marshal Sir Colin Campbell Hayelock Lyon.

"The army of occupation is not less deserving the kindest mention and the highest praise. I suppose Napoleon's army in Russia was not half so brave as we are. Last evening, just as the night-guard was being mounted, an alarm was given. It was reported that the Yankees, the men fell silently into their places. We knew the hand to come. Major Ray, Captain Gardner, and of Belinda Ann. Nobody said any thing—our hearts were too full; but a braver set of hearts never beat in a human breast. The men fell into along the line to see that every thing was in order. An observer like me could have discovered that each man—told them that if they fell Mayor Tiemann would mention their names to the Common Council—and that Mrs. Jenkins would call upon. It was our first going into action, and we were naturally anxious to do credit to the corps. Then forward with a shout that must have stricken terror to the hearts of the Sepoys, for upon reaching the seat of alarm, it turned out to be only a Mr. Jones, a general Houston's treasure; for it seems that at that hour of the evening, according to the strict orders of a Sepoy stump or atrocious and inhuman stone so suddenly that he cried out, but, with the presence of mind which so eminently distinguishes him, he instantly discovered that it was only a stump, and so, after a few oaths, he went to bed. He turned up he was as self-possessed and calm as if nothing had happened. It was now quite dark, and as the army of occupation were engaged in enforcing one the terrible chums in the Corporal's trousers, a strange, and alarming, and ominous white object of the dark beyond the lines:

"'Oh, Jim, and murther mee greapmeethee! if that beast a can for the Lieutenant-Governor Lyon!'

"Under these trying circumstances the army behaved with admirable spirit, and withdrew in perfect order.

"Thus far, dear Ma, the loss in our ranks has not been severe. It has been mainly confined to temper, boots, breeches, and health.

"The enemy has lost their men in his head—but, on the other hand, out of some hundred or more, not more than eighty-seven have vanished, and only about nine to the seven thousandsons. Dear Mother, it's very difficult to get hot red damsel in this country, or hot water to soak the feet. I am up hankerchiefs dreadfully. A wicked Sepoy sold to me, when I was on picket on the other day, and blowing my nose continually, 'Sagor mun, why don't you follow your nose, and you?' I laughed at him with my bayonet, but the sarcastic villain had escaped among his fellow-devils.

"But whatever amount of bombasts, or tic, or rheumatism may fall to my share, how sublime and consoling is the thought that we are here, the representatives of the State, to prevent this nonsense thing of thing. I haven't quite made out what we are here for, although I know that either Governor's speech as hard as I can. But 'taint no use; I can get into it, but I can't get out. On the whole, I conclude we are here to restore the bloody burning Sepoys, and to die of lumbago for our country. We try to keep up the spirits, but the night air is depressing. We are on the northeast shore of the island and the equinoctial is coming.

"There, there, my son sore again!

"Good-by, dearest mother!

"In great haste, your affectionate son,

"HANNIBAL LAND."

PITIFUL.

A MAN who could deliberately take advantage of the fact that the stone of a fruit is sometimes called a pit, to make a pun about an affray at his following, ought to be sent to serve for six weeks in the army of occupation upon Sopor Island.

Why was Joseph, the son of Israel, like a peach-tree?—Because he was raised from a pit.

THE MEANING OF MEN'S NAMES.

In the Weekly of the 31st August, "A Lady Reader" requested a wish to know the meaning of men's names, and the Lounger has received several satisfactory answers. One is signed "W.," of Trenton, New Jersey, for the most copious and complete list—such too full to print, but admirable for reference. From which "W." will please receive his heartiest thanks. In a lady's hand-eases also is sent by "J. H. B.," of Queens County, fanciful catalogue. But "J. H. B.," of Queens County, furnishes, more briefly than "W.," the following:

Here is one will make rich a lover's bites,
"Philemon, Philip, Philo, Philander,
Francis is free, open-hearted, and frank:
And so too is Franklin, and so is Frank.
Benjamin means that you are such in shame;
But Edgar is honor. Trust not in name.
Jim means supplant. Could we a trailer,
Yet Arnold is faithful to his honor.
Bless me can't judge of the amount of any,
Well not believe William the shield of many:
Now in Leon is the strength of mankind.
Frederick gives rich peace to and and mind.
Paul is little; Peter a rock or quarter;
And Edwin is a happy conqueror.
Edmund is blessed and Edwin is blessed peace:
Joseph is a name implying increase.
Walter is the ruler of the host.
But Harvey is the hope of an army.
Ambrose is the divine, governor,
Egbert is celebrated, or fences:
Philip is a great friend of horses.
And finds delight in racing on courses;
Solomon's peaceful, Alfred, all peace;
And Oliver is the emblem of peace.
Joshua, like Jesus, is Lord, Saviour;
Hugh is a counsellor, and Christopher
Alexander implies strong help to men:
But Gideon is destroyer of men.
Theodore expresses a gift of God:
John is like the chief citizen of God:
And 'mong the Harpers 'tis found most common,
Each family of them is John and John:
Or if there be exceptions they are few—
A family without John I never knew.
Of Scripture names I add variety,
Though by no means a great family:
Timothy is an honorer of God;
Titus signifies the goodness of God;
Zachariah is manifest of the Lord;
And Jeremiah exalts the Lord:
Nehemiah is the Rest of the Lord;
Hezekiah strengthens the Lord:
Obadiah the servant of the Lord:
And Israel prevaileth in the Lord.

THE HOGS.

AFTER all, it is John Bull who swallows the total whole with the greatest unction. We make feible efforts to do it, and often with very tolerable success for a short period. But John does it and relish the thing! He licks his chops and rolls his eyes with such huge satisfaction! He swears he has n't a bone in his carcass! He licks it up so clean, that it is a vain hope to rival or surpass him. Dear me! Seems Jenkins Yahoppish Bull!

He has lately been gloating over the wedding of a young and noble lord and lady, and to those American readers who are wont to complain of the splendid habits of society in America, we copy the letters, describing watering-place balls—as where Mrs. A. Jones, and "decidedly handsome," and Miss B——" evidently the belle of the evening," and Mrs. C——" in a beautiful red bandana, hopping with spirit and grace through the country dances"—sounds the letter to the Manchester Guardian, from London, describing "the marriage festivities of Lord Craven."

"A more beautiful bride is seldom seen. Lady Elizabeth Craven belongs to a notable type of English beauty which combines an extraordinary contour of feature with a complexion singularly fair and delicate, in which roses and lilies maintain an unnecessary struggle for precedence. In the bride, the rose leaves its red foreground step to gaze, as it were, and, upon that 'lily-haired girl,' whose cheeks glow with buttercup, eloquent blush, whose eye, red, pouting lips, blue eyes, and smiling face, retain their full charm of beauty, without loss in pleasant surprise. This morning, on the road at the altar, in his bride's train, a magnificent diamond star on her head covered by the richest bridal veil, 'the plant and flower of light,' as Du Bartas calls orange, in its lofty, reigned supreme over her lovely features. Yet the full ripe lips were there, and the blue eyes, although cast down in modest bashfulness, and the pleasant smile, although it was tempered by the fears and regrets natural to those who leave fond parents and loving sisters for a new home. Now and then the head bowed over its pearl-studded veil; but that would start, and the high courage could not conceal the emotion that agitated the 'full-bosomed maid,' as old Homer would have called her.

"The bridegroom was as ardent and tender as a young and gallant gentleman might be expected to be. While on his bride is unusually fair, the young heir of the house of Wilton is of dark complexion, with black eyes and hair. In figure he is tall and handsome and slender, but when thus has knit his limbs and given him the life-guardsman's appearance which seems to be a family trait, he will not discredit his gallant crops, either in Hyde Park or elsewhere."

There is more of it. But these are the plums. You think that the American press is unjustifiably personal? Read in any such a letter as that in the Evening Post or the Express, of a young lady married in Grace Church! No, John eats the toad much more skillfully than we.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—You were kind enough to oblige me some time ago with a list of the Magazines of the World, in finding and publishing 'a piece of poetry' for me. Hunger on a Blister.'

"I have been for more than twenty years trying to discover a piece of poetry that I read in a newspaper, when I was comparatively young, and remember well. Will you be equally kind in one of your main readers, and help me to find it? I remember but a small portion of it. I think it was entitled 'The Student.' These lines were in it:

"Like a young eagle on the mountain top
Plunging his eyes in the sun's orb to find
Fearless and lonely. Beautiful and bright
Destruction's self serve him, for he can be viewed;
And though from midst its rays the sound of strife
Shall reach his ear, he cannot see the foe."

"I read it in a newspaper—I think, in the Iris, published in Natchez, about the year 1839 or 1840; but of that I am not sure. The Iris of course I mean, not Orion.

"If you can succeed in recovering it, you will very much oblige a constant reader.

"HENRY MCKINSTRY."

"ALPHA" will be amused, probably, with two surprising statements about himself which he makes in this note. He says that he read the poem when he was quite young, and probably still; and then, that he is a very great curiosity! He probably means to say neither; and the Lounger hopes some erudite friend will satisfy "Alpha."

"YEATON" must, of course, have anticipated that the mouth of the Delaware and the eastern shore of Long Island would open upon him; and here is the voice of the latter:

"EASTERN LONG ISLAND.

"MY FRIEND LOUNGER,—Would you favor communication from Savages, says: 'Were I a rich dunce, I would spot my beautiful villa on the east side of Shelter, or down toward the mouth of the Delaware, where I would be admired by all the world.'

"Now who the inhabitors of the region 'down toward the mouth of the Delaware' are, I cannot say; but upon state of civilization may be, I am at present unable to state; for I never was there. But I presume that I am happy to be able to add somewhat to 'Visitor's' store of knowledge regretfully that particular species of knowledge which, from the Long Island standpoint, I could supply him to abound in most, by informing him that the people of Eastern Long Island have learned to read, have seen New York, have even seen Savages, have heard mown of the name of Lossing and Parke and some little time since, were astonished by the news of a telegraph across the Atlantic.

"They read the Journal of Civilization, and they sell their potatoes and their eggs, and are proving to 'Visitor' that they can fully appreciate a dance rich or green wherever he will favor them with a visit.

"—I. E. H." sends some verses, "A Day," of which the last two stanzas are better than the rest:

"O days of life, how fair, how fleet
The motion of your happy feet
Through the lilies and the roses!
"O days of life, how faint, how slow
Your heavy footsteps onward go
Amid the sullen days of sorrow!"

—The "HOGS" are not all dead yet, it seems.

"DEAR RESPECTED LOUNGER,—Being addressed to you now and then in a letter concerning a certain agricultural family whose members are not known, but who show themselves in other ways than by eight rather obscure cards in confirmation of the fact, I have been much delighted Hey Family. Now I know you pity me with a gentle sympathy, a kindness, indeed. I had made up rather a fine dress ago with uncommon care, and presented to the Queen's Levee, being then a noble in Brooklyn. Nothing occurred until I left the host, when, to my utter surprise, I found that the whole cascade of the skirt completely dashed with BOGGO STUFF. What shall I do? I can not tell. But rather uncomfortably when I met my friends, for one side of my dress was evidently spotted by Buffalo Hog. Esq. If this will help to deter that unhappy family from emitting such insults as forty-sixers, please use it.

"BEADER."

"ASHER CREEK, 1858.

"To the Lounger:

"I may be wrong, but it strikes me that this is the best time for the Mermaid to appear. I have the author's permission to inclose it to you.

F. G."

THE MERMAID'S MESSAGE.

Under the ocean waves afar,
Beyond the kiss of sun or star,
A mermaid spied from her coral cell
The Captain's boy, Tom Bowline.

Skirting the jagged ledges it came,
Dropping down like a thread of flame,
Shading the branches of the trees
That grow in groves down under the seas.

She looked, and wondered what could be
Dropping so strangely into the sea:
Then gliding forth from her coral cell
To where the object floated well,

She touched it with inquisitive hand—
Instant her heart-beat throbbed through the land,
Rolling and rocking the ocean bed.
The mermaid's message presaged the Queen's.

THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION ON STATEN ISLAND—THE CAMP.

THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION ON STATEN ISLAND.

We give herewith two pictures of the army of occupation in Richmond County. Our readers are aware that, in consequence of the burning of the Quarantine hospitals, the Governor has proclaimed the island to be under martial law, and has ordered the 8th Regiment New York State Militia thither. Our first picture represents the camp of the regiment; our second some soldiers' tents, with the men enjoying their ease in the neighborhood.

The Eighth, which is commanded by Colonel Lyons, consists of 300 men. The officers are the following: Major, C. G. Waterbury; Acting-Adjutant, P. F. Wentworth; Paymaster, T. M. Cushman; Surgeon, Lyons Ramsey; Assistant-Surgeon, John Atkins; Chaplain, John S. Ash; Engineer, E. Ellaridge; Assistant-Quartermaster, —— Tiffany. Commandants: Company A, C. J. Blauvelt; Company B, Thomas Sweeny; Company C, Edward Burger; Company D, E. D. Lawrence; Company E, William Waterman; Company F, Leanda Buck; Company G, Charles H. Burtis; Company H, Samuel Gregory; Company I, J. M. Varian. Non-commissioned officers: Sergeant-Major, T. Carr; Quartermaster, J. Penn; Color-bearer, —— Jones; Left General Guide, T. Ball; Assistant Sergeant-Major, C. Wood; Ordnance Sergeant, W. Miller; Right General Guide, —— Hart; Sergeant, W. Silcock; Leader of the Band, T. G. Adkins.

The camp lies to the northwest of the Quarantine hospitals, partly on the Quarantine and partly on the ferry property. The tents have all been pitched according to the rules for a regimental encampment. On the southern end of the ground is the guard tent, in which is quartered a portion of the guard who are ordered for duty during the day. In the extreme northern portion of the ground the troops are quartered. The tents are all pitched in rows of half a dozen each, forming six streets, with tents on both sides, a main avenue running through the centre, which is called Broadway. Each company is quartered according to rank in line, as in the following order: Company C, Captain Burger; Company B, Captain Sweeney; Company A, Captain Blauvelt; Company D, Captain Lawrence;

THE SOLDIERS' TENTS.

Company E, Captain Waterman; Company H, Lieutenant Commanding Gregory; Company O, Captain Burtis; Company F, Captain Buck; Company I, Captain Vattan.

Each street is about fifteen feet wide; the floors of the tents are raised about three inches from the ground, so as to avoid dampness. Running in reverse order, on the upper side of the privates tents, and facing out on a line with each row, are located the band and non-commissioned officers. Twenty-five feet in the rear again, running in a like manner, are located the captains and lieutenants; and at a like distance, further to the north, are encamped the field and staff officers. At the extreme end, and looking out on what is called "Broadway," from which also a full view of the entire camp can be had, is Colonel Lyons' head-quarters, in front of which is stationed a sentinel.

On the west side of the grounds is the mess house, erected by E. F. Rodgers. The building is 130 feet long by 21 feet wide, and is so arranged as to accommodate each Company separately. Men were kept busy all day yesterday by Mr. Rodgers, so as to get the building finished by this afternoon. Mr. Rodgers, for the comfort of the militia, also floored most of their tents.

The following orders have been issued for the governance of the army of occupation:

HEAD-QUARTERS, CAMP WASHINGTON, N. Y. S. M.,
CAMP WASHINGTON, SEPTEMBER 1, 1858.

RULES AND REGULATIONS FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF THIS CAMP.

1. Courtesy among military men is indispensable to discipline. Respect to superiors will not be confined to obedience on duty, but will be extended to all occasions. It is always the duty of the inferior to accost or to offer first the customary salutation, and of the superior to return such complimentary notices.

2. All inferiors are required to obey strictly, and to execute with alacrity and good faith the lawful orders of the superiors appointed over them.

3. The gun shall be fired at sunrise, and colors set.

4. The Reveille will be beat at five o'clock, A.M., and is the signal for the men to rise, and the sentries to leave off challenging.

5. "Pass upon a trencher," the signal for breakfast, will be sounded or beat at seven o'clock.

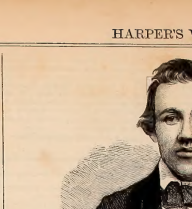
6. The "Troop" will be beat at eight o'clock in the morning, to assemble the men for duty and inspection at guard mounting.

7. Morning parade at nine o'clock. Evening dress parade at five o'clock in the afternoon.

8. "Roast Beef," the signal for dinner, will be sounded or beat at twelve o'clock.

9. "The Retreat" will be beat at sunset, when the evening gun will be fired and the flag struck.

10. The Tattoo will be beat at ten o'clock in the evening, after which no soldier is to be out of his tent or quarters unless by special leave.



11. The long roll is the signal for gathering under arms in case of alarm or the sudden approach of the enemy.

GEORGE LYONS, Colonel.

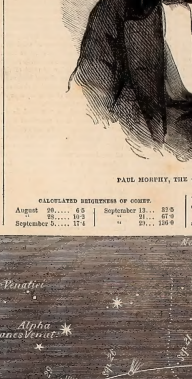
Officer of the day, Captain Blauvelt, Company A.

Officer of the Guard, Lieutenant Johnston.

The storm on Wednesday last told severely on the army. A reporter says: "Most of the tents were soaked through and through by the rain; the beds and bedding, the clothing and uniforms were completely saturated with water. Most of the men were up half the night, and, from all accounts, but very little sleep was had among any of them. The tents which the guards have been using are very poor, having been used for some time for camping purposes throughout the State. The guards also suffered very much from the storm. Sergeant William Wilson, a member of the regiment, remained on duty nine hours, but was at last so overcome that he was taken with a fit in the morning, and had to be brought up to the city and conveyed home. Several others of the members were also compelled to give up and return home for a new outfit and a little nursing, being overcome by fatigue. During the forepart of yesterday the men also suffered considerably by the storm; but they, with one or two exceptions, stood it out like soldiers. As soon as it began to clear off, the tents were thrown open, and the blankets, beds, and clothing of the men were strung up on the line running from one tent to another to dry. Toward the latter part of the afternoon most of the uniforms had been pretty well dried; but Colonel Lyons, on account of the storm, had issued orders in the morning that there would be no afternoon parade, so the men were not compelled to put on their dump clothing."



PAUL MORPHY, THE CHESS CHAMPION.

THE COMET.

THE advent of the comet which is at present visible to the naked eye in the northern heavens, was first made known by Professor Donati, of Florence, on the 2d of June. It was also discovered by Henry M. Parkhurst, Esq., of Perth Amboy, New Jersey, on June 20. We give herewith a representation of the comet as it at present appears, and also a diagram showing its position among the fixed stars through which it passes, from August 28 to September 29, shortly after which time it will be lost to sight. By means of this diagram the reader will be able to trace its course on a celestial globe.

Its motion around the sun is retrograde; that is, in the direction opposite to the motions of the planets. Its distance from the earth at present is roughly computed at nearly 90,000 miles. Its tail is about 6,000,000 miles long. Its distance from the sun at perihelion, or when nearest that luminary, is calculated at 40,000,000 miles, and its velocity at that time will be no less than 3560 miles per minute. Its relative brightness has been calculated, and is shown in the following table:

CALCULATED BRIGHTNESS OF COMET.
August	20.....	4·5	September 13...	83·5
"	25.....	10·5	" 21...	47·9
September 5.....		17·4	" 25...	126·9

COURSE OF THE COMET THROUGH THE STARS.

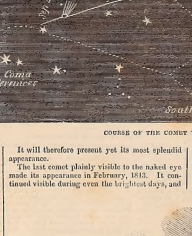
It will therefore present yet its most splendid appearance.

The last comet plainly visible to the naked eye made its appearance in February, 1853. It continued visible during even the brightest days, and passed it must have almost grazed it. Its perihelion distance was but 99,000 miles. The velocity with which it whirled around the sun, at the instant of its perihelion, was prodigious; such, indeed, that, if it had continued, the comet would have encircled the sun in the space of two hours and a half. In fact, it did pass half around it in that time. In forty days, the period of its visibility, it had described 173 degrees from perihelion; while to describe the next seven degrees required many years, perhaps centuries, its rate decreasing in an immense ratio with its distance from the sun. The heat it received from the sun at perihelion was computed by Professor Herschel to be 47,000 times greater than that received by the earth from a vertical sun. The comet was for some time red-hot; and spectators near the equator described the tail as resembling "a stream of fire from a furnace."

The present comet will be visible, probably, until the beginning of October. The best time to see it is early in the morning, between three and four o'clock, in the direction of its tail to toward the North Star. Its elements have not yet been certainly computed; but it is supposed to have a period of thirty-one years, and to be identical with the comets which appeared in 1827 and 1764 (two periods). This would bring its return about 1858-1890.

PAUL MORPHY, ESQ.,

THE CHESS CHAMPION OF THE WORLD.



THE extraordinary chess genius, Paul Morphy, who is at present attracting the attention of the chess world toward his triumphs in England, is a native of New Orleans city, and is not yet twenty-one years old. His father, who was a prominent citizen and an honorable judge in Louisiana, among other innocent amusements indulged in, as a relief from the severe studies of the law, reckoned the game of chess, and young Paul early came in for his share of instruction at the family fireside. At the age of ten years he was familiar with the moves of the game; and before he was twelve his father, and his uncle, a distinguished amateur, found themselves surpassed by the youthful Paul. Soon after this he celebrated his birth-day events that visited the "Crescent City," and played three games with the "infant phenomenon." The young Morphy won, and made a "drawn" of the third.

At the meeting of the first National Chess Congress of the United States, held last summer in New York city, Paul Morphy was for the first time introduced to the public. His youthful appearance and wonderful power soon made him the centre of attraction, and as the losers of the Congress proceeded, it became apparent that he would be its champion—a position he finally won, with the cordial sympathy of all who witnessed his extraordinary performances, placing himself in the first position in the world as a chess-player. Following this triumph, his friends challenged Howard Staunton, the great chess author and analyst, and chess editor of the London News, the acknowledged champion of England.

On Paul's return to New Orleans he was received by his friends and the members of "his club" as a hero who had won laurels in a distant conquest. In time the news came that Mr. Staunton could not make it convenient to leave England, and therefore he could not meet Mr. Morphy. This did not satisfy Mr. Morphy's friends. Confident in his power to defeat any one who came in contact with him, the members of the club and his personal friends waited in a body on our young Paul's mother, and endeavored to overcome her reluctance to let her boy cross the Atlantic. After much persuasion, in which "Young America" argued that our national reputation was involved in the proposed contest, the permission was given, and in due time young Paul sailed for Europe.

The bold challenge of young Morphy, and the reports of the printed games he played at the National Congress, had their effect in England, and he received the best homage to his surprising powers from abroad, in a cordial invitation to attend the great gathering of the chess-players of Europe which took place at Birmingham last year. So great, indeed, was the curiosity to see him, that the regular time set for the gathering was postponed, in the hope that Mr. Morphy would appear. On his arrival, finally, in England, he was received with the most enthusiastic marks of gratification. The first people of England, including the nobility and gentry, and men distinguished for science and learning, vied with each other to do honor to the youthful stranger.

Preliminary contests, including players of world-wide fame, were soon arranged, and Morphy presented himself at the various clubs, the observed of all observers. Quiet and unpretending, never exulting, never off his guard, he entered upon practical demonstrations of his skill. Very soon he lit up the fires of excitement; all were enthusiastic, save Mr. Staunton and a few of his ilk, who reluctantly yielded to the belief that a young American youth was about to wrest the crown of superiority from veteran brows. Every step he made, however, gave indication of his power, and admiration finally gave way to enthusiasm; and even Mr. Staunton, who probably at the outset disdained to accept Morphy's challenge, has been forced to acknowledge the surprising ability of the youthful player. The speaking of Morphy's triumphal progress, one of the leading London journals remarks, "A general chess conflagration seems to be kindling just when the political and fashionable world begin to 'pale their ineffectual fires' in the approaching dawn of the recess. The matches which have produced this startling effect are not of the Lucifer order, but will burn longer and more steadily than the most mischievous of Palmer's best strawns. To convey our views in a more familiar metaphor, Mr. Morphy, the champion of the American chess world, is in the field, and prepared to joust with all corners. And—putting aside a match with Mr. Lowenthal (just finished), and another with Mr. Staunton (now on the tapis)—thus far, he has kept his ground triumphantly. Though occasionally beaten, he has scored a considerable majority of games against every player whom he has encountered, including several of our first English celebrities. And this, with a gallery of strangers (looking on), and at the age of twenty-one. Within a few months since, we read of the American phenomenon who was to "whip all creation" at the checkered field, we confess we felt somewhat skeptical. The language of the West is singularly tinged with Oriental hyperbole, and this young lion, the auspices of Mr. Barnum, has become a science. We thought of the Ohio pork-mound and the steam horse—of the hunter who could whip his weight in wild cats, and the mare whose rapid transit past successive mile-stones cut the country into a appearance of a cornfield-cut-up. Even the report of the New York Chess Congress, would not prepare amateur from New Orleans won, unless our memory fails us, eighty-one games out of eighty-four, did not positively slight and abandon them. The games were brilliant; but they were played chiefly against blindfolders, with whom it might be a mistake literies. So dashing a style would perhaps prove fatal when tried against wary veterans, trained in defenses and resources of the subtlest art, years ago when once gained. Such were our previous impressions and those of many of the players and pressions not destitute of some a priori probability. But we were mistaken—we confess it frankly and deliberately—utterly and absolutely mistaken. Mr. Morphy needs no aid either of 'yarn' or 'whale chat' (we quote liberal American slang metaphors) to establish his claims as an extraordinary genius in his line. This is no place for discussing the value of chess, nor for a recital of our views as to of intellectual power. Enough to say that its living votaries are legion, including men of the very high literary or professional distinction; and that it is historically associated with recollections of Charles XII., Napoleon, and other

THE FRENCH IMPERIAL PRINCE. —[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"Dead, but scepted monarchs who still rule
Our spirits from their urns."

Our present purpose is to claim for our distinguished visitor the high rank and consequent chivalrous player, the praise to which he is entitled in that character even from the non-chessplaying world."

Speaking of Mr. Morphy's appearance, our London authority says: "Look at him as he plays. You see a fine, full face, with a high forehead, a piercing clear eye, and fine, well-developed ear; but when you have observed him long and frequently, you discover that he is never flurried, never disturbed, that a defeat does not discourage, nor a victory elate him; you see he is, in his every action and self-possessed, whether in the quiet circle of the St. George Club or in the noisier gallery of the Chess Divan, and is, consequently, an easy and graceful player. We ever saw to do his own powers justice under the mental tension of a long game, and the trials of temper which frequently attend it.

The terms of the match alluded to in our extracts between Mr. Löwenthal and Mr. Morphy, were that the winner of the first nine games should be entitled to the stakes. The match was played by Morphy, nine; Löwenthal, three; three draws. It may not be uninteresting to our readers, as showing the importance the English attach to minutiæ in chess, to state that, in this contest, Mr. Morphy's "seconds" are Lord Arthur Clinton and Mr. J. Owen. Throughout the time this game was in progress, Mr. Staunton secured at Mr. Lowenthal's play, and insinuated that it was an easy matter to beat his game. This led its effect on Mr. Morphy, and he revenged himself at Staunton's When the Birmingham chess tournament came off, Mr. Morphy refused to join it: the result was, that Mr. Staunton and Mr. Lowenthal came together as the champions of the tournament, and Mr. Lowenthal —not Mr. Morphy engaged—took Mr. Staunton badly. Mr. Morphy then challenged the eight champions of the tournament to play them, blindfolded, all at once. The challenge was promptly accepted, and Mr. Morphy won seven out of the eight games—a most unprecedented feat in matches of chess, and showing a mental power that has no corresponding example. Mr. Morphy's next victory will be over Mr. Staunton, the match has been arranged. As an evidence of the style of Mr. Morphy, we give the following consultation game between Mr. Morphy and Mr. Barnes

(Philidor's Defense to the Queen's Pawn.)

WHITE (Mr. Barnes).	BLACK (Mr. M.).
1. P to K 4th	P to K 4th
2. K Kt to B 3d	P to Q 3d
3. P to Q 4th	P to K 3d

(Mr. Barnes thinks this move of Philidor's a defensive one, and, in fact quite so harmless as some writers on chess have represented it to be.)

4. Q P takes KP	K P takes K P
5. K Kt to K 5th (a)	Q to Q 5th
6. P to K 4th	K Kt to Q B 4th

(The next move is bad. K Kt to K B 3d, or even Q to Kt 3d, may be believed to be—I. Q Kt to Q B 3d, a move to which no satisfactory reply has been discovered. The move in the text, however, is the present game opens the attack, and thus bringing out the King's Kt, but it has yet to undergo analysis.)

7. K Kt to B 3d (b)	P to K B 3d

(He might have taken the P. Queening the pawn, the piece if his Kt to Kt 6th, by checking with the Queen at K R 5th.)

8. Castles	Q takes K Kt
9. P to Q B 3d	P to Q Kt 3d
10. K to Kt sq	B to Q Kt 2d
11. P to K 5th	K Kt to Q 4th
12. K to K B 3d	P to K B 4th
13. P to K B 4th	K Kt to Q B 3d
14. P to K 6th	P to K 3d
15. Q Kt to Q 5th	K Kt to Q 4th
16. P takes B	P takes P
17. Q takes Kt	P takes Q

(His only way to postpone defeat; for, if Pawn takes Kt, he is mated evidently in two moves.)

18. Castles	P takes Q Kt
19. P to Q Kt 3d	P to Q Th 4th
20. K to Kt sq	B to Q B 4th
21. Kt to K 4th	K to Kt 2d (c)
22. R to Q 3d	B to K sq
23. Kt takes B	Q takes Kt

And White resigns.

THE SON OF FRANCE.

By way of explaining the above title, we may as well mention at once that the idea of the French monarch is always called the "Son of France," the French people at large being enfans and by reason of loyalty his natural fathers and guardians. In this sense the people of France have been blessed with an abundance of paternity of late years. Henry Cieq was a son of France; the numerous offspring of Louis Philippe were sons and daughters of France; and now the ton of the Emperor Napoleon the Third—whose portrait we give on the preceding page—is the youngest child in the world and the army as the "Son of France."

As he is but an infant in the cradle, it can hardly be expected that he can have much of a biography as yet. But it is to be history that, in writing of his Imperial babyship, mention should be made of his military career. When he was an infant of but few days old, he was found to have a complete supply of the primitive food of infancy, and no other service could be then exacted by the Son of France in the abdominal region, he was duly admitted to the army as a private. The unswerving rectitude of this conduct, and his unblemished record in it, may be inferred from the fact that, since his first promotion, he has never once performed a movement, or even been called to account by his military superiors. Doubtless in consequence of this exemplary behavior as his regiment, the Commander-in-chief, his commanding officer as a fit subject for promotion. It was precisely shown from the time he first enlisted—at the age of several months—to the present moment—he is three years old—he has never been once off duty, has never had a punishment, or swearing, or insubordination, or disobedience. Such a soldier was evidently a fit subject for advancement, and accordingly, last month, the Imperial Highness was duly promoted to the rank of corporal, with the pay of one penny per day, and one a day and an extra glass of pop-eye.

This is the latest account with mournful tidings. They have almost got over these pecuniary losses in England; but the present Prince of Wales was entitled, at his birth, to hold a court of justice in Lancaster, and administer the law, as the Duke of Lancaster, and, ever body knows that George the Fourth was a bishop—and Some of the German princes exercise—or are deemed in the exercise—certain functions of a spiritual character, almost from the hour of their birth. Indeed, mental or physical capacity has never been considered essential in the Son of France, and he is dead to the performance of public duties. In the old Spanish dominions kingdoms of Europe, fifteen and eighteen were usually the ages at which princes attained their majority, and entered upon the exercise of their regal authority; and even in France the Prince is as competent to be a corporal at three, and sovereign at four, as he is to be a father of a numerous boys were to administer despotic governments. In such cases one must fall back on the old saying—

"La valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années."

LITERARY.

The hymns of the saints have been the most sublime poetry in all ages. Poets of every name and language, seeking the grandest themes for their growth, have found them in the lives of those which the religious history and the destiny of the race of man suggest. Like it is not strange in the epics of great poets, the music of Dante, the fervor of Tasso, the sublimity of Milton, that the perfection of religious feeling—and, indeed, of poetry—in the simple songs that are heard by the breaden in their worship of the Creator and Saviour, and sung from the lips of the martyrs and confessors in all ages. Words of simple beauty and sublime import, which have come down to us from the early Christian times have reached heaven from the very depths of human woe, consisting of our extremity of sorrow, smoothed pillows of death, shed down grief in deep graves, and opened views of heaven from the verge of hell—such words, so simple, so lonely, unpolished, unlearned, have nevertheless been in their touch of the sorrows of a world, and have been sealed to immortality by a more certain stamp than has been placed on even the Father of Epics, or the Prince of Song, in the days of his England. If there be any of the songs of earth which will outlast time itself, and of which we shall be permitted to take the words and phrases with us to heaven to be used in the choirs there, they are those of the early Christians. They are the one and only melodies in heaven who remember with interest the days of their pilgrimage, and whose eager lips tremble to the notes of the golden harps, if they do not actually utter the old songs they sang in the holiday morning of their early pilgrimage.

There David stands, with harp in hand,
As master of the band;
A thousand times that man were blessed
That might his music hear!
There Heman, Asaph, Ethan, sing
With tunes surpassing sweet;
And all the sons of Levi, they
Singing shout for joy!

There dear Saint Andrew, Salome sings,
Saint Austin doth the like,
Old Simeon and Zachary
Have all their voices set.
There Magdalen hath left her moan,
And cheerful sings with Mary,
With all blest saints, whose harmony
Through heaven doth ring always.

Our attention is directed to the subject at present by a volume published by Carter & Brothers —THE VOICE OF CHRISTIAN LIFE IN SONG; or, HYMNS AND HYMN-WRITERS OF MANY LANDS AND AGES. The author is an English clergyman. The work seems to be enthusiastically executed, and with great success. The book will therefore prove interesting to all lovers of poetry, and to those of the finest lyrics in any languages. Translations are given with the originals, from the earliest, down to date, and deep, and brilliant, known as the Methodists. Tens of thousands have gone into it with new while chief value of the book consists in its arrangement and condensation, within a few pages, of so many of the noblest hymns and so much of their history.

Clement of Alexandria, Ephraim Syrus, and Gregory of Nazianzum, lead the choir. St. Ambrose, Gregory the Great, Venantius, and Bernard follow. The Medieval hymns are well chosen and well translated. We especially admire the rendering of "Jesu dulcis memoria"—

"Ad præsentia vita fontem mens sitivit arida."

Here is the first stanza:

"In the heart of Jesus Christ, the parched heart its thirst would slake,
And the soul in flesh imprisoned, longs with love to see and wake to brink—
Exile, seeking, sighing, yearning, in her fatherland to ache."

Many of the finest hymns of the Church have been in the Reformed Church, and the Presbyterian Reformed Church, that public worship should be conducted in the vulgar tongue of the worshipers, by which we do not mean that we have forfeited the private enjoyment of those outbursts of Christian type and logic which have come down to us from good men of olden times. We have reason to believe that, of late years, the knowledge of most of the old hymns of the monks has been almost lost, even by those who are capable of appreciating their excellence, and that the pen-rule class of hymns of praise is likely to be forever forgotten.

The volume of Mr. Trench on "Sacred Latin Poetry," published by Parker, is a valuable compendium of these hymns, although we have marked some important errors and omissions in the examples given by him. Want of space forbids our recalling many of the hymns to the recollection of those of our readers who have forgotten them, in a few stanzas suffice. Here is one, from Adam of St. Victor, on Judas the Baptist:

Ardens fax, nec sub modio
Et ad verum lucem ducens
Multa docet lumina;
Non lux sita sed locanda,
Lucebas vox in deserto,
Lux librabas sonita.

The splendor of the hymn of Hildebert, Archbishop of Tours in the Twelfth Century, has seldom been surpassed in any language:

Urbs cœlestis, urbs beata,
Supra petitus pinnaculo,
Urbs in pura satis tua,
De lapidibus electis, sacris parata.
Nec relictus ego, quod mentis ego filius ire,

and that through three thousand hexameter lines! Let us hope that Mr. Trench will, for the sake of his kind in America, will induce others to look up these songs of the past, and reorganize in them those simple and sublime hopes and affections that characterize the Christian tool in all countries and ages. We subjoin the volume to our universal circulation. Its character is familiar and fitted to the home and fireside, and will prove to all Christian houses a new mine of poetry and piety.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION.

The Government expedition to Paraguay will start in the course of a week. It is to consist of some fifteen vessels. The steamers Fulton and Water Witch, forming part of the squadron, have been ordered to Gosa. A very heavy caliber have been selected for both vessels—the armament of the Fulton consisting of one eleven-inch shell gun on a pivot, and four of nine-inch in broadside; and that of the Water Witch of one nine-inch shell gun on a pivot. In addition, the Fulton will carry two boat howitzers. The Water Witch will also carry a crew of twenty-five men, and a surgeon and assistant surgeon. Both vessels are supplied with small arms and ammunition, and with all necessary stores, including the Sharpe and Minie muskets, together with revolvers.

STATE OF AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

The Herald correspondent writes: The civil officers now reside in Salt Lake City, but the army is encamped with Camp Floyd, forty miles from Salt Lake Valley. The people are employed on the high roads, and some are busy building houses. Provisions are very cheap and plentiful. There all has been peace and good joy. Some eighty wagons, with provisions, arrived from the west a few days since, and more are expected on the way, where they get overwrought prices—for instance, flour sells at the rate of $1 per pound. But it is owing to their praise who will give it than the people's blame who deserve it. The people are poor, and the rich dare not give them, and the sympathizing kindness of that army is the only thing to cheer their pilgrimage.

General Johnston has the confidence and good-will of the people. The officers of the army, as a body, are gentlemen, and with a refinement purely American they vie with each other in their kindness to the Mormons. Many of the officers—and they are of the best—have purchased their wives and children of the Mormons, and in the purchase of the wives they have taken pains to clothe the naked people; sometimes they will then for a trifle, a horse or a mule, buy the wife back to-day."

DREADFUL STATE OF THE WOMEN.

